

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2012 with funding from internet archive

THE Vation

A LIBERAL WEEKLY DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, ECONOMICS, SCIENCE, FOREIGN AFFAIRS, LITERATURE, DRAMA AND THE ARTS

FOUNDED 1865

VOLUME 158

JANUARY 1, 1944, to JUNE 24, 1944

THE NATION ASSOCIATES, Inc. 20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK 7

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Buclingame, Calif.

THE RESERVE

INDEX TO VOLUME 158

JANUARY 1, 1944, to JUNE 24, 1944

rs are used to indicate conce
rticle aragraph
rticle aragraph
rticle aragraph
rticle aragraph
aragraph
aragraph
aragraph
aragraph
tures
tures
cle
reviewers are indexed
Review Section.
Pages
reviewers are indexed

rages rages
1- 28 January 1 377-404 April 1
1- 28 January 1 377-404 April 1 29- 56 January 8 405-42 April 8 75- 84 January 15 377-404 April 1 29- 56 January 15 405-42 April 8 75- 84 January 15 405-42 April 8 75- 84 January 29 407-524 April 20 407-524 Apr
57- 84 January 15 433-460 April 15
85-112 January 22 461-496 April 22
113-144 January 29 497-524 April 29
145-172 February 5 525-552 May 6
173-200 February 12 553-580 May 13
201-236 February 19 581-608 May 20
237-264 February 26 609-636 May 27
265-292 March 4 637-664 June 3
293-320 March 11 665-692 June 10 321-348 March 18 693-720 June 17 349-376 March 25 721-748 June 24
321-348 March 18 693-720 June 17 349-376 March 25 721-748 June 24
349-376 March 25 721-748 June 24
A P.	AGE
. F. of L. See American rederation of
. F. of L. See American federation of labor MG. See War, European—Allied military M.G. See War, European—Allied military government, c. W. Comments on letter by Journalist concerning the Chinese school of journalism; c. 690; see also C government
ekerman, C. W.
Comments on letter by Journalist concerning the Chinese school of journalism;
C690; see also C	551
ddress unknown. J. Agee; MP	577 dmiralty islands. See War, Pacific dventures of Mark Twain. J. Agee; MP	577 teronautics. See Aviation igee, James
His movie criticisms praised. F. Thomp-
gee, James His movie criticisms praised. F. Thompson; C. War newsreels and war-record films; S Reviews of motion pictures:	663
War newsreels and war-record films; S	743
Address unknown	577 577
Adventures of Mark Twain	577
And the angels sing.	634
Army's "Screen magazine"	288
Attack!-The invasion of New Britain
688,	743
Retween two worlds	549
Broadway shythm	577
Ruffalo Bill	577
Cover girl	120
Curso of the est sounds the	401
Destination Toland	22
Destination Tokyo	600
English of Ca Manh abo	661
Eve of St. Mark, the	216
Fighting seabees, the	510
Pollow the boys	5//
Gastight	003
Going my way	3//
Guy named Joe, a	549
Hairy ape, the	716
Happy land	549
Higher and higher	23
Hitler gang, the	577
Imposter, the	344
It happened tomorrow	577
Jane Eyre	197
Knickerbocker holiday	577
Attack!—The invasion of New Britain Between two worlds Broadway rhythm Buffalo Bill Cover girl Curse of the cat people, the Destination Tokyo Gaslight Going my way Gaslight Going my way Gaslight Going my way Guy mamed Ipe, a. 52, Happy land Higher and higher Hitler gang, the Imposter, the Imposter, the domorrow Jane Eyrel domorrow Jane Eyrel Lady and the monster, the Lady in the dark Lifeboat Lost angel Lost angel Madame Curie	577
Lady in the dark	316
Lifeboat	108
Lodger, the	197
Lost angel	81
Madame Curie Memphis belle Miracle of Morgan's creek, the Mr. Skeffington Negro soldier the	23
Memphis belle	456
Miracle of Morgan's creek, the	167
Mr. Skeffington	661
Negro soldier, the	316
No greater love	316
Passage to Marseille	316
Phantom lady	261
Pin-up girl	577
Purple heart, the	316
Riding high	52
Roger Touhy, gangster	716
See here, Private Hargrove.	344
Seven days ashore	577
Shine on harvest moon	373
Show business	577
Song of Bernadette the	137
Mr. Skeffington Negro soldier, the. No greater love Passage to Marseille. Phantom lady Plin-up girl Purple heart, the Riding high Roger Touly gaugeter. Seven days ashore. Seven days ashore. Shine on, harvest moon. Show business Song of Bernadette, the Standing room only.	316

P	AGE
Sullivans the	316
Tender comrade	549 373 577
Tunisian victory	577
Underground report	661
Uninvited, the	316
Uncertain glory Underground report Uninvited, the Up in Arms. Up in Mabel's room. White cliffs of Dover, the. With the marines at Tarawa Yellow canary, the	661 316 316 577
Voice in the wind	344
White cliffs of Dover, the	634
Yellow canary, the	577
Agencies, governmental. See United States; ammes of agencies forciulture Farm labor and the Associated farmers; The La Follette committee's report. I. F. Stone; S. House votes to give statutory authority to the Farm security agency; EP.  the agricultural appropriation bill, S.P. Subsides Bankhead bill, the EP.
Farm labor and the Associated farmers;
The La Follette committee's report. I. F.	502
House votes to give statutory authority to	302
the Farm security agency; EP	666
School-lunch program passed attached to	666
Subsidies
Bankhead bill, the; EP	113
Labor urged not to torce a showdown on Subsidies Bankhead bill, the; EP. Labor urged not to force a showdown on the wage formula in order to save the President expected to veto Congress's ban on the use of further food subsidies; E. resident Roosevelt's five-point program; E 88; see also. Subsidies of the anti-subsidy bill is sustained by Congress; EP. Air, M. Webster, recitals. B. H. Haggin; M. Alabama	32
President expected to veto Congress's ban	204
President Roosevelt's five-point program:
E88; see also	90
President's veto of the anti-subsidy bill is	238
Air power. See Aviation	230
Aitkin, Webster, recitals. B. H. Haggin; M	605 sustained by Congress; EP.  Air power. See Aviation Aitkin, Webster, recitals. B. H. Haggin; M. Alabama Hill, Senator L., seeks reelection to the United States Senate. E. M. Steed; See, 1506; see also EP53; EP  EP. nominated for Representative; EP. nominated for Representative; Crowley aids the cartels. I. F. Stone; Crowley aids the cartels. I. F. Stone; Milens
United States Senate. E. M. Steed;
S506; see also EP553; EP	666
EP nominated for Representative;	666
Alien property custodian  Crowley aids the cartels. I. F. Stone; S
Crowley aids the cartels. I. F. Stone;	240
Aliens	240
Comment on K. Grossman's article, "Unrec-
Aliens Comment on K. Grossman's article, "Unrecognized allies"; C Entry and naturalization of eastern hemisphere Indians urged. J. J. Singh; C Allied Mediterranean commission. See Mediterranean advisory commission	111
sphere Indians urged. J. J. Singh; C	607
Allied Mediterranean commission. See Medi-
Allied Mediterranean commission. See Mediterranean advisory commission Allan, Richard Digesting the State department: S
Allan, Richard Digesting the State department; S Alsace-Lorraine	558
Alsace-Lorraine
Argus; S	100
Alvarez del Vayo, Julio	249
Condemns allied agreement with Spain on	249 wolfram. F. Kirchwey; S556; see
also EP	583
Mexico left and right: S	560
Mexico's war-time boom; S621; see	***
also EP	718
also EP639; C745,	746
Political strategy of invasion, the; S205;	214
Return from Mexico: S
Wallace in Chungking; S	465 707
America. See United States
Digesting the State department; S. Digesting the Nazifying the University of Strasbourg. Argus; S. Alvarez del Vayo, Julio Brazil's underground movement; S. Condems allied agreement with Spain on wolfram F. Kirchwey; S candidate for the presidency unless the
Republicans nominate an avowed isola-	639
Smith may call a convention to draft	003
Colonel McCormick as a presidential can-	554
American concert ballet. B. H. Haggin: S.	289
American federation of labor
Issues program for the post-war period; EP	499 workers be taken in with jurisdiction limited to that of 1936; EP	147
workers into the federation; EP.	582
Rejects Roosevelt's proposal for C.I.O. rep-ization conference: EP	322
American Jewish committee	-
Urges the British government to abrogate	114
American labor party	114
Left wing captures the state organization.
F. Kirchwey; S	409 435
Right wing withdraws and forms a new Liberal party; E	641
R. Bendiner: S
candidate for the presidency uniess the Republicans nominate an avowed isola- Republicans nominate an avowed isola- Smith may call a convention to draft  Colonel McCormick as a presidential can- didate; EP.  American concert ballet. B. H. Haggin; S.  American federation of labor Issues program for the post-war period; EP Proposes that J. L. Lewis's United mine  that the state of 1936; EP.  Rejects Lewis's terms for entry of the mine  workers into the federation; EP.  Rejects Roosevelt's proposal for C.I.O. rep- resentation at International labor organization  conference; EP.  American Jewish committee Urges the British government to abrogate  the white paper on Palestine; EP.  American Jewish committee  Urges the British government to abrogate  the white paper on Palestine; EP.  American labor party  ER, Sirchwey; S.  Right wing may form a new party; EP.  Right wing may form a new party; EP.  Right wing withdraws and forms a new  Liberal party; E.  Versus the C.I.O. political action committee.  R. Bendiner; S	641

American legion	PAGE
Atherton, W. H., fights Rankin's efforts to block the "G.I. bill of rights"; E	527 to H. Bridges to address student body. F. G.; C	459
American medical association Fights the Murray-Wagner-Dingell health
American legion Atherton, W. H., fights Rankin's efforts to block the "G.I. bill of rights"; E Protests University of Colorado's invitation of F. G., C American medical association Fights the Murray-Wagner-Dingell health insurance bill. J. M. Morse; S676; see also was a seen of the seen of t	648
And the dismissal of C. S. McGlue from
W. H. Baldinger; C112; see also	10
Wins maintenance-of-membership clause in	352
American telephone and telegraph company	03.
Defeats union proposal for employee repre-	500
Negotiates for transfer of teletype, teleunion; E	500
Amerikanski Srbobran, B. Raditsa; S118;	201
And the angels sing. J. Agee; MP	291 634
Anti-Semitism. See Jews Anti-trust laws See Managolies
Anzio. See War, European-Italy
And the British white paper on Palestine.
And the British white paper on Palestine.  J. Lurie; S	92
"Argentina? Si, si, mein führer you're through." Low; Ct	445
ence of the International labor organiza-
J. Lurie; S	497
see also	149
Axis post-war plans. D. Thompson; S 158; see also.  Behind the Bolivian coup d'état. M. Seo-ane; S.  Farrell, General E., becomes presiden; EP 265; see also.  How fascism came. S. Bagú; S 384; see also Ct.	66
Farrell, General E., becomes president; EP	387
Farrell, General E., becomes president; EP	385
New leaders force the resignation of Gen-	302
eral A. Gilbert and E. P. Gonzalez of the	237
Perón versus Ramirez. M. Seoane; S	237 387
S M. Seoane;	387
Ramirez, P., ousted as president by the	265
Ramirez, P., ousted as president by the colonels; EP. capital, the. S. Bagti, S. Seeks to develop a bloc of fascist states in Latin America; E. Why it broke with Germany. F. Kirchwey;	265 384
Why it broke with Germany. F. Kirchwey;
Argentinita. B. H Haggin; S289;	149 717
Argus
Aerial destruction of buildings of cultural value Anti-espionage campaign Anti-nazi jokes and slogans Awaiting the invasion. 253; see also Black factor in bloods. Black factor in bloods. Break in German civilian morale foreseen; S Campaign launched for salvage of textile goods	337 161 189
Anti-nazi jokes and slogans	189
Berlin after the air-raids	44
Black market in labor	596
seen; S	681
goods	626
Casualties on the eastern front	74
Children's names reveal the influence of "cultural nazism".  Communal kitchens replace private housekeeping.  Disaffection in the Leipzig military barracks.  Food shortages	216
keeping	596
Disaffection in the Leipzig military bar-	44
Food shortages	653
Foreign workers in brown uniforms	253
France divided into labor-manpower
"Front pigs" reappear in the army	366
Himmler orders all men to serve in the auxiliary police	310
Hitler's birthday celebration	541
Tannes "Bront pigs" reappear in the army Himmler orders all men to serve in the auxiliary police Hitler's birthday celebration. How the news of the Normandy is announced was announced	737 216 44 474 395
Manufacture of sweets discontinued	44
Maquis flourishes, the596; see also Misuse of military identification papers.	395
Nazi reply to the leaflets dropped by
How the news of the Normandy Inwasion  was amounced  was amounced  Maguis flourishes, the . 596; see also.  Misuse of military identification papers.  Nazi reply to the leaflest dropped by  allied fliers  Nazifying the University of Strasbourg.  Nazis seek SS. recruits outside the reich  New anti-fewish campaign.	100
Nazis seek SS. recruits outside the reich New anti-Jewish campaign	161
New anti-Jewish campaign	709 equipment during all fallottitities

Raising the birth rate; the "well of life" plan in Norway. 18 Scarcity of soap. 709 Schwarze korps urges increase in births in preparation for third world war C66; see also. 18, 568 Secret weapons 44, 393 State versus nazi party machinery. 189 Transportation system deteriorates. 568; see also. 681	Baldwin, Roger R.	Brittain, Vera plan in Norway	Baldwin, Roger R. Comments on "Hymn to free enterprise" by J. D. K.; C460; see also P 329 Balkan states	Brittain, Vera Her pamphlet, "Massacre by bombing," protests mass air-raids as a military weapon; E
Schwarze korps urges increase in births	Balkan states	weapon; E
in preparation for third world war	Between hell and blazes. Low; Ct 37 Care of doves, the. Low; Ct 469	Broadcasting. See Federal communications
Secret weapons44, 393	Hitler's satellites, unwilling victims or ac- complices? E	Broadway rhythm. J. Agee; MP 577
Transportation system deteriorates568;	Nazis attack Tito forces furiously in	Soldiers' votes and 1944; S 207
see also	Balkan states Between hell and blazes. Low; Ct	commission; Radio Broadway rhythm. J. Agee; MP shortly; EP	J. Alvarez del Vayo; C. 746; see also manpower draft	Russia's influence on post-war developments.  B. Raditsa: S. 440: see also E.P. 433	651; EP
Vacation season 541 War between the Catholic church and the	See also names of countries	Browder, Raissa Irene
War between the Catholic ceuters and the 421 Mari regime in the Catholic Ca	move in to join Tito for a Balkan drive shortly, EP	Biddle urged to suspend the deportation order against her: EP 30
Weser-Ems starts its own race institute 393 Armaments. See War effort	Ballet theater, the. B. H. Haggin; S522, 550 Baltic states	Browne, Mallory
Army, United States. See United States—	Soviet plan for sixteen autonomous soviet republics seen as a basis for the entry of	Broz, Josip. See Yugoslavia
Art	the Baltic states into the Soviet Union:	Bruner, Jerome S.  Public opinion and the next president: S., 704
Abstract (: Greenberg 450		Sye also Communist party Swe also Communist party Browder, Raissa Irene Bidding aggest Bidding aggest Browne, Mallory Browne, Mallory British tories look ahead; S. 11 Broz. Josip. See Yugoslavia Bruner, Jerome S. Public opinion and the next president; S. 704 Budapest quartet, the. B. H. Haggin; M. 25, Budget, public. See Finance, public
Exhibitions: Abstract and surrealist artists under forty. C. Greenberg	Bankhead, John H., 2nd. See Agriculture— Subsidies.	Budget, public. See Finance, public Buffalo Bill. J. Agee; MP
Abstract and surrealist artists under forty. C. Greenberg	Barkley, Alben W. Leads Senatorial revolt against the President over the tax veto; E267; see also F. 268: 270	Buffalo Bill. J. Agee; MP 577 Bulgaria
C. Greenberg	dent over the tax veto; E267; see also E268: 270	Bulgarian democrats in exile. B. Raditsa:
Friedman, Arnold. C. Greenberg 456	Barnard, Chester I. See United service or-	S 644 Warned by Russia to break with Germany; cabinet crisis continues; EP 637 Burdick, Usher L. Opposes Nye in North Dakota for the Re- publican senatorial nomination. H. Y. Williams; S 730
Gris, Juan. C. Greenberg 495	ganizations Barrett Tack	cabinet crisis continues; EP 637
Masson, André. C. Greenberg 604	Cross-word puzzles28, 56, 84, 112,	Opposes Nye in North Dakota for the Re-
Posada, José Guadalupe. D. C. Miller. 542	404, 432, 460, 496, 524, 552, 580, 608, 636,	publican senatorial nomination. H. Y. Williams: S
Quintanilla, Luis. C. Greenberg 634	664, 692, 720, 747 Baruch Hancock report See United States	Burma
Romantic painting in America. C. Greenberg. 495 Whey, Mark. C. Greenberg. 495 Whey are the free freenberg. 24 Federation of modern painters and sculptors versus the Museum of modern art. C. Greenberg. 195	Barrett, Jack Cross-word puzzles	Burma Allied military failure to reopen the Burma road. D. W. Mitchell; S
Tobey, Mark. C. Greenberg 495 Whitney annual, the. C. Greenberg 24	Barzun, Jacques Comments on "The time of the assassins" by L. Bogan; C635; see also 475 Bates, Ralph	China's role in the drive to recapture
Federation of modern painters and sculptors	by L. Bogan; C635; see also 475	Japanese drive into India to cut Stilwell's
Greenberg	Dates, Rapin Comments on "No unity with fascists" by J. Alvarez del Vayo; C745; see also 651; EP 639 Battista, Orlando Aloysius Atoms at work; S	offensive in North Burma; EP 378 Tapanese threaten to cut the Assam rail-
Greenberg	J. Alvarez del Vayo; C745; see also	Way; EP 433
Report of the La Follette committee. I. F.	Battista, Orlando Aloysius	coast would isolate Japanese forces in Association of internes and medical students;	Bedaux, Charles E., death; E	Burma and India; EP
supports the Murray - Wagner - Dingell	Belgium Government in exile, the. B. Raditsa: S 616	drive; EP 294
Associated farmers Report of the La Follette committee. I. F. Stone; S. Association of internes and medical students; supports the Murray-Wagner-Dingell health insurance bill. J. M. More; 648 Atherton, Warren H. See American legion	Bendiner, Robert, leaves Nation staff for the	Business Chase national bank indicted for transac-
Atlantic charter	Political action committee of the C.I.O.:	tions involving the smuggling of indus-
And Russia's territorial ambitions. L.	S7; see also EP 202 Bent, Silas	Chase national bank indicted for transac- tions involving the smuggling of indus- trial diamonds to the axis; E
The state of the s	Bent, Silas (7, See also EP 202  Bent, Silas (7, See also EP 39  Berge, Wendell. See Department of justice Bernstein, Leonard. B. H. Haggin, M 25, 605  Between two worlds. J. Agee; MP 549  Biddle, Francis. See Department of justice Bogan, Louise Modern detective novel, the: S475; see	Inflation Inflation
Churchill sees need for clarification, F.	Westbrook, Jr.; C264; see also 39  Rerge Wendell See Department of justice	And congressional politics; EP
Kirchwey; S 381; see also 325	Bernstein, Leonard. B. H. Haggin; M25, 605	to revise the Little steel formula; E 204 social provisions. K. Hutchison; S529;	Between two worlds, J. Agee; MP 549	ban on subsidies: E204, see also see also 584 Will not apply to Germany, says Church-	Bogan, Louise	EP 238
Attack The invesion of New Britain T	Modern detective novel, the; S475; see also C	Wages and living costs; E32; see also C290
Will not apply to Germany, says Churchill; E	Boisson, Pierre. See French North Africa	A. F. of L. program backs free enter-
Agespurg, Anita, death. G. Baer; S	Bolivia Argentina is behind the recent coup d'etat;	A. F. of L. program backs free enterprise; EP. 499 Baruch-Hancock report, the: EP. 238 Foreign trade expansion; EP. 499 Role of American business ment in the pripage of th
Accused by the Chicago Tribune of limited	E 5 Background of V. Paz Estenssoro, M.	Foreign trade expansion; EP 499
Its war record; EP	Background of V. Paz Estenssoro. M. Scoane; S	Role of American business men in the
Austrian democrats in exile. B. Raditsa;	Second: S	Prices
S 644	New government—pro-fascist or democratic?	subsidies; E204; see also EP 238
S. 644  Hapsburg legitimism—new style, R. Vambery; S211; see also C 347  Post-war government. A. Sturmthal; S 36  Automobiles	Why E. Peñaranda Castillo's government	Congress threatens to cripple the price-
Post-war government. A. Sturmthal; S 36 Automobiles	Why E. Peñaranda Castillo's government fell. M. Seoane; S	ing many ceilings; EP 697
And synthetic tires. McA. Coleman and P. Elias: S	Even Holland goes left; S 679	E 113
And synthetic tires. McA. Coleman and P. Elias; S	Even Holland goes left; S	Prices And the Senate vote against further food subsidies; E204; see also EP238 Congress threatens to cripple the price-control structure by amendments lift.  697 President Roosevelf's five-point program; E88; see also 90; EP on military affairs; EP	Price-control act should be continued in Brittain, V., protests mass air-raids as a military weapon; E		Senate banking committee proposes that
Postwar	Borgese, G. A.	controls be limited to 45 essential com-
Postwar Competition for post-war United States routes, K. Hutchison; S	Bonomi, Ivanoc. See Italy Borgese, G. A. Comments on "No unity with fascists" by J. Alvarez del Vayo; C745; see also 651; EP. His telegram from Puerto Rico to Italian meeting in New York stopped by cen- sor; C	Profits B T B-i-
Lea bill, the. K. Hutchison; S 271	His telegram from Puerto Rico to Italian	Of the big steel companies. B. J. Reis;
American flag line; plan is supported	meeting in New York stopped by cen-	Versus contract renegotiation. K. Keyer-leber; S. Russia as a market for American manufactured products. F. Sternberg; S. 735. "—But not goodbye". M. Marshall; D 521
by Pan-American airways; EP 378 Railroads seek a share of post-war domes-	sor; C	Russia as a market for American manufac-tic routes. K. Hutchison; S 271	Brazil	"-But not goodbye". M. Marshall; D 521
Avila Camacho, Manuel. See Mexico.	del Vayo; S	Byrnes, James F.
	Brehm, Bruno. F. C. Weiskopf; S 45	tion criticized. J. H. Collins; C 607
В	Boos, Subhas Chandra. See India Brazil Underground movement, the. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S	His speech on post-war economic stabiliza- tion criticized. J. H. Collins; C
B.S. Snapshot from Algiers; S	lowing navy shutdown of Long Island	tions into effect. I. F. Stone; S 270
Snapshot from Algiers; S 652 Badoglio, Pietro. See Italy	Bricker, John William	and that movementon, once of
Baer, Gertrude Augspurg, Anita, death: S	Hopes for presidential nomination revived by Willkie's defeat; EP	C
	Bridges, Harry	C.C.F. See Cooperative commonwealth fedversity of Colorado protested by the	cration C.I.O. See Congress of industrial organiza-
Baldinger, Wilbur Corrects "In the wind item regarding the	American legion. F. G.; C 459 Briggs. George N.: and the Hopkins letter:	California
S	Bridges, Harva address student hody of University of Colorado protested by the American legion. F. G.; C	Costello, J. M., Dies committee member, de- feated in primaries; EP611; see also
Massachusetts, Telegram-News; *C112; see also 10	British empire. See Great Britain	EP

[Jan.-June, 1944

Vol. 158]

200
Gahagan, H., wins Congressional nomination; EP	Strength of the Communist army and the guerrilla auxiliaries in the northwest.  M. S. Stewart; S	Congress of industrial organizations A.F. of L. rejects Roosevelt's proposal for	PAG
Canada C.C.F. scores sweeping victory in the Sas- katchewan election; EP	Universal military service law proves un- popular, M. S. Stewart: S	Congress of industrial organizations A.F. of L. rejects Roosevelt's proposal for C.I.O. representation at International labor organization conference; EP. Cost-of-living report; E. Political action committee	32:
Godbout, A., Liberal candidate, opposes M. Duplessis, leader of the conservative		Cost-oi-lying report; E.  Political action committee workers to register for the elections. J. S. Bruner; S.  Formation and purposes. R. Bendiner; S.  T; see also EP.  Its work may be embarrassed by the new Liberal party formed by the ALF right Liberal party formed by the ALF right Rankin and Hoffman demand an investigation of the PAC following defeat of three Dies committee members in the primaries; EP.  To be investigated by the Dies committee; EP.  To be investigated by the Dies committee; EP.  To be investigated by the Dies committee; EP.  Conscription. See Selective service Contracts, war. See War effort Cooperative commonwealth federation Its strength increasing rapidly in Canada.	70
Onion nationale, for the premiership of Quebec. E. Turcotte; S	Japanese drive to seize stretch of railroad linking Peking with Hankow and the Yangtze valley; EP	Formation and purposes. R. Bendiner; S7; see also EP.	202
	E. 613 Will Japan knock China out of the war? J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 707 Church, Roman catholic. See Roman Catholic	Its work may be embarrassed by the new Liberal party formed by the ALP right
Ouebec votes to socialize Montreal light,	Church, Roman catholic. See Roman Catholic church	Rankin and Hoffman demand an investi- gation of the PAC following defeat of	641 heat, and power consolidated. E. Tur- cotte; S	Churchill, Winston. See Great Britain City light company	three Dies committee members in the primaries; EP611; see also EP	660
F. H. Underhill; S532; see also EP	Washington. McA. Coleman; S 127 Civil aeronautics board	Bricker, urge a Congressional investi- gation of its funds and activities; EP	666
Political currents in Quebec. E. Turcotte;  Quebec votes to socialize Montreal light, heat, and power consolidated. E. Tur- Views on British commonwealth principles. F. H. Underhill; S. 532; see also EP 498; EP Capps, J. I. 54 Capriccio espagnol. B. H. Haggin; S. 717 Carriage from Sweden, a M. Moore; P. 311 Cartiage from Sweden, a M. Moore; P. 311 Cartons	Church, Roman catholic. See Roman Catholic church. Churchill, Winston. See Great Britain City light company Model public power plant in Seattle, Washington. McA. Coleman; S	To be investigated by the Dies committee; EP146; see also EP	239
Cardenas, Lazaro. See Mexico Carmen. B. H. Haggin; M	mestic routes. K. Hutchison; S	Kirchwey; S. Conscription. See Selective service	409
Carriage from Sweden, a. M. Moore; P 311 Cartels. See Monopolies Cartons	Investigatory procedure of the Civil service commission against government employ-	Contracts, war. See War effort Cooperative commonwealth federation Its strength increasing rapidly in Canada.
Cartels. See Monopolies Cartons  "Argentina? Si, si, mein führer you're through." Low 445 Between heil and blazes. Low 37 Blimp calls to blimp. Low 27 Burning of the books, the. G. Schreiber. 30.3 Care of doves, the. Low 660 Gare of doves, the. Low 183 "Elastic defense". Low 183 "Elastic defense". Low 729 Five minutes to twelve. S. Hook 590 France to the attack. A. Hoffmeister. 43 Little nations at the airplane counter. A. Young 301	ces; E	Its strength increasing rapidly in Canada.  D. Lewis; S 671; see also EP	663
Between hell and blazes. Low	More on the investigation of government employees; E	Scores sweeping victory in the Saskatche- wan election: EP	732
Care of doves, the. Low	ate confirmation of government employees earning over $4,500; EP377; see also EP	Cooperatives Challenge the oil trusts by their investments	15
Egregious imposter. Low	Clark, Michael Anxiety in Cairo over allied relations with	Plan for post-war international enterprises.  K, Hutchison; S.	154
France to the attack. A. Hoffmeister 43 Little nations at the airplane counter. A.	the French committee of national libera-	Coordinator of inter-American affairs Rockefeller, N. A., scored for failure to act
	Clausen, Harold C. Vansittart's views on post-war Germany;	enemy through Latin America; E Copland, Aaron. B. H. Haggin; M53,	115
maistore opens a second front. A. Robi- meister. 279 Son of heaven, the. A. Hoffmeister. 279 Spanish serenader. Low. 160 What! Another one? Low. 385 "When I said softening up', I didn't mean When Laid softening up', I didn't mean Catholic tuch. See Roman catholic church Catholic tuch. See Roman catholic church	C375; see also C318 Clayton, Will Appointed to handle disposal of government.	Cooperatives Challenge the oil trusts by their investments in petroleum refining. K. Hutchison; S. Plan for post-war international enterprises. K. Hutchison; S. K. Costello, John M. Member of the Dies committee defeated in the California primaries; EP. S. 11, see also EP. S. K. Hutchison; S. K. K. Hutchison; S. K. K. Hutchison; S. K. K. Hutchison; S. K. K. K. Hutchison; S. K. K. K. Hutchison; S. K.	563
"When I said 'softening up', I didn't mean here." Low	owned productive resources after the war. I. F. Stone; S270; see also 354	Member of the Dies committee defeated in the California primaries; EP611; see
Catholic chuch. See Roman catholic church Censorship Dewey charges State department with sup- pression of political news sent by Ameri-	Seeks anecdotes on W. Rogers; C 292	also EP	000
pression of political news sent by American reporters in London to their papers	tion 698 Restaurant in Algiers; S. 511 Clausen, Harold C. Vansitart's views on post-war Germany; Clacon 375; see also C. 318 Clausen, Harold C. Lacon Will 375; see also C. 318 Clacon Will Appointed to handle disposal of governmentowned productive resources after the war. I. F. Stone; S270; see also . 354 Clemens, Cyril Seeks an excellence on W. Rogers; C. 292 Colon Longo and Frank Hague; S12; see also EP 3; C. 111 Public power versus private power interests; S 127	Council for a democratic Germany. See Germany—Post war Cover girl. J. Agee; MP. Creel, George, defends C. Hull and the State department. I. F. Stone; S382; see also EP322; 325;	428
here; E	ests; S	department. I. F. Stone; S382; see also EP322; 325;	381
pression of pointical news sent by American reporters in London to their papers 407  Euguire's second-class mailing privileges withdrawn because of the Varga girl drawings; EP. 30  Great Britain restricts movements and messages of diajonats in London; EP. 497; see also EP. 553	Coleman, McAlister, and P. Elias Future prospects of natural and synthetic rubber; S	Criticism Johnson, S., as critic. J. W. Krutch; S Croatia. See Yugoslavia	218
see also EP	Collett, John Albert Investigated by the Dies committee for his role in the Peace now movement; EP 239	Johnson, S., as critic. J. W. Krutch; S Croatia. See Yugoslavia Crowley, Leo T. Aids the cartels. I. F. Stone; S210;	0.00
to Spain attacked; E	Byrnes, J. F., on post-war stabilization:	Course of the cat people, the. J. Agee; MP	401
Telegram from G. A. Borgese in Puerto Rico to Italian meeting in New York	Commerce. See Business Committee for constitutional government	Government in exile, the. B. Raditsa; S Russo-Czech mutual assistance treaty, the. L. Witold; S	125
Borgese; C	Backs proposal for constitutional provision limiting income and inheritance taxes to	2. 11.000, 2	12.
Indicted for pre-Pearl Harbor transactions involving the smuggling of industrial dia-	Commerce. See Business Committee for constitutional government Backs proposal for constitutional provision limiting income and inheritance taxes to a maximum of 25 per cent; EP	D Don See Was European sages of dialomats in London; EP. 497; see also EP. secrecy on oil shipments 407 "Strange Truit" banned from Boston book- stores by the police; EP. 379 Telegram from G. A. Borgese in Puerto Rico to Italian meeting in New York stopped by United States censor. G. A. Sorgese; C. Chase national bank Involving the snuggling of industrial dia- monds to the axis; E. 115 Cherry orchard, the. M. Marshall; D. 167 Chiago Tribune	Committee of physicians for the improvement of medical care, supports the Murray-Wagner-Dingell health insurance bill. J. M. Morse; S676; see also648 Commonwealth federation. See Cooperative commonwealth federation	D-Day, See War, European Dance, the American concert ballet performs G. Balanchine's works. B. H. Haggin; S
Chicago Tribune Accuses the Australians of limited participation in the Pacific war; EP	J. M. Morse; S676; see also 648 Commonwealth federation. See Cooperative	chine's works. B. H. Haggin; S	717
Montgomery Ward plant; E 585 Defends seditionists on trial in Washington.	Communications, See Federal communications	gin; S	717
Deplores the lack of an isolationist candidate for president: EP. 554	communission Communist party And the American labor party. F. Kirch-	Denby, E., as dance critic. B. H. Haggin; S	717 commission Communist party And the American labor party. F. Kirchwey; S. Biddle urged to suspend the deportation order against Mrs. Browder; E.P. Browder, E., praises Hull. F. Stone; 322 Browder, proposes that the party become a political association. F. Kirchwey; S. Brañez, B., of Chilean workers confederation protests attack on him by Browder; C. Supports the Hague machine. McA. Coleman; S. Line of the confederation of the confederation of the confederation protests attack on him by Browder; C. Supports the Hague machine. McA. Coleman; S.	Fancy free, B. H. Haggin; S	550 108
Juvenile delinquency in Germany. Argus; S	Browder, E., praises Hull. I. F. Stone; S	Serenade. B. H. Haggin; S. Swan lake. B. Haggin; S. Swan lake. B. H. Haggin; S. Swan l	522
Jara, A., exposes nazi spy ring; EP 265	Browder proposes that the party become a political association. F. Kirchwey; S 89  Thanez B. of Chilean workers confedera-	Tally-ho. B. H. Haggin; S. Three-cornered hat. B. H. Haggin; S. Y.M.H.A. series, the. B. H. Haggin; S	717
And the United States: Chinese exchange restrictions hamper American army construction of air- fields. M. S. Stewart; S	tion protests attack on him by Browder; C	Darnand, Joseph. See France David, Michael M. Urges organization for liberal business men; fields. M. S. Stewart; S	man; S	Davis, Elmer. See War information, office of	292
inadequate American military aid; E. 613; see also	Jugar to maintain unity with American Urger to maintain unity with American Sciences. J. Alvarez del Vayor S. 6561; see also EP 639; C 745. Condon, Eddie; jazz concerts. B. H. Haggin; M. M. 137	Davis, William Hammond. See War labor board Day. Stephen A.
tang-Communist split. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S		Seeks reelection as congressman-at-large from Illinois. W. Shelton; S	298
tang-Communist split. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S	Congress And fillbusters. A. N. Meyer; C	Defense, national. See War effort	200
Japan. M. S. Stewart; S242; see also E	E	can relations—North Africa; French committee of national liberation Del Vayo, Julio Alvarez. See Alvarez del Vayo, Julio
Inflation, shortages, and hoarding, impede the war effort. M. S. Stewart; S 330 School of journalism. Journalist; C551;	Policy, the; EP	Vayo, Julio Alvarez. See Alvarez del Vayo, Julio Democratic party
Speeches of Kuomintang officials hint at a	also EP	Texas state convention splits over New Deal issues; two rival slates named to the national convention; EP. 638; see also E. See also Presidential campaign of 1944	666
long-needed reorganization of the govern-	See also Presidential campaign of 1944	See also Presidential campaign of 1944	000

PACE	PAGE		PAC
Denby, Edwin, as dance critic. B. H. Hag- gin, S	Nazifying the University of Strasbourg. 100 Argus; S. 100 New school for social research celebrates its twenty-fifth anniversary; EF. 639 Post-war plans of the New York board of	Fischer, Louis  Does Europe need Germany? S  Flandin, Pierre-Etienne. See French commitgin,; S550, 577, 717	Argus; S	Flandin Pierre-Etienne See French commit-	3.
Reports that Franco has been won over to	twenty-fifth anniversary; EP 639	tee of national liberation the allied cause; E 116	Post-war plans of the New York board of Department of justice	regents; Fourtain attached to the agri- cultural appropriation bill; EP	Pepper, Senator C., seeks reelection to the United States Senate. R. W. France; S507; see also EP553; EP suspended for the duration of the war.	cultural appropriation bill; EP 666	S507; see also EP553; EP	6
I. F. Stone; S 178	Edwards, Corwin D.	Follow the boys. J. Agee; MP	5 fees before the Kilgore committee on anti-	cartel purposes. I. F. Stone: S178:	UNRRA urged to work with the cooper-trust-law violations of the railroads; EP. 203	see also 410	atives in liberated countries to supply needed foodstuffs, K. Hutchison; S	,
Biddle, F., offers a program for breaking up	Eire, See Ireland,	needed foodstuffs, K. Hutchison; S
NAM charges that it tried to prevent the	see also 410 Eire. See Ireland. Eisenhower, General Dwight D. Named commander of the allied invasion	Attacks investigatory procedure of the Civil oil industry from participating in discus-	forces; EP 1	Foreign_conomic administration Attacks investigatory procedure of the Civil service commission; E Fotich, Constantin. See Yugoslavia France, Anatole: 1844-1944. A. Guérard; S	4
Obtains conviction of Minneapolis Trotsky-	Elections See Presidential campaign of 1944	Fotich, Constantin. See Yugoslavia
ist union leaders under the alien and sedi-	Elias, Peter, and McA. Coleman	France, Anatole: 1844-1944. A. Guérard; S	4
tion law; EP30; see also E 60	Future prospects of natural and synthetic rubber: S	France, Royal Wilbur Pepper, Senator C., runs for reelection in Florida; S 507; see also EP 553; EP	, charges of subversion among federal em-	Emanuel. Victor. and the cartels. I. F.	Florida; S507; see also EP553; EP	. 6
ployees largely unfounded; EP 266	Stone; S210; see also E 240	France
Destination Tokyo I Agee: MP	Named commander of the allied invasion forces; European pages of 1944  Electropean pages of 1944  Eletropean pages of 1944  Emergency committee to save the Jewish peodern pages of 1949  Letter of resignation. B. Deütsch. C 319	France American State department denies any intention to deal with Vichy. F. Kirchwey; S. Churchill promises arms to the under
Deutsch, Babette	Letter of resignation. B. Deutsch; C 319	tention to deal with views. E. Ariston Churchill promises arms to the under ground; E.P. Consultative assembly in Algiers demands arms from the allies for France's under ground; E.P. Darnand, J., organizes mobile forces to a constant of the underground fighters. E.P. E.P.	. 4
Resigns from the Emergency committee to	Emigrés. See Refugees	Churchill promises arms to the under-
De Valera Eamon. See Ireland	England. See Great Britain	Consultative assembly in Algiers demands	8
Dewey, Thomas E.	Esquire; denied second-class mailing privileges	arms from the allies for France's under-
Charges that State department suppresses	by the post office; EP	ground; EP reporters in London to their papers here;	Polish American politics; S591; see	track down the underground fighters:
Denby, Edwin, as dance critic. B. H. Hagenis. S. 1981. S.	also C 718	EP	. 2
reporters in London to their papers here; E  407 His soldier-vote record; EP. 322; 723 His view on the poll tax; E. 612 Profile, a. I. F. Stone; S. 586 Runs first as presidential candidate in the Pennsylvania Republican primaries; EP. 526 Smith, G. L. K., attacks his international- ism; EP. 554 Speech on American foreign policy; EP. 526	ple of Europe Letter of resignation, B. Deütsch; C 319 Emigrés. See Refugese Employment. See Labor England. See Great Britain Esquise; denied second-class mailing privileges by the post office; EP	EP Descriptions of Normandy as a "land of plenty" are deceptive; EP. Escape through the underground. B. S.;	7
Profile, a. I. F. Stone; S 586	2. C. Dt. Main, inc. J. Agec, mil 001	Escape through the underground. B. S.:
Runs first as presidential candidate in the		Free French fear that use of allied france by invasion troops will cause inflationary spiral; E	. 6
Smith G. I. K attacks his international-	F	Free French fear that use of allied france	3
ism; EP 554	F.C	spiral; E667; see also 693; 698: E	. 7
ism; EP. 554 Speech on American foreign policy; EP. 526 Versus Willkie for the Republican presidential nomination; EP. 86 See also Presidential campaign of 1944	F. G. American legion protests University of	French national committee in Algiers recdential nomination: EP	American legion protests University of Colorado's invitation to H. Bridges to address student body; C	ognized as provisional government of	7
See also Presidential campaign of 1944		German army takes over the French rail-	-
Dickinson, Leon A., Jr. Comments on "O little town (restricted)" by W. Whitman; C	Over twenty-one: D	roads. Argus; S	. 5
ed)" by W. Whitman; C 55	Over twenty-one; D	Nazifying the University of Strasbourg	. 1
Dies, Martin	port of Roosevelt: EP	Argus; S	. 1
EP	House votes it an appropriation; opponents	New France, the. C. de Gaulle; S447;	; ,
Will not stand for reelection to Congress; EP	Failure of, seen turning Negroes from support of Roosevelt, EP. 294 House votes it an appropriation; opponents taken unawares by a parliamentary trick;	No AMG administration for post-war	. 3
Charges of widespread subversion among	Far east. See names of countries	France! E296; see also EP	. 3 report by H. Gaston to Attorney gen-	Farm security agency	Post-war leaders. J. Moch; S42; see	. 6
eral Biddle; EP 266	Farm security agency House votes to give it statutory authority; EP	Pucheu trial encourages the resistance move-	- 0
Costello, J. M., deteated in the California	EP	ment, the. Tasks after liberation. J. Moch; S594 624; see also	. 4
Investigates the Peace now movement;	Farrell, General Edelmiro. See Argentina	624 see also	2 5
EP	Farrell, James T.	Underground resistance: a patriot's note- book. J. Kessel; S	-
New Yorker profile of T. B. Matthews.	Longan, Lonergan, and New York's finest; Longan, Lonergan, and New York's finest; Longan, Lonergan, and New York's finest; Sale Pederal bureau of investigation Will it play a reactionary role in the post- war period? I. F. Stone; S. Special House investigating committee uses smear tactics against employees. I. F. Stone; S. Federal workers. See Labor	book. J. Kessel; S director of research; EP 499	Federal bureau of investigation	wev: S Badognor F. Kirch	4
Receives an additional appropriation; will	war period? I. F. Stone: S 502	Wey; S. manpower districts for Germany Argus; S. Franco, Francisco. See Spain	- mittee; EP146; see also EP 239	Federal communications commission	many. Argus; S	3
Starnes, J., defeated in Alabama primaries;	Special House investigating committee uses	Franco, Francisco. See Spain
two other members face run-off elections;	Stone; S	Franco-American relations North Africa:
Viewed by a Catholic. I. F. Stone; S. 614, 642	Federal workers, See Labor	America seen moving toward greater rec-	-
Dilling, Elizabeth Her followers still active in Chicago.	Attacks the Museum of modern art policies	national liberation EP	1
F. T. D. C. 263	as reactionary. C. Greenberg; A 195	Behavior of American troops in Algiers.
Dingell-Wagner-Murray bill. See Medicine	Felipe, Leon	B.S.; S	, 6
Dilling, Elizabeth Her Tollowers still active in Chicago. Her Tollowers still active in Chicago. Dingell-Wagner-Murray bill. See Medicine Dirksen, Everett M. Leads Congressional fight against the Home owners' loan corporation; E	Felipe, Leon But why do Spaniards talk so loud? S 673 Fels, Samuel S. Proposes ten points for peace	North Africa: America seen moving toward greater recognition of the French committee of Behavior of American troops in Algiers B.S.; S. Behind the story of de Caulle's "refusal" to cooperate with allied invasion command; E.
owners' loan corporation: E	Proposes ten points for peace	mand; E	. 7.
Dr. Wassell. J. Agee; MP 688		America will not participate in the Drama. See Marshall M. (for reviews)	Fighting seabees, the. J. Agee; MP 316 Films. See Agee, J. (for reviews) Finance, public	meeting; E667; see also E	7
Dream with music. M. Marshall; D 688	Finance, public	Free French negotiations with General	1
Dream with music. M. Marshall; D	Finance, public Barkley, Senator A. W., leads Senatorial revolt against the President over the tax veto; E	strictions on the French national com-
York force by the commissioner; EP 3	veto; E267; see also E268; 270	mittee; EP553; see also E	. 6
Case against him should be reopened; EP 31	tax hill that will make extertionate against	should receive the right of provisional	1
Cleared of charges of anti-Semitism; EP 87	possible; E 3	administration of liberated France:
du Pont de Nemours de Canada du Pont de Nemours de Complaint filed by Department of justice citing the concern for monopolistic business activities; EP	Congress tax bill is far short of the needs	E. 296; see also EP . 349; 616; E.	. 6
Complaint filed by Department of justice	presented in the Treasury proposal; E 3 Fifteen states pass resolution asking con-	arms and supplies for France's under	3
ness activities: EP	stitutional provision limiting income and	ground; EP	. 1
mas anning) and 11111111111111111111111111111111111	inheritance taxes to a maximum of 25 per cent; EP	Hull's statement on relations with the	2
	inheritance taxes to a maximum of 25 per cent; EP	Behind the story of de Gaulle's "refusal" to cooperate with allied invasion command; E. Churchil invites de Gaulle to London, America will not participate in the Free French negotiations with General Eisenhower impeded by British code restrictions on the French anional committee; EP	+ 4
E	W. L. Willkie; EP173; see also 180	and de Gaulle, an. F. Kirchwey	2
E. T. D.	of the Treasury department following the	Roosevelt's opposition to de Carlle F	6
Followers of E. Dilling still active in Chi-	defeat of his tax programs in Congress;	Kirchwey; S438; see also	4
cago: C 263	Suppose of the fourth was 1 379	Views of the New York Times on the	2
East, far, middle, and near. See names of countries	Success of the fourth war loan drive; EP 239 Tax law protects the steel companies in the	tion; EP tional libera-	2 countries Eastland-Rankin soldier-vote bill. See United	first two post-war years. B. J. Reis; S 674	Free French. See French committee of na-	-
States—Army Fhright Sergeant Frederick	Why President Roosevelt vetoed the tax bill; E268; see also 270	tional liberation Freedom of the press
Memorial to the great big beautiful self-	Will President Roosevelt veto the tax bill?	American newspaper guild wins mainte sacrificing advertisers; P 38	Success of the fourth war loan drive, EP. 239 Tax law protects the steel companies in the first two post-war years. B. J. Reis, S. 67 Why President Rossevelt vetoed the tax bill? E. 268 see also. 270 Will President Rossevelt veto the tax bill? EP. 202	nance-of-membership decision; E.	3.
States—Army Ebright, Sergeant Frederick Memorial to the great big beautiful self- sacrificing advertisers; P	Pintond money stabilization plan; E 499	American newspaper guild wins mainte- nance-of-membership decision; E See also Censorship French committee of national liberation
Edman, Irwin First principles; P415; see also C 523	Soviet terms for peace not harsh; EP 293	And post-war leaders for France. I. Moch
First principles; P415; see also C 523	Warned by Secretary Hull against continu- ing in the war; EP 202	Behind the start 42; see also	6
Education Future of the nazi youth, the. K. Paetel;	First principles. I. Edman: P415: see	French committee of national liberation And post-war leaders for France. J. Moch S
S391, 419	also C 523	E	7:

Churchill-de Gaulle meeting presages greater British recognition of the committee; EP Churchill invites de Gaulle to London Angerica will service and the committee; EP Churchill invites de Gaulle to London Angerica will service and the committee of the committee assembly at work, the J Churchill reports on Anglo-French relations; E. 640; see also E. 667; C. 718; E. 724 Consultative assembly at work, the J Mochi, S. 24 Consultative assembly at work, the J Mochi, S. 25 Consultative assembly at work, the J Mochi, S. 25 Consultative assembly at work, the J Mochi, S. 25 Consultative assembly at work, the J Mochi, S. 25 Consultative assembly at work, the J Mochi, S. 25 Consultative assembly at work, the J Mochi, S. 25 Consultative assembly at work, the J Mochi, S. 25 Consultative assembly at work, the J Mochi, S. 25 Consultative assembly at work, the J Consultative and the Consultative and the Coale of the Coale Coale and the Coale and Coale Coale and the Coale Coale and the Coale Coale and the Coale
Churchill-de Gaulle meeting presages greater British recognition of the committee; EP
Consultative assembly in Algiers demands that the committee speed the purge of Vichyites in North Africa; E 640; see also E 657; see also E 724 Consultative assembly in Algiers demands that the committee speed the purge of Vichyites in North Africa; E 85; see also E 724 Consultative assembly in Algiers demands that the committee speed the purge of Vichyites in North Africa; E.P 85; see also E.P 85; see also E.P 85; see also E.P 86; see also E.P 86; see also E.P 86; see also E.P 87; see also E.P 87; see also E.P 87; see also E.P 88; see also 89; see a	Churchillade Gaulle meeting presages greater	PAGE
Consultative assembly in Algiers demands that the committee speed the purge of Vichyltes in North Africa; EP85; see also EP 142 Cools toward in French Communities. EP142 Cools toward in French Communities. EP144 Cools toward in French Cools toward in French Cools toward in French Cools in French Cools toward in French Cools in Fr	British recognition of the committee; EP Churchill invites de Gaulle to London;	114
Consultative assembly in Algiers demands that the committee speed the purge of Vichyltes in North Africa; EP85; see also EP 142 Cools toward in French Communities. EP142 Cools toward in French Communities. EP144 Cools toward in French Cools toward in French Cools toward in French Cools in French Cools toward in French Cools in Fr	America will not participate in the meeting; E667; see also E	724
Consultative assembly in Algiers demands that the committee speed the purge of Vichyltes in North Africa; EP85; see also EP 142 Cools toward in French Communities. EP142 Cools toward in French Communities. EP144 Cools toward in French Cools toward in French Cools toward in French Cools in French Cools toward in French Cools in Fr	Churchill reports on Anglo-French relations; E640; see also E667; C718; E	724
Boisson, and others; EP. 2. Flandin, P. Boisson, and others; EP. 2. 2. Fear that use of allted francs by invasion troops in France will cause inflationary spiral; E667; see also 693; 698; E724 Imaginary conversation between Rocceeding and the see also and the see also are also as a see	Moch; S	308
Boisson, and others; EP. 2. Flandin, P. Boisson, and others; EP. 2. 2. Fear that use of allted francs by invasion troops in France will cause inflationary spiral; E667; see also 693; 698; E724 Imaginary conversation between Rocceeding and the see also and the see also are also as a see	that the committee speed the purge of Vichyites in North Africa; EP85; see
tions; EP 553; see also E 611 New France, the C. de Gaulle; S 447; see also EP 349 Pucheu trial, the; EP. 321; see also 449; 693 Recognized at the provisional government, or 244 Recognized at the provisional government of 244 Restaurant in Algiers M. Clark; S 511 Roosevelt's opposition to de Gaulle. F 512 Restaurant in Algiers M. Clark; S 514 Restaurant in Algiers M. Clark; S 529 Restaurant M. Clark; S 529 Restaurant in Algiers M. Algiers M. Clark; S 529 Restaurant in Algiers M.	Cools toward the French Communists; EP.	114
tions; EP 553; see also E 611 New France, the C. de Gaulle; S 447; see also EP 349 Pucheu trial, the; EP. 321; see also 449; 693 Recognized at the provisional government, or 244 Recognized at the provisional government of 244 Restaurant in Algiers M. Clark; S 511 Roosevelt's opposition to de Gaulle. F 512 Restaurant in Algiers M. Clark; S 514 Restaurant in Algiers M. Clark; S 529 Restaurant M. Clark; S 529 Restaurant in Algiers M. Algiers M. Clark; S 529 Restaurant in Algiers M.	cases of M. Peyrouton, PE. Flandin, P. Boisson, and others; EP	2
tions; EP 553; see also E 611 New France, the C. de Gaulle; S 447; see also EP 349 Pucheu trial, the; EP. 321; see also 449; 693 Recognized at the provisional government, or 244 Recognized at the provisional government of 244 Restaurant in Algiers M. Clark; S 511 Roosevelt's opposition to de Gaulle. F 512 Restaurant in Algiers M. Clark; S 514 Restaurant in Algiers M. Clark; S 529 Restaurant M. Clark; S 529 Restaurant in Algiers M. Algiers M. Clark; S 529 Restaurant in Algiers M.	Fear that use of allied francs by invasion troops in France will cause inflationary	~~1
tions; EP 553; see also E 611 New France, the C. de Gaulle; S 447; see also EP 349 Pucheu trial, the; EP. 321; see also 449; 693 Recognized at the provisional government, or 244 Recognized at the provisional government of 244 Restaurant in Algiers M. Clark; S 511 Roosevelt's opposition to de Gaulle. F 512 Restaurant in Algiers M. Clark; S 514 Restaurant in Algiers M. Clark; S 529 Restaurant M. Clark; S 529 Restaurant in Algiers M. Algiers M. Clark; S 529 Restaurant in Algiers M.	Imaginary conversation between Roosevelt	124
tions; EP 553; see also E 611 New France, the C. de Gaulle; S 447; see also EP 349 Pucheu trial, the; EP. 321; see also 449; 693 Recognized at the provisional government, or 244 Recognized at the provisional government of 244 Restaurant in Algiers M. Clark; S 511 Roosevelt's opposition to de Gaulle. F 512 Restaurant in Algiers M. Clark; S 514 Restaurant in Algiers M. Clark; S 529 Restaurant M. Clark; S 529 Restaurant in Algiers M. Algiers M. Clark; S 529 Restaurant in Algiers M.	see also	698
Recognized as the provisional government of France by four governments in exile; E. 724 Restaurant in Algiers. M. Clark; S. 511 Recogney 18 opposition to de Gaulle. F. 475 Restaurant in Algiers. M. Clark; S. 511 Recogney 18 opposition to de Gaulle. F. 475 Restaurant in Algiers. M. Clark; S. 514 Restaurant in Algiers. M. Clark; S. 524 Restaurant in Algiers. M. Clark; S. 525 Restaurant in Algiers. M. Clark; S. 526 Restaurant in Algiers. M. Clark; S. 527 Restaurant in Algiers. M. Restaurant	ties reach new impasse as the French are placed under the new British code restric-	(11
Recognized as the provisional government of France by four governments in exile; E. 724 Restaurant in Algiers. M. Clark; S. 511 Recogney 18 opposition to de Gaulle. F. 475 Restaurant in Algiers. M. Clark; S. 511 Recogney 18 opposition to de Gaulle. F. 475 Restaurant in Algiers. M. Clark; S. 514 Restaurant in Algiers. M. Clark; S. 524 Restaurant in Algiers. M. Clark; S. 525 Restaurant in Algiers. M. Clark; S. 526 Restaurant in Algiers. M. Clark; S. 527 Restaurant in Algiers. M. Restaurant	New France, the. C. de Gaulle; S447;
GI bill of rights. See Veterans G. I. in India. Galangen, Helessional nomination in California; EP. Gament, Frank E. Committee for constitutional government, headed by him, backs proposal for constitutional provision to limit income and inheritance taxes; EP. J. M. Morse; S. 676; see also. Gament, Lewis White, William Allen, death; S276; see also. H. M. Morse; S	Pucheu trial, the; EP. 321; see also. 449, Recognized as the provisional government of	693
GI bill of rights. See Veterans G. I. in India. Galangen, Helessional nomination in California; EP. Gament, Frank E. Committee for constitutional government, headed by him, backs proposal for constitutional provision to limit income and inheritance taxes; EP. J. M. Morse; S. 676; see also. Gament, Lewis White, William Allen, death; S276; see also. H. M. Morse; S	France by four governments in exile; E Restaurant in Algiers. M. Clark; S	724 511
GI bill of rights. See Veterans G. I. in India. Galangen, Helessional nomination in California; EP. Gament, Frank E. Committee for constitutional government, headed by him, backs proposal for constitutional provision to limit income and inheritance taxes; EP. J. M. Morse; S. 676; see also. Gament, Lewis White, William Allen, death; S276; see also. H. M. Morse; S	Roosevelt's opposition to de Gaulle. F. Kirchwey; S 438; see also	447
GI bill of rights. See Veterans G. I. in India. Galangen, Helessional nomination in California; EP. Gament, Frank E. Committee for constitutional government, headed by him, backs proposal for constitutional provision to limit income and inheritance taxes; EP. J. M. Morse; S. 676; see also. Gament, Lewis White, William Allen, death; S276; see also. H. M. Morse; S	government of liberated France: E296; see also EP349: 616: E	667
GI bill of rights. See Veterans G. I. in India. Galangen, Helessional nomination in California; EP. Gament, Frank E. Committee for constitutional government, headed by him, backs proposal for constitutional provision to limit income and inheritance taxes; EP. J. M. Morse; S. 676; see also. Gament, Lewis White, William Allen, death; S276; see also. H. M. Morse; S	Tasks ahead in France. J. Moch; S594, 624; see also	529
GI bill of rights. See Veterans G. I. in India. Galangen, Helessional nomination in California; EP. Gament, Frank E. Committee for constitutional government, headed by him, backs proposal for constitutional provision to limit income and inheritance taxes; EP. J. M. Morse; S. 676; see also. Gament, Lewis White, William Allen, death; S276; see also. H. M. Morse; S	Viewed by the New York Times; EP Friedman, Arnold, exhibition. C. Greenberg;
GI bill of rights. See Veterans G. I. in India. Wins Congressional nomination in California, E.P. Committee for constitutional government, headed by him, backs proposal for constitutional provision to limit income and inheritance taxes; EP. Committee for Constitutional government, headed by him, backs proposal for constitutional provision to limit income and inheritance taxes; EP. Committee for Constitutional government, headed by him, backs proposal for constitutional provision to limit income and inheritance taxes; EP. Composes the Murray-Wagner-Dingel bill. Gannett, Lewiss. Gantett, Lewiss. Gantett, Lewiss. Gantett, Lewiss. Gantett, Lewiss. Gaston, Herbert, See Department of justice Gaulle, General Charles de. See Franco- committee Charles de. See Franco- committee of national liberation. George, Walter F. See United States—Post- war Handle air raids hit few buildings of cultural value. Argus; S.  Arti-espionage campaign. Argus; S.  161 Advanit Phologes and slogana Argus; S.  162 Back-to-the-church movement; EP.  162 Back-to-the-church movement; EP.  163 Back-to-the-church movement; EP.  164 Back-to-the-church movement; EP.  165 Barming of the books, the. G. Schreiber;  165 Back-to-the-church movement; EP.  167 Back-to-the-church movement; EP.  168 Back-to-the-church movement; EP.  169 Berlin after the air-raids. Argus; S.  161 Back-to-the-church movement; EP.  169 Berlin after the air-raids. Argus; S.  161 Back-to-the-church movement; EP.  160 Back-to-the-church movement; EP.  160 Back-to-the-church movement; EP.  161 Back-to-the-church movement; EP.  161 Back-to-the-church movement; EP.  162 Back-to-the-church movement; EP.  163 Back-to-the-	A	430
Gerber, John W. India's would-be Quisling; S	G
Gerber, John W. India's would-be Quisling; S	GI bill of rights. See Veterans	442
Gerber, John W. India's would-be Quisling; S	Gahagen, Helen Wins Congressional nomination in Cali-
Gerber, John W. India's would-be Quisling; S	Gannett, Frank E.	666
Gerber, John W. India's would-be Quisling; S	headed by him, backs proposal for consti- tutional provision to limit income and
Gerber, John W. India's would-be Quisling; S	Opposes the Murray-Wagner-Dingell bill;
Gerber, John W. India's would-be Quisling; S	J. M. Morse; S 6/6; see also Gannett, Lewis White William Allen death: S. 276; eee	648
Gerber, John W. India's would-be Quisling; S	also EP	147 605
Gerber, John W. India's would-be Quisling; S	Gaston, Herbert. See Department of justice Gaulle, General Charles de. See Franco-
Gerber, John W. India's would-be Quisling; S	American relations—North Africa; French committee of national liberation George Walter F. See United States—Port.
Greber, John W. India's would-be Quisling; S	George-Murray bill. See War effort-Con-
Anti-espionage campaign. Argus; S. 161 Anti-nari jokes and slogans. Argus; S. 189 Awaits the invasion. Argus; S. 253; see Before-the-threch movement; EP. 59 Berlin after the air-raids. Argus; S. 596 Burning of the books, the. G. Schreiber; C. 180 Campaign numered for salvage of textile decay of the content of the conten	Gerber, John W.
Anti-espionage campaign. Argus; S. 161 Anti-nari jokes and slogans. Argus; S. 189 Awaits the invasion. Argus; S. 253; see Before-the-threch movement; EP. 59 Berlin after the air-raids. Argus; S. 596 Burning of the books, the. G. Schreiber; C. 180 Campaign numered for salvage of textile decay of the content of the conten	Germany Allied air raids hit few buildings of cultural	473
goods Argus; S.  Casualties on the eastern front. Argus; S.  Children's names reveal the influence of "cultural nazism." Argus; S.  Citter of the control of	value. Argus; S	337 161
goods Argus; S.  Casualties on the eastern front. Argus; S.  Children's names reveal the influence of "cultural nazism." Argus; S.  Citter of the control of	Anti-nazi jokes and slogans. Argus; S Awaits the invasion. Argus; S253; see	189
goods Argus; S.  Casualties on the eastern front. Argus; S.  Children's names reveal the influence of "cultural nazism." Argus; S.  Citter of the control of	Back-to-the-church movement; EP	59
goods Argus; S.  Casualties on the eastern front. Argus; S.  Children's names reveal the influence of "cultural nazism." Argus; S.  Citter of the control of	Black market in labor. Argus; S Burning of the books, the. G. Schreiber;
Children's names reveal the influence of "cultural nazism". Argus; S	Ct
Divides France into zones of labor man- power Argus; S. 366 Food shortages. Argus; S. 337; see also argus; S. 100; 513; 553 Forced savings. Argus; S. 253 Forced savings. Argus; S. 709 "Front piece" representations of the argus; Argus	Casualties on the eastern front. Argus;
Divides France into zones of labor man- power Argus; S. 366 Food shortages. Argus; S. 337; see also argus; S. 100; 513; 553 Forced savings. Argus; S. 253 Forced savings. Argus; S. 709 "Front piece" representations of the argus; Argus	Children's names reveal the influence of "cultural nazism." Argus: S.
Divides France into zones of labor man- power Argus; S. 366 Food shortages. Argus; S. 337; see also argus; S. 100; 513; 553 Forced savings. Argus; S. 253 Forced savings. Argus; S. 709 "Front piece" representations of the argus; Argus	Communal kitchens replace private house- keeping. Argus; S
Divides France into zones of labor man- power. Argus; S	Disaffection in the Leiszig military base	45
also	racks. Argus; S
Brown and the state of the stat	power. Argus; S
gus; S. 709  "Front pigs" reappear in the army. Argus; S. 366  Himmler orders all men to serve in the auxiliary police. Argus; S. 310  Hitler's birthday celebration. Argus; S. 541  How the news of the Normandy invasion.	Forced savings. Argus; S	653 253
S	gus; S
Hitler's birthday celebration. Argus; S	Himmler orders all men to serve in the
	Hitler's birthday celebration. Argus; S How the news of the Normandy invasion.	541

Juvenile delinquency. Argus; S	216
gus; S	44
Maquis flourishes, the. Argus; S596; see also. Misuse of military identification papers. Argus; S. Nazi reply to the leaflets dropped by allied filters. Argus; S. Nazifying the University of Strasbourg. Argus; S. Nazis seek foreign S.S. recruits. Argus; N. Nazis seek foreign S.S. recruits.	474
Argus; S	393
fliers. Argus; S	653
Argus; S	100
New anti-Jewish campaign. Argus; S Physicians ordered to protect medical equip-	161 513
ment during air raids. Argus; S	709
Post-war And German youth. K. O. Paetel; S	419
charter does not apply to Germany;	268
Does Europe need Germany? L. Fischer;	333
Does Europe need Germany? L. Fischer; S. Future of German cartels, the. I. F. Stone; S	410
German exiles in the United States form a Council for a democratic Germany;
ILO resolution on economic rehabilita-	644
ion; EP	555
E. Mann; C318; see also C Paradox of German morale, the. P.	375
Sering; SStatus. F. Sternberg; S187; see	540
Pravda reports a meeting between British	318
officials and Von Ribbentrop to discuss a separate peace; EP87; see also EP	113
Raising the birth rate; the "well of life" plan in Norway. Argus; S	18
Russo-German war. See Russo-German war Scarcity of soap. Argus; S	709
Schwarze korps urges increased births in preparation for third world war. Argus;
Secret weapons. Argus; S44,	568 393
State versus nazi party machinery. Argus;	189
Vayo; S72; see also626;	681
ment with Britain and the United States.	583
Transportation system deteriorates. Argus;	681
Treatment of French prisoners of war. Ar-	280
Does Europe need Germany? L. Fischer; S. Future of German cartels, the. I. F. Stone; S	421 541
Vacation season. Argus; S
mazi regime. Argus; S	421
Argus; S	253
Argus; S	393
Gilbert, General Alberto. See Argentina Gilbert, Rodney, named dean of the Chinese
Gilbert, General Alberto. See Argentina Gilbert, Rodney, named dean of the Chinese school of journalism. Journalist, C. 551; see also C. Godbout, Adclard. See Canada Going my way. J. Agee; MP. Gonzalez, Enrique P. See Argentina Gordon, J. King, Joins staff of The Nation; EP. Government finances. See Finance, public Governmental agencies. See names of agencies	690
Godbout, Adélard. See Canada
Going my way. J. Agee; MP	577
Gordon, J. King, joins staff of The Nation;	295
Government finances. See Finance, public	273
Governmental agencies. See names of agencies Graham, Martha; dance recital. V. Mishnun;
Graham, Martha; dance recital. V. Mishnun; S	108
Program for post-war free enterprise; C Great Britain	459
Anglo-American relations:	273
Series of political and economic conversa-	296
Anglo-French relations:  British code restrictions hamper Free
French negotiations with General Eis- enhower: EP553; see also E	611
British government seeks to prevent a giers by the French committee of na- tional liberation; EP 57; see also EP85; EP321; 449; British, with American sanction, reported	693 demanding the release of prominent French fascists imprisoned in Algiers by the French committee of rational liberation; EP57; see also EP85;
EP	693
America will not participate in the meeting; E667; see also E	724
Frogram for post-war free enterprise; C Great Britian Anglo-American relations: Blimp calls to blimp. Low; Ct Series of political and economic conversa- series of political and economic conversa- British code restrictions hamper Free French relations with General Eis- enhower; EP 553; see also E British government seeks to prevent a purge of Vichyites imprisoned in Al- giers by the French committee of na- tional liberation; EP 57; see also British, with American sanction, reported demanding the release of prominent French fascists imprisoned in Algiers by the French committee of rational liberation; EP 57; see also EP85; EP	238

Churchill reports on relations with the French committee of national liberation; E 640, see also E 667, Meeting of Churchill and de Gaulle; EP.  Meeting of Churchill and de Gaulle; EP. Anglo-Palestinian relations: American Jewish committee urges the British government to abrogate the British government to abrogate the And the American Congress's resolution on the white paper. I. F. Stone; S 326; see also EP. Behind the gun-running trials. J. Lurie; White paper, the, J. Lurie; S. Anglo-Soviet relations; Eden, A., states Britain's position on the Soviet-Polish border dispute; EP. Pravida reports a meeting of British officials with Von Ribbentrop to discuss a separate peace; EP. 87; see also EP. Churchill's words of praise for the Franco regime; E 640; see also. 680; C. British coal strikes, the; EP. British tory policy for the post-war period. Churchill forces a vote of confidence on a minor issue; further outbreaks against the government depend on post-war bills; EP.	PAGE
tion; E640; see also E667;	604
Meeting of Churchill and de Gaulle;	724 114
Anglo-Palestinian relations:	114
British government to abrogate the	114
And the American Congress's resolution on the white paper. I. F. Stone:
S326; see also EP Behind the gun-running trials. J. Lurie;	406
White paper, the, J. Lurie; S	92 92
Anglo-Soviet relations: Eden, A., states Britain's position on the Pravida reports a meeting of British offi-	145 separate peace; EP87; see also EP	113
Churchill's words of praise for the
680; C	718 322
British tory policy for the post-war period.  M. Browne; S	11
Churchill forces a vote of confidence on a minor issue; further outbreaks against the government depend on post-war bills;	406
Churchill on the war and domestic post-war issues; EP377; see also	381
war; his reference to Spain disapproved;	210
Churchill's report to Parliament on the	718
Egregious imposter. Low; Ct	268 183
tions against instigators of strikes; EP Imperial conference, the F H Underbills	498
S532; see also EP498; EP Letter from London. M. H.; C	610 403
On D-day. H. J. Laski; S	703
M. Browne; S	611
Role of British capital in Argentina. S. Bagú; S.	384
See also War, European; World war	54
Greece All-party conference called by Premier Papandreou signs national charter for a coalition government; EP610; see also coalition government; EP610; see	644
Behind the army-navy "mutiny." B. Vlavi- anos; S	566
Government in exile, the. B. Raditsa;	644
Behind the army-navy "mutiny." B. Vlavi- anos; S. Government in exile, the B. Raditsa; S. Green, Dwight. See Illinois Greenberg, Clement Articles on art: Abstract art
Greenberg, Clement Articles on art: Abstract art Federation of modern painters and sculptors versus the Museum of modern art. Mondrian, Piet, death. Reviews of art exhibitions: Abstract and surrealist artists under forty Art in progress—Museum of modern art.	450
tors versus the Museum of modern art.	195 288
Reviews of art exhibitions: Abstract and surrealist artists under Abstract and surrealist artists under forty  Art in progress—Museum of modern art. Derain	634 688
Derain Friedman, Arnold	109 456 495
Martins, Maria: sculpture	634 604
Miró	604
Art in progress—Museum of modern art. Derain Fried Juan Gried Juan Martins, Maria: sculpture. Masson, André Ountanilla, Luis. Romantic painting in America; exhibit at the Museum of modern art. Whitney annual, the Griffin, Charles Lamson Comments on the compromise soldier-vote bill; C. Gris, Juan, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A
Tobey, Mark	24 495 24
Griffin, Charles Lamson Comments on the compromise soldier-vote
bill; C	403 495
France. Anatole: 1844-1944; S	478 549
Guy named Joe, a. J. Agee; MP52,	347
HOLC. See Home owners' foan corporation
Articles on music:	605
HOLC. See Home owners' loan corporation Haggin. B. H. H. See Home owners' loan corporation Haggin. B. H. A Hee an music: A Hittin, Webster Bernstein, Leonard, as conductor. 25, Billy the kid. Boris Godunov. Budapest quartet, the. 25, 82, 262, "Carmer" at the City center of music. Commercial announcements during concopland's "Short symphony" Eddie Condon's jazz concerts. Falstaff. 317, 346, Gondoliers, the. Heifetz, Jascha. Hindemith's new quartet. How orchestra conductors are chosen.	605 605 53
Boris Godunov	53 53 374
"Carmen" at the City center of music Commercial announcements during con-	346
Copland's "Short symphony"	137 137 137 374
Falstaff	374
Heifetz, Jascha	374 605 137
How orchestra conductors are chosen	137

PAGE	PAGE	Italy Allies back King Victor Emmanuel to head "liberated" Italy, G. Salvenini S. 16 And King Victor Emmanuel; failure of an expediency policy; EP. 17 American soldier comments on the attitude of the Sicilians toward the faceists; C. 5 Badoglio regime falls; Bonomi, I., becomes the premier: Italy Bonomi, I., becomes to the royal house; EP. 697 Churchill defends the continuation of King Victor Emmanuel and Badoglio in power; E
Koussevitzky on American composers 661	Hunter, Edward Can we make use of Hirohito? S 278	Allies back King Victor Emmanuel to head
Marriage of Figaro198, 346	Hutchison, Keith	"liberated" Italy. G. Salvemini; S 16
Lehmann, Lotte. 198 Marriage of Figaro 198, 346 Metropolitan opera performances. 53; see also82; 169; 198; 317; 346, 374	Civil air war, the; S	Allies rumored ready to abandon Badoglio
	Hutchison, Keith Civil air war, the; S	an expediency policy; EP 174
arranged 289	party; S	American soldier comments on the attitude
O E-slick worses foreign language		of the Sicilians toward the fascists; C 55 productions	New government commission directs the	the premier; EP productions	Montreal light, heat, and power consoli-	Bonomi cabinet refuses an oath of allegiance form Beethoven's sonata for violin and	Quebec legislature E. Turcotte: S 732	Churchill defends the continuation of King
Dhiladalahia and M.R.C. archaetrae com-	Hymn to free enterprise I D K : P 329:	Victor Emmanuel and Badoglio in power;
pared	see also C	E > 268
Rigoletto		willingness to enter a democratized Ramonic 25	I	doglio government; EP 405
Schnabel recitals of Beethoven's music 744		Hull's statement on American policy; E 464
Singher, Martial, song recital 198	I.L.O. See International labor organization Ibañez, Bernardo Protests attack on him by E. Browder as "ambiguous and sinister figure"; C458;	Prince Humbert; EP
Singing techniques: J. Tourel, D. May-	Ibañez, Bernardo	Liberals and the Badoglio cabinet. B.
nor, and E. Rethberg	"ambiguous and sinister figure"; C458;	Mediterranean advisory commission: EP 405
Rodzinski and the New York philhar- monic Schnabel recitals of Beethoven's music. 744 Shostakovitch's eighth symphony. 496 Singher, Martial, song recital 198 Singing techniques: J. Tourel, D. May- nor, and E. Rethberg 430 Stern, Isaac 430 Stern, Isa	see also C 551	Victor Emmanuel and Badoglio in power;  E P. Togliatti, amounces  Communist leader, P. Togliatti, amounces  doglio government; EP
Thomson, V., as music critic110, 346, 744	And the forged Hopkins letter naming Will-	returns from exile; EP 706
Walter conducts Mahler's fourth sym-	kie as Republican presidential candidate;	Vavo: S651: see also E.P 639:
phony	EP 115; see also EP 146	_ C745, 746
Articles on the dance: American concert ballet performs Balan-	charged with favoritism to the big oil	Reactionary policy of the AMG in liber-chine works 289	companies. I. F. Stone; S 6	Russia recognizes the Badoglio regime. F.
American concert ballet performs Balanchine works . 289 Argentinita . 289, 717 Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo . 522, 550, 717 Ballet theater . 522, 550 Caspiccio espagnol . 717 Denby, E., as dance critic . 550, 577, 717 Fancy free . 550 Rodeo . 522 Serenade . 522 Serenade . 522 Tally lo . 550 Three-corrored hat . 717 V.M.H.A. series, the . 717 Music, recorded . 169, 235, 262, 402, 430, 430 See also Book reviews	"ambiguous and sinister ingure"; C., 498; see also C.  Ickes, Harold L.  And the forged Hopkins letter naming Willking and the seed of the	Vayo; S
Ballet theater 522 550	concessions: E	651; C
Capriccio espagnol	Illinois	S. C. Menefee; S 184
Denby, E., as dance critic550, 577, 717	tions W Shelton: S 298	Izvestia. See Union of soviet socialist re- publics
Rodeo	Day, S. A., seek reelection as congressman-	publics
Serenade 522	at-large, W. Shelton; S
Tally ho 550	Illinois Colonel McCormick's slate for 1944 elec- tions. W. Shelton; S	J
Three-cornered hat	Lyons, R. J., opposes S. W. Lucas for the	J.D.K.
Y.M.H.A. series, the	United States Senate. W. Shelton; S 298	Hymn to free enterprise; P329; see also C
Music, recorded109, 235, 202, 402, 430, 522, 577, 633, 689, 716	chine. W. Shelton; S	also C
See also Book reviews	Immigration	also C
Hague, Frank. See New Jersey	rights I I Singh C 607	373
Hamlin, Talbot F.	Free ports for refugees. I. F. Stone; S 670	lapan
Comments on "Brains in the kitchen" by	Palestine and the White paper. J. Lurie;	Atrocities against American and Filipino
E. M. Stern; C 199; see also 95 Hancock John See United States—Postawar	Imperial chemical industries. See Monopolies	prisoners of war; E
See also Book reviews Hagir, Frank. See New Jersey Hagir, Frank. See New Jersey Hagir, Frank. See New Jersey Hamilin, Talbot F. Comments on Brains in the kitchen' by Comments on Brains in the kitchen' by Hamilin, Talbot F. See Spain Happy Ind. J. Agee; MP. States—Post-war Happy Ind. J. Agee; MP. See Spain Helfetz, Jascha. B. H. Haggin; M. 605 Helen goes to Troy. M. Marshall; D. 575 Higher and higher. J. Agee; MP. 23 Hildebrand, George L., Jr. Comments on 'Wages and living costs'; Comments on 'Wages and living costs'; Hill, Lister 200; see also E. 32 Hill, Lister	Immigration   East Indians should receive naturalization rights. J. J. Singh; C	Cairo conference reported agreed that the
Hayes, Carlton J. H. See Spain	In the wind10, 41, 71, 96, 129, 157;	Cairo conference reported agreed that the United States receive the mandated islands; EP
Helen goes to Troy. M. Marshall: D 575	307, 332, 361, 390, 418, 446, 472, 510,	Can we make use of Hirohito? E
Higher and higher. J. Agee; MP 23	539, 565, 593, 623, 650, 678, 706, 734	Hunter; S 278
Hildebrand, George H., Jr.	Bose S C would be Ouisling T W	Office States receive the mandated islands; EP . 58 Can we make use of Hirohito? E. 278 Can we make use of Hirohito? E
C	Gerber; S 473	Price: S
Hill, Lister	Develops a fifteen-year plan for economic	Military peace terms; E 241
Senate, E. M. Steed: S506: see also	G.I. impressions	Political peace terms; E 501
EP 666	Japanese block supply route to Imphal and	Japanese Americans
Democratic whip seeks reelection to the Senate. E. M. Steed; S 506; see also EP 553; EP 666 Hillman, Sidney Heads the C.I.O. Political action committee See also Congress of industrial organiza-	India Bose, C., would-be Quisling. J. W. Gerber, S. C., would-be Quisling. J. W. Gerber, S. C. W. Gerber, S. C. W. Gerber, S. C. G.	Congress defeats the Tohnson hill to de-
See also Congress of industrial organiza-	on Imphal; EP	prive them of citizenship; EP 267
tions	United States urged to permit entry and	tion in the eastern area; EP 527
Hindemith Paul. B. H. Haggin: M	C	Japanese-Chinese war. See Chinese-Japan- ese war
Hines, Frank T. See Veterans, war	Indiana	Jara, Anihal. See Chile Jellinck, Frank Watch Mexico; S
Hirohito. See Japan	Lyons, R. W., member of the Ku klux klan,	Jellinek, Frank
Hitler gang, the. J. Agee; MP 577	tional committee; EP 698	Jews
See also Congress of industrial organizations tions Hindemith, Paul. B. H. Haggin; M	Indiana Lyons, R. W., member of the Ku klux klan, becomes = member of the Republican na- tional committee; EP 698 Representative La Follette demands the resignation of Lyons; EP 723 Indiaton. See Business Inflation. See Business	American Jewish committee urges the Brit- ish government to abrogate the White paper on Jewish immigration to Pales- tine; EP114; see also92; 326; EP.
Mihailovich opens a second front	Industry. See Business	ish government to abrogate the White
Son of heaven, the 279	Inflation. See Business Insurance	tine; EP114; see also92: 326:
Holland Goes left. B. Bolles; S	and and	EP Anti-Semitic outhersks in New York city; 406 Anti-Semitic outhersks in New York city; EP3; was also EP87 Anti-Semitism R. S. Stewart; C
Holt, Rush, defeated for governor; EP 666	applies to insurance companies; E 725	EP31: see also EP 87
Home owners' loan corporation	magazine to be continued in Comede	Anti-Semitism. R. S. Stewart; C 54
sen; E 175	M. L. Twaddell; C	on the New York forces FR
Hook, Stig Five minutes to twelve; Ct	Supreme court rules that the anti-frust act applies to insurance companies; £	also EP31; EP 87
Hoover, I. Edgar	C. I. O. representation at conference:	Free ports in the United States can save
Attacks liberals in speech before the D.A.R.	EP 322	Stone: S Jews of Europe. I. F.
I. F. Stone; S 502	EP 322 Argentine delegate excluded from the conference; EP 497 Characterized by Isvestia as a bankrupt organization; EP 525	Letter of resignation to the Emergency com-
Letter supposedly written by him naming	Characterized by Isvestia as a bankrupt or-	mittee to save the Jewish people of Eur-
Willkie as the Republican presidential	ganization; EP 525	Joesten, Joachim candidate is exposed as a forgery; EP	ganization; EP	the remaining Jews of Europe. I. F. Stone; S. Stone; S. Letter of resignation to the Emergency committee to save the Jewish people of Europe. B. Deutsch; C
House in Paris, the, M. Marshall: D 428	K. Hutchison; S529; see also E 584	of citizenship defeated RP
Housing	Philadelphia charter, the; E 584	Johnson, Victor H.
Home owners' loan corporation under fire	Germany; EP 555	Why war workers strike; S68; see
Post-war boom in prefabrication. F. West-	Russia's absence hinders the work of the	Jones, Jesse H. 61 brook, Jr.; S 39; see also C 264	Tixier, A. Free French delegate discussion	Aids the cartels. I. F. Stone; S210;
Housing House to the Managarith of the Mousing Home owners' loan corporation under fire from Representative E. M. Dirksen; E. 175 Post-war boom in prefabrication. F. Westbrook, Jr.; S	Australia australe nitiders the work of the Experimental Company of the Australia Company of the Australia Company of the need for government intervention in the post-war reconstruction of Europe.  K. Hutchison; S 529; see also E 584; 594  Ireland	Why war workers strike; S. 68; see also. 61 Jones, Jesse H. S. 15, Stone; S. 210; Aids the cartels, I. F. Stone; S. 210; Jordan waltey authority Public power project on the model of the TVA unged for Palestine, G. W. Nor- ris; S. 589; see also hook review. 656 Journalism. See Newspapers
Hungary Davis, E., censors speech of J. F. Mont- gomery, former American minister, prais- ng Admiral Horthy; EF	the post-war reconstruction of Europe,	Public power project on the model of the gomery, former American minister, prais-	Ireland E584; 594	TVA urged for Palestine. G. W. Nor-ing Admiral Horthy; EP 583	Anglo-American high command closes Eire-	Journalism. See Newspapers
S	fusal to close axis consulates in Dubli-	Journalist Dec Newspapers
Karolyi, Count, urges Hungarians to join	Ireland Anglo-American high command closes Eire- Ulster border following De Valera's re- fusal to close axis consulates in Dublin; EP 321	Ackerman, Dean C. W., and the Chinese school of journalism; C551; see also
S 644 Karolyi, Count, urges Hungarians to join the Yugoslav partisans. B. Raditsa; S 440 Masquerades as an "occupied" country. R. Parker; S 468; see also E379	Iron Aga. J. I. Capps; C         54           It happened tomorrow. J. Agee; MP.         577           Italian war. See War, European—Italy	C
Parker; S468; see also E379	Italian war. See War, European Italy	Lugoslavia. Sce Yugoslavia Junger, Ernst. F. C. Weiskopf; S
	, anopeum analy	Junger, Ernst. P. C. Weiskopf; S 45

Vol. 158]	Index	[JanJune, 1944
PAGE	PAGE	PACE
K	Unethical practices by doctors in application of workmen's compensation law; EP 294	Liberal party ALP right wing forms a new party following its defeat in the primaries; E641; see also EP
Karolyi, Count Michael. See Hungary	Wages:	ing its defeat in the primaries; E641;
Montgomery Ward's private war; S509;	463; see also E32; C	New organization urged not to impede the
Karolyi, Count Michael. See Hungary Katzander, Shirley Montgomery Ward's private war; S. 509; see also EP526; E555; E585; EP638; EP	Wages: And the C.I.O. cost-of-living report; E 463; see also E 32; C 290 Big steel companies oppose the wage de- mands of the steel workers. B. J. Reis; S. v L. Little steel Labor's drive to revise the Little steel fation; Elamores the fight against in- fation; C.	mittee; E
	Labor's drive to revise the Little steel	Lifeboat. J. Agee; MP
notebook; S	flation; E	Proposes a foreign policy for post-war
How the Jack and Heintz company works;	Railroad strike threatens as workers seek a salary rise; E	America. H. J. Laski; S 180 Literature
Now the Jack and Heintz company works, S	Supreme court rules against union disruption by granting of "voluntary"	France, Anatole: 1844-1944. A. Guérard; S 478 In Germany today. F. C. Weiskopf; S 45
Kilgore committee Hears testimony concerning the violation of	increases; EP	Johnson, Samuel, as critic. J. W. Krutch; S
the anti-trust laws by the railroads; EP 203 Reports on cartel development during the	Kaifroad strike threatens as workers seek a salary rise; E	Modern detective novel, the. L. Bogan; S 475; see also C war. I. F. Stone; S178; see also	S	America. H. J. Laski; S
King, MacKenzie. See Canada	A. F. of L. rejects Lewis's terms for admis- sion of the United mine workers to mem-	Longo, John. See New Jersey Longan, Longgan, and New York's finest.
American labor party and the C.I.O. politi-	A. F. of L. rejects Roosevelt's proposal for	J. T. Farrell; S
7; EP435; E	C.I.O. representation at International	Low, cartoons "Argentina? Si, si, mein führer vou're party become a political association; S., 89	A. F. of L. still delays on accepting the	J. T. Farrell; S
117; see also118; EP	eration; EP	Blimp calls to blimp and de Gaulle, an; S693; see also 698	defeats union proposal for employee rep-	Churchill speech; S61; see also E31; 62; 90	And Montgomery Ward and company. S.	"Elastic defense"
Need for a permanent United Nations poli-	EP526; E555; EP638; EP 697	What! Another one? 385
382; EP	victed under the alien and sedition law;	here"
325; see also	EP30; see also E	Proposes a TVA for Palestine. G. W.
Soviet union and the Communist party of	strikes. V. H. Johnson; S68; see	Norris; S589; see also B 656 Lowell, Stanley H.
the United States, the; S	also	Votes for Negroes? S470; see also EP 434; EP638; E668
Stalin and Badoglio; S351; see also EP405; 651; C745; C 746	Smith committee charges the WLB exceeds	Lucas, Scott W. See Illinois Lurie, Jesse
There stands de Gaulle; S	its powers on maintenance-of-membership agreements; E	Guns in Palestine; S 92 Luxembourg
Kosanovich, Sava. See Yugoslavia Kosciusko league	Supreme court rules against union disrup- tion by the granting of "voluntary" pay	Government in exile, the. B. Raditsa; S 616 Lyons, Richard I. See Illinois
Notineers versus contract renegotiation; S. 63 Kilgore committee Hears testimony concerning the violation of the anti-trust laws by the railroads; EP. 203 Reports on carted development during the war. I. F. Stone; S 178; see also Wing, MacKenzie. See Canada King, MacKenzie. See Canada American labor party and the C.I.O. politi- cal action committee; S 409; see also 7; EP 435; E 188 Prowder, E. proposes the committee of the call action committee; S 409; see also 7; EP 435; E 189 Proyers and C 188 Prowder, E. proposes the committee of the call action committee; S 409; see also 17; see also 118; EP. 172 Haspinary conversation between Roosevelt and de Gaulle, an; S 593; see also 17; see also 118; EP. 189 Mess of wolfram, a; S 593; see also Mess of wolfram, a; S 595; see also Mess of wolfram, a; S 595; see also Mess of wolfram a; S 595; see also Mess of wolfram a; S 593 Soviet union and the Communist party of the United States, the; S 300 Soviet union and the Communist party of the United States, the; S 390 Spain and Argentina; S 595; see also EE 4.405; 631; (C. S. 455; C 438 Knickerbocker boliday. J. Agee; MP 577 Kosanovich, Sava. See Yugoslava Kosciusko league Seeks to cement Polish-Russian friendship; EE 582; see also 591	Supreme court rules that union membership	Luxembourg Government in exile, the. B. Raditsa; S 616 Lyons, Richard J. See Illinois Lyons, Robert W. See Indiana Lyons, W. D. Confesses to slaying in Oklahoma after brutal third-degree. L. B. Milner; S 444
Koussevitzky, Serge, on American composers.	need not be kept intact during delays in	Confesses to slaying in Oklahoma after
Kosciusko league Seeks to cement Polish-Russian friendship; EP 582; see also Koussevitzky, Serge, on American composers. B. H. Haggin; M. Krutch, Joseph Wood Johnson, Samuel, as critic; S	striles on our armed forces; E
Ku klux klan Dishands officially but its members join	Lady and the monster, the. J. Agee; MP 577	M
Johnson, Samuel, as critic; S	La Follette, Charles M.	M. H. Letter from London: C 403
EP	ber of the Ku klux klan, as Republican	MacArthur, General Douglas
Lyons, R. W., klan member in Indiana, becomes a state member of the Republican national committee; EP698; see also	Wins nomination for Representative; EP 666	ruin his chances as presidential candi-
EP 723	Seen moving toward isolationist Republican	Declares he is not a candidate for the presi-
	camp; EP	Machek, Joseph. See Yugoslavia
L	Issues report on the Associated farmers of California. I. F. Stone; S 502	Magazines. See names of magazines
Labor Agricultural, and the Associated farmers;	LaGuardia, Fiorello H. Opposes the reclocation of loyal Japanese-	In defense of Lord Vansittart's views on the La Follette committee's report. I. F. Stone: S	Americans in the east; EP 527 Laski, Harold J.	333; C
American newspaper guild wins mainten- ance-of-membership clause in case before	American myth and the peace, the; S 180 Lippmann, W., proposes a foreign policy for	Mariana islands. See War, Pacific the WLB; E	bost-war America; S	Asks Congress to shelve resolution on abroorder to speed victory in the war; E 31 Behind the strike of the Montgomery Ward	Latin America Fascism threatens to spread out of Argen-	Stone; S326; see also EP 406 workers. S. Katzander; S509; see also EP463; EP526: E555:	seen moving toward isolationist Repunican camp, Emmittee La Subset Committee California L. F. Stone; S	see also E31; 62; 90
EP638; EP	158; see also149; EP	Stone; S
jobs following navy shutdown of the	Need for post-war industrialization; EP., 610	Review of plays:
Civil service snooping against government	Used as a channel by American concerns	Cherry orchard, the employees; E	Lea bill On post-war aviation laws. K. Hutchison; S	Decision plant seizures in labor disputes; EP 697	S	Helen goes to Troy committee. R. Bendiner; S	And the "Hopkins letter"; EP115;	Jacobowsky and the colonel373, 428 preventing strikes. I. F. Stone; S90; see also E	Lehman, Leo H.	Mexican hayride
National service legislation and the anti-labor	Russia and the Vatican; C	Only the heart also EP	Leitgeb, Josef, poetry. F. C. Weiskopf; S. 45 Lend-lease act. See United States	Searching wind, the public opinion against unions; E 31	Lewis, Alfred Baker	Sheppey         521           Storm operation         105
Roosevelt offers a program of new roads as a plan for creating post-war jobs; EP 87	Amlie; C	Thank you, Svoboda ate confirmation of government employees	Canada swings left; S671; see also EP	Marshall islands. See War, Pacific earning over $4.500; EP377; see also EP582; EP666	Lewis, John L.	A shall. F. Kirchwey; S61; see also	Angered by A. F. of L. delay in passing on the return of the United mine workers;	Germany plans a negotiated peace; C 83
Thomas, R. J., denounces wild-cat strikes;	Les, Umphrey And, the "Hopkins letter"; EP115; And the "Hopkins letter"; EP115; And the "Hopkins letter"; EP115; Lehman, Leo H. Russia and the Vatican; C	Masters, J. G.
Labor Agricultural, and the Associated farmers; Agricultural, and the Associated farmers; Be La Follette committee's report. I. F. Solvent and the Associated farmers; Be La Follette committee's report. I. F. Solvent and the Associated farmers; American newspaper guild wins mainten- ance-of-membership clause in case before the WLB; E	Denounces the A. F. of L. for refusal to admit the mine workers to membership on his terms; EP	M. H. Letter from London; C

Matthews T R : profile in the New Yorker	Mitchison Naomi	Philadelphia and N.B.C. orchestras com-	PAGE
Matthews, J. B.; profile in the New Yorker praised; EP	Mitchison, Naomi Comments on "Workers on the Clyde" by	pared Recorded. See Haggin, B. H. Rodzinski and the New York Philharmonic, Schnabel recitals of Beethoven's music. Shostakovitch's eighth symphony Singher, Martial, song recital Singing techniques: J. Tourel, D. Maynor, and E. Reithberg.	456
Matuszewski, Ignacy. See Polish Americans	F. Kirchwey; C	Rodzinski and the New York Philharmonic.	25
Maverick, Maury	French consultative assembly at work, the;	Schnabel recitals of Beethoven's music Shostakovitch's eighth symphony	744
Opposes "gobbledegook language"; EP 40/ May, Andrew J. Gets War department not to use Public affairs pamphlet, "The races of man- kind"; EP 323; see also EP 203; EP	Tasks ahead in France; S594, 624	Singher, Martial, song recital	198 affairs pamphlet, "The races of man-	Who will rule France? S42; see also	and E. Rethberg	633
EP 554	Mondrian, Piet, death, C. Greenberg; A 288	Stern, Isaac. Stock, Frederick. Thomson, V., criticism	137 430
EP 554 Maynor, Dorothy. B. S. Haggin; M. 633 McCarran, Pat. See Aviation—Post war McCormick, Robert Rutherford His slate for the 1944 elections. W. Shel-	Money. See Finance, public Monopolies America heads for bigger and better post- war cartels. I. F. Stone; S178;	Thomson, V., criticism	744
McCormick, Robert Rutherford	America heads for bigger and better post-	37 ton; S	war cartels. I. F. Stone; S178; see also	Nation, The Botte, Charles G., becomes regular contribu- tor on military affairs; EP. Deadlines and military news; EP. Fifty years ago 91, 209, 328, 443, 559, Gordon, J. K., joins staff as managing edi- tor to replace R. Bendiner; EP. Seventy-Nive years ago 67, 179, 299, 411, ton; Sanction 298 May be drafted as presidential candidate by the America first party; EP	see also 410 And post-war aviation competition. K. Hutchison; S	Bolté, Charles G., becomes regular contribu-	723
Urges the United States to retain such is-	And Saudi-Arabian oil; E203; see	Deadlines and military news; EP	581 future safety; EP	And Saudi-Arabian oil, 245, 326 Biddle, F., speaks on the cartel system; EP 26 Department of justice files complaint against du Pont, Imperial chemical industries, and Remington arms company for cartel activities; EP 58	Gordon, J. K., joins staff as managing edi-	699
See also Chicago Tribune McGlue Charles S.	Department of justice files complaint against	Seventy-five years ago 67, 179, 299, 411.	295
Dismissed from the Lynn, Massachusetts,	and Remington arms company for cartel	531,	643 future safety; EP 3 See also Chicago Tribune McGlue, Charles S. Dismissed from the Lynn, Massachusetts, Telegram-News. W. H. Baldinger; C 112; see also 10 HKellar, Kenneth HKellar, Kenneth Grovernment employees earning over	Friends of the cartels in Washington, I. F.	Seventy-hve years ago67, 179, 299, 411, 531, Ten years ago35, 153, 274, 383, 505, Twenty-five years ago15, 124, 244, 355, 467, 588, National association of manufacturers Charges that the Department of justice tried	020
McKellar, Kenneth His bill requiring Senate confirmation of	Stone; S210; see also E240; 410	National association of manufacturers Charges that the Department of justice tried to prevent the oil industry from participation of the property of the prope	731 government government grandle containing over $4,500 is passed by the Senate; EP. 377; see also EP582; EP. and the operating funds of T.P. A., EP377; see also EP582;	the railroad trust; EP	Charges that the Department of justice tried see also EP582; EP 666	all foreign commercial agreements; EP 266	pating in discussion of a world oil
T.V.A.; EP377; see also EP582;	Seek post-war ownership of government war	National defense. See War effort	526
EP	Supreme court rules that the anti-trust act	National physicians' committee
Approves The Nation's points of view; C 111	Synthetic quinine versus the drug trade; EP 554	J. M. Morse; S676; see also	648
T.V.A.; EP. 377; see also EP. 582; EP	Montgomery, General Sir Bernard. C. G.	National service act. See War effort-Man-
	Montgomery, John F.	power See Germany Nazism. See Germany Near east. See names of countries Nedich, Milan. See Yugoslavia Negro soldier, the. J. Agee; M.P
Synthetic quinine discovered; drug trade may limit its commercial use; EP 554	His speech in praise of Admiral Horthy of Hungary is blue-pencilled by E. Davis	Nedich, Milan. See Yugoslavia may limit its commercial use; EP 554 Unethical practices in the operation of the workmen's compensation law; EP 294 Wagner-Murray-Dingel bill for national compulsory health insurance. J. M. Morse; S	of the OWI; EP 583	Negro soldier, the. J. Agee; MP	316
Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill for national	Anti-union stand provokes a strike in the	Negroes Anti-poll-tax bill defeated again in the Sen- ate: E.	612 compulsory health insurance. J. M.	Avery and the G.O.P.; E 585	Case of W. D. Lyons. L. B. Milner; S	444
Mediterranean advisory commission	Avery versus the C.I.O. S. Katzander;	House votes an appropriation to the Fair employment practices committee through Soviet-allied differences over the Badoglio regime seen as evidence of commission's	Two congressional committees named to in-	a parliamentary trick; EP	667 failure to function properly; EP 405	EP	Rankin, J. E., accused of blocking "G.I.	003 sacrificing advertisers. Sergeant F. Eb-	Montieal light, heat, and power consolidated  Ouebec legislature orders the socialization	hill of rights" in order to withhold bene- fits from Negro veterans; E	527
Memphis belle. J. Agee; MP	of the corporation under the direction of	Seen turning from support of Roosevelt be-	204
Menefee, Selden C.	Turcotte; S	South Carolina liberals oppose white-su-	277
sacrificing advertisers. Sergeant F. Ebright; P. 38  Memphis belle. J. Agee; MP. 456  Menefce, Selden C.  Success of our propaganda warfare in the Mediterranean; S. 184  Metropolitan opera company. B. H. Haggin; M 53, 82, 169, 198, 317, 346, 374  Mexican bayride. M. Marshall; D 197  Mexico	Department of justice files complaint against du Pont, Imperial chemical industries, and Remington arms company for carted activities, Earlies in Washington, I. F. Stone, S. 2.10; see also E240; 410 Kilgore committee hears testimony about the railroad trust; EP	Negroes Anti-poll-tax bill defeated again in the Senate E. W. D. Lyons. L. B. Milner; S. House votes an appropriation to the Fair employment practices committee through a parliamentary trick; EP. In Tennessee. Private; C. Rankin, J. E., accused of blocking "G.I. bill of rights" in order to withhold benessee. Seen turning from support of Roosevelt because of failure of the FEPC; EP. South Carolina liberals oppose white-supermacy resolution of the state house of representatives; EP. — 1344; see also. 470; EP. — 638; E. — Negro voting in Democratic primaries in Texas; EP. — 434; see also. 470; EP. — 638; E. — Negro voting in Democratic primaries in Texas; EP. — 638; E. — Negro voting in Democratic primaries in Texas; EP. — 638; E. — Negro voting in Democratic primaries in Texas; EP. — 638; E. — Negro voting in Democratic primaries in Texas; EP. — 638; E. — Negro voting in Democratic primaries in Texas; EP. — 638; E. — Negro voting in Democratic primaries in Texas; EP. — 638; E. — Negro voting in Democratic primaries in Texas; EP. — 638; E. — Negro voting in Democratic primaries in Texas; EP. — 638; E. — Negro voting in Democratic primaries in Texas; EP. — 638; E. — Negro voting in Democratic primaries in Texas; EP. — 638; E. — Negro voting in Democratic primaries in Texas; EP. — 1448; see also — 1479; EP. —	434
M53, 82, 169, 198, 317, 346, 374	Morley, S. G.	Supreme court decision rules against debt-	463
Mexican hayride. M. Marshall; D 197 Mexico	Morley, S. G. Comments on "Washington blues" by I. F. Stone; C	Supreme court outlaws devices to bar
Avila Camacho acts to counteract fascist interference in Mexican affairs. F. Jillinek; S	Morse, J. Mitchell Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill for national	Texas; EP434; see also470;
linek; S 364	compulsory health insurance; S648, 676 Morse, Wayne	Nenni, Pietro. See Italy	008
S364; see also	Nominated for Senate in Oregon; EP 666	Neutral countries. See World war
S560; see also	Mortgages Home owners' loan corporation mortgages	New deal; its accomplishments. I. F. Stone;	24
Vayo; S 465	Mortgages Home owners' loan corporation mortgages under fire from Representative E. M. Mosiroksen; E	New friends of music. B. H. Haggin; 289,	07
Role of the Roman catholic church. F.	Moscow conference. See World war	New Jersey	3/4
Sinarquists warn of red plot headed by	Mountbatten, Lord Louis. See Burma Moving pictures	M 289, New Jersey Edge, Governor W. E., opposes the relocation of loyal Japanese-Americans in the John Longo and Frank Hague, McA, Coleman; S. 12; see also EP. 3; C. New school for social research Celebrates its twenty-fith anniversary; EP. New York city Drew, J. L. called anti-Semitic policeman; Moreland act commissioners report on mal-others. F. Jellinek; S 364	War newsreels and war-record films. J. Agee; S	east; EP	527
Wage increases. F. Jellinek; S 364 War-time boom. T. Alvarez del Vavo: S	See also Agee, J. (for reviews)	man; S12; see also EP3; C	111
621; see also EP610; C 718	Murray-Wagner-Dingell bill. See Medicine	New school for social research Celebrates its twenty-fifth anniversary:
Congress and filibusters; C 523	Versus the Federation of modern painters	New York city	639
Mihailovich, General Draja. See Yugoslavia	Music (articles by B. H. Haggin)	Drew, J. L. called anti-Semitic policeman;	ON
Miller, Dorothy C.	Aitkin, Webster	EP	67
Posada: artist of revolution; S 542	Billy the kid	practices in the operation of the work- men's compensation law: EP	294
Correspondence with MacArthur seen likely	Murray-Wagner-Dingell bill. See Medicine Museum of modern art Versus the Federation of modern painters and sculptors. C. Greenberg; A. 195 Music (articles by B. H. Haggin) Aitkin, Webster	Moreland act commissioners report on mai- practices in the operation of the work- men's compensation law; EP. Outbreak of anti-Semitism; EP. Jagon, M. Haggin, M. Hag	87 dential candidate, I. F. Stone; S. 466:	Commercial announcements during concert	Haggin; M	25
see also EP498; EP 554 Milner, Lucille B.	broadcasts 137 Copland's "Short symphony" 137 Eddia Condon's 137	Board of regents submits a plan for post-
Case of W. D. Lyons; S	Heifetz, Jascha	war education; E	324
Avila Camacho acts to counteract fascist interference in Mexican affairs. F. Jillinek.  British St. Jillinek. S. Jillinek.	How orchestra conductors are chosen	suits; E.	380
dency. R. H. Rovere: S	Copland's "Short symphony" 137 Eddie Condon's jazz concerts 137 Heifetz, Jascha 605 Hindemili's new quartet 137 How orchestra conductors are chosen 605 Lebmann Lott American composers 662 Lebmann Lott American composers 662	Coudert-Mitchell bill limits stockholders' suits; E. Dewey's 'model' soldier-vote plan; EP, 322, Dewey's record as governor. I. F. Stone; S. Torrens, J. H., Democratic candidate, wins Congressional seat; EP. New York Times Its views on the French committee of national liberation; EP.	123
Miracle of Morgan's creek, the. J. Agee; MP 167	Koussewitzky on American composers 661 Lehmann, Lotte. 198 Metropolitan opera company: 53 Boris Godunov. 53 English versus foreign-language productation of the state of the s	Torrens, J. H., Democratic candidate wine	586
Miró, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A	English versus foreign-language produc-	Congressional seat; EP	294
Graham, Martha; S 108	tions	Its views on the French committee of na-
Mr. Skettington. J. Agee; MP	Gondoliers, the	New Yorker
Mitchell, Donald W.	Marriage of Figaro198. 346	As an agent of the liberal forces . A. B. Wood; C	0.2
305; see also EP	Rigoletto 53: see also	Praised for profile of J. B. Matthews; EP.	499
Germany at bay; S	Tristan and Isolde	American newspaper guild wins mainte-
Japanese navy avoids American invitations	arranged	See also Censorship Resedem of the	352
Minesoto Remater's case. See Labor unions Minesoto Minesoto Minesoto Mency. R. H. Rovere; S	Beethoven's sonate for violin and piere	press services of the second front; S 535	opus 96 137	Press seizes on labor unrest to mobilize opinion against unions; E	31

p	AGE	TAGE .
Neyman, Jerzy Poland's frontier claims; S595; see also E59; EP85; EP114; 125; Niebar, Reinhold World war III ahead? S. No greater love. J. Agee; MP. Nogueis, General Charles Will he be the Badoglio of France? F. Kirchwey; S	AGE	Peñaranda Castillo, Enrique. See Bolivia	Food shortages. Argus; S337; see also100; 513; 653 Forced savings instituted to combat in- flation. Argus; S
Poland's frontier claims; S 595; see		Pennsylvania	also100; 513; 653
also E59; EP85; EP114; 125;	609	Roosevelt runs third in the Republican	Forced savings instituted to combat in-
Niehuhr Reinhold	007	Penner Claude	Foreign workers in brown uniforms Ar-
World war III ahead? S	356	Florida New dealer runs for reelection to	gus; S 709
No greater love. J. Agee; MP	316	primary; Dewey wins; EP	"Front pigs" reappear in the army. Argus: S
Will he he the Badoglio of France? F.		Pernel, Orrea. B. H. Haggin; M 137	Himmler orders all men to serve in the
Kirchwey; S	438	Perón, Juan Domingo. See Argentina	auxiliary police. Argus; S 310
Norris, George W.		Peter II, King of Yugoslavia. See Yugo- slavia	Hitler's birthday celebration. Argus; S 541
also582; B	656	Petroleum administration for war	Himuler orders all men to serve in the auxiliary police. Argus; S
North Dakota	220	Charged with favoritism to the big oil com-	was announced. Argus; S
North Dakota Nye—a lost leader. H. Y. Williams; S	/30	panies, I. F. Stone; S	Manufacture of sweets discontinued. Ar-
Allied agreement negotiated with the Nor-		Phantom lady. J. Agee; MP 261	Manuis flourishes the Argus S . 596:
wegian government-in-exile regarding post-	296	Petroleum administration for war Charged with favoritism to the big oil companies, I. F. Stone; S	see also
Nove—a lost leader. H. Y. Williams; S. Norwad greement negotiated with the Norwad greement negotiated with the Norwad greement next to the Norwad greement; E. Government in exile, the B. Raditsa; S. Nazi soldiers are urged to have children by Norwegian women; children are sent to Germany, the Argus; S.	616	Philadelphia orchestra. B. H. Haggin; M 456	Argus; S 395
Nazi soldiers are urged to have children by		Phonograph records. See Haggin, B. H.—	Nazi reply to the leaflets dropped by al- lied fliers. Argus: S
Germany, the, Argus; S	18	Physicians' forum	Nazifies the University of Strasbourg.
Germany, the. Argus; S		organization Philadelphia orchestra. B. H. Haggin; M 456 Phonograph records. See Haggin, B. H.— Music, recorded Physicians' forum Supports the Murray-Wagner-Dingell health insurance bill. J. M. Morse; S 676; see also	Argus; S. Argus;
Nye, Gerald P. Seeks reelection to the Senate, H. Y.		see also
Seeks reelection to the Senate. H. Y. Williams; S	730	Pierce, John B., foundation	New anti-Jewish campaign. Argus; S 513
		Pierce, John B., foundation Publishes results of a questionnaire on "Family living as the basis for dwelling feesign"; EP Pin-up girl. J. Agee; MP	New anti-Jewish campaign. Argus; S. 513 Paradox of German morale, the P. Sering; S. 540 Physicians ordered to protect medical equipment during air raids. Argus; 709 S. 709
0		design"; EP 583	Physicians ordered to protect medical or - f information See War informa-		Pin-up girl. J. Agee; MP 577	equipment during air raids. Argus;
tion, office of		Poems
Office of war information. See War informa- tion, office of Office of war mobilization. See War mobiliza-		Carriage from Sweden, a. M. Moore 311	equipment during air raids. Argus; S
tion, office of Ogden, August Raymond Catholic looks at the Dies committee, a. I. F. Stone; S		First principles. 1. Edman415; see	Paetel; S
Catholic looks at the Dies committee, a.		Hymn to free enterprise. J.D.K329;	Raising the birth rate; the "well of life"
	042	Poems and the state of the stat	rost-war status. F. Sternberg; S., 187; see also C
And the Palestine white paper, I. F.		sacrificing advertisers. Sergeant F.	Schwarze korps urges increase in births
Stone; S	326	Ebright 38	in preparation for third world war.
		Poland Government in exile, the. B. Raditsa; S 644 Polish American congress in Buffalo urges support for the Polish government-in- exile; anti-Soviet campaign headed by I. Matuseewski. E. Estorick; S591, 718	Secret weapons. Argus; S44, 393 son; S.  Deal for Saudi-Arabian wells, the I. F. Stone; S.  Facts behind the lag in aviation gas out-	154	Polish American congress in Buffalo urges	State versus nazi party machinery. Ar-
Stone: S	245	support for the Polish government-in-	Temper of the people today. J. Alvarez
Stone; SFacts behind the lag in aviation-gas out-	125	I. Matuszewski. E. Estorick; S591;	del Vayo; S72; see also626; 681
put; EP	1/5	see also C	gus: S
Facts behind the lag in aviation-gas out- put; EP. Ickes, H. L., proposes government assist- ance to American oil companies for ex- ploitation of Arabian concessions; E. NAM charges that the Department of jus- tice tried to prevent the oil industry from participating in discussion of a world oil agreement; EP. Petroleum administration for war charged		I. Matuszewski. E. Estorick; S591; rese also border dispute. L. Witold; Russo-Polish border dispute. L. Witold; E.P114; E.P145; 333; 595; E.P609. Pole, Sir Felix J. C. Defends the cartel system. I. F. Stone; S178; see also410. Polish-Americans	gus; S. 1918 and party machinery. Argus; S. 2918 and party machinery. Argus; S. 272 see also ploitation of Arabian concessions; E	203	EP114; EP145; 333; 595; EP 609	Tubercular patients now subject to the tice tried to prevent the oil industry from		Pole, Sir Felix J. C.  Defends the cartel system I F Stone:	manpower draft. Argus; S 421 participating in discussion of a world oil	526	S 410	War between the Catholic church and the participating in discussion of a word agreement; EP. Petroleum administration for war charged with favoritism to the big oil companies. I. F. Stone; S. State department secreey on shipments to Spain attacked; E. Oklahoma	320	Polish-Americans Commerce of Polish-American organiza-	nazi regime. Argus; S 421 with favoritism to the big oil companies.	6	tions meets in Buffalo; will urge support	War mobilization reaches the 10-year-
State department secrecy on shipments to	0	for the government-in-exile. E. Estorick; S591; see also C718	Weser-Ems starts its own race institute.
Spain attacked; E	407	Matuszewski, I., stirs anti-Soviet feeling.	Argus; S
Oklahoma Democratic victory in the special congressional election seen as a victory for the New deal; EP, 1917 O'Month of the seen as a victory for the reign commercial agreements; is aimed at the cartels; EP. Only the heart. M. Marshall; D. Orlemanski, Father Suspended from to Russia; EP. 582; see also outside try to Russia; EP. 582; see also outside try to Russia; EP. 582; see		Commerce of Polish-American organizations meets in Buffalo; will urge support for the government-in-exile. E. Estorick; 718 Matuszewski, I., stirs anti-Soviet Feeling. E. Estorick; S	Weser-Ems starts its own race institute. Argus S Zones France into manpower districts. Grea Tertain: Reactions to Churchill's speech approving the Spanish regime 680; see also sional election seen as a victory for the	406	church post for unauthorized trip to	Great Britain:
O'Mahoney hill asks full publicity on all for-	400	Russia; EP 582; see also 591	the Spanish regime680; see also eign commercial agreements; is aimed at		Political action committee of the CIO. See	the Spanish regime680; see also E
Only the heart M Marshall D	456	Political war	Behind the army-navy "mutiny." B.
Orlemanski, Father		Alsace-Lorraine: nazifying the University	Behind the army-navy "mutiny." B. Vlavianos; S
Suspended from his church post for un-		Brazil has an undergound. J. Alvarez del also	591	Political working indistriate of the University A A Formation analysis of Strasbourg. Argus: S. 100 Brazil has an undergound. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 249 China:	Bose, Chandra, would-be Quisling. J. W.
Over twenty-one. F. K.; D	107	Wallace in Chungking, I. Alvarez del	Gerber; S
		Wallace in Chungking. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S	Allie tel Vie Viet P
P		France: Escape through the underground. B. S.;	Salvemini; S
Paetel, Karl O. Nazis under twenty-one; S391,	410		liberated area. G. Salvemini; S 16
		German army takes over the French rail- roads. Argus; S	Can we make use of Hirohito? E. Hun-
Palestine American Lewish committee urges the		Nazifying the University of Strasbourg. Argus; S	Japan: Can we make use of Hirohito? E. Hunter; S
British government to abrogate the White		Post-war leaders. J. Moch; S42; see	Frontier claims. J. Neyman; S595;
And Saudi-Arabian oil I E Stone: S	326	also Ct	Frontier claims. J. Neyman; S595; see also E59; EP. 85; EP. 114; 125; EP. 145; EP 609 Second-front strategy214; see also 205
Behind the gun-running trials. J. Lurie; S.	92	book. J. Kessel; S 97	Second-front strategy214; see also 205
Marshall, General G. C., asks Congress to		also Ct Underground resistance: a patriot's note Underground resistance: a patriot's note Proposition of the white paper. I. F. Stone; S326;		New France, the. C. de Gaulle; S447;	gime680; see also E640; C 718
TVA on the Jordan G W Norris	406	Puchen trial the 449: see also EP. 321: 693	Churchill's praise for the Franco regime680; see also E640; C 718 Franco awaits a German counter-attack to repel the Normandy invasion forces;
S589; see also B	656	Restaurant in Algiers; S 511	EP
White paper, the. J. Lurie; S92; see	406	Germany: Aerial bombings hit few buildings of cul-	Franco, new axis chief. D. Thompson;
Papandreou, George. See Greece		tural value. Argus; S	Ten points for peace
Masquerade in Budanest: S	468	Anti-espionage campaign. Argus; S 101 Anti-nazi jokes and slogans. Argus; S 189	Union of soviet socialist republics:
Passage to Marseille. J. Agee; MP	316	and the state of t	EP 737 Franco, new axis chief. D. Thompson; S. 158; see also Ct. 160; 149; EP. 266 Ten points for peace. 309 Union of soviet socialist republics: Reconstruction begins. F. Sternberg; S. 735 War, European:
Palestine American Jewish committee urges the British government to abrogate the White paper: EP And Saudi-Arabian oil. I. F. Stone; S. Behind the gun-running trials. J. Lurie; S. Marshall, General G. C., asks Congress to white paper. I. F. Stone; S. see also EP TVA on the Jordan. G. W. Norris; S. S. S89; see also B. White paper, the. J. Lurie; S 92; see also EP Papandroou, George. See Greece Papandroou, George. See Greece Masquerade in Budapest; S. Passage to Marseille J. Agee; MP Patrick, Luther Nominated for Representative in Alabama;		Berlin after the air-raids. Argus; S 44	War, European: D-day and the underground
EP	000	Awaits the invasion. Argus; S
His views on a national service law T F		Campaign launched for salvage of textile	Royal government-in-exile, the. B. Raditsa; S
His views on a national service law. I. F. Stone; S	150	Casualties on the eastern front. Argus;	Poll tax
Paul, Randolph Resigns as general counsel of the Tressurv department; EP	379	Children's names reveal the influence of "cultural nazism". Argus; S 216 Communal kitchens replace private house-	Popovic, Milan D.
Resigns as general counsel of the Treasury department; EP. Pavelich, Ante. See Yugoslavia Paz Estenssoro, Victor. See Bolivia		Communal kitchens replace private house- keeping. Argus: S	Comments on "The plot against Yugokeeping. Argus; S	slavia" by B. Raditsa; C291; see also 118 Posada Tosé Guadalune, exhibition, D. C.
Dies committee promises an investigation of its campaign for a negotiated peace; EP146; see also EP239; C		Does Europe need a post-war Germany?	Miller; A
EP146; see also EP239; C	290	L. Fischer; S	Anti-politax bill defeated again in the senter; E. Popovic, Milan D. Comments by B. Raditski, C. 291; see also. 118 Posada, José Guadalupe, exhibition. D. C. Miller,

Post-war reconstruction. See World war	Price administration, office of Congress ready to extend the life of the OPA but with changes crippling the price- control structure; EP	Rice, Philip Blair
Power	Congress ready to extend the life of the	Rice, Philip Blair How to get a hetter Congress; S
Power  McKellar, Senator K., seeks to limit the operating funds of T.V.A.; EP377; see also EP582; EP666 Public versus private. McA. Coleman; S. 127 Quebec's new power policy strikes a blow at the Canadian power trust. E. Turcotte; 722	control structure; EP	Comments on "O little town (restricted)"
see also EP 582; EP 666 Public versus private, McA. Coleman; S., 127	Senate committee proposes that price con- trol be limited to 45 essential commodi-	Riding high. J. Agee; MP
Quebec's new power policy strikes a blow at	ties; EP	Rights, civil. See Civil rights Rockefeller Nelson Aldrich. See Coordinator ties; EP 378 ties; EP 378 See also Business—Prices Prices. See Business Prisoners, war. See World war—Prisoners Private	of inter-American affairs
TVA achievements influence other countries in direction of public power projects.	Private	Comments on "In the wind" item concern-in direction of public power projects. G. W. Norris; S589; see also582; see also B	Private Negroes in Tennessee; C	ing the Chicago public library; C290; see also Pranda See Union of soviet socialist re-	Success of American psychological warfare	Rodzinski, Artur. B. H. Haggin; M 25
publics	Success of American psychological warfare in the Mediterranean area. S. C. Mene-	Roman catholic church
America first party may draft Colonel Mc- Cormick as a candidate: EP	Psychological warfare branch of the allied	McMahon, Dr. F. E., approves The Nation's
And the parties on the left; E 641	armies. S. C. Menefee; S	Nazis court the Vatican with a back-to-
Presidential campaign of 1944 America first party may draft Colonel Mc- Cormick as a candidate; EP. 554 And the parties on the left; E	War department, at instigation of Repre-	see also Rodainski, Artur. B. H. Haggin; M. 25 Roger Touhy, gangster. J. Agee; MP. 716 Roman catholic church Its role in Mexico. F. Jellinek; S. 364 McMahon, Dr. F. E., approves The Nation's point of view; C. 111 Nazis court the Vatican with a back-to- church movement; EP. 59 Orlemanski, Father, suspended from his church work for unauthorized trip to Church with the court of the court of Rome declares against a total victory; EP.
Both parties choose Chicago for their con-	pamphlet, "The races of mankind"; EP	church post for unauthorized trip to
Both parties choose Chicago for their conventions; EP	Public finances. See Finance, public	Pope in speech following the capture of
New deal wing of the Democratic party.	Public utility districts. See Utilities Pucheu, Pierre	EP
R. Bendiner; S	in the Mediterranean area. S. C. Mene- fee; S	Soviet government attacks the Vatican's policy as pro-fascist; EP174; see also
Colonel McCormick's Illinois slate. W.	Puget Sound power and light company	Wars with the nazi regime. Argus; 375  Wars with the nazi regime. Argus; 342  Rone. See Italy; War, European  Roosevelt, Franklin Delano  Administration:
Shelton; S. 298 Congressional primary results show a liberal trend; EP	Seattle, Washington. McA. Coleman;	Rome. See Italy; War, European eral trend; EP	Purple heart, the. J. Agee; MP	Roosevelt, Franklin Delano Administration:
mittee, defeated in the California prima-mittee, defeated in the California primarities, defeated in the California primarities	0	see also C for the New deal; EP	Quinine, synthetic, discovered; drug trade may limit its commercial use; EP 554 Quintanilla, Luis, exhibition. C. Greenberg;	sional revolt over the tax veto; E267;
Dewey: a profile. I. F. Stone; S 586 Dewey or Willkie on the Republican ticket?	Quintanilla, Luis, exhibition. C. Greenberg;	calls for a national service act. I. F.
EP		land-Rankin soldier-vote bill; EP. 350; see also C. W., leads Congressional revolt over the tax veto; E. 267; see also E. 168; 270 and the see also E. 268; 270 a
EP	R	Criticizes critics of American foreign
Congress; EP	RFC. See Reconstruction finance corporation	policy. F. Kirchwey; S381; see also
EP Dies, M., will not stand for reelection to Congress; EP. Gahagan, H., wins congressional nomination in California; EP. 666 Hill, Senator L., Democratic whip, seeks reelection, E. M. Steed; S., 506; see also EP. 553; EP. 666 How to get a better Congress. P. B. Rice; S. 413	American propaganda warfare in the Medi- terranean area. S. C. Menefee; S 184	also Hill, Senator L., Democratic whip, seeks reelection, E. M. Steed: S506: see		ris opposition to de Gaulle. F. Kirch- wey; S
also EP	Plet against Yugoslavia; S118; see	His veto of the anti-subsidy bill is sus- tained by Congress; EP
S	Raditsa, Bogdan Europe's governments in exile; S616, 644 Plet against Yugoslavia; S118; see also 117; C291; EP722 Russia and the Balkans; S440; see also EP.	Message on the soldier-vote hill the
Ku klux klan disbands officially and becomes active in the two major parties; EP. 68 Lessons of Willkie's defeat in the Wisconsin primaries; E. 435; see also. 437; MacA-thur. General. 581; C. 607; MacA-thur. General. 608; see also. EP. 658; MacA-thur. Willer correspondence, the. I. F. Stone; S. 466; see also EP. 498 Montgomery Ward and the G.O.P.; E. 588; Montgomery Ward and the G.O.P.; E. 598 Montgomery ward and the FEPC; EP 294 New deal victories scored in Florida, Alastone MacMarket Company and Co	EP 433 Railroads	Plan for world organization: EP 722
Lessons of Willkie's defeat in the Wiscon- sin primaries; E435; see also437;	Abuses in railroad management revealed	President considers establishing free ports in the United States for refugees. I. F. Stone; S
EP	Abuses in railroad management revealed to the Kilgore committee by W. Berge, assistant attorney general; EP 203	I. F. Stone; S the presidency; EP	Seek a share in post-war domestic aviation routes. K. Hutchison; S	deal. I. F. Stone; S
F. Stone; S 466; see also EP 498	Where the blame for the railroad strike rests; E	Should veto the tax bill; EP 202 Statement on the Palestine white paper.
Montgomery Ward and the G.O.P.; E 585 Negroes seen turning from Roosevelt be-	rests; E	I. F. Stone; S326; see also EP 406 Willkie's defeat and the fourth-term is-
New deal victories scored in Florida Ala-	And the soldier-vote bill; EP 173; see also	sue. I. F. Stone; S bama, Indiana, South Dakota primaries;	Blocks veterans' rights to unemployment in-	Rosenblatt, William
Nye-a lost leader. H. Y. Williams; S 730	surance and other benefits; E527;	J. Alvarez del Vayo; C718; see also reelection. R. W. France; S507; see	Ranshofen-Wertheimer, Egon	621; EP
hew deal victories scored in Florida, Alasbama, Indiana, South Dakota primaries; 553 Nyc.—a lost leader, H. Y. Williams; S. , 730 Pepper, Senator C., New dealer, runs for reelection. R. W. France; S. , 507; see also EP. , 553; EP. , 666 Polish-American bloc seeks to mobilize American vote on an anti-Russian plant. 718 Exterick; S. , 591; see also C. , 718 Exterick; S. , 591; see also C. , 718 Ements of the New deal. I. F. Stone; S. , 34 Public opinion polls on the candidates and issues. J. S. Bruner; S. , 704 Republican leaders ask at Congressional investigation of the CLO Political and committee; EP. , 566; see also EP. , 667 Expublican primary; Dewy force; EP. , 526 EP. Smith, G. L. K., condemus Dewcy's internationalism; EP. , 554; see also EP. , 526; EP. , 526; See P. , 537; see also EP.	reats; E	See also Presidential campaign of 1944 Rosenblatt, William Comments on "Mexico's wartime boom" by J. Alvarez del Vayo; C718; see also 621; EP
American vote on an anti-Russian plank. E. Estorick; S591; see also C 718	Article by K. Smith in praise of the State	Future prospects of natural and synthetic.
President Roosevelt reviews the accomplish-	department. R. Allan; S	Future prospects of natural and synthetic.  McA. Coleman and P. Elias; S 537 Synthetic rubber versus aviation gas; EP 175 ments of the New deal. I. F. Stone; S 34 Public opinion polls on the candidates and	Jones aids the cartels. I. F. Stone; S. 210; see also E issues. J. S. Bruner; S	Recorded music. See Haggin, B. H. Refugees	Molotov declares that Russian crossing of the Prut is not motivated by territorial ambitions; EP vestigation of the CIO Political action committee; EP666; see also EP 611	Case for free ports, the. I. F. Stone; S. 670 Reis, Bernard J.	amotions; EP 433 Seeks a way out of the war without fight- ing Germany; EP 433 Sends out peace feelers through Prince Barbu Stirbey as the Russian offensive gains momentum; E
Republican primary: Devey first EP 526	Reis, Bernard J. Big steel—prince or pauper? S 674	Sends out peace feelers through Prince
Smith, G. L. K., condemns Dewey's inter-	Big steel—prince or pauper? S	Barbu Stirbey as the Russian offensive
EP		Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics Russo-German war How the Red army wins. L. Renn; S 503 Leningrad siege lifted. D. W. Mitchell;
145; EP173; 207; E295; EP322;	How the Red army wins; S 503	How the Red army wins. L. Renn; S 503
Epunularism; Ef	Kenn, Ludwig How the Red army wins; S	S
Texas Democratic party splits over New	Forged Hopkins letter names Willkie as the	Nazi casualties. Argus; S
the national convention; EP638; see	party's presidential candidate; EP115;	Mitchell; S305; see also EP 461 which candidate will get the Wilkie bloc	Responsible for the Senate defeat of the	D. W. Mitchell; S151; see also EP 57
Why Roosevelt faces a tough fight in No-	Spangler, Butler, and Bricker urge a Con-	Red army crosses the Prut river; EP 433 Red army seen driving the Germans from vember; public opinion polls on the presi- dency. J. S. Bruner; S	gressional investigation of the CIO Po- litical action committee; EP	Russian soil this year; EP
Willkie begins his campaign on a high	Which candidate will get the Willkie bloc of votes? EP	reserves in western Europe; E 33
Wilkie on taxes; EP. 173; see also 180	Wilkie on the eve of the Wisconsin pri-	Leningrad siege lifted. D. W. Mitchell; S
willkie on the eye of the Wisconsin primaries. W. Shelton; S	Willkie outlines a 1944 platform. K.	Russians seize Krivoi Rog and Vitebsk; EP 266
Wilkie outlines a Republican 1944 plat-	Willkie versus Dewey for the presidential	Spanish troops and planes actively aid Ger- many on the eastern front, according to Press. See Newspapers	Willkie's campaign platform isolates him	Soviet reports; EP
retty little parlor. M. Marshall; D 521	from the rest of the party; E 239 See also Presidential campaign of 1944	stabilize? D. W. Mitchell; S 151
Price, Willard Future of Japan's islands, the; S 358	Rethberg, Elizabeth. B. H. Haggin; M 633	Comments on "Price control works"; C
July Common and Common	The Germany	579; see also E

PAGE	Soviet Russia. See Union of soviet socialist	Dewey Thomas F . S
Saipan. See War, Pacific	republics	Dewey, Thomas E.; S FBI's role in the post-war General Marshall and the Ickes and the oil men; S.
Saipan. See War, Pacific Salaries. See Labor—Wages Salvemini, Gaetano King Victor Emmanuel the allies' rubber stamp for "liberated" Italy; S16;	Spain  Agrees to han Nazi agents from Tangier.  Agrees to Kirchwey; S	Ickes and the oil men; S. Job procurement for vete La Follette committee's r sociated farmers; S MacArthur's political fora
stamp for "liberated" Italy; S16; see also	Spanish ports; EP	sociated farmers; S stamp for "liberated" 11aly; $200 See also Peactionary policy of the AMG in liberated Italy; $410 Saturday evening post Its attitude to the conomic future of Germany, I. F. Stone; $5	shipment of oil to Germany; EP 174 American government should insist that	also EP
Saturday evening post Its attitude to the economic future of Ger-	Franco clear all Germans out of Spain; EP	see also EP Monopolies seek post-wa many. I. F. Stone; S 410		National service act, a;
of oil concessions in this region; E 203	EP 321 Charged by Russians with substantial aid to the German army on the eastern front; EP 86; see also EP 174 Churchill's words of praise; E 640; see also 680: C 718	President Roosevelt revie
Oil and the Palestine immigration ban.  J. F. Stone; S	Franco in liberal dress; H. Denny reports that he has been won over to the allied	Special house committee FCC continues the Cox
Scharnhorst, sunk by the British navy; EP 29; see also 151	cause; E	Washington on D-day; S. Willkie's defeat and the
Saudi Arabia American oil companies plan exploitation of oil concessions in this region; E 203 Arabian oil deal, the I. F. Stone; S 245 Oil and the Falestine immigration ban. I. F. Stone; S	Franco offers "strict neutrality"; EP 174	Storm operation. M. Marsh
Schnabel, Artur, Beethoven recitals. B. H. Haggin; M	terattack to repel the Normandy invasion forces; EP	able by the Boston poli Stratton, William G. See II
Schnabel, Artur, Beethoven recitals. B. H. Schnabel, Artur, Beethoven recitals. B. H. Schnaber, Georges (cartoon) Breber, Georges (cartoon) Breber, Henry, banking corporation; it is with nazi cartels. I. F. Stone; S. 210; see also E. 240. Schumann, Gerhard, poetry. F. C. Weiskopf; S.	Has Franco freed political prisoners? D. Thompson; S	sociated farmers; S MacArthur's political fora, Mr. Hull's foreign-policy; see also EP Monopolics seek post-wa government war plants National service act, a; National service act, a; Visional service act, a; Visiona
Schroder, J. Henry, banking corporation, it ties with nazi cartels. I. F. Stone; S	ward neutrals; first step should be to	Subasich, Ivan. See Yugosl.
Schumann, Gerhard, poetry. F. C. Weiskopf; Science	Its embassy in Venezuela said to give money to nazi agents; EP 86	Sullivans, the. J. Agee; M. Sumner, Jessie
Science Atoms at work. O. A. Battista; S 247	Legitimist campaign launched by Don Car- los V. R. Vambery; S211; see also C 347	Introduces two bills calling war against Japan; E may limit its commercial use; EP 554	communications. Low; Ct	Outlaws devices to bar No
Science  Asoms at work. O. A. Battista; S. 247  Asoms at work. O. A. Battista; S. 247  Synthetic quinine discovered; drug trade  may limit its commercial use; EF. 58  Searching wind, the. M. Marshall; D. 494  Seattle, Washington  Its public power plant. McA. Coleman; S 127  Sedition  Thirty accused of conspiracy to incite	EP 86; see also EP 74 Churchill's words of praise; E 640; see also 680; C 640; see also 680; E 640; see also 180; EP 640; see also 181; see also 1849; EP 184 Franco, new axis chief. D. Thompson; S 188; see also 1849; EP 174 Franco waits anxiously for a German counterattack to repel the Normandy in 737 Has Franco recel the Normandy in 158 Hull announces stricter American policy toward neutrals; first step should be to recall Ambassador Hayes; EP 461 Its embassy in Venezuels, said to give 86 Legitimist campaign launched by Don Carlos V. R. Vambery; S 211; see also C 347 Madrid switchboard for Axis-Argentine communications. Low; Ct 445 Mess of wolfram, a. F. Kirchwey; S 536; see also EP 45 Spanish free movement, the. B. Raditsa; 644 Spanish serenader. Low; Ct 644	see also 470; EP638 Pollock decision rules a
Sedition  Thirty accused of conspiracy to incite mainly in the armed forces go on trial in Washington J. Weeksler; S50; see also EP  See here, Private Hargrove. J. Agee; MP. 344 Selective service Draft of men over twenty-six halted; EP. 462	Spanish serenader. Low; Ct	Refuses to review convic in Washington. J. Wechsler; S530;	to Franco attacked; E	see also E
See here, Private Hargrove. J. Agee; MP 344 Selective service	5	bership to be kept intact labor board hearings; E
Draft of men over twenty-six halted; EP 462 Lack of policy revealed in conflicting orders	Spangler, Harrison E. See Republican party Sparks, C. Nelson And the Hopkins letter; EP115; see also EP. 146 Stalin, Joseph. See Union of soviet socialist	ing of "voluntary" pay
Selective service  Draft of men over twenty-six halted; EP 462 Lack of policy revealed in conflicting orders on deferment of essential workers; EP 351 See also United States Army Scoane, Manuel Occurred among Argentina's generals in the	Stalin, Joseph. See Union of soviet socialist	surance companies; E . Switalski, John struggle for power; S 387	Stambaugh, Lye in North Dakota for the Re- Opposition enatorial nomination. H. Y. Williams. 730 Standard oil company. 730	Subsides. See Agriculture Sullivans, the. J. Agee; M Sumner, Jessie wills call war against Japan; E Supreme court, United State. Outlaws devices to bar Ne Democratic primaries in see also 470; EP
South American conspiracy, the; S Serbia. See Yugoslavia Sering, Paul Peradox of German morale, the: S 540	Williams; S
Sering, Laur	Diamet for the law in switting and	T. B. A. Comments on "O little to by W. Whitman; C Tarbell, Ida M., death; EP
Paradox of German morale, toe; S. Sessions, Al Comments on "Jobs for all" by T. R. Comments on "Jobs for all" by T. R. Seven days ashore. J. Agee; MP. 577 Shelton, Willard Colonel McCormick's slate for the 1944 elections; S. 299 Willkie against the gods; S. 412 Sheppey, M. Marshall; D. Agee; MP. 577 Shimon, Jarvest moon. J. Agee; MP. 577 Shos lakovitch, Dmitrit; eighth symphony. B. Show business. J. Agee; MP. 577 Simonds, Bruce. B. H. Haggin; M. 137 Simons, Harriet P. Comments on "Charleston contra munda" by E. Ewing; C. 202 Sinarquism. See Mexico Sinarquism. See Mexico	Standing room only. J. Agee; MP 316 Starbuck, Eric A.	Tarbell, Ida M., death; EP
Shelton, Willard	718; see also E	Versus post-war American elections; S	Member of Dies committee defeated in Ala- bama primaries; EP553; see also EP 666	ETaxation. See Finance, pub Teamsters' union, Minneap unions
Sheppey. M. Marshall; D	His followers seek the Willkie bloc of votes in the presidential campaign; EP 462	Tender comrade. J. Agee; N
Shostakovitch, Dmitri; eighth symphony. B. H. Haggin; M	Steed, Edgar M. Hill Sanator I seeks reelection to the	Its achievements influence direction of public power
Simonds, Bruce. B. H. Haggin; M 137 Simonds, Harriet P.	United States senate from Alabama; S506; see also EP553; EP 666	unions Tender comrade. J. Agee; M Tennessee valley authority Its achievements influence direction of public power Norris; S
Comments on "Charleston contra munda" by E. Ewing; C	Steel  Big steel companies oppose wage demands of the steel workers as a threat to post- war production. B. J. Reis; S	EP
Sinarquism. See Mexico Singh, J. J.	war production. B. J. Reis; S 674	Texas Democratic state conventio hemisphere Indians; C	Brains in the kitchen; S. 95; see also C. 199	Democratic state convention deal issues; two rival sl national convention; E
Smith, Gerald L. K.	Sternberg, Fritz Post-war status of Germany; S187; see	Dies, M., will not stand Congress; EP Supreme court outlaws dev
554; see also EP	Brains in the kitchen; S. 95; see also C. 199 Stern, Isaac. B. H. Haggin; M. 137 Sternberg, Fritz Postwar status of Germany; S. 187; see also C 318; 333; C 375 Recovery in Russia; S 735 Stettinius, Edward R., Jr. See United State Gepartment China as a base for the final drive against Lapan; S 242 China in distress; S 330 Stewart, R. S 330	Supreme court outlaws dev paign; EP	States—State department Stewart Maxwell S.	Thank you, Svoboda. M. M.
party to draft Colonel McCormick as presidential candidate; EP 554	China as a base for the final drive against Japan; S	Thomas, R. J. See Labor u
Article in the Reader's digest praises the State department. R. Allan; S 558	China in distress; S	Franco, new axis chief; S Thompson, Frederick
Smith, Gerald L. K. Condemns Dewey's internationalism; EP 554; see also EP. Gives his views on the presidential cam abagin; Event of the America first party to draft Colonel McCormick as presidential candidate; EP. 554 Smith, Kingsbury Article in the Reader's digest praises the Smith, Lilliam Strange fruit, "is banned from H. Boston bookstores by the police; EP. 375 Smith committee	Stilwell, General Joseph W. See Burma	Thomson, Virgil, as music
Smith committee  Reports on the work of the War labor	Favors a national service act. I. F. Stone; S123; see also	Three-cornered hat. B. H. Tito. See Yugoslavia board; E148; see also EP 697 Social security	China in distress; S	Congress, EP
Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill for national compulsory health insurance. J. M.	Stone, I. F. Arabian oil deal, the: S245; see also 326	Togliatti, Palmiero. See It Torrens, James H. See Ne
Soldier-vote bill. See United States—Army Soldiers. See United States—Army	Baruch-Hancock report, the: millionaires' Beveridge report: S. 354; see also EP	Toscanini, Arturo. B. H. Ha Totalitarian states. See nan
Song of Bernadette, the. J. Agee; MP 137 South Africa	238; C376; EP	Trade. See Business Tresca. Carlo
Beston books ores by the police; EP. 376  Reports on the work of the War labor reports on the work of the War labor war labor (E. 148), and the work of the War labor war labor war labor bear labor laborate. J. M. Ores (E. 148), and the war labor war labor laborate	Stocks. See Business Stone, I. F. Arabian oil deal, the; S 245; see also 326 Baruch-Hancock report, the: millionaires' Beveridge report; S 354; see also EP 228, 228, 228, 228, 240 Cartels, Washington friends, the; S 210; see also E case for free ports for refugees, the; S 670 Catholic looks at the Dies committee, a; S	Little police action to app
South Carolina Prominent liberals oppose white-supremacy	Catholic looks at the Dies committee, a;	Trotskyites Minneapolis Trotskyist w victed under alien and 30; see also E resolution of the state house of repre- sentatives; EP	S270; see also C	30; see also E

PAGE
r period; S. 586
r period; S. 502
second front; S. 62
rans; S. . . 270
eport on the As-ng for intensified es egro voting in the Texas; EP.434;
Egainst debt-peon-terring delays in 263 per 263 merican politics" 718; see also.... 591 wn..(restricted)" trade expansion; olis. See Labor IP.....373, 549 other countries in r projects. G. W. see also ...... 582 eks to limit funds .....377; see also EP .......... 666 itman; C....... 403 n splits over New ates named to the P..638; see also for reelection to 582 ices to bar Negro o; EP. 638; E. 668
[arshall; D. 428
(for reviews)
nions .158; see also.. 149 criticism; C.... 663 c critic. B. H. ......110, 346, 744 Haggin; S..... 717 ational labor or-Greenberg; A.. 495 w York state ggin; M 137, 456, 605 nes of countries ggin; M . . . . . . 633 rehend his killer; nion leaders con-sedition law; EP BURLINGAME

PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Calif.

			PACE
Truk. See War, Pacific Truman committee	PAGE	United nations relief and rehabilitation ad-	FAGE	Roosevelt offers a program of new roads as first plan for creating jobs; EP Senate Economic policy and planning committee headed by Senator W. F.
				Senate Economic policy and planning
Truman committee Investigation of the lag in aviation-gas output; EP	175	UNRRA aid will be needed in the battle	700	committee headed by Senator W. F.
F. Stone; S	245	Large appropriation authorized by the	147	George outlines a post-war economic policy; EP Welles, S., on post-war military alliances; EP
Tunisian victory. J. Agee; MP Turcotte, Edmond	3/3	ministration congress delays in vote for appropriation; UNRRA aid will be needed in the battle of Europe; EP	500	EP State department:
Investigation of the lag in avacaciages output; EP Saudi-Arabian oil deal. I Report on the Saudi-Arabian oil deal. I Report of the Manager of the Manager of the Manager of the Mantreal light, heat, and power of the Montreal light, heat, and power Turkey	732	Urged to work with the cooperatives in	529	State department: And the Palestine immigration ban. I. F.
of the Montreal light, heat, and power	722	various countries as they are liberated.	154	State department: And the Palestine immigration ban. I. F. Stone; S326; see also EP Charged by Dewey with suppression of political news sent by American re- porters in London to their papers here;
Turkey	132	United service organizations	401	political news sent by American re-
America and Britain suspend shipment of	293	tribute "The races of mankind," a pamph-		E :
Suspends negotiations with the British; EP	201	let on the problem of racial differences,		Denies any intention to deal with Vichy.
Comments on McA. Coleman's "John Longo		323; EP	554	Hull and Italy; E
Turkey  America and Britain suspend shipment of  war supplies; EP  Suspends negotiations with the British; EP  Turman, Herbert  Comments on McA. Coleman's "John Longo  and Frank Hague"; C	3	Tasks ahead in France. J. Moch; S. 594; see also. Urged to work with the cooperatives in various countries as they are liberated. K. Huthison; S. United service organizations Barnard, C. I., forbids the YMCA to distribute "The races of mankind," a pamphlet on the problem of racial differences, to USO centers; EP. 203; see also EP. 323; EP. United States. And China. Chinese exchange restrictions hamper Chinese exchange restrictions hamper.		Denies any intention to deal with Vichy.  F. Nicribwey; S. E.  F. Nicribwey; S. E.  F. Nicribwey; S. E.  Hull antiounces a stricter policy towards on cutrals; EP.  Hull asks four-power conference on world organization; small nations express their fears over the plan; E. 669; see also EP.  B. E. E. E. S. E. C. S. C. C. E. S. S. E. S. E. E. E. S. E. E. E. S. E. S. E. S. E. S. E. S. E. S. E. E. E. E. S. E. E. S. E. E. S. E. E. S. E.
Twaddell, Marie Louise Publication of International affairs to be continued in Canada; C				organization; small nations express
continued in Canada; C	663	fields. M. S. Stewart; S	330	their fears over the plan; E 669; see
		to inadequate military aid from	707	77 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1
UNRRA. See United nations relief and re- habilitation administration U. S. S. R. See Union of soviet socialist republics Incertain glory. I. Agee: MP.		Chinese defeat in the Honan area charged to inadequate military aid from America; E 613; see also	707	their fears over the plan; E. 669; see also EP. Hull's statement on relations with the French committee of national libera- Mr. Hull's foreign-policy troubles. I. F. Stone; S. 382; see also EP. 322; 325; Praised in Reader's digest article by K. Smith R. Allan; S States and S. S. S. Smith S. S. Smith R. Allan; S.
UNRRA. See United nations relief and re-		Kuomintang-Communist split and the establishment of a democratic constitu-		Mr. Hull's foreign-policy troubles. I. F. Stone: S. 382: see also EP 322: 325:
U. S. S. R. See Union of soviet socialist		tion. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S	707	Praised in Reader's digest article by K.
republicately J. Agee; MP. Underground report. J. Agee; MP. Underground report. J. Agee; MP. Underbill, Frank H. Imperial cross-curerats; S. 5.52; see also E.P. 498; EP. Unemployment. See Labor Uninvited, the. J. Agee; MP. Union of soviet socialist republies And Bustle. Sturmthat; S. And Bustle. Sturmthat; S. And Bustle. Sturmthat; S. And Common of soviet socialist republications and Studies of the socialist republication of soviet socialist republication. And Common of soviet socialist republications Russia charges Chinese border violations Russia charges Chinese border violations	577	And Great Britain:	000	Secrecy on oil shipments to Spain at-
Underground report. J. Agee; MP Underhill, Frank H.	661	Stettinius, E. R. to leave for London for	273	Stettinius, E. R., Ir., to represent United
Imperial cross-curernts; S532; see also	610	political and economic conversations;	3.9.1	States at Anglo-American conference
Unemployment. See Labor	216	And Italy. See Italy; War, European	001	United States steel corporation
Uninvited, the. J. Agee; MP Union of soviet socialist republics	316	And Japan: Cairo conference reported in agreement		profits. B. J. Reis; S
And Austria. A. Sturmthal; S	36	Cairo conference reported in agreement that the United States receive Japan- ese-mandated islands after the war; EP		United States supreme court. See Supreme
Russia warns the Bulgars to break with	627	ese-mandated islands after the war; EP 58; see also War, Pacific And Latin America: Combat nazi influence; EP. Our policy challenged by the spread of fascism; E. We should help to industrialize our neighbor countries; EP Arranco should be asked to clear all Ger- Franco should be asked to clear all Ger-	358	Secrecy on oil shipments to Spain at- tacked; E. R., Jr., to represent United States at Anglo-American conference States at Anglo-American conference United States steel corporation Proclaims its poverty despite huge wartime profits. B. J. Reis; S. United States supreme court. See Supreme court, United States Up in arms, J. Agee; MP. Up in Mabel's room. J. Agee; MP.
And China:	037	And Latin America:		Utilities J. Agee; MP
And China: Russia charges Chinese border violations in Outer Mongolia; EP  And Czechoslovakia: Russo-Czech mutual assistance treaty, the L. Witold; S	434	to combat nazi influence; EP	29	Public utility districts versus private power interests. McA. Coleman; S
And Czechoslovakia:		Our policy challenged by the spread of	5
the, L. Witold; S	125	We should help to industrialize our neigh-	610	Vagte Alfred
		And Spain:	010	Vagts, Alfred Beachheads for victory; S
Soviet terms not harsh; EP293; see also EP	202	And Spain: Franco should be asked to clear all Germans out of Spain; EP. Hayes, Ambassador C. J. H., should be recalled, by the state of the state o	321	Vambery, Rustem Legitimism—new style; S
Russian demands on post-war Germany.	333	Hayes, Ambassador C. J. H., should be	461	See also C
And Great Britain. See Great Britain-An-	333	Mess of wolfram, a. F. Kirchwey; S	401	Comments on "First principles" by I. Ed-
And Germany: Russian demands on post-war Germany. F. Sternberg; S. 187; see also C. 318; And Great Britain. See foreat Britain—An- glo-Soviet relations And Italy: Russia recognizes the Badoglio regime. F. Kirchwey; S. 351; see also EP And Polotic C		Our policy of appeasement challenged by	583	Van Loon, Hendrik, death
Russia recognizes the Badoglio regime.		Russian and Venezuelan reports of		Vansittart, Lord In defense of his views on post-war Ger-
405; 651; C745,	746	see also EP	174	Vansittart, Lord In defense of his views on post-war Ger- many. E. Mann; C318; see also 333; C
Border settlement. L. Witold; S125;		to Franco attacked; E	407	Varga girl. See Censorship
405; 651; C., And Poland: Border settlement. L. Witold; S., 125; see also E., 59; EP., 185; EP. 114; EP 145; 333; 595; EP And Spain: Spanish troops aid nazis on eastern front:	609		462	many. E. Mann; C. 318; see also 333; C. Varga girl. See Censorship Vatican. See Roman catholic church Venezuela
And Spain: Spanish troops aid nazis on eastern front; EP. Balianes, Sed; see also EP. And EP. Balianes, Sed; see also EP. Russia's influence on post-war developments. B. Raditas; S. 440; see also EP. And the United States; Americal Indianase shipments; EP. 294; American States Shipments; EP. 294;		Army: Draft of men over twenty-six halted; EP Draft of Indo Indo Indo Indo Indo Indo Indo Indo	442	Nazi agents said to receive money from the Spanish embassy; EP
EP86; see also EP	174	Lack of selective-service policy seen in	288
Russia's influence on post-war develop-		conflicting orders on deferment of es- sential workers: EP	351	Congress votes mustering-out pay; EP. Hines, Frank T., placed in charge of job procurement as recommended by the Bar-uch-Hancock report. I. F. Stone; S. 270; see also called the second control of th
EP	433	Military courtesy and discipline. Cor-	570	uch-Hancock report. I. F. Stone; S.270;
And the United States: American lend-lease shipments: EP 294:		Military courtesy and discipline. Corporal; C. Negro soldiers in Tennessee. Private; C. Soldier-vote bill, the: EP. 87; see also EP. 145; EP. 173; 207; E. 295; EP. 322; EP. 550; C. 403; C. 690; EP. Veterans. See Veterans, war Venumblet, The decides War amplet, The decides in its orientation courses; EP. 323; see also EP 203; EP. War department presses for a national service law. I. F. Stone; S 123, Congress. See Congress	663	see also Ep., opposes unemployment in- surance and other benefits in the "G. I. bill of rights", E. 527; see also EP ( Vichy. See France
Post-war trade E Sternberg S	700 735	EP145; EP173; 207; E295; EP		surance and other benefits in the "G. I. bill of rights"; E. 527; see also EP.
American lend-lease shipments, EP294; see also Post-war trade. F. Sternberg; S	89	322; EP350; C403; C690; EP Veterans. See Veterans. war	723	bill of rights"; E. 527; see also EP. (Vichy. See France Victor Emmanuel, King. See Italy Visas. See Refugees Vlavianos, Basil Behind the Greek "mutiny"; S
And Yugoslavia. B. Raditsa; S	440	War department decides not to use		victor isimilarities, King. See Italy
Communists warned against unity built through appearing the right; the Italian		its orientation courses; EP323; see		Vlavianos, Basil Behind the Greek "mutiny" S example. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 651;	746	War department presses for a national	554	Vogel, Lucien Disavows any territorial ambitions as Red	, 10	service law. I. F. Stone; S123, Congress. See Congress	150	J. Alvarez del Vayo; C745; see also
EP	433	Lend-lease:		Voice in the wind. J. Agee: MP
Its territorial ambitions and the Atlantic	333	Our shipments to Russia; EP294; see also	700	Visas. See Refugees Vlavianos, Basil Behind the Greek "mutiny"; S
Izvestia attacks the Vatican policy as pro-	375	see also Report on the first thirty-three months of the program; EP	58	W
Pravda reports a meeting between British	373	Post-war:	36	WLB. See War labor board possible separate peace; EP 87; see also		A. F. of L. program backs free enter- prise: EP	499	Wagner act See Labor unions
	113	Baruch-Hancock report, the: millionaires'		Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill. See Medicine
Joesten; S Russo-German war. See Russo-German war Supreme soviet offers plan enlarging the autonomy of the sixteen Soviet republics; E	389	see also EP238; 270; C	376	In Chungking. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S 7
Supreme soviet offers plan enlarging the		J. H. Collins; C	605	Asia in his pamphlet "Our job in the
E	176	Post-war: of L. program backs free enter- tages to the control of	271	WLB. See War labor board Wages. See Labor Wagner act. See Labor unions Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill. See Medicine Wallace. Henry Agard In Chungking. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S 7 Proposes a farsighted program for post-war Asia in his pamphlet "Our job in the Alle Mark Control of the Control of
Will be a large buyer in the world market	735	Fate of the government-owned war plants,	527	Walter, Bruno, conducts Mahler's fourth symphony. B. H. Haggin; M
Work of reconstruction begins. F. Stern-		Foreign trade expansion; E	537 499
Unions, labor. See Labor unions	735	mittee to study economic policy; EP.	146	Aviation-gas program lags, the; EP I Bonds. See War loan Conscription. See Selective service
F. Will be a large buyer in the world market after the war. F. Sternberg; S. Work of reconstruction begins. F. Sternberg; S. Unions, labor. See Labor unions United mine workers. A. F. of L. proposes to take the union in with jurisdiction limited to that of 1936; EP.		Influence of American business men on the	180	Conscription. See Selective service Contracts:
with jurisdiction limited to that of 1936;	147	Navy shutdown of Brewster aircraft plant	*00	Congressional proposals on renegotiation
EP Lewis denounces the A. F. of L. for refusal to admit the union to membership on his terms; EP United nations. See World war		reconversion program; EP	666	Congressional proposals on renegotiation seen opening the way to extortionate profits; E
terms; EP	582	New deal approach is not enough to meet post-war needs. I. F. Stone: S.	34	Cost-plus contracts under Senate investi- gation; their elimination would ease manpower problems; EP
United nations. See World war		Program of action. F. Kirchwey; S	300	manpower problems; EP 2

PACE TO THE PROPERTY OF THE PACE	GE	War information, office of	His defeat and the fourth-term issue I F
Fight against renegotiation, the. K. Keyerleben; S.	63	War information, office of Davis censors speech of J. F. Montgomery, former minister to Hungary, praising Admiral Horthy; EP	His defeat and the fourth-term issue. I. F. Stone; S
George-Murray bill for contract settle-	10	former minister to Hungary, praising ment, the. K. Keyerleber; S 6	19	Propaganda warfare in the Mediterranean	Named as Republican presidential candidate in a forged letter from H. Hopkins to Dr. U. Lee; EP 115; see also EP 14 On the eve of the Wisconsin primaries. W.
tion, K. Keyerleber; S 41	16	area. S. C. Menefee; S	in a forged letter from H. Hopkins to
Navy failure to renew war contracts at		area. S. C. Menefee; S	Dr. U. Lee; EP115; see also EP 14
the Brewster aircraft plant emphasizes		House defeats the Smith bill to prevent	On the eve of the Wisconsin primaries. W. 1 Outlines a Republican 1944 platform. K. 14 Hutchison, S. 2 Versus Dewey for the Republican presidential nomination; EP program; EP	66	plant seizures; EP 697	Outlines a Republican 1944 platform. K.
Problems of termination. K. Keyerleber;	19	Its reactionary character under the domina-	Hutchison; S
N		S 68; see also 61	dential nomination: EP
Draft of men over twenty-six halted; EP 40	62	Montgomery Ward's refusal to obey WLB	Which presidential candidate will get his
Drafting 4-F's for essential civilian	00	plant: EP	Wireless, See Radio
Draft of men over twenty-six halted; EP 40 Drafting 4-F's for essential civilian work; E	08	plant; EP	Wisconsin
gram for workers of seventeen years		ceeds its powers on maintenance-of-mem-	La Follette and isolationist Republicans
gram for workers of seventeen years of age and over; EP	66	Versus Montgomery Ward and company	seen moving closer together; EP: 58 Lessons of Willkie's defeat; E. 435; see also 437; EP 581; 60 McMurray; H. J., wins Senatorial nomination; E 61 Willkie on the eve of the primaries. W. 58elton; S 62 McMurray; McMurr
National service or proper coordination of		S. Katzander; S509; see also EP526;	also 437; EP581; 60
Stone; S123, 150; see also EP 35	50	E555; E585; EP638; EP 697	McMurray, H. J., wins Senatorial nomina-
National service or proper coordination of existing manpower resources; 1. F. Stone; S. 1.23, 150; see also EP	88	War loan	Wilkie on the eye of the primaries W
Shortage could be eased by the elimina-	00	War total Success of the fourth bond drive; EP 239 War mobilization, office of Fails under J. F. Byrnes to effectively mobilize American economy for the war. 1. F. Stone; S	Shelton; S tion of cost-plus contracts; EP 20	03	Fails under J. F. Byrnes to effectively mo-	With the marines at Tarawa. J. Agee; MP 34 Witold, Louis
Skilled woman-power versus the domes-		I F Stone: S	Russo-Czech mutual assistance treaty, the;
see also C	99	War, Pacific	S 12
Monopolies seek post-war ownership of gov-		War, Pacific Allied failure in Burma. D. W. Mitchell; S	Settling the Polish-Russian border dispute; S125; see also E59; EP85; EP 114; EP145; 333; 595; EP
ernment war plants. I. F. Stone; S.210;	37	S	114: EP145: 333: 595: EP 60
Off. of animal administration Con Daine	3/	simultaneously with the European in-administration, office of		vasion. D. W. Mitchell; S 151	Skilled woman-power versus the domestic-
Office of war information. See War infor-		294; see also	Skilled woman-power versus the domestic- help shortage. E. M. Stern; S95; see also C ome of price administration. See Frice administration, office of Office of war information, See War information, office of Office of war mobilization. See War mobili-		American forces invade Saipan; EP 721	Women's league for political education zation, office of		American superfortresses strike Yawata in	Isolationist women's group plans a cam-
President Roosevelt's five point program;	1.2	Attack on Truk the EP 237	Wood. Austin B.
Prices See Rusiness	13	Australia's participation; EP 350	New Yorker as an agent of the liberal
Strikes. See Labor		Bombers range widely over the Pacific in	forces; C 8
Success of the fourth war loan drive; EP 23 Taxation. See Finance, public War labor board. See War labor board	39	vasion. D. W. Mitchell; S. 151 Allied troops seize Admiralty islands; EP American torces invade Saipan; EP. 721 American superfortresses strike Yawata in Japan; EP Attack on Truk, the; EP. 237 Australia's participation; EP. 237 Australia's participation; EP. 237 Guivas; EP Crima as a base for the final drive against	also C women's league for political education Isolationist women's group plans a cam- paign among women. E.T.D.; C
War labor hoard See War labor hoard		drives; EP	profits; seen harmful to workers; EP 29
ar, European		Japan. M. S. Stewart; S	World war
Allied military government:		Chinese participation in war effort is hamp-	Hull announces a stricter American policy
G Salvemini S	16	ered by its economic problems. M. S.	toward neutrals; EP 46
Amphibious operations; the Normandy land-		Stewart; S 330 war lagor board. See war lagor board 'ar, European Allied military government: Reactionary policy in "liberated" Italy. G. Salvemini; S. Amphibious operations; the Normandy land- ings. A. Vagts; S. Bombings indicate imminence of "D-day";	27	Stewart; S. Drive to the China coast seen possible this year; EP Japanese atrocities against American and Filipino prisoners of war; E	Post-war plans for Austria. A. Sturm- thal; S
	61	Japanese atrocities against American and	No unity with fascists. J. Alvarez del
Churchill report stresses air warfare and indicates that invasion may not occur	-	Filipino prisoners of war; E 147	Vayo; S651; see also EP639; C.745, 74 indicates that invasion may not occur		ican fleet. D. W. Mitchell: S 305	Allies prepare to negotiate agreements
SUUII, E	07	Main drive on Burma delayed; Stilwell's	Post-war reconstruction: Allies prepare to negotiate agreements with Norway, Netherlands, and Bel- gium regarding post-war civil govern- ment; E
Eisenhower, General D. D., named com-	0,	forces moving across north Burma; EP	gium regarding post-war civil govern- ment: E
mander of the allied invasion forces; El'	1	Marshall islands attack indicates a major
D W Mitchell S	51	Marshall islands attack indicates a major sea offensive directly across the Pacific with the Burma campaign secondary; E. 177 Nayy continues its offensive in the Central Pacific; EP	Raditsa: S
"Elastic defense." Low; Ct 72	29	with the Burma campaign secondary; E 177	And the British commonwealth. F. H.
Five minutes to twelve. S. Hook; Ct 59	90	Pacific: EP	EP 61
Great Britain restricts movements and mes-	33	Outflanking the Japanese. D. W. Mitchell;	Blimp calls to blimp. Low; Ct
sages of diplomats in London as security measure; EP. 497; see also EP. 553; E Invasion's first phase passed successfully; enemy errors in meeting the attack; E. 77		S	Cartel caneer, the I. F. Stone; S. 178; see also 41 Churchill's view of post-war world or- ganization; E. 640; see also E. 669; 76 660; C. 718; EP measure; EP 497; see also EP 553; E 6:	11	bills for "Japan first" warfare; EP 350	Churchill's view of post-war world or-enemy errors in meeting the attack: E 72	24	Washington letters; articles by I. F. Stone;	ganization; E. 640; see also E. 669;
Italy:		6, 34, 62, 90, 123, 150, 178, 210, 245,	Germany. See Germany—Post-war
Anzio landings, the. D. W. Mitchell; S 15	51	586, 614, 642, 670, 700,	Hull asks four-power conference on ciency. Corporal: C	70	Wechsler, James	world organization; E669; see also
Political repercussions of the crisis at		Sedition and circuses; S530; see also EP 639 Werskopf, F. C.	I.L.O. discusses its future role, the, K.
Mittary courtery versus military efficiency.  Mittary courtery versus military efficiency.  Political repressions of the crisis at the Anzio beachhead; EP. 46.  Stalemate at the Anzio beachhead; EP. 46.  Lessons of the Red army victories. L. Renn; S. 503; see also EP. London on D-day. H. J. Laski; S. 77.  "Massacre by bombing" by V. Brittain protests mass air-raids as a military weapon; tests mass air-raids as a military weapon;	01	Contemporary German literature: S 45	I.L.O. discusses its future role, the. K. Hutchison; S529; see also E58 Influence of American business. H. J.
Stalemate at the Anzio beachhead: EP. 40	05	Weizmann, Dr. Chaim, confers with British leaders in an effort to modify the white paper. J. Lurie; S	Influence of American business. H. J. Laski; S
Success of American propaganda warfare.		leaders in an effort to modify the white	Japan. See Japan-Post-war
Via Cassilina under allied fire rapid	84		Law in the strategy of peace. P. E.
allied advance to the Po seen; EP 6;	37	On post-war military alliances; urges the	Legitimism—new style R Vambery:
See also Italy		On post-war military alliances; urges the establishment of a United nations political council; EP609; see also 325; 381; 382 Westbrook, Francis Jr.	S
Renn: S. 503: see also EP	97	Westbrook, Francis Jr.	McCarran, Senator P., proposes an "All-
London on D-day. H. J. Laski; S 70	03		carrier throughout the world: EP 37
"Massacre by bombing" by V. Brittain pro-		Western union Negotiating for A. T. & T. teletype, telegraphic, and other facilities; E 500 Wheeler, Burton K.	McCormick, Colonel R. R., urges Amer-tests mass air-raids as a military weapon;	23	graphic, and other facilities; E 500	ica to retain islands and airbases that
Montgomery, General Sir B., master of at-		Wheeler, Burton K.	Monetary stabilization; E 49
tack. C. G. Bolté; S 70	01	Protests the high proportion of American troops in the invasion forces: EP 30	Need for a United nations political coun-ance elements in their rear: EP 525.		White, William Allen, death, L. Gannett: S	Need for a United nations political council. F. Kirchwey; S. 325; see also 381; 382; EP
_ see also EP 49	97	276; see also EP 147	Roosevelt's plan for world organization;
Planes smash at German cities and the	57	Wheeler, Burton K. Protests the high proportion of American troops in the invasion forces; EP. 30 White, William Allen, death, L. Gannett; S 276; see also EP 147 White cliffs of Dover, the, J. Agee; MP. 634	EP 72
Preview of the second front. D. W Mitch-	37	Answers T. B. A.'s criticism of her article	INTERA See United nations relief and ell; S535; see also E33; 205; 2	14	"O little town"(restricted); C 171	rehabilitation administration
Katio of American to British troops in the	30	Comments on Dies committee investigation	Wallace offers a farsighted program for Resistance forces within each country must	30	Whitman, Willson Answers T. B. A.'s criticism of her article "O little town". (restricted); C	Welles S urges the establishment of
be utilized for the invasion of the conti-		see also EP	Rossevelt's plan for world organization; 22 The points for peace
nent; EP 497; see also EP 52	25	its dams; C	609; see also
E., 698: see also 700: 701: 703: EP.	97	Nye—a lost leader: S	World war III ahead? R. Niebuhr; S., 35 Prisoners
Tito may lead an allied drive against Ger-		Willkie, Wendell L.	Japanese atrocities against American and many through the Balkans; EP 69	96	Assailed by Russians for his opinion on the	Filipino prisoners of war; E 14
ond front. I, F. Stone: S	62	Begins his campaign for the presidential	Allies sink nazi destrovers in the Bay
ance elements in their rear; EP $25; see also EP	00	tits dams; C 403 tits dams; C 403 Williams, Howard Y. Wee a lost leader; S 730 Wire a lost leader; S 730 Wire a lost leader; S 730 Wire a lost leader; S 730 Begins his campaign for the presidential nomination on a high political level; E 239 Favors higher war-time taxes; EP 173; see also	Allies sink nazi destroyers in the Bay of Biscay; EP 2 Scharnhorst sunk by British naval units; EP 29; see also 15 here." Low: Ct	36	Favors higher war-time taxes; EP173; see also	EP 29: see also 15
		222 4.00 1	22 300 also

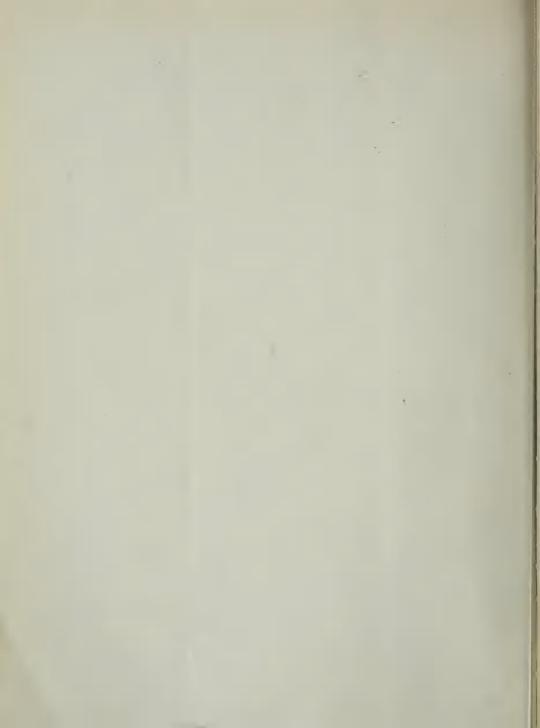

Second front: Bombings indicate imminence of D-day; EP	American jazz music. W. Hobson; AN	John of the cross. R. Sencourt; B	711 426
Softly sport on the war indicates that the invasion may not take place as early as expected; E	Apple must be bitten, the. F. S. Colby; AN	Cartoon cavalcade. Edited by I. Craven; BChase, Stuate money coming from? Problems of postwar finance; BChroniele of dawn. R. J. Sender; BColby, Fanny Sedgwick.  Apple must be bitten, the; AN.  Colegrove, Kenneth	162 342
Eisenhower, General D. D., named com- mander of the allied invasion forces;	Le crève-coeur; B	Apple must be bitten, the; AN	686 193
Five minutes to twelve. S. Hook; Ct., 590	Arciniegas, Germán	Common thread, the. M. Seide; B Complete etchings of Goya, the. Foreword by	75 399
Lessons of the Red army victories. L. Renn; S503; see also EP 497 Military strategy214; see also 205 Opens in Normandy; E698; see also 7202 7212 723 FP.	Germans in the conquest of America; AN. 491 Army air forces The commany official story of the VIII bomber command's first year over Europe; B. 49 Art and poetry. J. Maritain. Translated by E. de P. Mathews; B. 488 Arvin, Newton; R. 480 Arvin, Newton; R. 480 Aposite. the Translated by M. Samuel;	A. Huxley; B. Complete Jefferson, the. Containing his major writings, published and unpublished, ex- cept his letters. Edited by S. K. Pad-	101
700; 701; 703; EP	Arvin, Newton; R. 131 Asch, Sholem Apostle, the. Translated by M. Samuel; B. 21	Concerto, the. A. Veinus; B	496
Germany awaits the invasion. Argus;  Lesons of the Red army victors. L  Lesons of the Red army victors. L  Military strategy 214; see also 205  Opens in Normandy; E. 698; see also 700, 701; 703; EP	B	Apple must use outers, the; B. Common cause. G. A. Borgese; B. Common cause. G. A. Borgese; B. Common thread, the. M. Seide; B. Complete etchings of Goya, the. Foreword by A. Blukley; B. Complete Jefferson, the. Containing his major writings, published and unpublished, except his letters. Edited by S. K. Padover; B. A. Veinus; B. Concerto, the. A. Veinus; B. Concerto, the Contemporary Italy: Its intellectual and moral origins. Count C. Sforza. Translated by D. and D. De Kay; B. Corwin, Edward S. Constitution and world organization, the; Contemporary Italy: Its intellectual and moral origins. Count C. Sforza. Translated by D. and D. De Kay; B. Corwin, Edward S. Constitution and world organization, the; Constitution and world organization, the;	629
Y
	B Balchen, Colonel Bernt, Major C, Ford, and	Triumph of treason; B	516
Yellow canary, the. J. Agee; MP 577 Young, Art, death. M. Marshall; S. 130; see also EP 31; Ct 301 Yugoslavia	Major O. La Farge War below zero: The battle for Greenland;	Craven, Thomas Story of painting, the; From cave pictures	604
see also EP	Balchen, Colonel Bernt, Major C. Ford, and Major O. La Farge War below zero: The battle for Greenland; 739 Balkan journal. L. Archer; B	Cot, Pierre Triumph of treason; B. Crafford, F. S. Jan Smuts: A biography; B. Craven, Thomas Story of paints; AN. Crazv weather. C. L. McNichols; B. Cummings, E. E. 1 x 1; B. Cunha, Euclides da Rebellion in the backlands (Os sertoes). Translated by S. Putnam; B. Curti, Merle Growth of American thought, the; B.	399
bassador to the United States. B. Raditsa; S118; see also 117; EP 722	Sacred and secular elegies; B	Cunha, Euclides da Rebellion in the backlands (Os sertoes).	122 other Balkan countries. B. Raditsa; S. 440 King Peter versus the partisans. B. Ra-	Innocent empress, the: An intimate study of Eugénie; AN	Curtain rises, the. Q. Reynolds; B	340
ditsa; S118; see also EP2; 117 Kosanovich, S., protests Fotich's anti-Croat activities in the United States. B. Ra-	Pomanticiem and the modern era: R 46		423
ditsa; S	Barzun, Jacques; R	D day. What preceded it; what followed.	210
Machek, J., Croatian leader. B. Raditsa; S 118 Mihailovich opens a second front. A. Hoffmeister; Ct	Bay of silence, the. E. Mallea; B	da Cunha, Euclides Rebellion in the backlands (Os sertoes).	422
Mihailovich, representative of Greater Serbia tradition. B. Raditsa; S. 118; see also	Bell for Adano, a. J. Hersey; B 194 Bellow, Saul	Dangling man. S. Bellow; B.  De Jon, L., and J. W. F. Stoppelman	454
other Balkan countries. B. Raditsa; S 440 King Peter versus the partisans. B. Raditsa; S	Bartlett, Vernon     70       Tomorrow always comes; B     370       Bates, Ralph, R     164, 395       Bay of silence, the. E. Mallea; B     454       Becham, Sir Thomas     194       Mingled chimes, a: An autobiography; B     225       Bell or Adano, a. J. Hersey; B     194       Bellow, Sau     8       Bellow, Sau     454       Benedians, Ludwig     Now I lay me down to sleep; B     314       Benet, Stephen Vincent     4       America; B     711	D day. What preceded it; what followed. J. Gunther, B da Cunha, Euclides Rebellion in the backlands (Os sertoes). Translated by S. Putnam; B. Dangling man. S. Bellow; B. De Jon, L., and J. W. F. Stoppelman Lion rampant, the: The story of Holland's resistance to the nazis; B. Delo, David M., and H. R. Muelder Years of this land: A geographical history of the United States; AN.	397
Nazis attack Tito torces heavily in Bosnia; EP Ceneral Milan, Serbian Quising. 291 Nedich Raditsa; Milan, Serbian Quising. 291 Raditsa; C. Carlos asce size C. 291 Pavellch Carlos and Secks to reorganize the cabinet; EP .610; asce also	Seneta, Stephen vincent America; Stephen vincent America; Russell; R	Years of this land: A geographical history of the United States; AN. ———————————————————————————————————	401
Raditsa; S118; see also C291 Peter dismisses General Mihailovich and seeks to reorganize the cabinet; EP610;	Bisson, T. A.; R	de Poncins, Gontran Home is the hunter; B.	51
Royal government-in-exile, the. B. Raditsa; S. 118; see also .117; 644; EP 722	Bodmer, Frederick Loom of language, the. L. Hogben, editor;	History and technique of old master draw-	396
subasich, Dr. I., may become new premier as Peter plans cabinet reorganization; E.P610; see also E.P	Loom of language, the. L. Hogben, editor; B	Heiden; B. Deutsch, Babette; R.	281 486 seeks to reorganize the cabinet; EP. 610; see also Pir, 644; EB. Raditsa; S. 118; see also .117; 644; EP. 722 Serbs versus Croats. B. Raditsa; 722 Serbs versus Croats. B. Raditsa; S. 118; see also EP. 722 Serbs versus Croats. B. Raditsa; S. 118; see also E. 722 Tito and the existence of the service of the	Donsal, Stephen Unfinished business; B.  Book of Canadian poetry, the. Edited with an introduction and notes by A. J. M. Smith; AN.  261	principles. Edited by Sir W. A. Craigie and J. R. Hulbert. Four volumes; B	311 accord; EP	Borgese, G. A. Common cause; B	House committee, the: A study of the special House committee for the investigation of un-American activities, 1938-1943. A. R.
	Bornstein, Joseph Answers C. Riess's criticism of his review of "The invasion of Germany"; C27;	Disappearing daily, the: Chapters in American newspaper evolution. O. G. Villard;	642
BOOK REVIEWS	see also C	600	739
Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.  The following explanatory letters are used	Smith; AN. 261  Borgese, G. A. 254; see also C. 348  Bornatein, Joseph Answers C. Riess's criticism of his review of "The invasion of Germany". C. 25;  Both C. L. 25;  Both C. 26;  B	Dupee, F. W.; R	546
In the index:	his family; B	E
B Book review AN Brief annotation R Reviewer	Avalanche; B	Eagle and the dove, the. V. Sackville-West;	711
	Road to peace and freedom; B102; see also C	Eliot, T. S.  Comments on L. Trilling's review of his	/11
Abrams, Charles; R	Bricker of Ohio. K. B. Pauly; B	volume of selections from kipling's verse; C.  Elizabethan world picture, the. E. M. W.	83 front F. J. Spelman; B 254; see	Burlingame, Roger, and A. Stevens Victory without peace; B	Eloges and other poems. St. J. Perse. Trans- lated by L Vardèse; B.	570
Abrams, Charles; R. 191, 655 Action this day: Letters from the fighting front. F. J. Spellman; B. 254; see also C. 348 Adler, Mortimer J. How to think about war and peace; B. 658; see also P	Avalanche; B. 104 Brant, Irving Road to peace and freedom; B. 102; see also C. 263 Brant, Irving; R. 684 Bricker of Ohio. K. B. Pauly; B. 484 Building for peace at home and abroad. M. S. Stewart; B. 102 Burlingame, Roger, and A. Stevens Victory without peace; B. 569 Burns, Eugene Then there was one: The U.S.S. Enterprise and the first year of war; B. 600	Eagle and the dove, the. V. Sackville-West; B. Edman, Irwin; R. Eliot, T. S. Comments on L. Trilling's review of his verse; C selections from Kipling's lizable that word picture, the. E. M. W. Elioges and other poems. St. J. Perse. Translated by L. Vardèse; B. Emil in Africa ther. B. Emil in Africa ther. B. Emil in Africa ther. B. Ezekiel, Mordecai; R.	572 261 162
frontier. H. Griffin; B	С	F
American housing: Problems and prospects. Factual findings by M. L. Colean. Pro-	Campbell, Oscar James; R	Faith, reason, and civilization: An essay in bistorical analysis. H. J. Laski; B Far north country. T. Williamson; B Field, Ben	710 659
gram by the Housing committee; B 655	Sheen; C348; see also R 254	Field, Ben Outside leaf, the; B	51

Finnie, Richard; R. First Lady Chatterley, the. D. H. Lawrence; B Fischer, Louis Empire; B. Fischer, Markoosha My lives in Russia; B. Fitzgerald, Robert Wreath for the sea, a; B. Food, F. A. Pearson and D. Paariberg; B. Food "crisis" R. F. Hendrickson; B. Ford, Major Corey, Colonel B. Balchen, and Major O. La Farge War below zero: The battle for Greenland; B.	659	Henderson, Algo D. Vitalizing liberal education: A study of	Lazarus, H. P.; R
B B. Lawrence;	490	the liberal arts program; B	Lebowitz, Martin; R
Empire; B	572	vitalizing ineral education: A study of the liberal arts program; B	tinius, Jr.; B
My lives in Russia; B	627	G—for Genevieve; B	Liana. M. Gellhorn; B
Wreath for the sea, a; B	519	B	TVA: Democracy on the march; B 424
Food. F. A. Pearson and D. Paarlberg; B.	518	Bell for Adano, a; B 194	Limit of darkness. H. Hunt; AN 686 Lind, L. R.
Ford, Major Corey, Colonel B. Balchen, and	518	Heritage of symbolism, the. C. M. Bowra; B	Comments on L. Kronenberger's review of "The reader over your shoulder" by R.
Major O. La Farge War below zero: The battle for Greenland;		C. de Tolnay; B	Graves and A. Hodge; C
Fortunes of Falstaff, the. J. D. Wilson; B.	739	Hitler, Adolf, der fuehrer, his rise to power. K. Heiden; B	J. W. F. Stoppelman; B
Fowler, Gene Good night, sweet prince: The life and		American jazz music; AN	West; B
times of John Barrymore; B Frazier, E. Franklin; R	453	Hobson, Wilder American jazz music; AN	Loeb, James, Jr.; R
French right and nazi Germany, the, 1933-	546	Home is the hunter. G. de Poncins; B 51 Honig, Edwin	Loom of language, the. F. Bodmer. Editor, L. Hogben; B
Fortunes of Falstaff, the. J. D. Wilson; B Fowler, Geng, sweet prince: The life and times of John Barrymore; B Fazier, E. Franklin; R. Fazier, E. Franklin; R. French right and nazi Germany, the, 1933- 1939: A study of public opinion. C. A. Micaud; AN. From Shakespeare to Joyce. E. E. Stoll; B	344	Home is the hunter. G. de Poncins; B	TVA: Democracy on the march: B
From Shakespeare to Joyce. E. E. Stoll; B	229	Adler; B658; see also P415; C 523	Lost island. J. N. Hall; B
G		Humphries, Rolfe; R281, 711 Hunt, Howard	Lost week-end, the. C. Jackson; AN 194 Lowdermilk, Walter Clay
G-for Genevieve. Lieutenant I. M. Herbert:		Limit of darkness; AN	Palestine, land of promise; B
Garcia Lorca E. Honig: B.	739 281	Hutchison, Keith; R162, 226, 480, 682
Gellhorn, Martha	104	I	M
Genzmer, George; R	484 572		MacLiesh, A. Fleming Cone of silence; AN. 194 Madariaga, Salvador de Spain; B. 164 Makers of modern strategy: Military thought from Machiavelli to Hitler. Edited by E. M. Earle; B. 76
Germans in the conquest of America. G.	401	origins and background. H. Kohn; B 631	Madariaga, Salvador de Spain: B
Germany after Hitler. P. Hagen B;	226	Innocent empress, the: An intimate study of	Makers of modern strategy: Military thought
Weiskopf; R	45 226	Insurgent summer. C. A. Yarborough; AN. 686	E. M. Earle; B
G—for Genevieve. Lieutenant J. M. Herbert; Garcia Lorca. E. Honig; B. Gellhorn, Martha Liana; B. Liana; B. Genzmer, George R. Genzmer, George R. Germans in the conquest of America. G. Arciniegas; AN. Germans in the conquest of America. G. Germany after Hitler. P. Hagen B. Germany after Hitler. P. Hagen B. Germany will try it again. S. Schultz; B. Germany will try it again. S. Schultz; B. Gurmore, William; R. Goffin, Robert	739	Idala of nationalism, the A study of its origin and background. H. Kohn; B., 631 Indigo. C. Westone B., 135 Innocent empress, the: An intimate study of Eugénic. E. Barshak; AN. 261 Insurgent summer. C. A. Varborough; AN. 686 Introduction to India. F. R. Moraes and R. Stimson; B 314	War diary. Translated by P. Grant; B 232
			Bay of silence, the; B
White brigade, the. English version by	397	J. Ledwar Charles	tory, E. Kahler; B
Giffine, William; R. Goffin, Roberate, the English version by White breade, the English version by Markmann; B. Good-bye Mr. Chippendale, T. H. Robsjohn- Gibbings; B. Good night, sweet prince: The life and times of John Barrymore. G. Fowler; B. Goya, complete etchings of. Foreword by A. Huxley; B. Gratun, C. Hartley; R. Graubard, Mark Graubard, Mark Graubard, Mark Graubard, Walker and M. James; AN Great transformation, the. K. Polanyi; B. Greek revival architecture in America: Being an account of important trends in American to the war between the states. T. Hamhin; B.	574	Jackson, Charles Lost week-end, the; AN. 194 Jaeger, Werner Paideia: The ideals of Greek culture, Vol- umes II and III. Translated by G. Highet; 597 Lighter, and J. Walker Great American paintings: From Smibert to Bellows, 1729-1924; AN. 344 Jan Smuts: A biography. F. S. Crafford; B. 480	from Machiavelli to Hitler. Edited by E. M. Earle; B. 76 Malaquais, Jean War diary. Translated by P. Grant; B. 232 Mallea, Eduardo Bay of silence, the; B. 454 Man the measure: A new approach to his- man's food, its thyme or reason. M. Grau- bard; B. 284 Maritain, Jacques Art and poetry. Translated by E. de P. Mathews; B. 488 Marriott, Sir John A. R. 425 Short history of France, a; B. 425 Maugham, W. Somerset Raoro's edge, the; B. 547 McCoy, John Pleasant Swing the big-eyed rabbit; B. 399 McNichols, Charles L. Crazy weather; B. 399 McNichols, Charles L. Crazy weather; B. 600 Mentere, Selden Meiksins, Gregory Baltic riddle, the; B. Men, women and dogs. J. Thurber; B. 260 Mentere, Selden Assignment U.S.A.; B. 134 Micaol, Charles L. U.S.A.; B. 134 Micaol, Charles L. 193 Lassignment A. 193 Lassignment L. 193 Lassignment A. 194 Mingled chime, a: An autobiography. Sir T. Beecham; B. 395 Med L. Red amp, the; B. 395 Micaol, L. Red amp, the; B. 325 Ming, L. 1. Red amp, the; B. 395
Good night, sweet prince: The life and times	255	Paideia: The ideals of Greek culture. Vol-	Art and poetry. Translated by E. de P.
Goya, complete etchings of. Foreword by A.	101	Highet; B	Marriott, Sir John A. R. Short history of France a: B 425
Grattan, C. Hartley; R50, 80,	488	Great American paintings: From Smibert	Marshall, Margaret; R 627
Man's food, its rhyme or reason; B	284	Jan Smuts: A biography. F. S. Crafford;	Razor's edge, the; B
Bellows, 1729-1924. J. Walker and M.	3.1.4	Japan's islands of mystery. W. Price; B 488	Swing the big-eyed rabbit; B
Great transformation, the. K. Polanyi; B	480	Jefferson, Thomas, complete works. Edited by	Crazy weather; B an account of important trends in Ameri-		B 80 Japan's islands of mystery, W. Price; B. 488 Jazz hot and hybrid, W. Sargeant; AN. 689 Jefferson, Thomas, complete works. Edited by S. K. Padover; B. 572 Jefferson, Thomas, the philosophy of. A. Koch; B 22	Tell the folks back home; B to the war between the states. T. Hamlin;	221	Koch; B 22 Jefferson and the press. F. L. Mott; AN 604 Johnson, Albert Comments on G. S. Counts's review of "Liberal education" by M. Van Doren; 55	Baltic riddle, the; B
Greenberg, Clement; R260, 657,	740	Comments on G. S. Counts's review of	Menefee, Selden
Greenberg, Clement; R	368	C 55	Micaud, Charles A.
Shield of Achilles, the: Essays on beliefs		Johnson, Samuel, as critic. J. W. Krutch;	1939: A study of public opinion; AN 344
Gregory, Horace Shield of Achilles, the: Essays on beliefs in poetry; B	480	Pacific partner; B	Beecham; B
Griffin, Harold	054	Liberal education" by M. Van Doren; 55 Johnson, Samuel, as critic. J. W. Krutch; 218 Johnston, George H. 218 Johnston, George H. 258 Jones, Joseph Modern foreign policy for the United States, a; B. 601	Red army, the; B
Ten years in Japan; B. Griffin, Harold Alaska and the Canadian northwest: Our new frontier; B. Growth of American thought, the. M. Curti;	659	States, a; B 601	Modern foreign policy for the United States,
Growth of the red army, the. D. F. White;	423	K	Moore, Marianne; R
B. White;	395	Kahler, Erich	Beecham; B.   225
B. Guérard, Albert; R75, 370, 425, 516, Guérard, Albert J. Hunted, the; B. Gunther, John D day. What preceded it; what followed; R	202	Kahler, Erich Man the measure: A new approach to history; B	Introduction to India; B
Gunther, John	200	Society and nature. A sociological inquiry,	Mott, Frank L. Jefferson and the press: AN 604
B	340	Kerr, Walter	Muelder, Hermann R., and D. M. Delo Years of this land: A geographical history
н		Kussian army, the; B	of the United States; AN
	006	Kohn, Hans	Uses of reason, the; B
Hackberry Cavalier. G. S. Perry; B. Hagen, Paul Germany after Hitler; B. Haggin, B. H.; R	286	AN 661 Kert, Walter Russian army, the; B. 395 Koch, Adrienne Philosophy of Thomas Jefferson, the; B. 22 Kohn, Hars Ideas of nationalism, the: A study of its Origina and background; B. 21 Kroner, Richard Primacy of faith, the: B. 339 Krutch, Joseph Wood; R. 255	Motherwell, Hiram; R. 628 Mott, Frank L. Jefferson and the press; AN. 604 Muscler, Hermann R., and D. M. Delo of the United States; AN. 401 Murpby, Arthur E. 401 Uses of reason, the; B. 627 My revolutionary years. The autobiography of Madame Wei Taening; AN. 261
Haggin, B. H.; R	496	Kroner, Richard
Lost island; B	742	Krutch, Joseph Wood; R	N
Greek revival architecture in America; B	231	L	Nash, Walter
Haskell, Douglas; R.	231	Le Force Major Oliver Colonel B Balahan	New world guides to the Latin American re-
Woolf; B.	544	and Major C. Ford	the United States coordinator of inter- American affairs, Edited by E. P. Han-
Greek revival architecture in America; B. Harrow, Benjamin; R. Haskell, Douglas; R. Haskell, Douglas; R. Woolf; B. Harrow, Benjamin, the state of th	632	La Farge, Major Oliver, Colonel B. Balchen, and Major C. Ford War below zero: The battle for Greenland; Table 1. Lase Harold J. Faith, reason, and civilization: An essay in historical analysis; B. 710 Lawrence, D. H. First Lady Christopher; R. 490 Lazare, Christopher; R. 356	Nash, Walter New Zealand; B writing in Europe, 1920-1940. Edited by		Faith, reason, and civilization: An essay in	News of the nation: A newspaper history of the United States. S. Hoffman, editor.
by D. C. Fischer; B	630	Lawrence, D. H.	and C. H. Grattan, associate editor;
Der fuehrer: Hitler's rise to power; B	281	Lazare, Christopher; R	AN 344 Niebuhr, Reinhold; R. 20, 658, 710

PUBLIC LIBRARY

Nizer Louis	PAGE	Royal game, the. S. Zweig; B	547	Thurber, James Men, women and dogs; B.  Men, women and dogs; B.  Zillyard, E. M. W.  Elizabethan worfs of the control of the c	MGE
Nizer, Louis What to do with Germany; B. No mortal fire. E. Valentine; AN. Now I lay me down to sleep. L. Bemeimans; Boyes, Charles E.; R. Nusantara. A history of the East Indian archipelago. B. H. M. Vickke; AN.	226	Russian army, the. W. Kerr; B	395	Men, women and dogs; B	260
No mortal fire. E. Valentine; AN	686			Elizabethan world picture, the; B	501
В	314	S		Tomorrow always comes. V. Bartlett; B	370
Nusantara. A history of the East Indian	114	Sackville-West, V.		Transit. A. Seghers; B	502
archipelago. B. H. M. Vlekke; AN	661	Eagle and the dove, the; B. Sacred and secular elegies. G. Barker; B. St. John of the cross, biography. R. Sencourt; B. Santayana, George	711	Trilling, Diana; R51, 104, 194, 286, 342,	742
		St. John of the cross, biography. R. Sen-	,,,	Trilling, Lionel	72
0		Santayana George	711	of the volume of Kipling's verse selected
Odum, Howard W.		Persons and places: The background of my	121	by Eliot; C	83
American crisis: B	453	Sargeant, Winthrop	131	Triumph of freason. P. Cot; B	010
Ogden, August Raymond		Jazz hot and hybrid; AN	689	U
Odum, Howard W. Race and rumors of race: Challenge to American crisis; B. Ogden, Angust Raymond House committee for the investigation of un-American activities; 1938-1943; B. 614, One times one. E. E. Cummings; B. Our hidden front. W. Gilman, B. Outside teat, the. B. Field; B.		Santayana, George Persons and places: The background of my life; B. Sargeant, Winthrop Jazz hot and hybrid; AN Schultz, Sigrid Germany will try it again; B. Seghers, Anna Sedies, Anna Sedies, Anna Sedies, Michael	226
un-American activities, 1938-1943; B.614,	394	Schwarzschild, Leopold; R	281	U.S.S.R.: The story of Soviet Russia. W. Duranty; B	346
Orwell, George; R	572	Transit; B	602	Under the bridge. F. Greenslet; B 3	68
Outside leaf, the B. Field: B	51	Common thread, the: B	399	Uses of reason, the A. E. Murphy: B	86
,		Sencourt, Robert
P		Iransi; B. Seide, Michael Common thread, the; B. Sencourt, Robert Carmelite and poet; A framed portrait of St. John of the cross; B. Sender, Ramón J.	711	v
Parihery Don and F A Pearson		Sender, Ramón J.	342	Valentine, Elsa
Food; B	518	Seven myths of housing, the. N. Straus; B	191	No mortal fire; AN 6	86
Pacific partner. G. H. Johnson; B Paideia: The ideals of Greek culture. Vol-	238	Seven sleepers and other poems, the. M. Van	401	Vambery, Rustem; R	31
umes II and III. W. Jaeger. Trans-	597	Sforza, Count Carlo		Comments on I. Edman's poetic parody on
Palestine, land of promise. W. C. Lowder-		moral origins; B	628	M. J. Adler; C523; see also P415; R 6	58
Pauly, Karl B.	656	Shark's fins and millet. I. R. Sues; B	452	Valentine, Elsa No mortal rec AN. 6 Vannor, Rusmir R. 6 Vannor, Rusmir R. 6 Vannor, Rusmir R. 6 Vannor, Rusmir R. 6 Comments on I. Edman's poetic parody on "How to think about war and peace" by M. J. Adler; C. 523; see also P. 415; B 6 Vansitart, Lord 1, 167 Vansitart, Lord	01
Bricker of Ohio; B	454	Philosophies at war; B254; see also C	348	Lessons of my life; B	20
P Paarlberg, Don, and F. A. Pearson Food; B. Don, and F. A. Pearson Food; B. The ideals of Greek culture. Volumes II and III. W. Jaeger. Translated by G. Highet; B. Palestine, land of promise. W. C. Lowdermilk; B. Pauly, Karl B. Pauly, Karl B. Pauly, Karl B. Pauly, Karl B. Person, Dank A., and D. Paarlberg Food; B. Person, Dank A., and D. Paarlberg Food; B. Person, Dank A., and D. Paarlberg Food; B. Perse, St. John Eloges and other poems. Translated by L. Varèse; B. Perse, St. John Eloges and other poems. Translated by L. Varèse; B. Peter Domanig. V. White; AN. Philosophies at war. F. J. Sheen; B. 254; see also C. Philosophies at war. F. J. Sheen; B. 254; see also C. Philosophy of Thomas Jefferson, the. A. Koch; B. M. Pissarro, Camille, Letters with he is son Lucien.	518	St. John of the cross; B. Sender, Ramón J. B. Chromicle off busing, the. N. Straus; B. Chromicle off busing, the. N. Straus; B. Seven sleepers and other poems, the. M. Van Doren; AN. Sforza, Count Carlo Contemporary Italy: Its intellectual and moral origins; B. Sheen, Fulton J. Philosophies at war; B. 254; see also C. Shepard, Odell; Sherrod, Robert story of a battle; B. Sheid of Achilles, the: Essays on beliefs in poetry. H. Gregory; B. Short history of France, a. Sir J. A. R. Marriett B. Short history of France, a. Sir J. A. R. Shriphis, K. Shaniali; R. Simpost, K. E. A. Robertson; B. Sieneley Agnes; R. Smith, Lillian Strange fruits B.	368		96
Perry, George Sessions Hackleberry Cavalier: B	286	Tarawa. The story of a battle; B	340	Vercors
Perse, St. John	200	poetry. H. Gregory; B	486	Vercors Silence of the sea, the; B	07
L. Varèse: B	570	Short history of France a Sir I A P	399	A. Stevens; B 5	69
Persons and places: The background of my	121	Marriott; B	425	Disappearing daily, the: Chapters in Amer-
Peter Domanig. V. White; AN	686	Shridharani, Krishnalal; R	314	ican newspaper evolution; B	82
Philosophies at war. F. J. Sheen; B254;	348	Silence of the sea, the. Vercors; B	367	liberal arts program. A. D. Henderson;
Philosophy of Thomas Jefferson, the. A.	340	Smedley, Agnes; R	452	Vivas, Eliseo: R 4	12
Pissarro, Camille: Letters to his son Lucien.	22	Strange fruit; B	342	Vlekke, Bernard H. M.
Panisophy of Inomas Jenerson, the. A. Koch; B. Pissarro, Camille: Letters to his son Lucien. Edited by J. Rewald with the assistance of L. Pissarro; B. Poems. D. Thompson; B. Polanyi, Karl	740	Snow, Edgar; R	224	archipelago; AN	61
Poems. D. Thompson; B	519	Society and nature. A sociological inquiry.	661	Voorhis, Jerry Beyond victory: B	14
	480	Spain. S. de Madariaga; B	164	20,000 1000, 211111111111111111111111111
Great transformation, the; B.  Poncins, Gontran de Home is the hunter; B.  Possony, Stefan T; R.  Powell, Thomas Reed; R.  Price, Willard	51	Action this day: Letters from the fighting		w ·
Possony, Stefan T.; R	570	front; B 254; see also C	348
Possony, Stefan T.; R Powell, Thomas Reed; R Price, Willard Japan's islands of mystery; B	514	Stern, James; R	314	Wakeman, Frederic Shore leave: B	99
Japan's islands of mystery; B Primacy of faith, the R. Kroner; B	488	Stettinius, Edward R., Ir		Walker, John, and M. James
	000	Lend-lease, weapon for victory: B
Frimacy of faith, the R. Kroner; B	339	Smith, Liffers Strange fruit; B. Smuts, Jan, biography. F. S. Crafford; B. Snow, Edgar; R. Society and nature. A sociological inquiry. H. Kelsen; AN. Spain. S. de Madariaga; B. Spellman, Francis J. Action this days. 254; see also C. Stern, James; R. Road to victory, the, B. 254; see also C. Stetmius, Edward R., Jr Lend-lease, weapon for victory; B. Stevens, Alden, and R. Buglingame.	132	Bellows, 1729-1924; AN 3	44
	339	Lend-lease, weapon for victory; B Stevens, Alden, and R. Burlingame Victory without peace; B Stewart, Maxwell S.	132 569	Bellows, 1729-1924; AN	44
Q	339	Lend-lease, weapon for victory; B. Stevens, Alden, and R. Burlingame Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Building for peace at home and abroad; B.	102	Bellows, 1729-1924; AN. Smbert to Bellows, 1729-1924; AN. Swar below zero: The battle for Greenland. Colonel B. Balchen, Major C. Ford, and Major O. La Farge; B	44 39
	339	Lend-lease, weapon for victory; B., Stevens, Alden, and R. Burlingame Victory without peace; B., Stewart, Maxwell S., Building for peace at home and abroad; B. Stewart, Maxwell S; R. Stewart, Maxwell S; R. Moraes	102	Bellows, 1729-1924; AN. 3  War below zero: The battle for Greenland. Colonel B. Balchen, Major C. Ford, and Major O. La Farge; B	44 39 32
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R	339	Lend-lease, weapon for victory; B. Stevens, Alden, and R. Burlingame Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Building for peace at home and abroad; B. Stewart, Maxwell S., R. Stewart, Maxwell S., R. Moraes Introduction to Intelligence and Stell, Elmer Edgar	102	Wakeman, Frederic Shore leave, B	44 39 32 86
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R	101	Lend-lease, weapon for victory; B. Stevens, Alden, and R. Burlingame Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Building for peace at home and abroad; B. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stimson, Robert, and F. R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shalkespeare to Joyce; B.	102	Great American pantungs: From Smibert to Bellows, 1729-1924; AN. 3  War below zero: The battle for Greenland. Colonel B. Balchen, Major C. Ford, and Major O. La Farge; B. 7  War diary. J. Malaquais. Translated by P. Grant; B. 2  Warner, Rex Return of the traveller; B. 6  Wei Tao-ming. Madame	44 39 32 86
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R	101	Lend-lease, weapon for victory; B. Stevens, Alden, and R. Burlingame Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Building for peace at home and abroad; B. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stimson, Robert, and F. R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. Stone, I. F.; R. 614, Stoppelman, Joseph W. F., and L. de Jongs.	102	Grant American paintings: From Sminert to Bellows, 1729-1924, AN. c. Central 3  War Colonel B. Balchen, Major C. Ford, and Major O. La Farge; B. 7  War diary. J. Malaquais. Translated by P. Grant; B. 2  Warner, Rex Return of traveller; B. 2  Warner, Rex Return of traveller; B. 6  Wei Wei W. Grant; B. 6  Wei W. Weiskonf, F. C.; R. 2	44 39 32 86 61 45
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R	101	Lend-lease, weapon for victory; B. Stevens, Alden, and R. Burlingame Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S. R. Moraes Stimson, Robert, and F. R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. Stone, I. F., R. S. W. F. and L. de Jong, and S. Stewart S. Stone, I. F., R. S. W. F. and L. de Jong, and S. Stewart S. Stone, I. F. S. S. Stone, I. F. S. Stone, I.	102	Great American paintings: From Smibert to 3 Bellows, 1729-1924; AN	44 39 32 86 61 45 12
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R	101	Lend-lease, weapon for victory; B. Stevens, Alden, and R. Burlingame Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Building for peace at home and abroad; B. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stimson, Robert, and F. R. Moraes Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. Stone, I. F.; R. Stoppelman, Joseph W. F., and L. de Jong- Lion rampant, the: The story of Holland's resistance to the nazis; B. Story of painting, the; From cave pictures to	102	Great American paintings: From Smibert to 3 Bellows, 1729-1924; AN	39 32 86 61 45 12
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R	101	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stone, I. F. R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stone, I. F. Stone, I. F. Stewart Stewa	102	Oreal American paintings, "room Simbert to Bellows, 1729-1724", AN. 1729-1724"	39 32 86 61 45 12 35 26
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R	101	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stone, I. F. R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stone, I. F. Stone, I. F. Stewart Stewa	102	Great American paintings, From Smibert to Bellows, 1729-1924, AN. or Creenia 3.  War Colonel B. Balchen, Major C. Ford, and Major O. La Farge, B. 7.  War diary. J. Malaquais. Translated by P. Grant; B. 9.  Warner, Rex Return of the traveller; B. 6.  Wei Tao-ming, Madame Weishoff, F. C. R. Wester, Alfred; R. 21, 7.  Werner, Alfred; R. 21, 7.  Weston, Christine Indigo; B. What to do with Germany. L. Nizer; B. 2.  Whete's the money coming from? Problems of postwar finance. S. Chase; B. 1.	39 32 86 61 45 12 35 26 62
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R	101	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stone, I. F. R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stone, I. F. Stone, I. F. Stewart Stewa	102	Great American paintings: From Smibert to 3 Bellows, 1729-1924; AN	39 32 86 61 45 12 35 26 62 95
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R	101	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Building for peac at home and abroad; B. Stimson, Robert, and F. R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. Stope, I. F., Sep. W. F., and L. de Jong, resistance to the nazis; B. Story of painting, the: From cave pictures to modern art. T. Craven; AN. Stowe, Leland They shall not sleep; B. Strange fruit. L. Smith; B. Strange fruit. L. Smith; B. Strange fruit. L. Smith; B. Steven with of housing the B.	102	Oreal American paintings. From Simhert to 3 Bornes. 123-124. A. S. Connelland. Colonel B. Balchen, Major C. Ford, and Major O. La Farge, B	39 32 86 61 45 112 35 26 62 95
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R	101	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Store, I. F.; R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. G. Store, I. F.; R. Store, I. Stewart S. Store, I. St. Stewart S. Stewart	102	Great American pantings: From Smibert to Bellows, 1729-1924, AN. or Ceremina 3.  Calonel B. Balchen, Major C. Ford, and Major O. La Farge, B. 7.  War diary. J. Malaquais. Translated by P. Grant; B. 9.  Warner, Rex Return of the traveller; B. 6.  Wei 'Iao-ming, Madame 4.  Wei'sloof, F. C.; R. Werner, Alfred; R. 21, 7.  Werner, Alfred; R. 21, 7.  Weston, Christine 1.  Indigo; B. Where's the money coming from? Problems what to do with Germany. L. Nizer; B. 2.  Where's the money coming from? Problems white Depth of Corowth of the red army, the; B. 10.  White Drigade, the R. Goffin English version by C. L. Markmann; B. 9.  White, D. Pedioff	44 39 32 86 61 45 112 35 26 62 95
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R	101 453 314 547 422 395	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Store, I. F.; R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. G. Store, I. F.; R. Store, I. Stewart S. Store, I. St. Stewart S. Stewart	102	Great American paintings: From Smibert to 3 Bellows, 1729-1924; AN Greenland A	39 32 86 61 45 12 35 26 62 95 97
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R	101 453 314 547 422 395	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Store, I. F.; R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. G. Store, I. F.; R. Store, I. Stewart S. Store, I. St. Stewart S. Stewart	102	Oreal American paintings. From Simbert to Bellows, 1729-1824, at the for Greenland, and Colonel B. Balchen, Major C. Ford, and Major O. La Farge, B	39 32 86 61 45 12 35 26 62 95 97
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R	101 453 314 547 422 395	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Building for peac at home and abroad; B. Stimson, Robert, and F. R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. Stope, I. F., Sep. W. F., and L. de Jong, resistance to the nazis; B. Story of painting, the: From cave pictures to modern art. T. Craven; AN. Stowe, Leland They shall not sleep; B. Strange fruit. L. Smith; B. Strange fruit. L. Smith; B. Strange fruit. L. Smith; B. Steven with of housing the B.	102	Great American paintings, From Smitert to Bellows, 1729-1524, Mile for Greenland, Major Colonel B. Balchen, Major C. Ford, and Major O. La Farge, B. 7 War diary. J. Malaquais. Translated by P. Grant; B. 2 Werner, Rex. Marchael B. 2 Werner, Rex. Marchael B. 3 Werner, Rex. Marchael B. 4 Werner, Rex. Marchael B. 4 Werner, Rex. Marchael B. 4 Werner, Alfred; R. 21, 7 Weston, Christine Indigor, B. 1 Indigor, B.	39 32 86 61 45 112 35 26 62 95 97 38 88 88 88
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R  R Race and rumors of race: Challenge to American crisis. H. W. Odum; B  Report on India; B. Razor's edge, the. W. S. Maugham; B Rebelliom in the backlands (Os sertoes) E. Redecunda. Translated by S. Putnam; B. Reder Gustav. H. Minz; B. Report on India. T. A. Raman; B. Rewald, John Gustav. G. Greenberg's review of his book, "Georges Seurat"; Reynolds, Quentin. Currian; rises, the; B.	101 453 314 547 422 395	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Building for peace at home and abroad; B. Building for peace at home and abroad; B. Building for peace at R. R. Stimson, Robert, and F. R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. Stone, I. F.; R. Stope, I. F.; R. Store, I. F. Store, I. F. Store, I. S. Store,	102	Great American paintings: From Smibert to Bellows, 1729-1924, AN. or Creenia d March Colonel B, Balchen, Major C, Ford, and Major O. La Farge, B. 7  Var diary. J. Malaquais. Translated by P. Grant; B. 9  Wenter, Rex. Return of the traveller; B. 6  Wei Tao-ming, Madame Weishoff, F. Cl. B. Wester, Alfred; R. 21, 7  Wenter, Alfred; R. 21, 7  Weston, Christine Indigo; B. What to do with Germany. L. Nizer; B. 2  Where's the money coming from? Problems of postwar finance. S. Chase; B. 1  White Drigade, the R. Goffin. English version by C. L. Markmann; B. 3  White Drigade, the R. Goffin. English version by C. L. Markmann; B. 3  White, Leigh; R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 66  White, Victor White, Victor White, Leigh R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 66  White, Victor White, Victor White, Light R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 66  White, Victor White, Victor White, Leigh R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 66  White, Victor White, Victor White, Leigh R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 66  White, Victor White, Victor Miller, Willon; R. 4  White, Light R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 66  White, Light R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 66  White, Light R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 66  White, Light R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 66  White, Light R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 61  White, Light R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 61	39 32 86 61 45 112 35 26 62 95 97 38 85 86
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R  R Race and rumors of race: Challenge to American crisis. H. W. Odum; B Ramort on India; B Racor's edge, the. W. S. Maugham; B Rebellion in the backlands (Os sertoes) E. da Cunha. Translated by S. Putnam; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Reder, Gustav Bottomich, Drawings by M. L. Vogeler- Regler; B. Report on India. T. A. Raman; B. Return of the fraveller. R. Warner; B Rewald, John Comments of Corcenberg's review of his Reynolds, Quentin Curtain rises, the: B. Rice, Philip Blair; R. Riess, Curt	101 453 314 547 422 395 657 314 686 111 340 597	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Marchael S.; Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. Stoppelman, Joseph W. F., and L. de 104g. Lion rampant, the: The story of Holland's resistance to the nazis; B. Stoppelman, Joseph W. F., and L. de 104g. Lion rampant, the: From cave pictures to modern art. T. Craven; AN. Storme, Leland Stephen, Stewart, Lessen, Leland Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Strange fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, John Raif Sues, Honn Raif Sues, Honn Raif Sues, Honn Raif Sues, Honn Raif Sun at noon, the J. Heerst; R. Swing the big-eyed rabbit. J. P. McCoy; B.	102	Great American paintings. The commission of the	39 32 86 61 45 12 35 26 62 95 97 38 88 88 88 86 24 22 25 99
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R  R Race and rumors of race: Challenge to American crisis. H. W. Odum; B Ramort on India; B Racor's edge, the. W. S. Maugham; B Rebellion in the backlands (Os sertoes) E. da Cunha. Translated by S. Putnam; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Reder, Gustav Bottomich, Drawings by M. L. Vogeler- Regler; B. Report on India. T. A. Raman; B. Return of the fraveller. R. Warner; B Rewald, John Comments of Corcenberg's review of his Reynolds, Quentin Curtain rises, the: B. Rice, Philip Blair; R. Riess, Curt	101 453 314 547 422 395 657 314 686 111 340 597	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. 614, From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. 614, Stoppelman, Joseph W. F., and L. de Jong. Lion rampant, the: The story of Holland's resistance to the nazis; B. Stoppelman, Joseph W. F., and L. de Jong. Lion rampant, the: From cave pictures to modern art. T. Craven; AN. Stray of painting, the: From cave pictures to modern art. T. Craven; AN. Strange fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Stray, Str	569 102 518 314 229 642 397 604 224 342 191 104 452 632 399	Great American pantings, cross Smitert to Bellows, 1729-1824, AM of or Greenland, and Great Greenland, and Great Greenland, and Great Grea	39 32 86 61 45 12 35 62 95 97 38 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R  R Race and rumors of race: Challenge to American crisis. H. W. Odum; B Ramort on India; B Racor's edge, the. W. S. Maugham; B Rebellion in the backlands (Os sertoes) E. da Cunha. Translated by S. Putnam; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Reder, Gustav Bottomich, Drawings by M. L. Vogeler- Regler; B. Report on India. T. A. Raman; B. Return of the fraveller. R. Warner; B Rewald, John Comments of Corcenberg's review of his Reynolds, Quentin Curtain rises, the: B. Rice, Philip Blair; R. Riess, Curt	101 453 314 547 422 395 657 314 686 111 340 597	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. 614, From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. 614, Stoppelman, Joseph W. F., and L. de Jong. Lion rampant, the: The story of Holland's resistance to the nazis; B. Stoppelman, Toseph W. F., and L. de Jong. Lion rampant, the: From cave pictures to modern art. T. Craven; AN. Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Strange fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Sweng the big-eyed rabbit. J. P. McCoy; B. T. T. T. Democracy on the march. D. E. Lillenthal: B.	569 102 518 314 229 642 397 604 224 342 191 104 452 632 399	Great American pantings, From Smibert to Bellows, 1729-1924, AN. or Ceremina 3  Manager State St	39 32 86 61 45 112 35 26 62 95 97 38 885 886 886 886 886 886 886 886 886 88
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R  R Race and rumors of race: Challenge to American crisis. H. W. Odum; B Ramort on India; B Racor's edge, the. W. S. Maugham; B Rebellion in the backlands (Os sertoes) E. da Cunha. Translated by S. Putnam; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Reder, Gustav Bottomich, Drawings by M. L. Vogeler- Regler; B. Report on India. T. A. Raman; B. Return of the fraveller. R. Warner; B Rewald, John Comments of Corcenberg's review of his Reynolds, Quentin Curtain rises, the: B. Rice, Philip Blair; R. Riess, Curt	101 453 314 547 422 395 657 314 686 111 340 597	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. 614, From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. 614, Stoppelman, Joseph W. F., and L. de Jong. Lion rampant, the: The story of Holland's resistance to the nazis; B. Stoppelman, Toseph W. F., and L. de Jong. Lion rampant, the: From cave pictures to modern art. T. Craven; AN. Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Strange fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Sweng the big-eyed rabbit. J. P. McCoy; B. T. T. T. Democracy on the march. D. E. Lillenthal: B.	569 102 518 314 229 642 397 604 224 342 191 104 452 632 399	Great American paintings. The commission of the	39 32 86 61 45 112 35 62 95 97 38 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R  R Race and rumors of race: Challenge to American crisis. H. W. Odum; B Ramort on India; B Racor's edge, the. W. S. Maugham; B Rebellion in the backlands (Os sertoes) E. da Cunha. Translated by S. Putnam; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Reder, Gustav Bottomich, Drawings by M. L. Vogeler- Regler; B. Report on India. T. A. Raman; B. Return of the fraveller. R. Warner; B Rewald, John Comments of Corcenberg's review of his Reynolds, Quentin Curtain rises, the: B. Rice, Philip Blair; R. Riess, Curt	101 453 314 547 422 395 657 314 686 111 340 597	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. 614, From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. 614, Stoppelman, Joseph W. F., and L. de Jong. Lion rampant, the: The story of Holland's resistance to the nazis; B. Stoppelman, Toseph W. F., and L. de Jong. Lion rampant, the: From cave pictures to modern art. T. Craven; AN. Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Strange fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Sweng the big-eyed rabbit. J. P. McCoy; B. T. T. T. Democracy on the march. D. E. Lillenthal: B.	569 102 518 314 229 642 397 604 224 342 191 104 452 632 399	Great American pantings. Trom Simbert to Bellows, 1729-1824, AM for Greenland, War Colonel B. Balchen, Major C. Ford, and Major O. La Farge, B. 7 War diary. J. Malaquais. Translated by P. Grant; B. Warner, Rex March, Rex Merner, Alfred; R. 21, 7 Weston, Christine March, Rex Merner, Alfred; R. 21, 7 Weston, Christine G. Weston, Christine March, Rex March, Rex March, Rex March, Rex March,	39 32 86 61 45 12 35 62 95 97 38 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R  R Race and rumors of race: Challenge to American crisis. H. W. Odum; B Ramort on India; B Racor's edge, the. W. S. Maugham; B Rebellion in the backlands (Os sertoes) E. da Cunha. Translated by S. Putnam; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Reder, Gustav Bottomich, Drawings by M. L. Vogeler- Regler; B. Report on India. T. A. Raman; B. Return of the fraveller. R. Warner; B Rewald, John Comments of Corcenberg's review of his Reynolds, Quentin Curtain rises, the: B. Rice, Philip Blair; R. Riess, Curt	101 453 314 547 422 395 657 314 686 111 340 597	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. 614, From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. 614, Stoppelman, Joseph W. F., and L. de Jong. Lion rampant, the: The story of Holland's resistance to the nazis; B. Stoppelman, Toseph W. F., and L. de Jong. Lion rampant, the: From cave pictures to modern art. T. Craven; AN. Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Strange fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Sweng the big-eyed rabbit. J. P. McCoy; B. T. T. T. Democracy on the march. D. E. Lillenthal: B.	569 102 518 314 229 642 397 604 224 342 191 104 452 632 399	Great American pantings, From Smibert to Bellows, 1729-1924, AN. for Greenland, War Colonel B. Balchen, Major C. Ford, and Major O. La Farge, B. 7 War diary. J. Malaquais. Translated by P. Grant; B. 2 Warner, Rex Return of traveller; B. 6 Werner, Rex Return of the traveller; B. 6 Weiskoff, F. C. R. Werner, Alfred; R. 21, 7 Werner, Alfred; R. 21, 7 Weston, Christine Indigo; B. 10 Weston, Christine Indigo; B. 10 What to do with Germany. L. Nizer; B. 2 Worth of the Weston, Christine Indigo; B. 10 What to do with Germany. L. Nizer; B. 2 What to do with Germany. L. Nizer; B. 2 White, Leight, R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 60 White, Leight; R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 60 White, Leight; R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 60 White, Leight; R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 60 White, Leight; R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 60 White, Leight; R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 60 White, Wilders, Thames White, Elizaheth; R. 19, 4 Wilders, Elizaheth; R. 19, 4 Wilders, Thames C. J. Rolo; B. 22 Wingate's raiders. C. J. Rolo; B. 22 Wereath for the see, a. R. Fitzgerald; B. 51 Wreath for the see, a. R. Fitzgerald; B. 51	39 32 86 61 45 112 35 26 62 95 97 38 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R  R Race and rumors of race: Challenge to American crisis. H. W. Odum; B Ramort on India; B Racor's edge, the. W. S. Maugham; B Rebellion in the backlands (Os sertoes) E. da Cunha. Translated by S. Putnam; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Reder, Gustav Bottomich, Drawings by M. L. Vogeler- Regler; B. Report on India. T. A. Raman; B. Return of the fraveller. R. Warner; B Rewald, John Comments of Corcenberg's review of his Reynolds, Quentin Curtain rises, the: B. Rice, Philip Blair; R. Riess, Curt	101 453 314 547 422 395 657 314 686 111 340 597	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. 614, From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. 614, Stoppelman, Joseph W. F., and L. de Jong. Lion rampant, the: The story of Holland's resistance to the nazis; B. Stoppelman, Toseph W. F., and L. de Jong. Lion rampant, the: From cave pictures to modern art. T. Craven; AN. Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Strange fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Sweng the big-eyed rabbit. J. P. McCoy; B. T. T. T. Democracy on the march. D. E. Lillenthal: B.	569 102 518 314 229 642 397 604 224 342 191 104 452 632 399	Return of the traveller; B. 6 Wei Tao-ming, Madame My revolutionary years; AN. 2 Weiskonf, F. C.; R. 21, 7 Werner, Alfred; R. 21, 7 What to do with Germany. L. Nizer; B. 2 Whate to do with Germany. L. Nizer; B. 2 White, D. Fedotoff Growth of the red army, the; B. 10 White, D. Fedotoff Growth of the red army, the; B. 10 White, D. Markmann; B. 3 White, Leigh Long Balkan night, the; B. 3 White, Leigh; R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 6 White, Williams and Million; R. 4 Williamson, Thames Per Domang; AN. 4 Williamson, Thames Far north country; B. 66 Wilson, J. Dover Fortunes of Falstaff, the; B. 7 Wingate's raiders. C. J. Rolo; B. 25 Woolf, Virginia Haunted house, a, and other stories; B. 54 Wreath for the sea, a, and other stories; B. 54 Wreath for the sea, a, and other stories; B. 54 Wreath for the sea, a, and other stories; B. 54	86 61 45 112 35 26 62 95 97 38 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R  R Race and rumors of race: Challenge to American crisis. H. W. Odum; B Ramort on India; B Racor's edge, the. W. S. Maugham; B Rebellion in the backlands (Os sertoes) E. da Cunha. Translated by S. Putnam; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Reder, Gustav Bottomich, Drawings by M. L. Vogeler- Regler; B. Report on India. T. A. Raman; B. Return of the fraveller. R. Warner; B Rewald, John Comments of Corcenberg's review of his Reynolds, Quentin Curtain rises, the: B. Rice, Philip Blair; R. Riess, Curt	101 453 314 547 422 395 657 314 686 111 340 597	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. 614, From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. 614, Stoppelman, Joseph W. F., and L. de Jong. Lion rampant, the: The story of Holland's resistance to the nazis; B. Stoppelman, Toseph W. F., and L. de Jong. Lion rampant, the: From cave pictures to modern art. T. Craven; AN. Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Strange fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Sweng the big-eyed rabbit. J. P. McCoy; B. T. T. T. Democracy on the march. D. E. Lillenthal: B.	569 102 518 314 229 642 397 604 224 342 191 104 452 632 399	Return of the traveller; B. 6 Wei Tao-ming, Madame My revolutionary years; AN. 2 Weiskonf, F. C.; R. 21, 7 Werner, Alfred; R. 21, 7 What to do with Germany. L. Nizer; B. 2 Whate to do with Germany. L. Nizer; B. 2 White, D. Fedotoff Growth of the red army, the; B. 3 White, D. Fedotoff Growth of the red army, the; B. 3 White, Leigh L. Markmann; B. 3 White, Leigh Long Balkan night, the; B. 3 White, Leigh; R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 6 White, Williams and Million; R. 4 Williamson, Thames Far north country; B. 66 Wilson, J. Dover Fortunes of Falstaff, the; B. 7 Wingate's raiders. C. J. Rolo; B. 2 Woolf, Virginia Haunted house, a, and other stories; B. 5 Wreath for the sea, a, and other stories; B. 5 Wreath for the sea, a, and other stories; B. 5	86 61 45 112 35 26 62 95 97 38 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R  R Race and rumors of race: Challenge to American crisis. H. W. Odum; B Ramort on India; B Racor's edge, the. W. S. Maugham; B Rebellion in the backlands (Os sertoes) E. da Cunha. Translated by S. Putnam; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Reder, Gustav Bottomich, Drawings by M. L. Vogeler- Regler; B. Report on India. T. A. Raman; B. Return of the fraveller. R. Warner; B Rewald, John Comments of Corcenberg's review of his Reynolds, Quentin Curtain rises, the: B. Rice, Philip Blair; R. Riess, Curt	101 453 314 547 422 395 657 314 686 111 340 597	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. 614, From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. 614, Stoppelman, Joseph W. F., and L. de Jong. Lion rampant, the: The story of Holland's resistance to the nazis; B. Stoppelman, Toseph W. F., and L. de Jong. Lion rampant, the: From cave pictures to modern art. T. Craven; AN. Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Strange fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Sweng the big-eyed rabbit. J. P. McCoy; B. T. T. T. Democracy on the march. D. E. Lillenthal: B.	569 102 518 314 229 642 397 604 224 342 191 104 452 632 399	Return of the traveller; B. 6 Wei Tao-ming, Madame My revolutionary years; AN. 2 Weiskonf, F. C.; R. 21, 7 Werner, Alfred; R. 21, 7 What to do with Germany. L. Nizer; B. 2 Whate to do with Germany. L. Nizer; B. 2 White, D. Fedotoff Growth of the red army, the; B. 3 White, D. Fedotoff Growth of the red army, the; B. 3 White, Leigh L. Markmann; B. 3 White, Leigh Long Balkan night, the; B. 3 White, Leigh; R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 6 White, Williams and Million; R. 4 Williamson, Thames Far north country; B. 66 Wilson, J. Dover Fortunes of Falstaff, the; B. 7 Wingate's raiders. C. J. Rolo; B. 2 Woolf, Virginia Haunted house, a, and other stories; B. 5 Wreath for the sea, a, and other stories; B. 5 Wreath for the sea, a, and other stories; B. 5	86 61 45 112 35 26 62 95 97 38 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R  R Race and rumors of race: Challenge to American crisis. H. W. Odum; B Ramort on India; B Racor's edge, the. W. S. Maugham; B Rebellion in the backlands (Os sertoes) E. da Cunha. Translated by S. Putnam; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Reder, Gustav L. Minz; B. Reder, Gustav L. Minz; B. Retwinds Drawings by M. L. Vogeler- Regler; B. Report on India. T. A. Raman; B. Return of the fraveller. R. Warner; B Rewald, John C. Greenberg's review of his Reynolds, Quentin Curtain rises, the: B. Rice, Chilip Blair; R. Riess, Curt	101 453 314 547 422 395 657 314 686 111 340 597	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. 614, From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. 614, Stoppelman, Joseph W. F., and L. de Jong. Lion rampant, the: The story of Holland's resistance to the nazis; B. Stoppelman, Toseph W. F., and L. de Jong. Lion rampant, the: From cave pictures to modern art. T. Craven; AN. Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Strange fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Sweng the big-eyed rabbit. J. P. McCoy; B. T. T. T. Democracy on the march. D. E. Lillenthal: B.	569 102 518 314 229 642 397 604 224 342 191 104 452 632 399	Return of the traveller; B. 6 Wei Tao-ming, Madame My revolutionary years; AN. 2 Weiskonf, F. C.; R. 21, 7 Werner, Alfred; R. 21, 7 What to do with Germany. L. Nizer; B. 2 Whate to do with Germany. L. Nizer; B. 2 White, D. Fedotoff Growth of the red army, the; B. 3 White, D. Fedotoff Growth of the red army, the; B. 3 White, Leigh L. Markmann; B. 3 White, Leigh Long Balkan night, the; B. 3 White, Leigh; R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 6 White, Williams and Million; R. 4 Williamson, Thames Far north country; B. 66 Wilson, J. Dover Fortunes of Falstaff, the; B. 7 Wingate's raiders. C. J. Rolo; B. 2 Woolf, Virginia Haunted house, a, and other stories; B. 5 Wreath for the sea, a, and other stories; B. 5 Wreath for the sea, a, and other stories; B. 5	86 61 45 112 35 26 62 95 97 38 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R  R Race and rumors of race: Challenge to American crisis. H. W. Odum; B Ramort on India; B Racor's edge, the. W. S. Maugham; B Rebellion in the backlands (Os sertoes) E. da Cunha. Translated by S. Putnam; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Red army, the. I. Minz; B. Reder, Gustav L. Minz; B. Reder, Gustav L. Minz; B. Retwinds Drawings by M. L. Vogeler- Regler; B. Report on India. T. A. Raman; B. Return of the fraveller. R. Warner; B Rewald, John C. Greenberg's review of his Reynolds, Quentin Curtain rises, the: B. Rice, Chilip Blair; R. Riess, Curt	101 453 314 547 422 395 657 314 686 111 340 597	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Moraes Introduction to India; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. 614, From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. 614, Stoppelman, Joseph W. F., and L. de Jong. Lion rampant, the: The story of Holland's resistance to the nazis; B. Stoppelman, Toseph W. F., and L. de Jong. Lion rampant, the: From cave pictures to modern art. T. Craven; AN. Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Strange fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Strapes fruit. L. Smith; B. Sweng the big-eyed rabbit. J. P. McCoy; B. T. T. T. Democracy on the march. D. E. Lillenthal: B.	569 102 518 314 229 642 397 604 224 342 191 104 452 632 399	Return of the traveller; B. 6 Wei Tao-ming, Madame My revolutionary years; AN. 2 Weiskonf, F. C.; R. 21, 7 Werner, Alfred; R. 21, 7 What to do with Germany. L. Nizer; B. 2 Whate to do with Germany. L. Nizer; B. 2 White, D. Fedotoff Growth of the red army, the; B. 3 White, D. Fedotoff Growth of the red army, the; B. 3 White, Leigh L. Markmann; B. 3 White, Leigh Long Balkan night, the; B. 3 White, Leigh; R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 6 White, Williams and Million; R. 4 Williamson, Thames Far north country; B. 66 Wilson, J. Dover Fortunes of Falstaff, the; B. 7 Wingate's raiders. C. J. Rolo; B. 2 Woolf, Virginia Haunted house, a, and other stories; B. 5 Wreath for the sea, a, and other stories; B. 5 Wreath for the sea, a, and other stories; B. 5	86 61 45 112 35 26 62 95 97 38 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88
Q Quintanilla, Luis; R  R Race and rumors of race: Challenge to American crisis. H. W. Odum; B  Report on India; B. Razor's edge, the. W. S. Maugham; B Rebelliom in the backlands (Os sertoes) E. Redecunda. Translated by S. Putnam; B. Reder Gustav. H. Minz; B. Report on India. T. A. Raman; B. Rewald, John Gustav. G. Greenberg's review of his book, "Georges Seurat"; Reynolds, Quentin. Currian; rises, the; B.	101 453 314 547 422 395 657 314 686 111 340 597	Victory without peace; B. Stewart, Maxwell S. Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. Marchael S.; Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. Stoll, Elmer Edgar From Shakespeare to Joyce; B. Stoppelman, Joseph W. F., and L. de 104g. Lion rampant, the: The story of Holland's resistance to the nazis; B. Stoppelman, Joseph W. F., and L. de 104g. Lion rampant, the: From cave pictures to modern art. T. Craven; AN. Storme, Leland Stephen, Stewart, Lessen, Leland Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Strange fruit. L. Smith; B. Straus, Nathan Seven myths of housing, the; B. Straus, John Raif Sues, Honn Raif Sues, Honn Raif Sues, Honn Raif Sues, Honn Raif Sun at noon, the J. Heerst; R. Swing the big-eyed rabbit. J. P. McCoy; B.	569 102 518 314 229 642 397 604 224 342 191 104 452 632 399	Return of the traveller; B. 6 Wei Tao-ming, Madame Wei Tao-ming, Madame Weiskopf, F. C.; R. 21, Weston, Christine Indigo; B. 1 What to do with Germany L. Nizer; B. 2 Where's the money coming from? Problems of postwar finance. S. Chase; B. 1 Whore to the money coming from? Problems of postwar finance. S. Chase; B. 1 White brigade, the R. Goffin. English version by C. L. Markmann; B. 3 White brigade, the R. Goffin. English version by C. L. Markmann; B. 3 White, Leigh White, Vigh; R. 102; see also C. 263; R. 66 Whitman, Willson; R. 44 Williamson, Thames Williamson, Thames Williamson, Thames Fortunes of Falstaff, the; B. 7 Williamson Thames Haunted house, a, and other stories; B. 54 Wreath for the sea, a. R. Fitzgerald; B. 55	86 61 45 112 35 26 62 95 97 38 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88 88

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 158

NEW YORK SATURDAY · IANUARY 1, 1944

5

6

26

28

NUMBER 1

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITO	RIA	LS
Come	and	Get

Conne	and	Ger	11
Bolivi	a—an	d A	fter

ARTICIES

Ickes and the Oil Men by I. F. Stone	6
Labor's Fourteen Million Votes by Robert Bendiner	7
In the Wind	10

11 British Tories Look Ahead by Mallory Browne John Longo and Frank Hague by McAlister Coleman 12

25 Years Ago in The Nation 15

OLITICAL WAR
"Liberated" Italy by Gaetano Salvemini	1
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus	1

BOOKS AND THE ARTS
Guides to America South by Elizabeth Wilder	19
Vansittart's Obsession by Reinhold Niebuhr	20
St. Paul and the New Faith by Alfred Werner	21
Jefferson as Philosopher by Jacques Barzun	22
Film Notes by James Agee	23
Art by Clement Greenberg	24
Music by B. H. Haggin	25

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Editor and Publisher FREDA KIRCHWEY

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 45 by Jack Barrett

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER Washington Editor I. F. STONE

Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Editor Political War Section J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Associate Editors MAXWELL S. STEWART KEITH HUTCHISON

Assistant Editor I. MITCHELL MORSE Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL LOUIS FISCHER

JONATHAN DANIELS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U.S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 55 Fifth Ave., New York 3, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act

The Shape of Things

THE PRESIDENT'S CHRISTMAS BROADCAST proved rather meager fare. He had nothing to say about the domestic affairs of the nation, in regard to which his leadership is so badly needed; nor did he use the opportunity to report on the Cairo and Teheran conferences in a way that would have enlarged the people's understanding of the major issues of the war. The one real item of news he had to offer-the appointment of General Eisenhower to command the Allied invasion forces -was hardly a surprise, since authoritative sources had already indicated this choice. As the only alternative seems to have been General Marshall, who is doing an outstanding job as Chief of Staff, the selection will be generally approved. General Eisenhower has shown himself to be a first-rate organizer, a skilled coordinator of land, sea, and air forces, and a good diplomat. He has won many laurels for his tact and skill in welding a staff drawn from different nationalities and services into a good working team-never an easy task. But he has yet to prove himself a major strategist. In the Mediterranean he has shown a caution which at times has appeared excessive, particularly after the capture of Sicily and the fall of Mussolini. A more dashing policy at that moment would have involved greater immediate risks, but it might have paid dividends in lives and time. It is only fair to add that history may show that responsibility for this delay lies elsewhere. In any case, General Eisenhower is now being given an opportunity such as has fallen to few commanders, and we wish him and the men he leads all good fortune.

THE SESSION OF CONGRESS WHICH ENDED on December 21 with barely twenty Representatives on the floor of the House may claim the distinction of having done less at a time of great urgency than any other Congress in a decade. A year ago, when the Seventyeighth Congress convened, it faced seven main responsibilities. Preeminent among these was the necessity for raising sufficient additional revenue to absorb excess purchasing power, then estimated at more than forty billion dollars. Also of great importance were the tasks of combating rising prices, creating the machinery for an orderly post-war reconstruction, providing financial and educational assistance to service men as they are demobilized, establishing a mechanism to prevent eleven million service men from being disfranchised in the next election, revising our social-security laws as repeatedly urged by the President, and formulating the broad outlines of our post-war international policies. Only the last was accomplished, and that largely by a fluke. The Connally resolution on post-war organization was given some substance at the last moment as a result of the timely announcement of the Moscow agreements. Against this must be set not only the failure of Congress to make provision for the difficult transition from war to peace at home but its indefensible action in killing the one agency that had done constructive work in this direction—the National Resources Planning Board.

*

THE MOST FLAGRANT DERELICTION OF DUTY on the part of Congress, however, has been its tendency to play politics on the inflation issue. Although few individual Congressmen will deny the necessity for the stabilization program, both houses have repeatedly vielded to the pressure of special interests and passed measures which, if they had become law, would have wrecked the entire anti-inflation program. Fortunately, many of these measures, like the anti-subsidy bill and the bills for increasing the pay of non-operating railway workers, the price of oil, and the price of corn, after passing in one house were held up in the other. And earlier in the session the President twice stepped in to avert disaster by vigorous use of his veto power. But if the difficulty of obtaining agreement between House and Senate saved Congress from many sins of commission, no such factor operated in connection with its sins of omission. Its failure to provide adequate tax revenues has already been seized upon as a justification for labor's demands for a wage scale above the Little Steel formula. Fortunately, as the session ended, there were signs that public opinion was making itself felt in Washington on the subsidies and soldier-vote issues. A three weeks' vacation certainly cannot do the Seventy-eighth Congress any harm; it is possible that a few talks with the folks back home may do it some good.

*

EVENTS ARE MOVING FAST IN THE BALKANS. Last week we commented on the demand of the new Partisan government in Yugoslavia for Allied recognition. Since then it has gone farther. Tito has broadcast a bitter attack on King Peter's Cabinet and announced that the King himself will not be allowed to return to Yugoslavia until the people have had a chance to decide whether or not they want him. This latest move creates an even more embarrassing diplomatic problem for the Allied governments. Tito's Partisan army is too important a military factor to be ignored. Even now it is containing as many German troops as are the British and American forces in Italy; and in preparing the way for an Allied invasion its operations are indispensable. Washington and London undoubtedly knew that eventually they would have to break with Mihailovich and the government in exile. But they had hoped they might employ the young King Peter to help bridge the diplomatic gap opened by the present situation. To graft Peter on the new political growth in Yugoslavia not only would serve to satisfy the ingrained British and American passion for legitimacy but would provide, it was hoped, a rallying point for forces in Yugoslavia still loyal to Mihailovich and the King. Now the Tito government has upset this hope. It cannot be suspected of having acted irresponsibly, especially since it is working in close cooperation with British, Russian, and American advisers. The repudiation of Peter was almost certainly a political necessity. At this stage in the struggle it is more important to represent the wishes of the Yugoslav people and keep their morale high than to spare Allied diplomats the consequences of their long-continued support of the government in exile.

*

ANYONE WITH AN AVERAGE MEMORY WILL recall how solemnly the State Department defended the necessity of transporting Marcel Peyrouton from Argentina to North Africa shortly after the Allied invasion. As one of Hitler's most assiduous French collaborators, Peyrouton, to be sure, had established concentration camps for Frenchmen on French soil and introduced the Nürnberg code to the land of liberty, equality, and fraternity; but his presence was demanded, it was said, because he was a good administrator. Now the indispensable administrator is in jail, along with such other supposedly essential adjuncts of Allied liberation as Pierre Boisson, and the bottom has not dropped out of the administration ot French North Africa. On the contrary that administration is in an increasingly robust state. Unlike the French governments in the declining years of the Third Republic, it is not disposed, in the name of democracy, to nourish democracy's enemies until they are strong enough to destroy it. The so-called "purge committee," besides rounding up the Peyroutons, Boissons, and Flandins, is gathering data on members of the army, navy, and civil service who belonged to the various fascist legions that contributed so willingly to the collapse of the Republic. It is looking into the recent history of publishers who until the Allied invasion printed their newspapers in accordance with daily instructions from Dr. Goebbels. To perform this service it has been necessary to impound the books of all papers published before November, 1942, an action which has produced wails of anguish about the De Gaullists' violation of the freedom of the press. Perhaps the best answer to these loose charges is the fact that the administrative procedure involved in the process has been severely criticized in Echo d'Alger, whose editors have incurred no penalty as a result.

*

THE McCORMICK THEORY OF INTERNATIONAL relations is that the interests of this country are endangered less by its enemies than by its friends and allies. So the Colonel is perfectly logical in advocating policies which seem bound to insure that we shall eventually have no friends left to worry about. "We should insist," he told the Detroit Athletic Club on December 15, "on retaining such of the islands as will secure our future safety from attack; we should retain air bases wherever we have built them . . . we should make such other arrangements as will provide for our security." This is a pretty tall order, with implications which the Colonel, unfortunately, failed to develop. We have built air bases all around the world. Is each of these to become an enclave of American territory, and if so, how will they be defended? Suppose, for instance, we "retain" an air base at Dakar. Are we then going to look to the French, who will not be exactly pleased at this invasion of their sovereignty, to guard it for us or are we to depend on our own strength? If the latter, we must take over more than a few square miles of North Africa, for an isolated air base would prove entirely indefensible. In fact, retaining all the air bases we have built for the purposes of carrying on this war would inevitably lead to the acquisition of most of Asia and Africa, not to mention such headaches as Northern Ireland, and would leave us permanently on a war footing if not permanently at war. Seeking security while rejecting internationalism, our isolationists are moving rapidly toward super-imperialism.

TRY TO IMAGINE A JEWISH POLICEMAN WHO not only hates Catholics indiscriminately but who attends meetings at which anti-Catholic campaigns are mapped out, who associates with shady characters under indictment for seditious activities, and who uses his garage as a storage vault for abusive anti-Catholic literature intended for popular distribution. Go on, then, and picture this arm of the law caught red-handed and brought up on departmental charges. Is there any doubt in your mind that he would—and should—be dropped from the force as fast as the shield could be stripped off his uniform? Now stop imagining and look at the case of Patrolman James L. Drew of the New York police. With a few legally irrelevant changes it parallels our hypothetical case—up to a point. Drew is not Jewish but on the contrary an avowed anti-Semite. He is a friend and associate of Joe McWilliams and other notorious rabble-rousers. On the testimony of Commissioner of Investigation William B. Herlands, he has contributed funds "to at least four organizations which, according to federal indictments, were engaged in seditious activities," and in his garage were found quantities of scurrilous anti-Semitic pamphlets. Here the parallel ends. Far from being unceremoniously booted from the force, Drew has been reinstated by Commissioner Valentine, with back pay. During part of the period of his suspension he was even permitted to continue policing a Brooklyn precinct with a preponderantly Jewish population. Both Mr. Herlands and Dean Ignatius M. Wilkinson, Corporation Counsel of New York, believe that Valentine acted in defiance of all the evidence. Mayor LaGuardia promises to look into the matter when he has a chance. He should not be allowed to forget it.

×

THE STORY OF JOHN LONGO'S ARREST AND conviction as told elsewhere in this issue by McAlister Coleman is so preposterous that the average American is likely to think that some of the essential facts must have been omitted. Yet evidence from many sources, including the testimony of Governor Edison himself, indicates that Longo's sole crime is that of opposition to the Hague political machine. It cannot even be pretended that he has received a fair trial. The prosecutor, the judge, and even the jury that convicted him were under Hague's influence. And the Longo case is only one of six apparent miscarriages of justice which have been called to the attention of Attorney General Biddle by the City Affairs Committee of Jersey City, which is demanding a federal investigation of the infringement of constitutional rights by the Hague machine. Mr. Biddle's position is embarrassing, but we incline to agree with Mr. Coleman that a clear-cut response to civic duty in this instance would react favorably to the Administration in New Jersey as well as elsewhere. Meanwhile, every effort must be made to see that Longo receives the kind of trial every American is entitled to. Funds for his defense may be sent to the Reverend George G. Hollingshead, treasurer of the Jersey City Affairs Committee, Goodwill Industries, 574 Jersey Avenue, Jersey City.

Come and Get It

A FTER months of groaning labor, Congress seems about to give birth to a bad joke—a tax bill not only completely inadequate for the fiscal needs of the nation but threatening to take more out of the Treasury than it adds to it. Although a Presidential veto of a tax bill is quite unprecedented, it is not surprising that such action is being urged in quarters close to the White House. The Treasury put before Congress plans to raise $10½ billion in new revenue. The House, ignoring the possibilities of higher income levies, particularly in the over-$3,000 brackets, scraped together some odds and endaged to the property of the property of taxes estimated to yield a total of little over $2 billion. Not content with this, the Senate Finance Committee has whittled further, and in addition has voted to freeze pay-roll taxes at the present rate of 1 per cent. Unless overridden, a Presidential veto would mean that social-security collections would automatically increase $1.4 billion in the next year, making a net loss of under $1 billion from failure to pass a tax bill.

But that is not the worst. Tacked on to the tax bill in its present form are a series of drastic amendments to the renegotiation law which will not only prevent the government from collecting refunds when contract prices prove out of line with costs but will probably involve the return of vast sums to contractors who have already agreed to scale down prices.

The renegotiation law was passed for the purpose of checking in this war the rampant profiteering experienced in the last. While it can hardly be said to have achieved this objective it has served at least to limit raids on the public purse. It is, moreover, an essential law because it is absolutely impossible to ascertain production costs in advance in a great many cases. When a new type of plane or tank is ordered, no one can say what will be the real unit cost of a batch of 5,000. This can only be ascertained as the production line gets into swing and the "bugs" are ironed out. Then various ways of reducing the labor cost per unit are likely to be discovered. Further, if the order is later increased, unit costs will be again reduced since the heavy expenses of preparing blueprints, special dies, etc., will be spread over a larger output.

Under the renegotiation law it has been the practice of government procurement officers to place contracts at prices which the manufacturer concerned believes will protect him fully. Then, when actual costs have been proved by experience, renegotiation begins, and if the final figure agreed upon is less than the original, a refund is made to the government. This process serves to prevent delays in placing contracts: the extent to which it also serves to protect the taxpayer is indicated by the fact that already over $5 billion has been collected in refunds.

At the time the law was passed there was very little opposition, and many large war contractors have since warmly indorsed its principles and paid tribute to the way they have been applied. In his report to the stockholders for 1942, Frederick B. Rentschler, chairman of United Aircraft, declared: "The directors and officers wholeheartedly support the principle of renegotiation.... Price reductions, before excessive profits can accrue, tend to keep costs at a minimum. In this respect renegotiation is superior to a broad profit limitation, which reaches profits only after they accrue and affords no incentive to reduce costs."

Many corporations, however, when faced by the prospect of disgorging cash to the Treasury, decided that the law was an unjust one. They objected that renegotiation did not take into account the necessity for providing post-war reserves out of profits, and they claimed that revision of contracts should be based on consideration not of gross profits but of profits after taxes. Actually profits, after taxes and renegotiated refunds, are proving ample in most cases to provide for post-war reserves unless business is preparing to hibernate like a bear and live on its accumulated fat through a prolonged winter of depression. Moreover, Congress has made generous provision for tax rebates in the event of post-war losses. As to the second claim, it means in effect that taxes on profits would be treated as cost and that the Treasury would pay out with one hand what it received in the other.

Congress, however, has been mightily impressed by these pleas, and the result is the inclusion in the current tax bill of a series of amendments which in the opinion of such conservative administrators as Under Secretary of War Patterson and Under Secretary of the Navy Forrestal (both government recruits from Wall Street) are calculated to emasculate the renegotiation law. Among the changes approved by the Senate Finance Committee is the retroactive exclusion from renegotiation of subcontracts for articles which do not become a component part of the final product consumed. The effect of this amendment would be the return of huge sums to manufacturers of machine tools and many other contractors. Another proposal is for the exemption from renegotiation of all "standard commercial articles." This introduces but does not define a term capable of widely differing interpretations. Is an army blanket, a ship, a Diesel motor, or a truck axle a "standard commercial article"? And in any case is no consideration to be given to the fact that a bulk government order for such articles can be filled at very much lower unit cost than the equivalent production made up of numerous relatively small orders for private customers?

Other amendments approved by the House or the Senate Finance Committee or both require renegotiators to take into account taxes and post-war reserves and permit 8.000 voluntary settlements already achieved to be appealed to the courts. It is no wonder that Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau has declared that the renegotiation provisions of the tax bill "open the way to truly extortionate profits. I predict that if they are enacted into law they will come back to plague not only Congress but the war-goods manufacturers who get temporary gain from them."

The idea that this war, unlike the last, was to be fought on a non-profiteering basis has already gone down the drain. Corporate earnings after taxes in 1943 reached an all-time high. But if these proposals become law, the nation's substance will be piled in the hog trough and industry invited to gorge itself sick.

Bolivia—and After

TWAS clear when the Ramirez regime in Argentina was first established that the Colonels would not be content with seeing their program victorious in Argentina alone. Every circumstance drove them to extend their influence beyond the national frontiers. On one hand they faced the growing dissatisfaction of the people, and on the other the difficult diplomatic situation engendered by their conflict with the United States. The only way they could compensate for their weak position was to bolster Argentine fascism with the support of the greatest possible number of Latin American countries.

The Bolivian coup d'état was written on the wall, and La Paz is not the only capital threatened by fascism. In his broad analysis of how fascism developed in Argentina, J. Alvarez del Vayo last week referred to a project, centering in and around Argentina, to create a strong military bloc of states, directed particularly against the United States. Even before the overthrow of the Peñeranda regime was reported, those who had followed affairs in Buenos Aires were familiar with the outline of the plan, which encompassed Paraguay, Bolivia, Chile, and Peru. Paraguay and Bolivia have been won over by Argentina, and Ramirez agents have shown tremendous activity in recent weeks in Chile and Peru.

No more conclusive proof can be offered that the tolerance of a single fascist state anywhere endangers every state everywhere. With Buenos Aires as the core of infection, fascism threatens to spread all along the Plate River and the Andes, penetrating even into Central America and Mexico. Though Mexico City is a long distance from Buenos Aires and La Paz, reports from there are far from reassuring. On the contrary, an eminent Mexican who occupies an official post and who only a year ago scoffed at stories in The Nation about the Sinarquist danger admitted the other day that in view of recent developments in South America the danger could no longer be minimized. Recently the Mexican Parliament discussed at great length the proportions which the Sinarquist agitation is assuming. Well organized, and constantly acquiring new financial means, the Sinarquistas have been working systematically and aggressively among the young men who are scheduled for induction into the army. The Bolivian coup d'état was acclaimed by the Sinarquistas without even an attempt to disguise their intention to profit by a good example.

This situation deserves the closest attention from the government and people of the United States. All our complacency about the progress which the cause of democracy and of the United Nations is making in Latin America has been fundamentally challenged; should things continue to move in the same direction, we may find ourselves emerging victorious from the war only to see fascism triumphant in Latin America. And the triumph of fascism in the southern continent could not fail to find a reflection in the United States itself.

It may seem absurd that such a threat should develop at a moment when the Allied coalition is defeating the Axis powers on every front. But the explanation is simple. The growth of fascism in Latin America is the result of our insistence upon waging this war not as a war for democracy but as a purely military enterprise. It is the consequence of the absence of a united political policy from the direction of the war.

The democratic elements, the liberal forces, the working masses in Latin America have been confused and thwarted by our contradictory policy. It is true that the principal leaders of the coup d'état in Bolivia are the same people who obliged the government of Peneranda to declare a state of siege in 1941, "because the existence of plans and activities against public order and the legal powers in connivance with foreign political interests of totalitarian character has been proved." It is true that in certain respects the coup in Bolivia is the second act, this time successful, of a project conceived in 1941 in cooperation with Ernst Wendler, the German Minister in La Paz, and developed by Major Elias Pabón, the Bolivian military attache in Berlin. But it is no less true that these leaders were able to take advantage of the profound distrust which the mass of the Bolivian working class has come to feel toward the United States and toward the United Nations in general.

Not everyone behind the new Bolivian regime is a pro-Nazi, although the leadership may be. Many of the men who are involved in the coup or who supported it are moved by a belief that the war may end with a capitalist oligarchy dominating Latin America, supported and favored by Washington. German agents in Bolivia knew well what they were doing when they distributed throughout Latin America thousands of leaflets quoting the statement of the United States Minister in La Paz in favor of the Bolivian mine owners in their struggle against the Bolivian workers. It was too much to expect that when the junta led its troops into the streets of La Paz the other day to overthrow the Peñeranda government, the working masses of Bolivia would rush from their houses to oppose their new rulers and shout hosannas for the United Nations.

This is the situation to which the lack of a democratic political direction of the war has led. Washington may or may not decide to recognize the new Bolivian government, but as long as the United Nations have nothing better to offer Latin America than a policy of supporting oppressive dictatorships, of making no distinction between reactionaries and democrats, the plot conceived in Buenos Aires and now victorious in Bolivia will have success after success.

Ickes and the Oil Men

BY I. F. STONE

O ONE has been more critical of dollar-a-year men than Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes. He has boasted that in his Petroleum Administration for War there are no dollar-a-year men, that the men running the PAW, unlike those running the War Production Board, are regular government officials working at regular government salaries.

A few days ago a subcommittee of the House Naval Affairs Committee under the chairmanship of L. Mendel Rivers released a transcript of hearings on the petroleum situation. This transcript revealed (1) that at least three officials of the PAW are still being paid salaries by private companies, although they are also paid regular salaries by the government, and (2) that the PAW refused to give the House Naval Affairs Committee a list of other PAW officials receiving private pay. A similar request some time ago from a subcommittee of the Senate Agriculture Committee met with a similar rebuff.

Ickes's deputy in charge of the Petroleum Administration for War is Ralph K. Davies. He testified that he was on leave of absence from his job as first vice-president of Standard Oil of California. When he was asked whether he was receiving a salary from that company, his answer was, "Not salary as such." But in answer to further questions Davies explained: "My salary with the government is $10,000. My compensation from Standard Oil of California is $47,500... which together represent my civilian salary of $57,500."

Edwin D. Cumming is director of refining in the PAW. He testified that he was with the Shell Oil Company, American affiliate of Royal Dutch Shell, for twenty years, and explained his dual position thus:

Mr. Cumming: . . . I left Shell to come down here as director of refining.

Mr. Rivers: You are not now connected with Shell?

Mr. Cumming: No.

Mr. Rivers: What is your salary over here?

Mr. Cumming: $8,000.

Mr. Rivers: You don't draw any salary from any other source now?

Mr. Cumming: I get a so-called termination pay from Shell.

Mr. Rivers: How much is that?

Mr. Cumming: That amounts to about $18,000 a

Mr. Rivers: What is that, Mr. Cumming? Is that a kind of annuity?

Mr. Cumming: Yes. Shell, of course, was reluctant to have me leave and wanted to be sure that I maintained some sort of connection with them during the war, and that I would return to them after the war, even though they were most anxious that I have nothing to do with them as long as I was in Washington.

Donald R. Knowlton, Director of Production for the PAW, testified to a similar position. He is a government official at $8,000 a year but is "still on the pay roll of the Phillips Petroleum Company . . as compensation for past services rendered" at $16,380 a year, because he is "what you might call loaned by the Phillips Petroleum Company."

Representative F. Edward Hébert of Louisiana, a member of the Rivers subcommittee, asked Knowlton to supply a list of PAW officials showing "whether or not they are still drawing compensation from their companies which loaned them here to Washington, as well as the compensation they are getting in Washington." This request was given a polite brush-off by Davies in a letter to Representative Rivers.

There is a federal statute, passed in 1918, which says:.

No government official or employee shall receive any salary in connection with his service as such from any source other than the government of the United States. . . . And no person, association, or corporation shall make any contribution to, or in any way supplement the salary of, any government official or employee for the services performed by him for the government.

The purpose of this law, as explained by an opinion of the Attorney General in 1922, "was that no government official or employee should serve two masters to the prejudice of his unbiased devotion to the interests of the United States." I think this pretty elementary. I think the people of this country at least have a right to know when a public official is also on a private pay roll, especially when he is engaged, as PAW officials are, in regulating the affairs of his own industry. I think that when men are on the public pay roll and a private pay roll at one and the same time it is hardly candid to draw a moral distinction between them and dollar-a-year men. The only difference is that we get their services more cheaply at the WPB than at the PAW. I frankly cannot understand how a public official with a record like that of Harold Ickes can justify his refusal to give the facts to a Congressional committee.

So many have been the inquiries about this matter that the PAW is giving out mimeographed copies of a letter sent by Attorney General Francis Biddle to the President January 1, 1944 on April 27, 1942. PAW represents this letter as authorization for the acceptance of private salaries by its officials. But I do not think the letter supports the interpretation given it. The letter is a reply to a request from the White House for an opinion "whether it is proper for an officer of the United States to engage in private business activities and be compensated for so doing." Davies in his letter to Rivers said his subordinates "devote their undivided effort" to the PAW. If this is true, the question put to Biddle does not cover them. PAW seems to rely on a sentence in the Biddle opinion which says that the statute quoted above "does not, however, prohibit payment for services rendered exclusively to private persons or organizations and which have no connection with the services rendered to the government." But this does not cover PAW officials, for Davies's excuse for the dual salaries was that "we can't get an organization to do this work at government salaries." In that case, the payments from the private companies do supplement government salaries for work done for the government—clearly a violation of the statute.

We need not be legalistic or babes in the wood. The big companies from which the leading officials of PAW are drawn have never distinguished themselves by an over-punctilious sense of propriety in dealing with the government. If the Shell Oil Company was as anxious as Cumming said that he should "have nothing to do with them as long as [he] was in Washington," Shell Oil is a very unusual company. Most companies assign men to WPB, PAW, or other agencies because they want someone there to see that their interests are taken care of.

The Rivers subcommittee seemed to think the situation at PAW no different from at WPB. "The Petroleum Administration for War was criticized by nearly every witness," its report said, "for . . . favoritism to the big oil companies, whose employees predominantly man the Petroleum Administration for War." Surveying the activities of the PAW's all-powerful district committees, the subcommittee found "discrimination against the weaker independent members of the industry under the guise of furthering the war effort." This is exactly the kind of criticism that Ickes has aimed in the past at the WPB and the RFC.

Labor's Fourteen Million Votes

BY ROBERT BENDINER

N JUNE 26 last any one of a hundred Congressmen might have been seen to sit back and rub his hands in solid satisfaction. Over the President's veto the Smith-Connally anti-strike bill had been made the law of the land; after ten years of overindulgence at the hands of New Deal "professors," labor, these statesmen thought, had been put in its place. They had voted—or so they believed—to arrest a trend, to check the political advances of the unions. In their astigmatic way the Congressmen did not see that what they had really done was to give labor a political awareness which may well cost some of them their jobs as representatives of the people. They had made a good many wage-earners suddenly understand that henceforth their security would depend not only on the success of a union's dickerings with an employer but equally on the attitude of Presidents, Representatives, and Senators.

The demonstration, however unintentional, was effective, and it quickly bore fruit. From the C. I. O., the A. F. of L., and the Railroad Brotherhoods alike came hot words of protest—and some plain speaking about the 1944 elections. Trade-union leaders of every caliber and every faction were agreed at least that their casual trust in the self-perpetuation of labor's New Deal gains had been unwarranted, that their beauty nap in the election campaigns of 1940 and 1942 had been bought at too high a price.

The awakening was all to the good, but political consciousness is not the same thing as political solidarity. In the first flush of disillusion and alarm, labor, like Leacock's knight, has leaped to the saddle and galloped off in all directions. Sections of the A. F. of L., pinning the Smith-Connally bill on the Southern Democrats and jealous of alleged favoritism toward the C. I. O., have soured on the Administration as a whole and are ready to give the nod to the first Republican who tosses them a kind word. This drift can be counted on to reach ground-swell proportions should Willkie be nominated. John L. Lewis, on the other hand, now detests Willkie even more than he does Roosevelt and is playing a waiting game in the hope that fate will make it unnecessary for him to choose between his two best hates. The political direction of the Railroad Brotherhoods will probably be decided by the government's handling of the current strike crisis. At the moment the Brotherhood leaders are resentful over what they regard as the favored treatment accorded to Lewis's miners, who were allowed to violate the Little Steel wage formula because they insisted. They are equally resentful over the President's Fair Employment Practices Committee, which for the sake of the war effort would have them sacrifice a time-honored tradition of discriminating against Negroes. Victor Riesel, the New York Post's labor columnist, reports that some of them have taken to mumbling about "the President's Harvard professors."

Sidney Hillman

On the side of the Administration, and geared for political action on a scale no major labor group has yet attempted in this country, are the unions of the C. I. O. Their story in the campaign of 1944 will be the story of a new agency and a fateful experiment in American labor politics-the C. I. O. Committee on Political Action, appointed by Philip Murray and headed by Sidney Hillman. It should be said at the outset that the Political Action Committee aspires to give direction not merely to the C. I. O. unions but to great sections of American labor beyond those boundaries and to farmer and independent liberal groups as well. It is a major bid for progressive unity on the political front-and on its banners may well rest the hopes of Franklin D. Roosevelt for his own reelection or for the election of his chosen successor.

NON-PARTISAN BUT-

Ostensibly the Political Action Committee is not bound to support Roosevelt or the Democratic Party, but its protestations on this score need not be taken seriously. It is true that at last November's convention of the C. I. O. President Murray was not prepared to tell the Democratic Party or any other party, " 'Here we are, meek and humble of spirit, prepared to give to you our bodies and our souls in a state of abject surrender." And he did in fact suggest that 1944 would be time enough to make selections for 1944. But Hillman, agreeing technically and with obvious reluctance, could not resist adding that if the election were only a few months away he would still raise his voice and "urge, for the sake of humanity, the nation, and labor, the nomination and reelection of Franklin Delano Roosevelt." Since Hillman was deliberately chosen as kingpin of the committee, it may be assumed that the "bodies and souls" involved will ultimately be delivered to the Democrats, if not "in a state of abject surrender," then perhaps in a state of mild protest-but in any event delivered.

Hillman explains the committee as a kind of spontaneous generation. Realistic C. I. O. leaders, he says, did not blink the fact that labor had taken a severe drubbing at the polls in 1942. The same truth did not escape the Seventy-eighth Congress, and the Smith-Connally law, which among other choice provisions forbade unions to contribute to political parties, was merely the most blatant expression of a triumphant hostility that promised even direr things to come. Meeting in executive session, the C. I. O. high command voted on July 7 to sound out other labor and farmer groups on the chances of a common effort to arrest the trend. A committee was appointed under Hillman's chairmanship to explore and report back. The objective, Hillman told me, is "to provide a mechanism for organizing, ward by ward and precinct by precinct, the progressive forces of the country for the election campaign of 1944 and to make sure that the issues of that campaign will be real issues." The foremost of these is to be full employment after the war, and beyond that a foreign policy compatible with democracy at home. The punch behind the program, according to the blueprint, is to be the pooled voting strength of fourteen million trade unionists.

In view of labor's divided political sentiments it is no doubt wise of Hillman to emphasize issues rather than candidates or parties. Republicans as well as Democrats are eligible for the committee's support in Congressional and local fights. Nevertheless, only the most naive observer can doubt that the committee will in fact be a campaign instrument for the New Deal wing of the Democratic Party. In the first place, Hillman, in the course of his unity explorations, has called for a "National United Labor League" which would support candidates "who have demonstrated their consistent and unequivocal support of President Roosevelt on all major issues, domestic and foreign." Secondly, the Administration has already assigned some of its best talent to work with the committee. C. B. Baldwin, once administrator of the Farm Security Agency, has been lent out as Hillman's administrative assistant. Former Representative McKeough of Illinois, an ardent New Dealer, will act as regional director for Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin. And Maury Maverick is being pressed to serve in the Southwest. All are expected to work closely with the White House. Finally, the committee is dead set against the one kind of action that would finish all Democratic hopes for a 1944 victory—recourse by labor or progressives to a national third party. Hillman himself is not impressed with the argument that with labor's support assured so early in the game, the President would be free to concentrate on conciliating the right. On the contrary, he argues, concessions are made only to power.

PROGRESS: ON PAPER AND OTHERWISE

Reporting back to the C. I. O. convention in November, Hillman recounted the achievements of his exploratory campaign. In ten regional conferences he had consulted with C. I. O. representatives from more than forty states, and had obtained unanimous and enthusiastic agreement, not to mention three-quarters of a million dollars. He had appealed to local officials of the A. F. of L. and the Brotherhoods, and nowhere did he "find opposition from any section of the organized labor movement for some kind of cooperation on political action." In Philadelphia, in the state of New Jersey, and in many other places, he reported, "all of labor is organically united for political action." Unofficially he spoke of a $5,000,000 "educational" fund in the making and expressed the hope that the Federation, the Brotherhoods, and the C. I. O. would hold a convention of their own prior to the Presidential conventions. Recommendations would be drawn up for inclusion in the platforms of the major parties and labor standards set up for candidates. The convention voted full approval, and its Committee on Political Action buckled down to work.

Since November the committee claims to have established organic unity, that is, single groups representing all major labor organizations, in the states of Vermont and Louisiana, and on a city-wide basis in Oakland, Cleveland, and St. Louis. A similar setup is said to be on the way in Minnesota, Arkansas, and Seattle. Parallel unity—separate groups working cooperatively for the same local candidates—is reported to obtain in Washington, Kentucky, and West Virginia. Committee officials even talk hopefully of primary drives in some of the most benighted strongholds of the South, with fights scheduled against "Cotton Ed" Smith in South Carolina, Dies in Texas, and possibly Rankin in Mississippi.

It should not belittle either the purposes or the prospects of the Political Action Committee to note in this picture the somewhat gaudy tints of the professional political artist. The C. I. O. unions, it may be taken for granted, will deliver, as promised, a solid bloc for the New Deal candidate—assuming there is a New Deal candidate and assuming the committee succeeds in getting out a full vote (in itself no mean objective in view of labor's sluggishness in the recent past). But it is doubtful whether the unity attained so far with the A. F. of L. or the Brotherhoods amounts to anything politically significant on a national scale. All too often "organic unity" is just another term for the inevitable collaboration of small progressive groups that have time after time worked together, plus an A. F. of L. local here and another there—the nucleus for a broad front perhaps but hardly a front in itself. Philadelphia's United Labor Committee, established a year ago, is already cracking under the strain. In the mayoralty campaign of last November the Communist-controlled affiliates not unnaturally refused to go along in support of William C. Bullitt and worked at cross-purposes with their organically united colleagues. Now the A. F. of L. Teamsters are reported to have withdrawn unofficially or to be on the verge of doing so.

In Minnesota, to put another claim to the test, the unity achieved is not so much a product of the Political Action Committee as it is the A. F. of L.'s contribution to a statewide effort for a united Democratic-Farmer Labor ticket. The C. I. O., comparatively weak in that state, is merely going along. On the Pacific Coast the committee has come to terms with the powerful Teamsters' machine of Dave Beck, but it should be remembered that at the top of the Teamsters is Dan Tobin, chairman of the labor committee of the Democratic Party. If this particular Federation union couldn't be counted on to cooperate, the prospects of a solid labor front would be too faint to be seen by the naked eye.

In the top reaches of the A. F. of L. there is nothing but coolness for the advances of the Political Action Committee. When Hillman told the convention that "not in a single place did [he] find opposition from any section of the organized labor movement," he was slyly forgetting at least one none too gentle rebuff. The executive council of the Federation, he had been told, rejected his proposals for joint action, preferring to follow its "old non-partisan policy without becoming entangled with committees of other organizations."

It is true that, given the autonomy of the Federation's affiliates, the council can speak only for itself, but the causes of its chilliness run deep into the fabric of the organization. Foremost, perhaps, is the jealousy of leaders, national and local. Hillman's prestige will rise or vanish with the success or failure of the New Deal next November. In the event of a victory he will be credited with having delivered labor's vote, and Federation leaders are not even faintly interested in contributing toward that end. Those among them who choose to back the Administration will want recognition for whatever votes they deliver. On the other hand, the possibility of a New Deal defeat is certain to lure some of them into the Republican camp, where in the event that their gamble proves sound they will be in all the better position because of the C. I. O.'s headlong commitment. Finally, Hillman's high-handed approach to the complex political situation in New York has violently alienated one of the largest and most powerful of the Federation's unions-David Dubinsky's International Ladies' Garment Workers-and has probably sealed the doom of the American Labor Party.

NIGHTMARE IN NEW YORK

The incredible muddle in New York requires an article in its own right; its intricacies can only be suggested here. Logically the American Labor Party, undeviating in its support of the New Deal, should have been made the core around which the Political Action Committee built its unity structure in the state. Hillman agreed to treat it as such but laid down the conditions that it accept the affiliation of all unions desiring to join and that representatives of all unions be admitted to the ruling council of the party. The theory was that the C. I. O. could hardly support an organization from which any of its constituent unions were barred, whatever the political complexion of their leaders. To accept the proposal, therefore, the A. L. P. would have to abandon its long and bitter struggle to keep Communists from attaining dominant positions in the party. Acting on the principle that Communists are entitled to their own party but not to others, the right-wing leaders of the A. L. P. will not yield. They are bitter at Hillman, who they fully believe has deliberately jockeyed them into an impossible position partly out of personal animosity toward Dubinsky.

Aside from certain legal objections to the Hillman proposal, the A. L. P. leaders insist that even if they wished to surrender, their party workers-the men and women who ring doorbells, speak on street corners, and in general carry the burden of campaigning-would abandon the party in droves rather than accept a united front with Communists after years of mutual castigation. The way would then be open for the Communists to sweep in and take over the ward machinery and the club houses, the heart of the party, regardless of how small a minority they might be in its top councils. Who else would be ready to step into the precincts? Certainly not Sidney Hillman's Amalgamated Clothing Workers. The A. L. P. would have accepted an alternative proposal, its leaders told me, whereby the party, its own structure unaffected, would attach itself as a unit to a statewide political-action league organized for the 1944 campaign.

To all of which Hillman answers blandly that the left wing is fast taking over the party as it is, and that his scheme would at least prevent the Communists from controlling the state committee. The fact is that in making his proposal Sidney Hillman had nothing to lose. Should the New Deal come to grief in 1944, an A. L. P. revamped along the lines he suggests would probably disintegrate. Should a New Deal candidate win, Hillman would have made use of the party, and whether or not it became a Communist front afterward would not, I think, greatly concern him. It is my belief, therefore, that Alex Rose, George Counts, and David Dubinsky, the guiding spirits of the A. L. P., will flatly reject the Hillman proposal. Along with the district leaders they will shortly decide whether to abandon the party now or hold out in the hope of defeating the left-wingers—who in that event will be aided by Hillman's followers-in a bitterly contested April primary.

Whatever his intentions, Hillman has created, in the name of unity, a seething disunity in the most crucial of all the states. He may be able to make up for it in the other forty-seven, and, considering what is at stake, there should be no liberal so partisan as not to wish him well. If he fails and the New Deal is drowned in a flood of hostile ballots, it will be many a year before labor will again be recognized as a political force in the United States. In that event the rivalries that now separate a Brotherhood locomotive engineer from a Federation teamster, or an I. L. G. dress cutter from a C. I. O. steel riveter, will seem like wretched stuff beside the headaches that will afflict them all in common—because government will continue to play a major role in their affairs, and an unsympathetic government can be a lot harder to bargain with than an unsympathetic employer.

In the Wind

EW YEAR'S PREDICTION. Around City Hall in Jersey City the talk is that Republican Governor-Elect Walter Edge will appoint as Prosecutor of Hudson County, to take the place of Dan O'Regan, who tried John Longo, another of Hague's henchmen now on the bench.

ON NOVEMBER 20 THIS COLUMN reported the dismissal of Joseph Kaufman, liberal columnist on the Lynn, Massachusetts, Telegram-News. Almost immediately after sacking Kaufman, the Telegram-News dropped another column, McGlue's News-Vues, which had appeared on the same page. This had consisted of anti-New Deal, anti-Semitic, anti-Russian propaganda fashioned by one Charles S. McGlue, former associate of James M. Curley. The local Newspaper Guild, exercising its rights under a closed-shop contract, had served notice on the publisher that it would not accept McGlue into membership and that he could no longer continue to write for the paper.

THE WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD recently carried the names of seventy-four men who would shortly report for active duty in the armed forces. At the foot of the list was the name of Joseph E. Flemmings, followed by "Colored Inductee."

A TEMPLE CONGREGATION in Houston, Texas, recently passed a resolution barring from voting membership any Jew who practiced the dietary laws of orthodox Judaism, favored the perpetuation of Hebrew as a language, or belonged to any organization favoring Zionism. The congregation bears a Hebrew name, Beth Israel, which in English means "House of Israel."

FESTUNG EUROPA: A bomb exploded in a Norwegian printing shop where a German sympathizer was having a book printed. Fifteen innocent employees were slightly injured. The saboteurs sent each of them flowers. . . . In a raid on a large transformer station in Frederiksberg (Copenhagen) seven saboteurs disarmed the policemen on guard by emptying their revolvers and taking their ammunition. The ammunition, however, was returned to the policemen by post, according to promise.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Windeither clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

British Tories Look Ahead

BY MALLORY BROWNE

London, December 10

FOUR and a half years of total war have changed many things in England, including the Conservative Party itself. British Tories today are rallying in ever-greater numbers round a political program which would make the American New Deal—even the New Deal of the old days—look rather like diehard conservatism.

The Conservative Party has always considered itself the aggressive defender of tradition, but it has never denied that even tradition changes, and one can reasonably argue that the younger Conservatives have been quicker to grasp the political implications of the changes wrought by the war than their Labor opponents. Off the record the leaders of the Labor Party acknowledge that there has been a definite shift in the political outlook in the past few months—indeed, almost in the past few weeks. The political currents in England which until recently were flowing strongly leftward are no longer doing so, although it is too early to say that the main trend is now in the opposite direction.

One reason for Tory confidence, of course, is Winston Churchill himself. It is hard to beat the leader who can say, "I led you to victory in the war; follow me and win the peace." And Churchill is not only the head of the government; he is also the Conservative leader.

But there is another important reason for the British Conservatives' recovered prestige. It is their readiness to take a position as defenders of the new tradition, although the essence of this new tradition is not Conservatism at all but the social reform which Conservatism for so long resisted. With magnificent disregard of this fact the Conservatives are calling their new program "Forward—by the Right!" The slogan has been used as the title of a booklet issued recently by the Tory Reform Committee, which has caused a real stir in British politics.

What, then, is the Tory Reform Committee? It consists of a number of Conservative members of Parliament most of whom, though not all, belong to the group commonly referred to here as the "Young Tories." Originally formed in February, 1943, to encourage the government to take constructive action along the lines of the Beveridge plan for social security, the committee has since evolved into an organization with much more comprehensive objectives. When its members found that they were agreed as to the principles which they felt should govern the conduct of political affairs, they decided to produce a complete program of action.

In explaining why it issued its statement, the Tory Reform Committee makes a significant admission namely, that the ends which it seeks do not differ essentially from those of many of its Labor opponents:

The great material needs of human society are peace and an adequacy of the essentials of life for every human being. No political party can fail to reflect in its policy the overwhelming demand of the British people for those ends. There is some disposition today to think that this identity of ends destroys the significance of party politics. This is not so; the vital difference between parties has been . . . in the means by which these ends are to be achieved.

The reformers go still farther. They attack the right-wing diehard members of their own party in the following caustic sentence: "If there are still any Conservatives whose political ambition is to return to the conditions which existed between the wars, or who regard the party merely as a convenient organization for exposing the fallacies of socialism, they are today of small account."

Much of the sixteen-page pamphlet is, of course, mere election propaganda, designed to make Conservatism look as attractive as possible to people who are being wooed by the left as well as the right. But it contains some real contributions, of which perhaps the most important is an insistence on full employment.

The supreme test of parliamentary democracy will lie in its ability to reconcile planning for full employment with the liberty of the individual. . . . There is considerable agreement among economists that the demand for capital goods is the factor which determines the activity of trade, and this in turn depends upon the investment of savings. We therefore consider that the government must so influence or, if necessary, control the volume and timing of expenditure on capital goods as to insure an adequate demand for them at any time.

This emphasis on full employment acquires significance from signs that at least the younger Conservatives really mean it. During the debate on the King's speech at the opening of the new session of Parliament late in November, the Tory Reform Committee put down an amendment severely criticizing the government—which meant criticizing some of their own party leaders—because of the failure of the speech to include a practical program for giving effect to the government's rather vague assurances about full employment. Most Conservatives in Britain today realize that if they are to save the system of private profit, as they are determined to do, they must prevent another serious slump and largescale, long-term unemployment. The value of the Tory Reform Committee's recommendations is that they crystallize this realization into a concrete policy.

Here are some of the committee's views on other outstanding issues:

Removing the causes of war:

The interdependence of nations is economic as well as political. Restraint against aggression will in the long run be ineffective unless it is accompanied by constructive steps to remove the causes of dispute. The joint machinery of war must be adapted to the needs of peace. Organizations of the nature of the Middle East Supply Center should be continued. The International Labor Office and the Hague Court . . . should be revived.

Cooperation with America, Russia, and China:

The welfare of the human race will depend in the immediate post-war period on mutual cooperation and understanding between the British Commonwealth, the United States of America, the U. S. S. R., and the Republic of China. The final structure of any world organization must clearly be founded on an even broader basis than cooperation of this type.

Social security:

Social Security [must be] guaranteed by adequate minimum wages and a system of social insurance on the lines proposed by Sir William Beveridge. Such security implies a corresponding obligation on the part of individuals who are capable of so doing to contribute by their labor to the national wealth and the establishment of a preventive and curative health service to insure that the maximum number can so contribute.

Private property and freedom:

The freedom to vote secured by our parliamentary institutions is not of itself enough. It must be buttressed by an increasing measure of economic independence in the individual. For this reason we regard private property as indispensable to political freedom and consider that a widespread distribution of private property should be the aim of parliamentary government.

The importance of this Tory reform program lies in the fact that in addition to being a parliamentary election platform it gives a pretty fair preview of what post-war England is going to be like. "Forward—by the Right!" represents, it is true, only the left-wing of British Conservatism and has not yet received the indorsement of the party as a whole, but public opinion, as it will emerge from this war, will be at least as far to the left as the Young Tory reformers. Mr. Churchill, the party leader, is much too keen a politician not to realize this, and it can be taken for granted that the party will eventually adopt a program which will say the same thing in slightly different words.

But will the Conservatives carry out such a program? The answer is that they will probably be forced to do so, first by the growing strength of the reform movement within their ranks, and secondly in order to combat the increased strength of the Labor and Liberal opposition.

It seems more and more likely, therefore, that whoever occupies the White House in Washington after the war will find over here in Whitehall a nominally Conservative government ready to go at least as far to the left, in both domestic and international affairs, as the Roosevelt Democrats of the New Deal days.

John Longo and Frank Hague

BY MCALISTER COLEMAN

YEAR ago this month John Longo, twenty-nine-year-old crusader against the regime of Mayor Frank Hague of Jersey City, was brought up short by this headline in the Jersey Journal, mouthpiece for the Boss: "Longo Denies Tampering with Election Books." From bitter experience in his ten-year war with the Hague machine he realized immediately that Hague's henchmen were once more on his trail and hurried to consult his friend and comrade-in-arms, J. Owen Grundy. "They're after us again," exclaimed Grundy when he had read the story; "we've got to make the fight all over."

The anonymous writer for the Journal had said that William E. Sewall, Hudson County Supervisor of Elections, an appointee of Governor Edison, charged Longo with tampering with the permanent registration book of the 1941 Jersey primaries in order to change his registration from Republican to Democrat so that he could get a job from Edison. As Longo had seen no reporter from the Journal he had, of course, made no denial, nor did anyone around Sewall's office know about any charges. But there was evidently more to the piece than sheer malice. Its purpose must be to discredit Longo with the Governor and the headline-reading public and perhaps set in train some sort of court action.

Grundy busied himself with defensive plans as he had done so often in the past. From their days together in Lincoln High School he and Longo had been inseparable. It was Grundy who first interested the high-spirited, eloquent Italian youth in the strange ways of politics in their shabby water-front town. Owen would take Johnny along on frequent visits to Journal Square cafeterias, where the youngsters would listen for hours to muted talk about Hague's latest shenanigans. Owen was a great hand at collecting the writings of the politically heterodox, and he showed Johnny autographed books by Upton Sinclair, Lincoln Steffens, Norman Thomas, with all of whom he had corresponded. In this fashion Owen found escape from his meager home life with an invalid mother, behind their little delicatessen shop on a drab Jersey City street. He and Longo agreed that it was their duty to destroy Hague and Hagueism and that they would support any man or party—Socialist, Communist, Republican, Democratic—that would help them.

Longo had other than political motives for his deepseated detestation of the lean man in the City Hall. A devout Catholic, he was grieved to know that the evil reputation of the Catholic Mayor was hurting his church everywhere. He was shocked to see church dignitaries sitting on platforms behind the ranting Mayor, eagerly accepting his benefactions, openly campaigning for his reelection. Further, he resented the scornful attitude of the peat-bog élite of the City Hall toward the Italians of the town. "They think you are fit only for garbage collectors," he told his Italian American audiences.

In 1938, at the height of the C. I. O. civil-liberties campaign in Jersey City, Longo spoke against Hague over the radio—he was introduced as secretary of the Holy Name Society of his church, Our Lady of Sorrows—and the City Hall gang put him down for immediate punishment. Soon the brash youth was a prisoner in Hague's private Dachau—the unspeakable Secaucus Penitentiary. His crime? With magnificent irony he was convicted of election irregularities in Hudson County, conditions in which had just been described by a refreshingly honest election official in the following words:

We know it is futile to attempt to arrest anyone belonging to the Democratic organization in Hudson County on Election Day: the accuser usually finds himself in jail as the arrested party by the time he gets to the station house . . . the only way to have an honest election in Hudson County under present conditions is with the militia, and if the present conditions continue, it is futile and ridiculous for us to attempt to hold further elections in Hudson County.

From his cell Longo sent letters reaffirming his faith in his God and his mission, touchingly brave, naive letters which Grundy read aloud to sympathizers in the living-room behind the small shop, with curtains drawn against the spying of Hague's secret police. Grundy labored devotedly to free his friend, and it was largely through his one-man drive that Longo's sentence was shortened to seven months—seven months of physical and spiritual torture.

Alarming as were the implications of the Journal story, the two crusaders still felt that they were in a better position to defend themselves than they had been in 1938. There was an honest man in the Trenton State House, and a succession of deaths had enabled him to put anti-Hague men in the very citadels of Hudson County. To be sure, Governor Edison had time and again been let down shabbily by Washington. His suggestions for a candidate for a federal judgeship had recently been pointedly ignored by the President in favor of a Hague machine-tender. When Longo appeared before a Senate committee, headed by New Jersey's Senator Smathers, considering the qualifications of Hague's choice, the young man was mercilessly bullied. Smathers called him a "crackpot" and wanted to know why he was not in the army-a crippled foot had placed him in 4-F.

Longo's protest to Washington further enraged the City Hall gang, but nevertheless, with the Governor's backing, he was sworn in as deputy county clerk of Hudson County in the same courtroom from which he had been sent to Secaucus. Grundy had a post in the Superintendent of Elections office, and for a little space the position of the two fighters seemed secure.

But not for long. One day last April Grundy, in a state of sweating fear, burst into the Journal Square office of Raymond Chasan, lawyer for both men and for years their intimate friend, and said that he had been summoned to appear before the grand jury. He knew that it had to do with the story of Longo's changing the registration. Chasan tried to calm his excited client, urging him to repeat to the jury what Grundy had constantly asserted, namely, that he knew nothing of any such incident. Grundy returned in high fettle, rejoicing over what he took to be his victory in a verbal duel with Prosecutor Daniel O'Regan. However, in a few days the grand jury handed down indictments against both Grundy and Longo. When he heard the news, Grundy exclaimed, "This time they have indicted Longo and his Voltaire as well!"

Now an alarming change came over Grundy. The old crusading fire was quenched in him. He acted like a beaten man. He threw up his job with Sewall and was seen no more by the cafeteria philosophers. When visitors came to the little store he would call out to them, "They have struck me below the belt." He hinted at suicide. The gray men from the City Hall took to hanging around the Grundy store, and he was frequently seen in their company. In the court proceedings that followed he studiously avoided Longo, going around with the prosecutor's assistants, head hung low, "for all the world like van der Lubbe at the Reichstag-fire trial," said one observer.

On April 26, still apparently in a blind panic. Grundy went again to Chasan. Again the lawyer tried to reassure him, but Grundy turned on his heel and went out into the Square, where he was joined by . Hague lieutenant. An hour later Chasan's telephone rang. "What do you say about your young idealists now?" asked the reporter at the other end of the wire. "I thought you'd like to know that Grundy has just crawled into Judge Brown's chambers and confessed that he changed Johnny Longo's registration from Republican to Democratic. He says he did it because Longo told him to. He says he'll testify to this effect when the trial comes up."

Chasan was incredulous, but the next day, before

Mayor Hague

Judge Thomas H. Brown in the Court of Common Pleas. Grundy pleaded guilty to altering the records of the 1941 primaries at John Longo's order.

Chasan wanted the help of a trial lawyer, but it is not easy to find a Jersey City lawyer who will buck the Hague machine. Finally Julius Lichenstein consented to tackle the ungrateful job, asking only that he have time to study the case. Judge Brown, however, hurried the case to trial. Chasan and Lichenstein, on the ground that they were not ready for trial, refused to put in any defense for Longo. Grundy and five other employees in the office of the Superintendent of Elections swore to the altering of the registration book, Grundy testifying that he had made the change while Longo stood by, the others swearing that they had seen the two men poring over the book. The book itself was not produced; no physical evidence was brought into court. After brief deliberation a jury of seven women and five men found Longo guilty. "I feel as if I were in Berlin," exclaimed Longo as he was led away.

On June 2, 1943, Judge Brown sentenced Longo to a penitentiary term to run from eighteen months to three vears. A motion for a new trial was denied, and Longo was held under $2,000 bail. Grundy, under custody of the prosecutor, was not sentenced, and has not been sentenced at this writing, though the law provides that sentence must be pronounced within forty-four days after trial.

Only the men in the prosecutor's office know where Grundy is today, and they are not telling, though Governor Edison sent state troopers armed with warrants for the missing man all over the state immediately after the trial. The Governor, who said that the trial should cause the judiciary of the state "to hang their heads in shame," wanted Grundy to testify in an investigation of Sewall's office which he had started. But no one answers the door bell at the Grundy place, and neighbors say they have seen neither Owen nor his mother since the trial; the supposition is that Grundy is being kept outside the state until Edison leaves office on January 18. The story goes that Grundy was told he would have to take a long prison "rap"-if he did not testify against Longo and was promised draft deferment if he would turn against his friend.

Digging into the records of the case, Chasan, who had just begun to fight, came upon an item revealing that the prosecutor had informed the jury that a handwriting expert had examined the supposedly altered entry. This expert, when he was finally found by Chasan, said he had demonstrated to O'Regan that an alteration had indeed been made in the square opposite Longo's name in the registration book. The letters "Rep" had been erased, but in their place whoever did the tampering had written "Rep" once more. Evidently someone had blundered. Why were not this expert and the book on which he worked brought into court? To ask that question is to indicate an ignorance of the ways of Hudson County justice: it is the business of a prosecutor to convict those upon whom Hague has laid his long finger. A demand for a certificate of reasonable doubt on this fresh evidence having been denied by Judge Brown, Chasan brought the matter before Chief Justice Brogan of the New Jersey Supreme Court, who granted the right of appeal to his court.

In the meantime the Jersey City mobsters had been giving Longo the lumps. When he was in jail in Secaucus he was not allowed to wear the orthopedic shoes built for his crippled foot. Remembering the sufferings which prison shoes had caused him, Longo went to the Postgraduate Hospital in New York City soon after his second trial for an operation on his foot. He was immediately arrested as "a fugitive from justice," and a Jersey City cop was stationed at his bedside. His bail was forfeited. After he was brought back to New Jersey he was imprisoned for three weeks until his distracted mother raised $5,000 bail on the Longo store and home.

Grundy is not the only one who has deserted Longo in his hour of agony. The Communists, who at one time so completely surrounded him that he was identified with their cause by the Hague men, are content to deprecate mildly his persecution. When Longo came out of Secaucus, the comrades held a dinner in his honor at which Representative Vito Marcantonio, his lawyer at the time, spoke long and fulsomely. Today the Communist Party of New Jersey has no harsh words for Longo's persecutor. The unfortunate youth, they declare in a statement which is a masterpiece of euphemism. "has become the victim of a political feud between Mayor Frank Hague and Governor Charles A. Edison."

Very politely they call upon His Honor to release him, not only as a matter of simple justice but because "any other course will hamper, not advance, the cause of national unity."

Hagueism, say the Communists, is now really "a myth." To be sure, in the old days there were some dubious goings-on, but now everything has changed—like their line. They are frequently seen today in the company of Frank Eggers, Hague's nephew and heir apparent, who struts around Journal Square in the uniform of a reserve officer in the Coast Guard; it is said to have been upon the advice of the Communists that Eggers became the first prominent Jerseyite to indorse President Roosevelt for a fourth term. The Communists have suggested to Eggers that he explain to Uncle Frank, who is now basking in the Florida sunshine, that all is sweetness and light between the Hague machine and those whom the Mayor used to call "them goddam Commoonists."

Some decent elements in Jersey are still sticking to Longo. The state's textile workers (C. I. O.) have pledged support through their executive committee. The State Federation of Teachers (A. F. of L.) at a recent convention passed a resolution denouncing what Chasan has called "the worst political frame-up in the history of Jersey." The Jersey City Affairs Committee, headed by the redoubtable James E. Pope, has been active in Longo's behalf, and over the river PM has done a yeoman's job on the case.

The Longo affair, with its Dostoevski coloring of cowardice and betrayal, and with its shining courage as well, is in danger of being submerged beneath larger national and international issues. It seems to some, however, to test all our liberal integrity. Some years ago, when Frank Murphy was Attorney General, a Civil Liberties Division was set up in the United States Department of Justice. Agents of the division came to Jersey City to investigate a mountain of charges against the Hague gang but departed after an ignominious failure to accomplish anything. Now Attorney General Biddle is being urged to investigate not only the Longo case but a number of others involving Hague. What will Biddle do about the evil activities of the vice-chairman of the Democratic National Committee, the most corrupt character in our public life today? Will he continue the Administration's policy of appeasing Hague so as to keep New Jersey in the Democratic column? The futility of this craven attitude has already been shown. At the last gubernatorial election thousands of disillusioned liberals voted for a spavined Republican wheel-horse in preference to a labor candidate on the Democratic ticket who had received the Judas kiss of Hague. The Democrats have lost New Jersey by default and have nothing more to lose by stopping Hague. It is a strange situation when an appeal for simple justice has to be couched in such horse-trading terms.

25 Years Ago in "The Nation"

RECENT VIENNA DISPATCH says that the various nationalities "appear unwilling to wait for the peace conference, thinking that what they are able to grab now they will be able to keep." If Mid-Europe is not to unscramble itself into a worse than Balkan chaos the Allies must act quickly, and must let it be clearly understood that the occupation of territory under orders of the Supreme Allied Council does not mean the ultimate determination of boundaries.

—December 7, 1918.

IT IS GRATIFYING TO KNOW that, up to the present moment, the necessarily limited operations of the Shake-speare Playhouse have met with substantial favor and support. In the present degenerate condition of the theater, which is largely abandoned to purely commercial, ephemeral, frivolous, or demoralizing entertainments, any movement calculated to foster in the rising generation a knowledge and appreciation of the great masterpieces of the literary drama is of the greatest public interest and importance.—December 14, 1918.

IN REPLY TO THE NOTE received from the French government on November 15, announcing that France would not recognize the government in Finland which was headed by a king chosen from a nation at war with France, the Finnish Minister for Foreign Affairs has denied that the choice of a king was dictated by Germany. Prince Karl, according to the statement of the Minister, was offered the throne voluntarily with no nomination from Germany. "International law," the Minister concludes, "knows no stipulation which prevents neutral states from selecting a dynasty from a belligerent nation."—December 14, 1918.

THE LABOR UNIONS ARE APPARENTLY beginning a definite campaign to oust women from war-time positions, and the government, through the Labor Department and the War Labor Board, appears to be concurring. The secretary of the American Federation of Labor talks of the "problems of disposing of women in overalls and in uniform." "Woman's place is not on the street car," says W. D. Mahon, national president of the Carmen's Union.—December 21, 1918.

IT IS PLEASANT TO READ of the flattering reception which Mr. Wilson has met with in France, and of the favorable impression which his early public utterances have made. It would be an immense relief if the country might also know that the outlook was bright for a harmonious peace conference, and that the broad principles of justice which Mr. Wilson has repeatedly phrased would be frankly and unhesitatingly adhered to.—December 21, 1918.

EVERY FARMER KNOWS today the price at which he can sell his wheat next summer. This explains why he has planted the largest acreage ever devoted to winter wheat. Not so the industrial manager, however. He is confronted with the problems of a falling market and a high labor cost which will not come down until living costs have been reduced.—WILLIAM JUSTIS BOIES, December 28, 1918.

"Liberated" Italy

BY GAETANO SALVEMINI

USSOLINI is the Nazi rubber stamp in "occupied" Italy. King Victor Emmanuel is the Anglo-Saxon rubber stamp in "liberated" Italy. "Victor Emmanuel," said the correspondent of the New York Times on October 12, "is the king, but the power behind his throne is the Allied Mission, and as things are shaping now, it is still going to be behind the throne when Victor Emmanuel is again king of Italy in Rome." In its turn the Allied Mission carries out orders coming from London and Washington through Algiers. The Algiers correspondent of the Times cabled on November 28 that "as long as the Allies will let him," the King will "cling to his throne," but that the last word "is after all more up to Washington and London than to the Allied authorities in Italy and here [Algiers]." If one keeps this basic fact in mind, one is in a position to understand the events which are taking shape in Italy.

In November, when he still hoped to arrange some compromise with the Committee of National Liberation in Naples, Badoglio made the following promise: "As far as I am concerned, once we reach Rome I shall be delighted to rid myself of my heavy burden." But the possibility of compromise was wrecked by the committee's stubborn demand that the King and his son should be removed. On December 5, therefore, Badoglio altered his plans. He told the United Press that he would resign only when "all Nazis are expelled from the last inch of Italian territory." A thousand years ago an astrologer promised the King of Egypt that he would teach a goat how to speak, but he gave himself ten years in which to do the job; during those ten years he was sure that the King or the goat or he himself would die. Pending the day when the Germans have been driven from the last inch of Italian territory, the Italian soldiers and officers who were forming volunteer units under Allied command were disbanded. The Italian war of liberation is to be fought under the King's shadow and not otherwise. The red, white, and green emblem of Italian nationhood has vanished; only the emblem of the royal house survives. The soldiers' uniform has "the cross of Savoy over the left breast pocket." "All vehicles are also marked with the cross of King Victor Emmanuel's house." This Badoglio and the Allied Mission have decreed.

On December 6, three months after the "unconditional surrender" of September 8, the first unit of Italian soldiers was used against the German lines. Most of them were massacred. As the New York Herald Tribune reported, "that gallant, pathetic drive could have ended only in slaughter." The King needed some hundreds of dead to demonstrate his prestige. He got them. Until September 8, 1943, the Italians had to fight against the Allies for Hitler and Mussolini. Now they have to fight against the Germans for the King and Badoglio. They will never, it seems, be permitted to fight for an Italy belonging to themselves.

ine

On December 5 Badoglio announced that when military operations have been completed, the "entire nation" will not "decide" what shall be the ultimate solution of the constitutional problem but will merely "participate" in the solution. "The government would establish a constituent assembly of the two chambers which would express the people's feelings on the form of government they want." The "constituent assembly" would thus not be "elected by the people." It would be set up by the government and would consist of "two chambers"—that is, the Senate, whose present members, except for some decrepit bigwigs, were all appointed by the King on Mussolini's nomination and may be multiplied indefinitely at the King's discretion, and a lower house which Badoglio took care not to describe. On this, as on all points, the King and Badoglio-which means the powers in Algiers, London, and Washington that are behind the throne-will have the last word.

American and British authorities seem to be much concerned with the political opinions of the southern Italian peasantry. The New York Times Algiers correspondent told us on November 28 that "the southern Italian peasants, as against the more industrialized northern workers, are much more likely to be moved by appeals for King Victor Emmanuel than many people in the Allied world would like. And this feeling simply cannot be wholly ignored." If the southern Italian peasant should want to become the owner of the land he cultivates with the sweat of his brow, his desire might disturb the peace of mind of the Duke of Wellington, who owns a large estate at Bronte in Sicily and is a high official in the AMG there; in such an instance the feeling of the peasant would be ignored. Nor are the feelings of the workers of northern and central Italy, who are known not to want to have anything to do with royalty, to be considered. The only feeling which is to be taken into account is the alleged sentiment of the southern Italian peasants for the King-although how that sentiment has been tested we are not told. This punctilious regard for the "untrammeled sovereignty" of the southern Italian peasantry is moving in the highest degree.

On December 5 Badoglio also warned the Italians that until the Germans are driven out, "politics must take a back seat." He fully agrees with Colonel E. E. Hume, American military governor of the Naples area, who told the members of the Committee of National Liberation that "political rivalries must not interfere with the Italian war effort." "No politics, no politics," repeats General Alexander, the British head of the AMG. What to these men mean by "politics" and "political rivalries"?

A new party has been created in "liberated" Italy, a so-called "Blue Party," which supports the royal house and consists of "aristocrats and highly placed army and navy officers." The genesis of this movement is interesting. In 1911 a Nationalist Party was formed in Italy. It was monarchist, militarist, aristocratic, anti-parliamentarian, protectionist, and it favored an alliance between state and church. It was the party of the general staff of the army and navy and of big business. From 1920 to 1922 it favored the Fascist movement, though it remained apart from it. The Fascists wore black shirts; the Nationalists blue shirts. In 1923 the two parties merged. Mussolini's domestic and foreign policy from 1923 on was little more than the original Nationalist program. Now that the Fascist Party has been discredited by all kinds of disaster, the old Nationalist Party, renamed the Blue Party, has been revived under the wings of the AMG.

If we are to believe people in Naples, police and soldiers act as agents of the movement. The Times reported on November 29:

Much of the poster-erecting is being done by carabinieti, sometimes in civilian clothes, at the orders of the military. . . . A Communist leader saw a youth putting up signs and remonstrated with him. Immediately four men came up—one in a soldier's uniform—and threatened to beat him if he did not go away immediately, the Communist said.

These activities do not seem to be regarded as "political rivalries" interfering with the war effort; nor do the exploits of army and navy officers who smash the presses of newspapers which refuse to "fall into line," or the threats of other well-meaning persons to beat and kill known anti-Fascists and to burn their houses.

The only people who play "politics" and indulge in "political rivalries" likely to interfere with the war effort are those who do not swallow whole the policies of Badoglio and the AMG. This is why, on December 11, a meeting of students of the University of Naples was broken up by the police. "Rocks were tossed at the police, who fired over the heads of about 300 students. . . . Armed guards have been stationed around the university." The AMG made an investigation and announced that it "may take action against Adolfo Omodeo, rector of the university, who has ignored three summons by public-security officers of AMG who intended to warn him against political activity at the university." The Associated Press, which gave this information, added that the students had called another meeting for Saturday, December 18, but that police officials said the meeting would be broken up "in an even more vigorous manner, if it [were] held without authorization." It is not difficult to believe that "the police are under the direction of two Fascist-appointed officials who have not been removed by the Allies."

Small wonder that the Italians, as the Associated Press reported in another dispatch, are persuaded that Fascism is being reinstated in southern Italy.

Italians place part of the blame for current trends in Italy upon the occupying authorities. Many say that the British are determined to save the House of Savoy for dynastic reasons and that the Americans favor the continuance of a sort of fascism for the present as a bulwark against communism. Italian democrats also hold that the lack of civil liberties under the occupation is preventing the natural development of a representative government because there are no public assemblies or newspapers in which respective groups can reach the public with their ideas.

The students' meeting did not take place on December 18, but "at the last moment" permission was granted for a mass-meeting on December 19. Five thousand people demanded the immediate abdication of the King. "The tone of the meeting was anti-monarchist in the strict sense. The majority did not want even a regency," the Times reported on December 20. The AMG judged that the handling of that political rally was "tactless." As a consequence, according to the Herald Tribune of December 23, the AMG refused to permit a meeting of delegates of committees of National Liberation from the whole of "liberated" Italy.

Fortunately the "power behind the throne" is endowed with a magnificent sense of humor. The latest news is to the effect that Sicily, Sardinia, and a large section of the mainland will be placed under the King's men, but the administration will be intrusted to "men of good faith with Allied sympathies." Moreover, the Allied Mission will "be instructed to follow the Moscow declaration regarding Italy, in which the Allies said Fascism must be destroyed and Italians given the opportunity to set up a democratic system with freedom of the press, freedom of worship, and freedom of assembly."

However, on December 19 the Associated Press reported from Algiers that according to Colonel Hume "the AMG's task in Italy is not to squash Fascism but to defeat Germany." The Moscow conference was being playful when it announced that "Fascism and all its evil influences and configurations shall be utterly destroyed." The AMG's task in Italy is not only to defeat Germany. It is to preserve as much Fascism as possible in Italy.

[This is the third of a series of articles by Dr. Salvemini on current Italian political developments.]

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

IN war time, when millions of men are mobilized, few children are born. The Nazis don't like that. They aspire not only to more living space for their people but to more people for their living space. A propaganda campaign to raise the birth rate is under way, and in the Nationalsozialistische Monatshefte for November Dr. Elisabeth Acterberg-von Puch gives instructions to the propagandists. Above all, women are to be warned against the "false friends and foolish relatives" who advise them not to become pregnant during the war. They must be made to realize that "bringing up war-time children ranks among the most important tasks in the total war effort," and that it is the duty of every German woman "to present children to the nation unreservedly and unconditionally, for the sole reason that children are needed." A certain reluctance seems to be shown by some men, especially men on leave from the front. "I simply cannot understand two people," says the Frau Doktor, "who are unwilling to have more children because the husband may not survive. Precisely for that reason a woman with sound feelings should want to have as many children by him as possible." She goes on to point out the many benefits received by expectant mothers. They are given an additional clothing card and larger food rations, and in cases of a "second or third war-time pregnancy usually get the food rations allowed to invalids, which very few persons can obtain."

It cannot be ascertained whether propaganda of this kind is filling German nurseries, those anterooms to barracks. In any case that is the Germans' affair. Unfortunately, other people are affected by a project which the S. S. and the Gestapo have inaugurated in Norway.

This is one of the most repulsive schemes that the Nazi race maniacs ever thought up. An organization with the romantic name of "Well of Life" has been created to deal with the children born of German soldiers and Norwegian women. Its methods have been described by the author of the plan, the notorious Gestapo general and S. S. leader Wilhelm Rediess, in a confidential memorandum entitled "Sword and Cradle: The S. S. Works for a Greater Germany." Excerpts from this "inhuman document" were published by the Stockholm Dagens Nybeter on December 12.

The General finds German-Norwegian children "racially" very satisfactory and wishes to further their procreation. "German soldiers," he says, "should beget as many children as possible with Norwegian mothers, irrespective of marriage." The task of the "Well of Life" is to steal the children from the Norwegian mothers and acquire them for Germany.

As the first step in the procedure, a soldier is seldom allowed to marry a girl whom he has made pregnant. It has become apparent, says the General, that most Norwegians correspond to the "Germanic-Viking ideal" only physically. Spiritually they betray "Anglo-Saxon or parlor Bolshevik" traits. That is no proper alliance for a German soldier. "A German soldier's right to marry a Norwegian girl depends not only on her Nordic appearance but even more on her own and her family's political views."

The children, however, once they have been separated from their mothers and relatives, are desirable booty. The "Well of Life," therefore, takes control of the expectant mothers. Every Norwegian woman in whom a seed of the precious German stock is sprouting is sent to a "home" and kept there until her child is born. Then she is put out. And now the last act unfolds. Is she allowed to take her baby with her? Does it belong to her? No, indeed. Since she is unmarried and since the child has German blood in its veins, it belongs to her only if it is officially awarded to her. The court of appeal is nominally the Norwegian Department of Justice, but actually the department must consult the Well of Life. "Consequently the decision is entirely in German hands." And in most cases it is negative. Most Norwegian mothers are not sufficiently "reliable" to be allowed to bring up scions of the valuable German stock. What is done, then, with the children? On this point the General is somewhat obscure. "The best solution for the child," he declares, "would be to have it brought up in Germany by a German family." At present there seems to be no fixed rule about this. Most of the children are apparently still in the homes from which their mothers have been dismissed.

The memorandum emphasizes that "the German soldier must be spared all mental worries." For that reason he is not only relieved of all expense but guaranteed the strictest secrecy. The Well of Life has an iron rule that no one in Germany shall ever hear that a German soldier has had a child in Norway—not his family, nor his peace-time employer, nor any civilian official.

The net profit of the whole proceedings, according to the General's figures, has been about 2,000 Nordic babies in two years. That is a mere nothing compared with the German population and birth rate. Even a Nazi should see that such a piddling reward makes it scarcely worth while for the nation to incur the odium of this baby stealing, with its revolting mock legality and rabbit-breeding psychology. In all matters connected with race mythology, however, Nazis are completely crazy.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Guides to America South

THE NEW WORLD GUIDES TO THE LATIN AMERI-CAN REPUBLICS. Sponsored by the Office of the United States Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs. Earl Parker Hanson, Editor-in-chief. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. Two Volumes. $2.50 each.

T IS now going on 450 years since the discovery of America, and we have not yet had a good guidebook to the oldest and most historic parts of the hemisphere. Baedeker and Muirhead tried their hand at the United States as long ago as 1893, and later added "Excursions to Mexico, Cuba, Porto Rico, and Alaska"; but the New World was problem outside their experience, a problem not of mere research but of discovery-extracting secrets from a wilderness and memories from the Chamber of Commerce. T. Philip Terry, appreciating the Baedeker format, produced a "Guide to Mexico" which in everything but historical accuracy was excellent in 1909, though now it is so out of touch with reality as to be silly. The Touring Club Italiano, grappling with "Argentina, Paraguay, Uruguay" was rather more successful than Baedeker, though it too presented an America blemished by vast empty spaces. On the whole, the most useful attempt has been the sober, restricted, but dependable British "South American Handbook," which, besides such advice as that "consistent with moderation in the quantity of their baggage, lady passengers are well advised to take new and becoming clothes," has given us annually for twenty years the important facts about transportation, hotels, banks, government, and living conditions in the principal cities. Meanwhile North American travel in Mexico has resulted in a group of motorists' and tourists' guides which emphasize the life and culture of the living country, such a those of Anita Brenner and Frances Toor, Anything like the thoroughness, the breadth, and the dependability of the European Baedeker, however, has been quite unknown.

When, therefore, the Office of the United States Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs announced a pair of guidebooks to the other American republics, it was good news. We hoped for real travelers' guides, the kind made to be carried in the pocket, crammed with the information one wants at every street corner of a city like Lima. But if it should be melibrary-table guide—like the WPA "Washington, City and Capital"—one would hardly complain, for there is no such reference book for any part of Latin America.

What we have been given is two respectable volumes with no general index. To any connoisseur of guidebooks this in itself is inconceivable: the index is the heart of a guidebook, almost more valuable than the text; it is the logical outline of the merely geographical material of the text. But in the "New World Guides" one cannot find even the different countries except by flipping through the pages. Apparently the general index was sacrificed to a plan of binding up the different countries separately, so that each country is paged individually. As a result, though there is a brief index to each country, there is no way of finding out, for instance, in which country Santiago del Estero is located.

Nor can you find out from any general map. This guidebook furnishes one map for each country, regardless of size, and a plan of one or two cities-or merely their central section—in each country. The only maps of the whole territory are the end-papers, pitifully inadequate, and in the case of South America, hardly visible. There are no regional mapsto show the Valley of Mexico, for instance, or how Paraguay, Uruguay, and the Argentine fit together. It is rather striking to compare this with the thirty-three maps and forty-eight plans of the 1909 Baedeker, Furthermore, the maps of the countries themselves are as simplified as fourth-grade geography charts, and a good deal less interesting, showing only the outline of the country, a few cities, the main railways, and the most imposing paved roads. Elevation, which gives the whole meaning to South American geography, is not indicated at all. When you get down to looking for a certain monastery on the outskirts of Guatemala City, you realize that you might as well chuck the book out the window and ask the chambermaid.

In fact, the editors advise something of the kind. If addresses are lacking, the "taxi service," they assure you, "is usually excellent, and the general rule is that a taxi driver can take the visitor to any point much more easily if the point is merely named." An essay on maps urges the traveler to "provide himself with the best available maps of the countries visited," and a half-page on the "Travel Agent" disposes of all other problems. But does one buy a guide-book in order to be advised to take a taxi or consult a travel agency? The fact that new roads are being built does not really seem a valid reason for not indicating those that exist; it means rather that a guidebook must be thought of as a serial publication, constantly revised. Unless it includes current information, a guide is not worth its weight in travel.

These are not meant as carping criticisms but to indicate what we can expect of a guidebook. Certainly it ought to give accurately the facts which will answer a traveler's questions about a place, arranged so that they can be found easily. The editors of this publication had aimed higher, promising to present the republics "as nations, rather than as collections of sights and points of interest"; but I am not sure that the traveler or the reader gains by trying to see the nation without seeing its street corners, country roads, historic ruins, Chamber of Deputies, and federal penitentiary. As far as finding the information goes, I could not discover in half an hour's search where the national government of Ecuador is housed; I did finally find a paragraph describing its organization (under History), but there was no subtitle to attract the eye, nor was it listed in the index for Ecuador. Under these circumstances it is hard to see or deal with Ecuador as a nation. The basic difficulty lies, perhaps, in a lack of sympathy for the character of a guidebook, which should supply the material for understanding a country rather than itself undertake to explain it.

This misconception seems particularly unhappy since in the United States in the past decade we have worked out an exciting formula for the American guidebook. There seems no reason why the concept, the method, and the experience of the WPA regional guides should not be adapted to Latin America. In other republics, as here, it is the evanescent and forgotten evidences of the past, the still uncatalogued traditions, the deserts that remember explorers and pioneers, the creative present, which cries out to be recorded. Such a task cannot be done by so few people sitting at their desks so far from the places concerned. Isn't it another case where we might have let the Latin Americans themselves contribute? The Office of the Coordinator seems to have missed a signal opportunity for cooperative effort among the Americas. And we still need some good guidebooks to Latin America.

ELIZABETH WILDER

Vansittart's Obsession

LESSONS OF MY LIFE. By the Right Honorable Lord Vansittart. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

MONG the many problems waiting for a solution in our unhappy epoch, the question why Lord Vansittart has become our modern Cato, crying that Carthage must be destroyed, is perhaps not the most important. If, however, you are intrigued by the question, you have a chance of finding a tolerably plausible answer for it in Vansittart's most recent book, an autobiographical and truly self-revealing elaboration of his one theme.

Vansittart, you may remember, was permanent Under Secretary of the British Foreign Office during most of the inter-war period. During those years he was forced to watch the stupidities of the policy of appeasement at close range. His position was so high that he knew the most intimate secrets of the international game, but not high enough for him to be able to change the course of the fateful diplomacy by a hair's breadth. He possesses a kind of simple honesty which reacted strongly against the duplicities of diplomats; and he has certain narrow-range gifts of political realism which enabled him to understand and to discount the pacifist illusions on the left and the confusion created on the right by class interest. His political realism has the narrow range of a high-class civil servant who has never achieved a truly statesmanlike perspective of the European or world scene.

He saw with growing horror the rise of German Nazism, the blindness of European statesmen to its true meaning, and its consequent impunity while it prepared for its work of destruction in the full sight of the world. All this filled him with a sense of impotent rage. When he was finally able to speak freely, he had become the slave of an obsession. He himself confesses: "All my life political expression has been barred to me. After forty years of silence, broken only by rejected memoranda, I find the lawn of language thrown open. None must therefore blame a young sexagenarian alarge if he sometimes kicks up his heels on being turned out to grass." His obsession is the belief that no one has fully fathomed the depths of iniquity in the German character.

The obsession is so engrossing that it does not even permit him to state a full program of international policy for dealing with Germany. He believes that there are "four prerequisites" for peace-"the defeat, demilitarization, occupation, and reeducation of Germany." But he does not spend a page of his volume to explain what this program would mean in detail. We do gather that demilitarization also involves deindustrialization; but he has no suggestion as to how this is to be brought about. Nor does he seem aware of any pedagogical difficulties in the task of forcible reeducation. He has some appreciation of the static corruption of Europe, particularly of France, which was the foil of the dynamic corruption of Nazism. He believes, for instance, that Laval was in the pay of both Italy and Germany as early as 1935 and adduces some evidence for his belief. Some of his best pages are devoted to a description of this unsavory character; but he does not bother to explore the full implications of the authority of Laval and men of his kind in France during the years between wars.

The pacifist illusions of the left which contributed to the rise of Hitlerism and the fateful concurrence between this kind of idealism and the even more ignoble stupidities of the right are dealt with caustically in passing; and Vansittart has a great fear that neither right nor left has been cured of political blindness. But he never rises to an analysis of the cause of these stupidities either in our culture or in our political history. He has no perspective which would allow him to view the total anarchy of European civilization-or world civilization for that matter-and to discuss the German problem from that point of view. Even if Germany were the congenital gangster which it is according to his thesis, and even if every distinction between German and Nazi were as illegitimate as he thinks, it would still be important to contrive a strong international policy to hold such a gangster in check and to guarantee his impotence.

There is no suggestion in Vansittart's thought that there are any inherent difficulties in the achievement of such international action. One would imagine that nothing but a guileless underestimate of German villainy caused the failure of the post-Versailles years; and that a new and more universal certainty about the abysmal depths of evil in German character would be sufficient to produce a wise statesmanship and an adequate foreign policy after this war. It is necessary merely to mention one of our immediate problems to gauge the limits of Vansittart's thought—the problem of the relations of Russia to the Western world. If Russia and the Western nations do not find a solid basis for post-war cooperation it is quite possible that the military and predatory tradition of Germany will not be broken and that all Vansittart's dire forebodings may be fulfilled. But not a single facet of the vexing problem of Anglo-Russian relations is illumined by Vansittart's obsession, and no issue is brought nearer solution by his myopic view of German character.

One records these obvious defects with the more regret because Vansittart periodically reveals capacities for political understanding which might have served our generation well if they had not been engulfed in his obsession.

It is neither possible nor profitable to follow all of Vansittart's biased estimates of German character, politics, and culture. The tragedy of Germany's political and moral failure is so great that it has certainly not yet been fully fathomed. But Vansittart's indictments have the quality of angry barking rather than of a considered effort to measure the full meaning of this failure.

His analysis of German culture brings his whole method to a height of absurdity. For some reason which he does not explain he can find only three names in the history of German culture which merit respect—Kant, Goethe, and Beethoven. He robs the Germans of credit for the latter by calling him van Beethoven and glories in the fact that both Kant and Goethe criticized their fellow-countrymen. All the rest seem to be involved in the same mass of perdition. As a pious Catholic he does not rate the French enlightenment very high, but he is certain that its deficiencies were derived from German thought. He explains the anti-Christian character of Nazism thus: "Luther and Bismarck assailed the Catholic church; now all churches are assailed."

The real fact is that in dealing with cultural problems the author is completely out of his depth and becomes even more absurd than in his discussion of political history. Vansittart is something of a poet, and his text is studded with literary allusions from many sources. Sometimes they are apt and sometimes they are banal. It may be significant of something or other that he feels it necessary to bring a maliciously accurate description of Laval to a close with the quotation:

Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates and men decay.
REINHOLD NIEBUHR

St. Paul and the New Faith

THE APOSTLE. By Sholem Asch. Translated by Maurice Samuel. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.

N HIS brief moving epilogue to the present book the Lauthor thanks the Creator for the strength given him to "withstand all temptations and overcome all obstacles, those of my own making and those made by others," a strength enabling him to complete the two monumental novels "The Nazarene" and "The Apostle," together covering more than fifteen hundred crowded pages and dealing with one of the most gratifying if most difficult topics of literature—the genesis of Christianity. To what sort of "temptations" and "obstacles" does the author refer? In order to guess what he means by these vague allusions, one has to remember that Asch is a Yiddish writer, reared in the traditions of orthodox Jewry. Small wonder, then, that a profound change of mind had to precede his nostalgic literary rediscovery of Jesus and Paul, and that he could safely expect his unique magnum opus to be received as a "stumbling-block" by certain sections of Jewry and as a "foolishness" by certain Christians, to use the words applied by Paul to his own teaching of the new faith.

Were the books to appear in Germany, the so-called Deutsche Christen would resent strongly the author's "Judaization" of Jesus, who they assert was an "Aryan." Since they cannot very well bestow the privilege of "Aryan" descent upon the Pharisee Saul, whose story is less shrouded in mysteries than that of his master, they reject him as "Rabbi Saul," who had falsified the Aryan doctrines of Jews. For the Nazi hotspurs, of course, the whole of Christianity is just a "Jewish swindle." In the democratic world many Chris-

2

ALFRED·A·KNOPF FELLOWSHIPS

will be available for 1944

学不是

One award of $2,500 in the field of HISTORY and another of the same amount in the field of BIOGRAPHY

for the purpose of assisting talented writers to complete well planned but as yet unfinished books

7-72

A brochure, describing in full the terms of the awards and the requirements for applicants, is available on written request to tians consider the Yiddish poet's work a step toward their ultimate goal—the conversion of the Jews to Christianity. Orthodox Jewry, therefore, finds itself in a difficult position, facing as it does Asch's endeavors to restore the founders of Christianity to the Hebrew race.

A. L. F. R. E. D. · A. · K. N. O. P. F.

501 Madison Avenue · N. Y. 22

BANGANGANA KANDAN

Beyond the orthodox and the Christ-seeking wing of Jewry stands Professor Joseph Klausner of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, who, first in "Jesus of Nazareth" and lately in "From Jesus to Paul," sought to clarify the scene and point out the affinities of, as well as the differences between, Judaism and Christianity. To judge by Klausner's book, Asch seems to be justified when he portrays Jesusor Yeshua, as he calls him, by the Hebrew name-as an orthodox Jew who, while he considered himself to be the Messiah and expected to bring redemption to Israel, "never intended to found a new religion and spread it among the Gentiles." But the present novel, purporting to be a historical novel and not the product of unlimited imagination, somewhat distorts the real portrait of the propagandist and systematizer of Christianity. Asch emphasizes too strongly the Jewishness of Paul. Actually, this man from Asia Minor, this Roman citizen, whose soul from the beginning was torn between Pharisaism and Hellenism, was at most a denationalized Jew, and he was, to quote Klausner, the "real founder of Christianity as a new religion and a new church after it had been in existence for some time as I Jewish sect and Israelite congregation"; thus, for instance, it hardly makes sense to let Paul, the proclaimer of the idea of the Trinity, die with "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is one"—the Jewish confession of faith—on his lips.

The fact that these aberrations struck this reviewer and that he could not overlook them as merely the expression of licentia poetica indicates that Asch's work has, in a way, much in common with a religious tract, even though in a more superficial sense it is written along the lines of a novel. Obviously the tendency to set forth "the merit of Israel, whom Thou hast elected to bring the light of the faith to the nations of the world, for Thy glory and out of Thy love of mankind" hampered the artist Asch, who does not here live up to his great reputation as a creator of lifelike characters. The book contains magnificent pageants of the ancient world, striking vistas of Jerusalem, Antioch, Ephesus, Athens, Corinth, and Rome, minute descriptions of Jewish religious life and of the glamour and sickness of the decadent Gentile society. Yet the author fails to make us grasp the enigmatic soul of the epileptic tentmaker who started as a persecutor of the Christians and ended as one who brought the tidings of the Messiah to the Gentiles. While a few figures are well portrayed, most personages walk through the book like marionettes rather than like human beings of flesh and blood. There are a few unforgettable scenes, like the stoning of Reb Istephan (St. Stephen) or Paul's dispute with Seneca, where the author proves himself in full possession of his dramatic talents, but in general the book reminds us of a precious old Gobelin showing scenes in striking color but with the figures stiff and the vistas lacking perspective

Everything is fully, too fully, described. There is little of the humor, of the subtle implications, that carry the reader through Thomas Mann's lengthy Biblical novels. The frequent hair-splitting theological discussions prove the author's erudition but make hard reading. As a lofty message to Christians and Jews, stressing the high ideals of brotherhood and exhibiting the spiritual ties that bind the Christian to the Jew, "The Apostle" is of extreme value. But as a work of art it is inferior to "The Nazarene," and both novels appear somewhat anemic when compared with the author's brilliant and genuine characterization of Jewish life in "Three Cities."

Jefferson as Philosopher

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THOMAS JEFFERSON, By Adrienne Koch. Columbia University Press. $2.50.

FROM any point of view this small volume with its simple and alluring title is published by the University Press as a Columbia Study in American Culture, but it is unsatisfactory as a scholarly treatment of its theme. It is also an unexpectedly slim and attractive book which does not resemble a thesis, but it fails to live up to its enticing exterior and intellectual promise.

The author, I have no doubt, has taken great pains in her search through the mass of Jefferson's letters and papers; she has read the right secondary works. But she has neither organized the results of her inquiry nor developed a communicative interest in them. Much of her book is a paraphrase of what we are about to read in Jefferson's own words or a repetition of what we already know from the same source. She understands what her author says and tells us that this or that feature of his thought is very important; yet lacking as is every chapter in both conception and construction, nothing is salient, and nearly all portions remain on the same level of unillumined fact.

As she recognizes in her preface, her thesis that Jefferson had a genuine philosophical mind has to be established in the teeth of the contrary opinion now prevalent. Professor Chinard of Princeton is the chief upholder of this opinion, based on a lifelong study of Jefferson's writings. One may incline to agree with Miss Koch and disagree with Mr. Chinard, and yet be forced to admit that a Galahad setting out to vanquish the champion of the old order must have better weapons than purity of heart. Miss Koch, I think, found enough to defend her side but spoiled it by her use. On one point only she exhibits the necessary powers of exposition and argument, and that is on the question of Jefferson's materialism. Bolstered up by Picavet's great study of the "Idéologues," as well as by Jefferson's own words, she sets in its true critical light the nature of the Jeffersonian attempt to combine theism and materialism. Her pages 94 to 104 are very good and constitute a model neglected in the rest of the book.

Considered as a restatement for the general reader—since much of the book is not an addition to but a rehandling of known facts—the work fails even more conspicuously. Given her theme, what can justify making the reader go through ninety pages, comprising nine chapters, before he reaches a tenth entitled Jefferson's Philosophical Beliefs? Then, the discussion of the French system of ideology is in a perpetual cart-before-the-horse relation to Jefferson, the writer being unable to keep apart chronological and topical treatments even in a single paragraph. How excuse, moreover, the utterly inadequate and pointless chapter on Education, three pages long? One would suppose that Jefferson's views on the subject were casual or insignificant, but one is told the opposite, and bits crop up in a dozen alien contexts throughout the book.

The fact that scarcely any of the chapter headings corresponds to the substance presented, or really subdivides it on a rational plan, argues inadequate guidance on the part of the writer's academic advisers. This hypothesis is confirmed by the recurrent lack of precision in the use of English words and the excessive number of misprints in proper names, Latin quotations, and French accents. Assuming the lack of such supervision as every beginner is entitled to, the author of this book should not be too downcast by the shortcomings of her first publication. We all have initial fumbles to deplore, which we can retrieve only by learning from those who object—unfortunately, in public.

JACQUES BARZUN

Film Notes

ADAME CURIE" enlists an unusual amount of competence, patience, and commercialized sincerity in the production, which rather saddens than angers or pleases me, of the screen equivalent to Harpers' Prize "literature": safe, smooth, respectable, an epitome of all that the bourgeois likes what he calls his art to be. One could use it as a model of all that is most to be regretted in Hollywood at this stage, and I had thought I might. I suggest, instead, that you look up, in a recent issue of Life, two photographs: one of Pierre Curie and his brother and their parents, the other of Walter Pidgeon and three colleagues, representing them. Between them, those two pictures will tell you more than enough.

"Higher and Higher," which introduces Frank Sinatra to the screen, is one for the museums; nor is that just a crack. Sinatra adds to his more famous advantages that of being, obviously, a decent enough sort; he also has weird fleeting resemblances to Lincoln, which I think may help out in the audience subconscious. (Heaven help us all if Booth had missed and Lincoln had a larynx!) Through most of the film Sinatra is just a sort of male Mary Pickford, a mock-shy, poised young man huskily husking Occidental and very mortal corn. At the end, thanks to a stroke of simple genius on the part of the director, Tim Whelan, he stands without visible support among clouds, in an effect which could be described only in the unmailable terms of an erotic dream, and swells from a pinpoint to a giant. Higher and higher indeed. The Messiah Himself will have to sweat to work out a better return engagement.

"Destiny, Tokyo" combines a good deal of fairly exciting submarine warfare with at least as much human interest, which I found neither very human nor at all interesting. Warner does a lot of this sort of thing and of "socially conscious" work and is, I believe, more to be respected than any other American studio so far as maturity of intention is concerned. But even in that respect there is all the sky from knee-high left to grow in. And the cinematic achievement, as a rule, is just about what you get from any other studio.

JAMES AGEE

A SUPPLEMENT FOR THE FUTURE

JOBS for ALL

Full Employment After the War

A Special 32-page Nation Supplement

Presenting a plan on which labor, farmers, and small business can unite to save the country from needless depressions.

By THOMAS R. AMLIE

Single Copy Price, 10 Cents Special rates for copies in bulk of 100 copies or more on request

The Nation, 55 Fifth Ave., New York 3, N. Y.

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
55 Fifth Avenue
New York, N. Y.

OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give us at least two weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please enter my subscrip	otion to your	magazine
--------------------------	---------------	----------

- ☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8 ☐ 3 Years $11
- ☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me

Introductory Offer to New Subscribers ONLY:

□ 10 Weeks $1

Cash with order

Canada $1 a year extra

Foreign $1 a year extra Pan American Union requires no extra postage

NAME.....ADDRESS

1-1-44

MERICAN ART, like American literature, seems to be in retreat at the moment. This year's Whitney Annual (at the Whitney Museum of American Art until January 4) is more disheartening than ever. It hardly matters that some of the work shown was executed several years ago; the dominant note is of 1943. There is evident a general softening up, a relaxation into the appealing and the meretricious, and a fatigue that is particularly visible in the abstract section. The impulse to the exploration of form, some people say, is exhausted. The collective showing abstract art makes at the Whitney, its pursuit of safe effects, might tempt one to believe this if it were not that the other varieties of art present, for all their advantages of quicker surface pleasure, are even less interesting and hopeful. Just as naturalism at the time of the Bellinis in Venice was the only tendency which promised a future to painting, in spite of the wonderful sideshows staged by Carpaccio and Crivelli, so abstract art today is the only stream that flows toward an ocean. It is the only mode by which painters and sculptors can still master new experience; it furnishes the only profoundly original contemporary art; and the three best things at the Whitney are a piece of cast-iron and bronze sculpture by David Smith which obliterates almost everything else in the sculpture court, a pencil and crayon drawing by Arshile Gorky, and a Marin water color-the first two entirely abstract, the third abstract in feeling. These works, along with the limited successes that are a seascape by Feininger in oil, a snow landscape of Martyl's, also in oil, and Minna Harkavy's cast stone figure, help redeem the mediocrities, brilliant, spurious, and otherwise, which surround them. As usual, everybody shows a high level of competence, everybody is learned in the excellences of the past, but a community of excitement and ambition and a real richness of culture are missing.

The show of "Romantic Painting in America" now at the Museum of Modern Art (until February 6) harmonizes beautifully with last year's "American Realists and Magic Realists" exhibited at the same place. One sings alto to the other's bass, but the tune is the same. Both are phases of that campaign against modern art which began ambiguously among the surrealists twenty years ago, affirmed itself in the neo-romanticism of Christian Bérard, Tchelitchew, and the Bermans, and is now beginning to celebrate a triumph, such as it is, in New York and California during a period in which dry bones are being reclad withflesh, corpses resuscitated, and illusions revived by our failing nerves in every field of endeavor. It is the fag end of a boring, very great, and violent war. The superficial, true, and damning interpretations of these phenomena will all be made. But the most searching interpretations will also furnish apologies for them. Dali, who was really the baptizing John of the neo-baroque and the neo-romantic-Chirico being its unconscious Isaiah-felt that modern art isolated him from society, to which he wanted and wants very much to belong, and whose attention he needs no less than its money. The neo-romantics, surrealists, and others who took their cue from him and returned to the academic may have been impelled by the same motives-certainly their painting is the first "modern" art to have become a social success on the spot-but underneath, I feel, was also a yearning to put their art into a more explicit relation with the rest of their lives than postcubist painting and sculpture seem to allow. Cubism, or abstract art, gives the artist no room to express his immediate feelings about sex, for instance. They must first be transposed. It is impatience with the thought and feeling involved in the transposition of the aesthetic to and from the rest of experience that leads the Museum of Modern Art, or James Thrall Soby, to exclude the possibility that post-cubist art can be as "romantic" as anything else. The question is whether one is really interested in making "romanticism" actual and not merely a ribbon to decorate nostalgia for the academic. I think we all have that nostalgia more or less, but it should not obscure a truth which does not ask too much patience and reflection to feel and discover: namely, that Picasso, Miró, Braque, Arp, Lipchitz, Brancusi, the "inhuman" Mondrian, and the "intellectual" Gris have given the "romantic" as well as the "classical" aspects of contemporary life their most intrinsic expression in visual art.

The latest "romantic" revival in paintings—paralleled by a curiously similar revival among the younger poets in England and mew interest there in Pre-Raphaelism and the literary aspects of painting in general—stands historical romanticism on its head. For it does not revolt against authority and constraints, but tries to establish mew version of security and order. The "imagination" it favors seems conservative and constant as against the "reason" it opposes, which is restless, disturbing, ever locked in struggles with the problematical, "Reason" leads to convictions, activity, politics, adventure: "imagination" to sentiment, pleasure, and certainties. The new "romanticism" gives up experiment and the assimilation of new experience in the hope of bringing art back to society, which has itself been "romantic" for quite . while in its hunger for immediate emotion and familiar forms. A nostalgia is felt for a harmony which can be found only in the past-and which the very technical achievements of past art seem to assure.

Hence the inevitable charm which, for example, the nineteenth-century American landscapes at the "Romantic" exhibition have for us. Their singleness of view, their obvious but self-contained emotion make them more enjoyable at first glance than the contemporary pictures, which, despite greater force in many instances, seem fragments by comparison, organized on only one level.

The new "romantics" and the neoromantics, American and otherwise, look to the past for qualities of sentiment and for formal schemes by which to assure the unity and effect of their paintings. They borrow certain innovations of pre-cubist modern art-free brushwork, high color keys-only to subordinate them to the methods and moods of mannerist, baroque, German and French romantic painting. The result is art of a decadent flavor. Only the relinquishing of the effort to conquer new experience makes possible these seductive harmonies of paint and sentiment. Here are the limited objectives of a safe world, where we all understand each other because we have agreed to banish disturbing questions or are no longer capable of recognizing them; a wistful art that confirms our reluctance to take risks. (Such refusal of new impressions and influences is a characteristic moment of every decadence. Though one keeps on looking for new sensations, they must all be of the same order.) There are thrills, of coursebut never upsetting ones. It is art that has the shock of the fashionable: it creates unconventional effects by conventional means. The diabetic colors are sex: the careful handling is anal, represents money and the unwillingness to spend it on anything but pleasure. Sex and money are the two indisputable and perhaps the only exciting facts we have left. Yet this painting is not altogether to be despised; for it has inherent interest as phenomena, and in some cases its creators are extremely gifted. (See Walter Stuempfig's show at Durlacher Brothers.) And I say they know what they are doing. They have renounced the adventures and gambles of modern art. They want to be loved in a hurry. And they are. They sell well.

It should be added that relatively few of the contemporary American "romantics" at the Museum of Modern Art's show belong to the above manifestation. The "fantasists" Graves and Fett are akin to Klee or Masson; while such painters as Mattson, De Martini, Weber, Blanch, Bohrod, Karfiol, Evergood, and Palmer go back to French painting before cubism and recapitulate it in American terms, sometimes calling on the aid of Ryder or expressionism. Each has made a contribution, usually in landscape. It would be wrong to sneer at them because they lack power or are not quite up to date either as experimenters or "romantics." The fault most of them share is a narrowness of intention that compels them to repeat themselves after a certain point, and with repetition they degenerate woefully, woefully, into sweet effects. (A case in point is Bohrod's late show at the Associated American Artists.) The main reason I can see for Mr. Soby's insistence on their "romanticism" is that they never got too closely involved with anything later than fauvism or German expressionism. Weber and Evergood are perhaps the only exceptions.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

MUSIC

HE opening concert of the Budapest Quartet's series at the Y. M. H. A. began with Haydn's Quartet Opus 76 No. 2; and with the repetition of the first phrase there was already an unexpected change of phraselength and contour which was only the first little joke in the game that Haydn proceeded to play with the mind of his listener throughout the movement. The subtle surprises continued in the second movement; and their subtlety left one unprepared for the bomb which Haydn exploded in the third movement minuet: a canon, with the violins leading and the viola and cello following, making one laugh at first with the boldness of the procedure and then with the startling audacities of some of the details of the progression, and getting to be hilariously funny by the end.

Then came Mozart's great C major Ouintet K.515, with new surprises and audacities. One may think one has heard all the wonders Mozart could achieve; and then one hears something else which is, one thinks rightly, the most extraordinary thing in music one has ever heard. After the second-act finale of "Figaro" there is still the fourth-act finale (to say nothing of all that intervenes); at the end of this finale there is still the sublimity of the Contessa, perdono! passage. And so even after all the unique marvels of the instrumental works-of, for example, the slow movement of the Concerto K.467—one is unprepared for the boldness and power of the opening of the first movement of the C major Quintet, the tensions that are built up at the end of the exposition; nor do these prepare one for the things that happen in the second movement minuet: the somber strangeness of the opening statement, of the harmonic progressions and instrumental coloring in the first part of the trio after the flowing violin melody; the violently wrenching intensities of the middle part of the trio. And these things do not make one laugh; they leave one shaken.

The Budapest Quartet's performances of those two works also caused one to marvel all over again at what one had marveled at so many times before-the integrated progression of the four strands of sound that were inflected with such unerring plastic sense and expressive insight. There were occasions, more frequent in the Quintet, whenhappening to be very tired-I wondered whether I had really heard . blemish in intonation or tone or had merely imagined I heard it. But unblemished perfection, when it arrived in the performance of Beethoven's Opus 59 No. 1 that ended the concert, created no doubts, and convinced me that I really heard those blemishes in the performances of works which the Budapest Quartet plays less and rehearses less than Opus 59 No. 1. The first movement of Beethoven's work, incidentally, was swift-moving and fiery in this performance, and as convincing as the reflective, lyrical first movement of the Roth Quartet performance.

Young Leonard Bernstein's performance of Bloch's "Three Jewish Poems" with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony had beauty of sound, fluidity and plastic coherence, effectiveness as a statement of the music; and these certainly took ability to produce with a modern score in the hour and a quarter of rehearsal that I was told he had had. But just how able Bernstein is as a conductor and musician we will know only when we have heard him conduct Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and other music of the standard repertory, and with a less disciplined orchestra than the Philharmonic.

The New York Philharmonic is now a disciplined, fine-sounding orchestra; that much Rodzinski has achieved. But a disciplined. fine-sounding orchestra doesn't exist for itself; and the conductor's job isn't merely to get it to play with discipline and fine sound. The orchestra exists as an instrument for the performance of music; and the conducductor's job is to use it to provide us with effective statements in living sound of the great classics and other interesting works of the past, the important achievements of the present. Actually, Rodzinski's programs have offered few of the great classics or other interesting works of the past, and even less music of any importance of the present; and some of the programs have been as badly selected and combined as any I have ever encountered: John Alden Carpenter's "The Anxious Bugler," Saint-Saëns's Symphony in C minor, Liszt's Piano Concerto in E flat, Gershwin's "American in Paris"; or Berezowsky's "Soldier on the Town," Glière's Symphony "Ilya Murometz," Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto No. 3; or Noskowski's Symphonic Poem "Step," Tansman's Symphony No. 5, Szymanowski's Symphonie Concertante for piano and orchestra, Chopin's Concerto in F minor. One might say it is just as well that Rodzinski hasn't played Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and Schubert, since he doesn't play this music effectively; but that would amount to saying he is incapable of fulfilling one of the primary obligations of orchestra and conductor to the public. Nor is there enough modern music that he plays well to enable him to fulfill other obligations. I have heard good performances from him of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé," Sibelius's Fifth Symphony, the Fifth Symphony and other works of Shostakovitch, but a poor performance of Debussy's "La Mer" on the records issued a year ago; and at the concert I attended recently the performance of Mahler's Second Symphony had cool on-the-surface quality and sheen suitable for Ravel-which was like performance of "Othello" in the style of a Lonsdale comedy.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

A Good Job

Dear Sirs: Accept my congratulations on publishing the workman-like job of Thomas R. Amlie as a supplement to The Nation for November 27. "Lost: One Trillion Dollars" is one of the most constructive and stirring things I have encountered in a long time. It is a real challenge to the American people. Both you and Amlie deserve unstinted commendation for your enterprise in making this fine piece of work available to your readers. It should be sent to every Congressman, and, more important, it should be read by every labor official in the country, for there are still far too many of us in the labor movement whose economics follow the line of the National Association of Manu-AL SESSIONS facturers.

News Editor, Olympic Press Oakland, Cal., December 6

Overlooked

Dear Sirs: I was surprised to see that Mr. Amlie, in your supplement dealing with the post-war program for full employment, paid so little attention to the recommendations of the National Resources Planning Board. The board recommended genuine equality of educational opportunity for all, so that not merely would educational facilities be expanded but no one would be forced by economic pressure to lose the chance to take as full advantage of educational opportunities as his ability warranted. This important step Mr. Amlie overlooked entirely.

The board recommended a guaranty by the federal government of decent jobs at full pay for everyone able and willing to work for whom private enterprise failed to provide a job. It laid down the outlines of a number of projects, both construction and service projects, by which this policy could be put into practice. The idea of a government guaranty of useful jobs for all is one that can readily be made into an effective slogan, for it is a more personalized program than full employment, though it adds up to the same thing in the end.

Finally, the social-security program of the National Resources Planning Board, which has been largely embodied in the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill, is not mentioned by Mr. Amlie, nor is the bill itself. Instead, Mr. Amlie proposes $25 a week for the unemployed. There are other interferences with income than unemployment, such as sickness, old age, and disability. Also any flat sum is bound to be unjust because it fails to take into account the needs of dependents. Hence, the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill and the proposals of the National Resources Planning Board seem to be definitely superior to Mr. Amlie's idea of $25 a week for the unemployed. But even if they were not better, I suggest that progressives have an obligation to try to rally concentrated support for concrete proposals already in the political arena, especially when, like the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill, they have the support of both the main branches of organized labor, rather, than to toss out some other proposals for social security.

ALFRED BAKER LEWIS
New York, December 10

A Charlestonian Objects

Dear Sirs: The outburst about Charleston contributed by Enid Ewing to The Nation of November 20 raises a number of questions for its impetuous author to consider.

As a Charlestonian and a volunteer war worker, I am constrained to believe that Enid Ewing did not make a very thorough investigation before she voiced her strictures. Has she the slightest knowledge of building conditions under the present priority restrictions? Does she know that "despite the admonitions of furning Washington bureaucrats that Charleston fall in line" it has frequently been in the subsidiary offices of those "furning bureaucrats" that many needed projects have been indefinitely pigeonholed?

Then I should like to know in how many other war-swollen towns the author has lived? Has she any experience of prices and conditions in other such places? Having for some months now been a traveling army wife, I have experienced all those things of which Enid Ewing complains. I have climbed four flights of stairs to my one room, for which I paid $66 a month. In a small town I have been offered—and have refused for financial reasons—that apartment longed for by all army wives, two rooms and kitchen, tenants to supply all heat, water, linen, etc. Rent $120 a month. As I walked from that apartment I passed spacious houses which I later learned were lived in by one or two people. I have stood in line to get high-priced food in deplorably greasy restaurants, and I have not had the energy to stand in line long enough to get into one of the three movies which afforded the sole amusement in the small town. I have watched my Southern dollars "hoisted on an ancient pulley line" to a Boston cashier, but that Boston shop is hardly to be expected to instal a new system-which it probably couldn't buy anyway-just because war workers are spending freely. It never struck me as contra mundum for the Boston Athenaeum to continue its rule of hereditary membership after I came to town. The Boston Athenaeum went right on with the customs which have persisted through many wars, and I was perfectly happy in the Public Library. Charming Bostonians invited me to their homes, and there I tried to remember the rules of courtesy, which I learned in Charleston-that even though we might disagree on innumerable topics it can be very unpleasant if a guest is pugnaciously controversial with his host.

All of this is axiomatic and needs no argument to be accepted by the experienced and thoughtful. It would seem a waste of effort to remonstrate with the Enid Ewings, who are to be found wherever the going is a bit tough, save that their impatient gripings tend to arouse sectional resentments and tensions when of all times we should exercise forbearance.

HARRIET P. SIMONS Somewhere in New England, November 25

Foch and the Armistice

Dear Sirs: Joseph Bornstein said in his review of my book, "The Invasion of Germany," (The Nation, October 30), that Marshal Foch "strongly objected to the invasion of Germany, and he explained his point of view with the famous words, reported by Colonel House: 'No man has a right to cause another drop of blood to be shed.' "He thinks that he thus refutes my statement that Foch was against the Armistice as it was finally concluded. Mr. Bornstein evidently feels that to quote a somewhat bombastic sentence makes historical research unnecessary. He evidently is not aware that Colonel House was somewhat partial in his accounts of the Armistice negotiations and the peace negotiations.

Since Mr. Bornstein believes I should study better books, I might suggest in turn that he read the memoirs of Mrs. Woodrow Wilson on this point. It might also prove advantageous to study the works of the late Karl Friedrich Nowack, a renowned European historian and one of the accepted authorities on Versailles, on Foch's feelings on the Armistice. And it might also prove fruitful to Mr. Bornstein to read what Alfred Vagts, perhaps the outstanding authority in this country, wrote on page 263 of "The History of Militarism": "When the Germans finally proposed an armistice, the majority of the commanding generals, Haig excepted, declared in favor of fighting on until peace could be dictated on German soil; that was said to be 'so conforming with strategy and the experience of past wars.' . . . Only when hard pressed by the civilian politicians did Foch admit that there was no reason to fight on for harsher armistice conditions. . . ."

Still another important writer on military affairs, Valeriu Marcu, who recently passed away in this country, wrote in his book "Men and Forces of Our Times" ("Männer und Mächte der Gegenwart") on Foch's attitude toward the Armistice: "Nothing can ever have seemed so inopportune to the Marshal of France as the German request for an armistice." And how could it be so if Marshal Foch really desired that not another drop of blood be shed?

CURT REISS

New York, December 8

What Foch Said

Dear Sirs: Mr. Riess wrote in his book that Marshal Foch did not want to grant Germany the armistice of 1918. He asserted: "Foch was outvoted. The British, the Americans, and even Foch's own government thought that he was a megalomaniac. . . . No one listened to Foch."

The negotiations about the Armistice of 1918 have been described by men who took part in them. I will not again refer to Colonel House, President Wilson's delegate, whom Mr. Reiss calls "partial." Yet the fact that the conditions of the armistice were fully in consonance with the proposals of Marshal Foch is also confirmed by witnesses like General Pershing and Lloyd George. (Pershing, "My Experiences in the World War," page 363; Lloyd George, "War Memoirs," Vol. VI, page 3275). Ciemenceau's former assistant, André Tardieu, gave a documentary report of the armistice negotiations in his famous book "The Truth About the Treaty"; he quotes there especially the statements and declarations of Marshal Foch (pages 67, ff). There is finally one of the most important witnesses—Foch himself ("The Memoirs of Marshal Foch," American edition published by Doubleday, Doran and Company in 1931). Foch devoted two long chapters of his "Memoirs" (pages 450-96) to a day-by-day account of the armistice negotiations. He reveals the full text of his original propositions, his protests against any aggravation of the conditions, his statements made in the meetings with Colonel House, Lloyd George, and Clemenceau. In his conclusions Foch explicitly declares that the conditions of the armistice were fully satisfying from his point of view and continues: "It must not be imagined that the signing of the armistice was premature on our part, or that we might have derived advantage by delaying it . . . until such time as the German defeat had been finally sealed by a military defeat equivalent to new Sedan" ("Memoirs," page 490).

Karl Friedrich Nowack was not "a renowned European historian" but a German author who wrote a popular book against Versailles, thus helping the German nationalistic propaganda. Alfred Vagts certainly does not claim to have written the history of the armistice negotiations. The sentence of Valeriu Marcu's which Mr. Riess quotes applies to the strategic plans Foch had prepared before he knew that the Germans would ask for an armistice.

My review was published five weeks before Mr. Riess wrote his letter. He had plenty of time to search for material that would justify his statement. I can hardly believe that he overlooked all the well-known standard works about the armistice any employee of the Public Library could have recommended to him. However, Mr. Riess, who prefers the "authority" of Herr Nowack to the "partial" Colonel House, may also think that the books of General Pershing, Lloyd George, André Tardieu, and Foch himself are not reliable sources. I am sorry for his readers.

JOSEPH BORNSTEIN

New York, December 20

No Quarter

ON RUSSIA'S FIGHTING LINES by KONSTANTIN SIMONOV

(Correspondent of "Red Star")
"These pieces are written with a sensibility and penetration that suggest both a more vigorous Bunin and a far more subtle Babel... grand tradition of Russian literature.

—The New Yorker
With thirty-two photographs • $2.75

The Baltic Riddle

FINLAND, ESTONIA, LATVIA, LITHUANIA—KEY-POINTS OF EUROPEAN PEACE by GREGORY MEIKSINS

"... a significant contribution to the further development of mutual understanding and cooperation between the United States and the Soviet Union. No one interested in the Baltic States, the Atlantic Charter and the problem of the post-war frontiers of the U.S.S.R. can afford to ignore THE BALTIC RIDDLE."

-Frederick L. Schuman

300 pages • $3.00

Maxim Litvinoff

A BIOGRAPHY

by ARTHUR UPHAM POPE
"I know of an available book which would present to the American public anything like it. It is fascinating reading."

—Joseph E. Davies (Former U. S. Ambassador to the U.S.S.R.)

544 pages • $3.50

AT ALL BOOKSTORES

L. H. Fischer Publishing Corp.
381 Fourth Ave. New York 16, N. Y.

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 45 by JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

1 The lower he goes the less likely he is to go flat

Liver's out of order

10 Murmur at the tattoo for not being exciting 11 You find such eloquence in a Whig or a Torv

12 Oh, dear! A girl has lost a foot

- 13 He is here today and gone tomorrow 16 One William who was glad to miss
- his son 17 Little Edward and his debts become tiresome
- 19 Old tyrant who set a mark for new tyrants to shoot at
- 20 Fish on ice
- 22 Put the case again as the others dined

23 Sheer imbecility

- 25 Fifty-two pronouns in five letters
- without proper punctuation 27 It would not encourage the floored pugilist if he were to first half the second half
- 31 Nineteenth century French novelist of the "naturalist" school
- 32 Wood nymph, not an advertisement
- for Prohibition
- 33 A large slice of this earth 36 Al leaves Australia for a country in Europe
- 37 One of course was necessary when this famous London prison was pulled down
- 38 Fences with the edge in the middle 39 Are you making good this?

DOWN

- 1 Decapitate
- 2 A swindle starts a state of excitement.
- Politicians doubtless feel that one good one deserves another

- 4 Founder of Babel, and a big shot in his day
- A play, but not of the athletic kind "So over -----, or over civil, That every man with him was God or Devil" (Dryden) A king's man (an economic variety
- has been found to exist here!)
- Wild West show characterized by much horse-play
- 13 Result of excessive weeping—or of seeing red, perhaps (hyphen, 3 and 4)
- 14 A short English queen collaborates with an anti-New Dealer with successful results!
  - Whispered like the stirring leaves
- Use this discreetly during a black-out Form of wool that is mostly hide
- 21 One cannot be supine about one's ablutions in this (two words, 4 and 4) Treated badly (hyphen, 3 and 4)
- 26 She-goat (anag.) "Days of absence, sad and dreary, Clothed in sorrow's dark - - - - "
- (Rousseau)
- Worker who appears to hold the whip hand
- 30 Unsinkable ships of the desert
- 34 As steel
- 35 Is this a small portion of the Tree of Knowledge?

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 44 SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 44
ACROSS.—I DECATER; 5 TORNADO; 9
FRIGATE; 10 NOTICED; 11 LAG; 13
APIECE; 15 ARCHIE; 16 EXPRES; 17
SAGR; 19 ELMS; 20 RED INDIAN; 21
TOLLE; 23 DANE; 26 UNCUENT; 28
SPRING; 29 SEALED; 30 ASS; 32 GAMBUTS; 33 PRO RATA; 34 TIRADES; 35 NESTLES.

NESTLES.
DOWN:-1 DEFEATS: 2 CELLING; 3
TRANCE: 4 REEL; 5 TANG; 6 ROTORS:
7 ALCOHOL: 8 ODDNESS: 12 AERONALTS: 14 EXUDING: 15 ASSIGNS: 18
PRE: 19 BED; 21 INSIGNT: 25 UNKIND;
21 ALL HAHL: 25 ENDBARS: 25 UNKIND;
27 TENORS; 30 ASPS; 31 SPAN.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

The Black Book of Polish Jewry. An Account of the Martyrdom of Polish Jewry under the Nazi Occupation, Edited by Jacob Apenszlak, Rov. $3.

Clówns and Angels. Studies in Modern French Literature. By Wallace Fowlie. Sheed and Ward. $2.50.

Indian Crisis: the Background, By John S. Hoyland. Macmillan. $2.

The First Fifty Years. A History of the National Council of Jewish Women, 1893-1943. National Council of Jewish Women.

Society and Nature. A Sociological Inquiry. By Hans Kelsen. Chicago. $4.

Heart of Europe. An Anthology of Creative Writing in Europe, 1920-1940. Edited by Klaus Mann and Herman Kesten, Fischer, Orestes Brownson: Yankee, Radical, Catholic. By Theodore Maynard, Macmillan. $3.

The Waste Land. Some Commentaries by Eric Mesterton. Argus Book Shop, Chicago. $1.25.

The American Story of Industrial and Labor Relations. New York State Joint Legislative Committee on Industrial and Labor Conditions. Williams Press, Albany. Trade Edition, $1.50; School Edition, $1.

The Prohibition Movement in Alabama, 1702 to 1943. By James Benson Sellers, North Carolina. $1.25.

CONTRIBUTORS

MALLORY BROWNE is London correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor.

McALISTER COLEMAN, a resident of New Jersey, has long been active in the fight against Hague. He has recently published "Men and Coal," a study of the American miner.

GAETANO SALVEMINI was professor of modern history at the University of Florence until 1925, when he was arrested as an opponent of fascism. He is now teaching at Harvard. His latest book, written in collaboration with George La Piana, is "What to Do with Italy.'

ELIZABETH WILDER is on the staff of the Hispanic Foundation of the Library of Congress.

JACQUES BARZUN, assistant professor of history at Columbia University, is the author of "Romanticism and the Modern Ego."

ALFRED WERNER was formerly editor of Gerechtigkeit, an anti-Nazi paper published in Vienna. He was a contributor to the "Universal Jewish Encyclopedia" and has written for political and literary magazines.

AMERICA'S LRADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 158

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 8, 1944

NUMBER 2

IN THIS IS	SUE
------------	-----

HE SHAPE OF THINGS	2)
EDITORIALS
What Labor Must Remember	31
Wages and Living Costs	32
A Dangerous Year	33
ARTICLES
	34
What F. D. R. Forgot by I. F. Stone	-
10 Years Ago in The Nation	35
Moscow and Austria by Adolf Sturmthal	30
Memorial to the Great Big Beautiful Self-Sacrificing
Advertisers by Sergeant Frederick Ebright	38
Houses on the Belt by Francis Westbrook, Jr.	39
In the Wind	41
POLITICAL WAR
Who Will Rule France? by Jules Moch	42
	4-
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus	4.
BOOKS AND THE ARTS
The Horror Silently Walking by F. C. Weiskopf	49
Romanticism of Jacques Barzun
by Eric Russell Bentley	40

Editor and Publisher

Official-but Not Dull by Marcus Duffield

Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling

Film Notes by James Agee

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Music by . B. H. Haggin

A Working Democracy by C. Hartley Grattan

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 46 by Jack Barrett

Managing Editor

Washington Editor ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL I. F. STONE

Editor Political War Section J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Associate Editors KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

50

51

52

53

54

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL LOUIS FISCHER

JONATHAN DANIELS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U.S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 56 Fifth Ave., New York 3, N.Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N.Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THE PRESENCE IN THE NEW BOLIVIAN government of two or three democratic officials and its various pronouncements in favor of pan-American unity have been taken in some quarters as hopeful signs that the latest Latin American putsch was not primarily a rightist affair. We believe such hopes are ill-founded. No Bolivian regime can survive long without the recognition of the United States, and almost any concession will be made to win it. But promises and even executive decrees will be worthless as long as the real power lies in the hands of the fascists and Nazi sympathizers who staged the recent revolt and make up the majority in the Paz Estenssoro regime. As we pointed out last week, the chief inspiration for the coup was in Argentina's pro-Axis government, which is doing all it can, directly and through Phalangist and other Axis agencies, to further the spread of fascism in Latin America. There is only one force strong enough to offset the influence of Argentina—the United States. But to counter the pro-Axis maneuvers of the Ramirez dictatorship, our State Department would have to adopt, belatedly, the policy we have steadily urged upon it: it would have to cooperate as actively with liberal and left elements in Latin America as the Axis has done with the reactionaries. This means a sharp reversal of traditional practices. In Bolivia, for example, we should have to support the very elements which we alienated and outraged a year ago by our Minister's intervention in behalf of the mine owners. It is hard to believe that Mr. Hull and his advisers will suddenly develop the courage and imagination to engage in effective political warfare in Latin America. They prefer to leave that sort of vulgar business to the Nazis.

*

THE BRITISH HOME FLEET HAD LONG BEEN waiting for the opportunity that arrived "in the halflight of the Arctic dawn" the day after Christmas, and it was no mere chance that led to its triumph. Many previous efforts had been made to lure the Scharnhorst into action, but the wary German commander had refused to be tempted out of his safe Norwegian anchorage. This time he fell for the bait-a juicy convoy bound for northern Russia, seemingly guarded only by a cruiser escort of inferior hitting power to the 26,000-ton German battleship. The Scharnhorst made contact confidently, but for all that they were outgunned, the British cruisers nipped at her heels so successfully that eventually she turned and ran for her base, with the British in pursuit. Meanwhile the big and fast battleship—the Duke of York-which had been steaming through the fog some distance behind the convoy changed course and neatly intercepted the Scharnhorst. That was the end of the last heavy German warship that remained in action and of a serious threat that had kept many British fighting ships on monotonous guard duty in the North Sea. The good news was followed in a few days by reports of another engagement in the Bay of Biscay, in which at least three Nazi destroyers and a blockade-running freighter were sent to the bottom. Both these victories have an important bearing on the coming invasion of the Continent, for they diminish the Nazi power to interfere with either transatlantic convoys or cross-Channel traffic. The German surface fleet has long had only a nuisance value, and it is now no more than a minor nuisance.

GENERAL EISENHOWER—A CAUTIOUS MAN has promised victory in Europe in 1944 provided everyone at the front and behind it does his or her duty. The New York Daily News has demurred on the ground that this is too much to expect. Perhaps Publisher Patterson's conscience is troubling him, for certainly his own chief contribution to victory has been the sowing of doubt and dissent. He has, for instance, supported Senator Wheeler's statistical approach to strategy. The Senator has heard gossip that the proportion of Americans to Britons in the invasion forces will be three to one and has registered a loud protest. Naturally the exact ratio is military secret, but we would remind the Senator and his journalistic supporters that British losses in this war are several times ours; that even in fighting Japan British casualties have almost certainly outnumbered ours; that while we have regarded Salerno as a wholly American victory we now learn that the initial landing on that bloody beach was made by two British divisions and one American. Lay down that adding-machine, Senator! It is such calculations as yours that help to snatch defeat from the jaws of victory.

THE MAGAZINE ESQUIRE HAS BEEN DENIED second-class mailing privileges by an order of Postmaster General Frank C. Walker which appears to us completely indefensible. After prolonged hearings on the question of whether or not some of the matter published by the magazine was obscene, a three-man Post Office trial board recommended by a majority that the privilege be not revoked. Thereupon Mr. Walker, apparently determined to "get" Esquire, took action on the ground that it failed to meet the requirements of being "originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry." Now it is arguable that the second-class mailing privilege, which is in effect a subsidy, has been over-extended, but the words of the statute should not suddenly be strictly applied to one publication while others which fail far more egregiously to satisfy the definition quoted above are undisturbed. If mailing rights are to be denied to Esquire on these grounds, how can they be justified for the dozens of "pulps" and "comics" which now enjoy them? This ruling by the Postmaster General is censorship of the most arbitrary kind, and we hope that the whole press will back Esquire strongly in challenging it in the federal courts.

IN AN ARTICLE CALLED THE G-STRING Conspiracy by its Washington editor, The Nation drew attention on July 26, 1941, to the particularly unfair and ludicrous character of the indictments obtained by the Department of Justice against a group of Trotskyite labor men in Minneapolis. These men have since been acquitted of seditious conspiracy, a charge involving acts rather than opinions, but have been convicted under the Smith Alien and Sedition Law of 1940, which makes the mere utterance of revolutionary doctrines a crime. The Department of Justice contended and the lower courts agreed that it was unnecessary to prove that these utterances constituted any "clear and present danger." In doing so they set aside the doctrine developed by Holmes and Brandeis to put sharp limits on prosecutions for opinion in time of war. The shocking thing about this case is that the utterance occurred before Pearl Harbor, and conviction was obtained under our first peace-time sedition law since 1798. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court has twice refused to grant a review of the Minneapolis convictions, with the result that the "clear-and-present-danger" doctrine, long applied by state courts as settled law in civil-liberties cases, is in danger of going into the discard. With the backing of the Civil Liberties Union, a new petition for a hearing has been made.

×

WE HOPE THAT ATTORNEY GENERAL BIDDLE will use the "hardship-cases" provision of the Alien Registration Act of 1940 to suspend the deportation order against Raissa Irene Browder, wife of the Communist leader, Earl Browder. Mrs. Browder entered the country from Canada illegally in 1933. Late in 1939 her husband applied for an immigration visa permitting her to go to Canada and reenter legally. This was denied by the well-known Visa Division of the State Department. The petition was followed within a few months by the issuance of a warrant for her arrest and deportation. This came shortly after proceedings had been begun against Browder, then running for President on the Communist ticket. The Browder prosecution was political, based on the most fine-spun of technicalities in the field of passport law. Mrs. Browder's case bore all the earmarks of political persecution of a particularly vindictive kind. Action by Biddle would wipe the slate clean. Mrs. Browder is married to an American and has three American children. Under the 1940 act the Attorney General is authorized in such cases to suspend deportation action and permit the wife, husband, or parent of Americans to begin naturalization proceedings. It is true that under the law Congress may object within thirty days of any such act of clemency. But this is a risk that Biddle should take.

ART YOUNG WOULD BE AMUSED IF HE COULD read the comments of the "capitalist press" on his personality, his art, and his politics. He was a lovable soul and a good artist, so the line goes, in spite of his "heterodox" opinions-heterodox being a euphemism for Socialist. We should not go so far as to say that Art was a lovable man and a fine artist because he was a Socialist, but we do protest that his personality, his politics, and his art were all of a piece. All flowed from the central spring of integrity, intelligence, and love which never failed and which was kept sweet by his gusto for life and a sense of humor as deep as it was broad. And the clean simple line characterized them all. Many of Art Young's wonderful drawings appeared in The Nation. Next week we shall reproduce some of them, as well as a comment on Art Young as an artist, a humorist, and that rara avis a permanent Socialist.

A NEW OUTBREAK OF ANTI-SEMITISM IN certain parts of New York City, notabl; the Washington Heights section and areas in lower Brooklyn, is revealed in a report of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and affidavits collected by local newspapers. The evidence shows not only widespread desecration of Protestant churches and Jewish synagogues but numerous assaults on Jewish children by gangs of boys from ten to fifteen years of age. In a few instances Jewish adults have been attacked by older boys. The police have chosen to minimize the incidents, dismissing them as minor manifestations of the current wave of juvenile delinquency. This is not an adequate explanation. Offenses of all sorts by young people are on the increase, but the nature of these attacks indicates that they represent a definite tendency. Behind them one can clearly see the anti-Semitism of certain well-organized fascist groups known to be strongly intrenched in the particular districts where the trouble arose. The uprooting of this dangerous un-American attitude is a long-range job which the schools, churches, and civic agencies of all types must resolutely shoulder. Meanwhile the responsibility for checking these outrages rests squarely upon the police. The past association of many policemen with the Christian Front and similar organizations and the recent whitewashing of Patrolman James L. Drew suggest that one reason these anti-Semitic outbreaks have not been stopped is the indifference of many members of the police force. The situation is serious enough to call for a thorough investigation of the police department's efforts, or lack of efforts, to check the attacks on Jewish children, and for a reinvestigation of the Drew case to find what pressures were brought to bear to allow that notorious anti-Semite to remain on the force.

What Labor Must Remember

HE growing crisis in the ranks of labor has as yet caused far more excitement in the headlines than disruption in industry. November, 1943, was a comparatively bad month, with twice as many workers on strike and twice as many man-days lost as in November, 1941, just before Pearl Harbor. But even so, idleness due to strikes amounted to little more than one-third of 1 per cent of available working time, and 87 per cent of the idleness was due to the coal strike. The surrender to John L. Lewis in that strike made it very difficult for Philip Murray any longer to hold the steel workers in line; their wages have many industrial and traditional links with those of the miners. The steel strike was nipped in its beginnings by a promise to make any wage rise retroactive, and the Administration seems to be striving, by revision of the official cost-of-living index, both to give the steel workers an increase and to keep the Little Steel formula in effect.

The manner in which the railroads were "taken over" by the government will not tend to lessen the dissatisfaction of railroad workers. They feel that they have a raise coming to them from roads earning the greatest profits in their history. But while the British railroads under government war-time control are limited to average pre-war earnings, "governmental control" here is little more than a semantic gesture to end a strike. Railroad officials have merely been put into uniform, and the Presidential order taking over the roads provides that the private companies shall otherwise carry on as usual.

We cannot help feeling that part of the blame for the threatened railroad strike rests on the failure of War Mobilization Director James F. Byrnes and the managements to put into effect the President's promise of last May to give the workers in the forty-eight-hour week railroad industry the overtime privileges enjoyed by other workers under the forty-hour law. And we think the non-operating unions, which include some of the lowest-paid workers in American industry, are right in insisting that arbitration of their overtime demands should leave untouched the recent four-to-ten-cents-anhour increase given them by Economic Stabilization Director Vinson.

The press, which is generally anti-labor, and some anti-labor officials have seized upon the unrest in labor's ranks to mobilize public opinion against the trade-union movement. Editors who looked on in indifference or approval at the succession of steps by which big business slowed up the war effort bring out their tallest headlines for the strikes. We wonder who was the "high Washington authority" who declared that the threatened railroad strike and the threatened steel strike had prolonged the war six months. This was both mendacious and malicious. The explanation given by this high authority, whoever he was, was far-fetched and incapable of proof. He said news of the threatened strikes would prolong the war by keeping Hungary, Bulgaria, Croatia, and Rumania in the conflict. That is dangerous nonsense. Such statements and recent scare headlines about the use of troops to man the roads embitter railroad labor, which was pledged not to strike against the government and had no intention of doing so.

However unfair the attacks upon it, labor needs more than ever to retain a sense of perspective. Labor's grievances are genuine enough: huge war profits, rising prices, the dilatory procedures of the War Labor Board, the tricky conduct of some members of the Administration, the greedy lobbies against subsidies and price control in Congress, the President's failure to take the offensive against them in his effort to hold down the cost of living. But labor must also consider the superhuman difficulties under which the President operates, and the fact that the line on profits, taxes, and living costs has been held better in this war than in the last. It must remember that a general revision of wages upward will only put "a baloney dollar" in workers' pay envelopes.

We ask members of labor unions to consider long and seriously the effect on the armed forces of current labor alarums. We ask them to remember that many soldiers are working and fighting under such conditions as can hardly be envisaged by any of us at home, and to remember always that they are fighting a movement designed utterly to crush and enslave labor. We ask trade unionists to imagine the reactions of men in New Guinea or Italy who hear of strikes at home, to consider the hostile attitude toward labor with which many will return from the front, to recall the role such animosity on the part of war veterans played in the rise of fascism abroad. We ask them to lift themselves for a moment above their grievances, their long-standing wage disputes and irritations, and consider whether there is involved anything as important as the good-will of the soldier and the respect of the public. On these may depend the security of the labor movement after the war and of free government with it. Every worker owes it to himself to think of these things, and to think, too, of his obligation to his country and to his comrades in uniform at the start of what will certainly be the bloodiest year of the war.

Wages and Living Costs

LTHOUGH the mine strike and some of the rail demands were settled, technically at least, within the limits of the Little Steel formula, any increase in steel wages will almost certainly require some adjustment in the formula which has governed wages for the past eighteen months. From the point of view of simple justice it would seem that a revision of the formula is long overdue. Since the beginning of 1941 wage rates have been permitted to rise a maximum of 15 per cent, while the cost of living has gone up 231/2 per cent. When Congress passed the law authorizing the control of wages in October, 1942, it specifically set the level of September 15 of that year as the level at which both wages and prices were to be stabilized. Yet the cost of living has risen an additional 5 per cent since then, and although some reduction has been achieved in the past seven months through the use of subsidies, the opposition of Congress to the rollback makes it highly unlikely that the Administration will be able to live up to its stated promise to push the general price level back to the September 15, 1942, mark.

From a humanitarian or economic point of view, strong case can be made out for a revision of the Little Steel formula which would permit wage rates to rise proportionately to living costs. This would, of course, largely satisfy labor and thus minimize the danger of further destructive strikes like those which threatened during Christmas week. But any such drastic tampering with the Little Steel formula at this time would be dynamite politically. In the eyes of most Congressmen—and of the public at large—the Little Steel formula is irretrievably linked with the entire stabilization program. If labor succeeds in breaking the formula, Congress would probably react by passing the ban on subsidies over a Presidential veto and yielding to farm and business pressure for increased prices all along the line. It need hardly be pointed out that labor would be one of the chief victims of any such collapse of the stabilization program. Once the cycle of inflation really got under way, there would be little possibility that wages would keep pace with the spiraling cost of living.

As long as there is a fighting chance of saving the subsidy program and preventing Congress from going all out for inflation, it is to labor's interest not to upset the apple cart by forcing a showdown on the Little Steel formula. That does not necessarily mean that the formula cannot or should not be subject to adjustment to provide for future rises in the cost of living. At the moment living costs are less than they were seven or eight months ago. But if the Administration is beaten in its present efforts to hold the line in such matters as subsidies, farm prices, and the price of crude oil, there should be some automatic provision for adjusting wages to meet the resultant increase in living costs. Some such arrangement as the Canadian plan whereby wages could be automatically revised every three months in accordance with changes in the cost-of-living index would be far preferable to the present rigid prescription, which apparently can only be adjusted under pressure of a threatened strike.

A Dangerous Year

IT IS not often that we find ourselves agreeing with Herr Goebbels, but in characterizing 1944 as "a dangerous year" the Reich Propaganda Minister seems to us to have used le mot juste. Probably his domestic audience considered him guilty of understatement, and in any case it hardly needed to be reminded of the perilous situation of Germany. With Berlin "half in ruins" and air raids growing weightier month by month, with the Russians advancing inexorably in the east, with American men and materials piling up impressively in the west, the Germans know full well that they are no longer fighting in the hope of victory, whatever Goebbels may say, but only with the desperate desire of staving off total defeat.

But for the United Nations also 1944 is "a dangerous year," though in a rather different sense. Our danger is not military defeat but failure, through over-caution, through divided counsel, to grasp victory. In 1943 we passed from the defensive to the offensive but only on a limited scale. Now in 1944 we have to go all out: the men are trained, the weapons manufactured, the ammunition accumulated. And the day for the coordinated attack on the Nazi fortress which was promised at Teheran is approaching.

Where and at what hour new breaches will be made in the walls of that fortress we do not know. The appointment of General Eisenhower to lead an attack from "other points of the compass" and the transfer of some of his ablest American and British subordinates from the Mediterranean point clearly enough to an invasion in the west. But the fact that as outstanding an officer as General Sir Harold Alexander has been placed in command of Allied forces in Italy suggests that that front will not be allowed to become static. And the appointment of General Sir Henry Wilson, with his experience of the Balkans, as supreme commander in the Mediterranean may presage the creation of a new front, or rather the reinforcement of a front where the Yugoslav Partisans have already driven a wedge into Hitler's lines.

It is in Britain, however, that the main invasion forces are being assembled, and the decisive battles outside Russia are likely to take place near the English Channel. The establishment of the first bridgeheads will be a gigantic and costly undertaking. Meticulous planning will be needed to gather the troops and their supplies at the embarkation ports and to collect the huge armada required to convoy them across. At this stage we must expect desperate efforts by the Luftwaffe to disorganize the expedition before it is well launched, for we can hardly hope that such a massive concentration of forces can be kept a secret from the enemy. This is the moment for which Göring has been hoarding his bombers. Yet we can feel confident that their challenge will be met, thanks to Allied superiority in the air, both by attacks on the German air bases and by defensive measures at the threatened points. With Air Marshal Leigh-Mallory, who had much to do with the defense of Britain during the blitz, in charge of the joint tactical air forces, the air protection of the Anglo-American expedition will be in good hands.

Eut the Luftwaffe is only the first obstacle to be overcome before firm bridgeheads are achieved. The Germans have had several years in which to fortify the coast of Western Europe and develop techniques of defensive warfare, and we can be sure that they will not be driven out by even the most devastating preliminary air and sea bombardments. Air cooperation will be of vital importance, but before our men can establish a firm foothold on the Continent there will be much bloody hand-tohand fighting, and casualties are likely to be extremely heavy.

We should be doubly thankful, therefore, that the Red Army has been doing such a wonderful job in wearing down German strength. In a desperate attempt to retake Kiev, Hitler threw in an important part of his reserves. The Russians met this counter-offensive and crushed it with such heavy losses to the enemy that the German command is encountering increasing difficulty in bolstering the weak points in its lines. With strong Russian drives developing in at least three sectors, these weak spots are becoming dangerously numerous.

There is every reason to hope that the Russians will be able to keep driving forward during the winter months so that by the time the western invasion is launched Hitler will be scraping the bottom of his reserve barrel and forced to strip one front to support the other. Thus once a bridgehead on the Continent can be established and consolidated, the chances of an early collapse of Germany will be bright. The risks are great; the prospects of reward greater. But we cannot afford mistakes in timing. Among the greatest dangers for us in 1044 is delay in carrying out our military obligations.

What F. D. R. Forgot

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, December 30 NE omission from the President's list of New Deal accomplishments seems to have escaped the attention of the press. This was the passage of the Wagner Act. The omission is symptomatic. With steel and railroad strikes threatening, the President may have thought it impolitic to boast of the part his Administration played in the organization of American labor and in guaranteeing the right of collective bargaining. I do not think the omission was accidental; if it was accidental, it was the kind of lapse of memory Freud explained for us. I am inclined to think it was deliberate, since the list of New Deal accomplishments and the Bunyanish parable about "Dr. New Deal" and "Dr. Win-the-War" were carefully prepared—though the President, like the artist that he is, gave them an air of improvisation.

Another accomplishment the President did not mention was the TVA, though he might easily have boasted of the great part it has played in war production. Perhaps the lambasting that Henry Wallace has taken for his reference to TVA's on the Danube helps to explain this omission. The President's list was prepared to evoke the shadow of the Hoover débâcle. "Dr. New Deal," the President said, had established a sound banking system, saved homes and farms from foreclosure, and rescued agriculture from disaster. These accomplishments, which led his list, represent a good middleclass reform program; minimum wages and maximum hours were put down near the bottom. Mr. Roosevelt wanted a list that was difficult to assail politically. That he succeeded is indicated by the New York Times's admission that "by and large it cannot be disputed that the 'New Deal' introduced into American life a very considerable number of reforms which were long overdue." Once this is admitted, Mr. Roosevelt's opponents can only quarrel with him over details, and that, in the midst of a world war, hardly makes for an effective campaign.

The Wall Street Journal, surveying the prospects for 1944, reported succinctly if lugubriously, "Statistics Favor a G. O. P. Victory but Democrats Still Have Roosevelt." The President is off to a brilliant start. His New Deal press conference, taken in connection with the conference of the preceding Tuesday, was as deft a piece of political footwork as anything in his career. He knows that the attention of electorates, like that of children, flags easily and needs new phrases and faces. "Win the War" is new and is also the obvious slogan for 1944; F. D. R. has preempted it. The offhand way in which the change of slogans was announced was seized upon by the opposition as a confession of past error. The President, by defending an unassailable record and indicating—though very cautiously—that there may be more of the same after the war, has put himself in a position his opponents must envy. He can run in 1944 as a non-partisan Win-the-War President without losing his franchise as a New Dealer. It will take more than MacArthur's profile to beat that one.

The range of possibilities for a President is never a wide one; constitutional and political necessities impose narrow limits on the leadership he can exert. Mr. Roosevelt is now, as always, just a wee bit to left of center, a little ahead of majority opinion today as he was a little behind it in the greatest days of the New Deal. The New Deal has been a strange and changing thing since the beginning. Aside from this vague phrase, reminiscent of Teddy Roosevelt's Square Deal, Wilson's New Freedom, and poker, Mr. Roosevelt's chief difference from Mr. Hoover in the 1932 campaign was on public power, and the first steps he took in office were as vigorously deflationary as anything Mr. Hoover might have suggested.

In the curious combination of elements behind Mr. Roosevelt were a section of big business which wanted relaxation of the anti-trust laws, farmers who wanted something like tariff protection for themselves, retail business men who understood the need for government spending. An older, more sophisticated, less vigorous capitalist class than ours might have used the NRA to move toward a form of corporate state, and would have understood the function of social demagogy in making it palatable. They took Mr. Roosevelt's rhetoric more seriously than it deserved, and by the violence of their attack tended in some degree to translate more of it into reality than was intended.

The demagogy of Section 7-a in the old NRA was taken seriously by the workers, and their organization both pushed Mr. Roosevelt toward the left and made most of his reforms politically possible. This is what makes his omission of the Wagner Act from the list of his accomplishments indicative. Like the guaranty of bank deposits, the Wagner Act was one of those reforms Mr. Roosevelt sponsored most unwillingly; I hope Senator Wagner will some day write his memoirs and tell the whole story. Yet without the wave of unionization which forced passage of the Wagner Act and was in turn strengthened by it, Mr. Roosevelt's reelection in 1936 would hardly have been possible. The working class provided the firm base of the New Deal, gave it vitality and direction. The dissatisfaction of the middle class and of middle-class farmers provided the other essential element in the victorious coalition. When the fear of foreclosure passed, and fear of labor took its place after the Little Steel strike, the old coalition was broken, and with it passed the earlier vitality and idealism of the New Deal.

This is as good a time as any to take realistic stock of what the New Deal accomplished. In the field of social and economic reform Mr. Roosevelt enabled us to catch up with the England of Lloyd George and the Germany of Bismarck's Monarchical Socialism. Social insurance will not end the ups and downs of the business cycle, though it may moderate their impact. In the field of spending Mr. Roosevelt could never bring himself really to prime the pump vigorously enough for permanent revival. The 1938 "recession" indicated that his second term might have ended in another serious slump if the preparations for war had not provided a new method of spending palatable to the upper classes, which have profited so largely by it. This is not said to disparage Mr. Roosevelt or to deny the wisdom of his war preparations; his policies were determined by the stage of our national development, by public opinion, by international necessities. But it will help us to guide ourselves in the post-war period if we clearly recognize that in the last analysis it was only war that saved the second Roosevelt Administration and world capitalism from a new depression.

The New Deal approach isn't good enough to meet our post-war needs, and it is time that liberals began to think in fresh terms. No economy can go on forever paying men to rake leaves or build mausoleums, and I'm afraid the Rooseveltians would do little more than provide new WPA's in the post-war depression. Another depression is what we're headed for so long as the President leaves plans for reconversion to the big-business crowd. They are already thinking in terms of restoring a profitable scarcity and shutting down new capacity. Post-war New Deals, post-war stabilization measures must take steps from which Mr. Roosevelt has always held back, perhaps because he would have been forced back had he taken them. Only by vigorous government intervention to maintain a high level of output, only by the employment of the jobless in productive enterprise, only by boldly putting idle men at idle machines can reality be given to that new, glamorous, and socially explosive slogan of Full Employment. I am afraid that this is a goal only a new movement and a new leadership will be able to achieve, and then only after a period of reaction.

10 Years Ago in "The Nation"

E ARE ENTERING A NEW YEAR fraught with enormous possibilities of good and evil for the people of the United States. It is no exaggeration to say that the very fate of our democratic institutions still hangs in the balance. Some of the great things that have been accomplished by the NRA under the New Deal . . . may not be permanent; many of them will be wiped out if the liberal Administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt is succeeded by a reactionary one . . . and yet somehow or other I feel that certain things have been accomplished that will be of lasting value, that ideas have been set afloat in the land which can never be returned to the source from which they came, or be wholly forgotten.—OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, January 3, 1934.

THE FIRST NATIONAL BIRTH-CONTROL conference ever held in Washington will open on January 15, under the auspices of Margaret Sanger's National Committee on Federal Legislation for Birth Control. A number of topic relevant to the general subject of contraception will be discussed by eminent physicians, ministers, and experts in education and sociology.—January 10, 1934.

IN HIS SPEECH at the Woodrow Wilson dinner President Roosevelt paid eloquent tribute to the desire of the peoples of the world for peace. Governments make war, he said; peoples fight wars against their will. He asked for an agreement among nations to eliminate offensive weapons and a declaration that "no nation will permit any of its armed forces to cross its own borders into the territory of another nation."—January 17, 1934.

IN THE HITLER-DOLLFUSS FIGHT for supremacy in Austria, the Austrian Premier unquestionably scored a victory in the last engagement. The arrest of an attaché of the German embassy at a secret meeting of Austrian Nazis proves that Berlin is directing and paying for the movement to overthrow the Dollfuss government. Documents confiscated on this occasion show that the National Socialists are planning not only the overthrow of the present regime but an Austrian revolution.—January 24, 1934.

PERHAPS NOTHING SEEMS more out of fashion than a book that was read by everyone ten years ago; in one sense it seems more ancient than a Victorian novel and infinitely more outmoded than a hearty survivor from the eighteenth century. So much for such best sellers as "Black Oxen," which is now superseded by "The Good Earth" and "Anthony Adverse."—HORACE GREGORY, January 31, 1934.

THEATER CALENDAR FOR 1934: "Ah, Wilderness!"; "As Thousands Cheer"; "Champagne Sec"; "Her Master's Voice"; "Let 'em Eat Cake"; "Mary of Scotland"; "Men in White"; "Peace on Earth"; "She Loves Me Not"; "Sailor Beware"; "The Green Bay Tree"; "The Pursuit of Happiness"; "The School for Husbands"; "Tobacco Road."—

January 31, 1934.

Moscow and Austria

BY ADOLF STURMTHAL

TOT having been admitted into the inner secrets of the Moscow conference, one finds it difficult to understand why one of the five statements of the three powers was especially addressed to Austria. The civil war in Yugoslavia between the forces of Tito and those of Mihailovich, the internal conflicts in Greece, the intricate problems of the French liberation movement failed to find mention in the Moscow decisions, but little Austria was singled out for what was in fact an appeal to revolt. Some commentators found the reason in impending military operations, which would soon bring Austria into the center of action; but it is hard to see how this could be done without the previous conquest of Greece or Yugoslavia, whose problems would thus have taken precedence over those of Austria. Another explanation was that the reestablishment of Austria's independence was one issue on which all parties at the conference agreed, while other problems were still subjects of negotiation. Possibly the statement on Austria was part of the settlement of the wider German issue, whose principles are said to have been established at Moscow. Publication of the plan for Germany itself is alleged to have been deferred for reasons of political strategy, whereas the Austrian part was ready for imme-

In any case, the three great powers are now committed to the reestablishment of an independent Austria at the end of the war. Although not clearly phrased, the statement seems to imply that Austria will be permanently separated from Germany, regardless of whether the Austrians want it that way or not. The Allies have thus reaffirmed the policy of Versailles with regard to the Anschluss. The reasons are probably the same now as then: German might would be increased by the addition of six million Austrians; the Anschluss would give to Germany an advantageous strategic position and make correspondingly difficult the position of Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Yugoslavia, and Italy; Austria's natural resources and its war industries, most of which have been established in the last few years, would increase the German war potential.

No one can know for certain whether a majority of the Austrian people, after Germany's defeat, would wish to remain incorporated in Greater Germany. But it is perhaps useful to recall that the German defeat in 1918 did not prevent 90 per cent of the Austrians from demanding the Anschluss. The reason was not only the desire for national unification—a democratic aim ever since the revolution of 1848—but also the fact that no one could see a practicable alternative which would allow a progressive democratic development and reasonable living standards in Austria. Indeed, the Anschluss was part and parcel of democratic and progressive thinking up to Hitler's victory in 1933. Independence was the slogan of the reactionary and monarchist factions. For them an independent Austria was merely the first step toward the reconstitution of the old Hapsburg empire. Very few Austrians in 1918 sincerely believed that Austria, left permanently to its own devices, could offer decent living conditions to its six million inhabitants. The idea of an Austro-Bavarian federation, which has found feeble support in England and elsewhere, belongs to the general plan of a clerical-inspired conservative bloc separating the Soviet Union from Western Whether nationalist emotions in Austria will have survived six or seven years of Nazi rule is an open question, but the economic problem of 1918 is bound to reemerge with a vengeance. It was a question then how Austrian industry could exist when it had a market of only six million instead of fifty million people. Now Austria's industrial development as fostered by Nazi Germany, is much greater than it ever was before. The triangle Linz-Vienna-Graz has become one of the big industrial centers of Europe. Using the natural resources of the Alpine provinces-iron ore, magnesium, and hydroelectric power-the industries of Upper and Lower Austria and Vienna, and the transportation facilities of the Danube and its plain, the Nazis have made it the greatest relatively bomb-proof (so far) industrial district in Greater Germany, equal if not superior to that of Upper Silesia. The destruction of the Ruhr by Allied bombing has increased the relative European significance of the Austrian triangle. In addition, Viennese trade, banking, and insurance have been immensely expanded by the Nazis, who have made them-of course under Berlin's control—the agents of the German war economy in the Danube Valley and the Balkans.

Much of this reorganization and expansion will no doubt collapse with Hitlerism, and would in any case have been discarded at the end of the war. A large part, however, could be converted for use in peace time. If Austria is cut off from the German market, poor as it will be after the defeat, and compelled again to fall back upon its small domestic outlet, a long-term depression is inevitable. And because of the present unparalleled expansion of Austrian industry the decline is likely to be even more lasting and severe than that which after 1918 made the country the pauper of Central Europe and gradually undermined the newly established democratic system.

January 8, 1944 37

It will be just and natural for the Allies to refuse to recognize the legality of Hitler's annexation of Austria and reestablish Austria's freedom. But it will be neither fair nor good politics to let it go at that. It is true that against the background of Nazi tyranny the years before the brown wave engulfed the country and before the Dollfuss dictatorship will be remembered by many Austrians as a Golden Age. But it does not require too strenuous an exercise of memory to recall the prolonged mass unemployment, the misery and hopelessness, of the thirties, and few have forgotten that this economic and social crisis was Hitler's strongest ally, demoralizing the masses and arousing the fear of a social revolution. The Allies will deprive themselves of a powerful weapon of political warfare if they offer nothing better to Austria -and to the whole of Central Europe for that matterthan the prospect of a return to the very conditions which gave rise to Hitlerism.

I can see only two alternatives for post-war Austria: Anschluss with a democratic German regime or economic cooperation with Southeastern Europe, Both solutions would meet tremendous difficulties. Both have as their starting-point the new security system which the Soviet Union is about to set up in Eastern Europe.

The mutual-assistance pact between Soviet Russia and Czechoslovakia is apparently designed to create a Moscow-sponsored safety zone from the Baltic to the Aegean, drawing into its orbit Poland and most if not all of the Balkan nations. Such a development would tend to eliminate many of the arguments that can reasonably be advanced against the Anschluss. A strong Slav confederation backed by the Soviet army-after Germany's defeat the most powerful land army on earth-need not be afraid of the addition of six million Austrians to a disarmed Germany. Moreover, it should not be overlooked that in the past a large majority of the Austrian population was under the leadership of Social Democratic or Catholic parties, both essentially pacific and hostile to pan-Germanism. Included in Germany, these groups would increase internal resistance to the rebirth of German militarism. Indeed, they would form a rallyingpoint for the democratic forces of the greater Reich.

I wonder, however, whether the victors of this war will realize the peace potential of the Anschluss, and even if they do whether popular passion would permit them to carry it out. Nor am I certain that the Austrians themselves, after six years of Nazi occupation, will be able to make a neat distinction between oppression by Nazi Germany and absorption by a different German regime. Even if they were given the full right of selfdetermination, they might very well prefer to separate from the Reich, particularly if separation did not mean isolation.

BETWEEN HELL AND BLAZES

Economic cooperation between Austria and Southeastern Europe might be the alternative. Such a plan runs into several difficulties. Southeastern Europe suffers from a surplus agricultural population, and a progressive industrialization seems to offer the only outlet for its people, as long as large-scale emigration remains impossible. If this area embarks upon an industrialization program, it will want to exclude foreign consumer goods as soon as it can produce them, but it will need large imports of capital goods. Indeed, so great will be the demand that wide opportunities will be opened not only for Austrian industry but for Czech and other industries as well. Without such outside help Southeastern Europe would be compelled to adopt the pattern of Soviet industrialization-a frightful reduction of already low living standards to obtain the necessary capital and a political system which allows such a violent Only if foreign capital goods are imported on longterm credit can Southeastern Europe gradually build up its own industries and then use its excess agricultural production for the amortization of its foreign debt, Unfortunately neither Austria nor Czechoslovakia will be able to sell capital goods against long-term credits. They will therefore need international assistance. To give it would be a wise investment for the United Nations, both politically and economically. Two of the basic weaknesses of Europe, the surplus agricultural population of Southeastern Europe and the over-industrialization of Austria and Czechoslovakia, could in this way be turned into assets for the reconstruction of the Continent.

Such an economic union between Austria and Southeastern Europe might, but need not, take the form of a federation. The Soviet Union has in the past looked askance at plans for a Danubian federation, fearing that they might mean a renewal of the old policy of forming a cordon sanitaire. This fear was again expressed in an article entitled The Fate of Austria appearing in the November issue of War and the Working Classes. The U. S. S. R. is categorically opposed to any federation which does not include the Soviet Union. And Izvestia at the same time insisted that any federation plans must be developed in the countries themselves, without pressure from outside, particularly from unrepresentative governments in exile. Central European liberals, on the other hand, have suspected, not always without reason, that the federation idea was a first step toward reconstitution of the Hapsburg empire. The Russo-Czech pact has, I believe, eliminated many of the grounds for these fears. Backed by the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia is in a position to enter an absolute veto against all Hapsburg dreams in Central Europe, and it is obvious that close economic cooperation between Austria and Soviet-led Southeastern Europe will not be a combination of the sort Moscow opposes. Moreover, the pact will make it impossible for any anti-Soviet regime to be established in Austria itself. Indeed, Austria might well become the point at which Anglo-American and Soviet influence meet in cooperation. Anglo-American capital, making use of Viennese experience in dealing with the Balkan nations, could be funneled through Austria into Southeastern Europe for the benefit of all. There is no Austrian government in exile, and as far as I can see, none that would be representative can come into being until Austria is liberated. This, however, should not prevent friends of a strong and democratic Austria from laying now the foundations for a stable order in the heart of Europe.

Memorial to the Great Big Beautiful Self-Sacrificing Advertisers

BY SERGEANT FREDERICK EBRIGHT

Look, we don't give a hoot if Zippo-Fasteners have gone to war (millions of us, by some strange coincidence, have done the same thing); and it isn't likely to break our hearts if we can't buy one today or tomorrow or whenever it was we were going to buy a Zippo, or whatever for—we believe Life will somehow go on.

And it doesn't matter too terribly much to us in the front lines if Old Cask whiskey is rationed: not to us for whom it has been rationed so thinly that we haven't seen a label in eleven months.

Cease worrying us with your nobility: yours is no national disaster:

your apologies are beginning to wear thin.

If your magazine is late—
If you can't reserve a lower berth—
If you can't purchase Durafilm—
If your long-distance call is held up—

So what! Cease the (advt.) threnody: nobody's going to die because of this.

War in itself is a vulgarity; it should not be an excuse for advertisers to parade their enormous sacrifice behind a thin screen of bond pleas, of shallow regrets, of four-color-process hypocrisy. We can stand only so much of a hard-luck story; then we begin to wonder about your sincerity.

Isn't the government paying you for your product? Okay, then—pipe down!

We're being paid too for our blood and our legs and our eyes and our arms, and we're not making a full-page song-and dance about it.

The pattern is all too familiar: bright shells burst on the page; tanks rear and planes crash (the artist's conception of war) in the midst of well-ordered disaster. Not so much blood and filth, of course, as to offend good taste—oh, the immaculate conception of war—and then the sob-line about no cigarette lighters today, no bath scales, no aluminum lids for your poor, poor desolate cleansing some day somebody will fracture an arm thus publicly waving a flag.

The woman in Saginaw who reads the telegram of regret from the government, for her only son-and the lad on the cruiser who's just seen his pal blown to hell in a loud flash—they too feel the impact of war, but they can't put their grief in a $5,000 lithograph and ask you to cry with them.

There is a dignity in silence.

Houses on the Belt

BY FRANCIS WESTBROOK, JR.

PREFABRICATION of houses will be the key to the greatest building boom this country has ever known. As the basis of a vast new industry, it will not only fill an important social need but enable the country to attain full employment after the war and a new level of industrial activity. The prefabrication of houses is no longer hypothetical. Much valuable experience has been gained in providing housing for war workers, and several of the largest corporations in America have definitely stated that after the peace they will go in for mass production of low-cost homes.

Many ingredients of a housing boom are already present. Some authorities estimate that to meet post-war requirements 2,000,000 dwellings will have to be built annually over a period of ten years. S. Morris Livingston, construction expert of the Department of Commerce, believes that, given full employment, the demand may be so great by 1945 that for several years a billion dollars' worth of construction will be needed.

Should an effective demand for anything like 2,000,000 houses a year develop, it is doubtful whether conventional builders could meet the challenge. The chances are that building costs would rise sharply and cut off a proportionate amount of the demand. This has always happened in the past, and in consequence there has never been any great replacement of private homes. If the greatest possible post-war building boom is to materialize, at least 4,000,000 non-farm homes with a rental value of less than $20 a month must be replaced. And to these should be added another 2,000,000 farm homes unfit for human needs.

To meet the challenge, past experience must be reversed. Building costs must be lowered, counter to the mounting demand. This can best be achieved, in the opinion of a growing number of architects and industrialists, by the extensive prefabrication of houses. At least fifty companies, some of them large organizations such as the Kaiser interests, Glen Martin, the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company, and the American Radiator Company, are planning to enter the field after the war. A number of these have laid out assembly lines and constructed units, confident that they can tap mass markets and bring low-cost houses to millions. A representative of the Goodyear Company told me that his firm expected to develop a business comparable to that of "some fair-sized automobile companies."

The chief argument in favor of prefabrication is that it brings mass-production methods into full play in house construction. The change is as revolutionary as the shift from the small-town carriage shops of the eighteenth century to the great automobile factories of today. The reduction in costs will be immense. Houses are built in sections at a factory and assembled on the building site. Walls, roofs, and floors are made in easily portable panels. Bathrooms, kitchens, heating systems, and rooms are prefabricated as units and made of standardized parts—just as are automobile engines, chassis, and bodies. Everything possible is done on the assembly line.

With houses as with other mass-produced merchandise, the lower the cost the more will be sold—provided the value is good. S. Morris Livingston has estimated that only one-third of the population, even with maximum employment, can pay more than $5,000 for a home. Another third can pay between $3,000 and $5,000, while the bottom third must get n house for less than $3,000. He also states that in the five years prior to the war more than half of the new houses cost more than $5,000 and about 40 per cent cost between $3,000 and $5,000. Thus the poorest third of our population got very few new dwellings during this period. The lower two thirds will provide the great mass markets of the future.

War-time experience, coupled with the estimates of manufacturers and architects, indicates that many kinds of prefabricated houses can be supplied for between $1,500 and $3,000, exclusive of land. These prices would be for three- or four-room dwellings suitable for a family of four. They should enable all but the poorest of our people to have decent homes.

In addition to the potential demand, there are other factors which will stimulate prefabrication. Chief among them is the wide range of new building materials developed just before and during the war. Many of these lend themselves to prefabrication through their strength and lightness. Plywood, glued together with powerful plastics, has the strength of some metals and is far more versatile than raw wood. Laminated plastics, using textiles or paper as a base, likewise achieve strength and versatility; they have a bright future in the fabrication of interior fixtures and possibly of wall panels. Light metals such as aluminum and magnesium, of which great supplies will be available at low prices, will find a place in the new homes. Windows can be made of transparent plastics of the type used in the noses and gun turrets of bombing planes. One company has designed model kitchen in which practically all fixtures and utensils are of glass. There also is a growing array of fabricated wall boards and roofing materials.

Competition among these materials should keep prices reasonably low. And the selection of specialized materials, each to be used only where it is best fitted, should result in better buildings. Some of the products, because they are different from anything used before, will permit desirable changes in design and construction. Unbreakable glass will make large windows more practical than heretofore. The great strength and low heat conductivity of other substances will make possible thinner, and therefore less expensive, walls.

Certain important groups are openly opposed to prefabrication, largely for selfish reasons. They object, for example, that all homes will look alike. This argument overlooks the obvious fact that the cheap craft-built houses in mill villages and the brick or brownstomhouses of our city blocks also look very much alike. Yet these dwellings are normally sold and rented without difficulty—often for prices far above their real worth.

Not all prefabricated houses, however, will be identical. Each manufacturer will presumably offer several models, perhaps changing them every so often, and of any particular model a great number of variations will be possible. Exteriors will be individualized by the number and arrangement of the rooms, interiors by the coloring used and by household furnishings. In Kaiser's Vanport City in the state of Washington, where some 20,000 shipbuilders are housed in almost identical units, variety has been obtained by grouping and landscaping.

Another objection one hears is that prefabricated houses have an exotic appearance. But the weird shapes of some of them, ranging from igloos to sausages, are not inherent in the method of fabrication; rather, they are symptomatic of the revolution through which the building industry is passing. The advanced architects are attempting to break free of tradition, to reduce waste, to obtain a maximum of functionalism. They are working with new materials and concepts. It is not strange that in some cases what appears to be good engineering practice should lose contact with aesthetics. For example, Buckminster Fuller has designed a round metal unit that looks like a brooder house. Two of these units are placed side by side, with connecting door, to make a home for four people. It is easily manufactured and easily set up. Its interior comfort, the cheapness with which it can be heated or cooled, its strength and durability are no doubt sound arguments in its favor. None the less, to me at least, it is not an object of beauty. But prefabricated houses need not be so extreme. Many of the designs do not differ greatly from conventional small dwellings.

No strong case can be made, however, against a general change in the appearance of the homes of the future. The first automobiles were built to look like horseless carriages, but the engineers soon found that a radically different "carriage" was required for the efficient operation of a gasoline engine. The public easily became accustomed to modern automobile design. Similarly a revolutionary change in house design may find rapid acceptance. Just because the new houses are different does not mean that they have no aesthetic value.

With the technicalities of prefabrication well mastered, the major difficulty appears to be distribution. The most efficient means of transportation and merchandising must be devised. Perhaps delivery can be by huge trailer trucks, like those which today carry three or four automobiles. For long hauls railway flat cars may be used.

The merchandising will probably be handled by local dealers who will be a sort of cross between an automobile dealer and a building supply-and-construction company.

Many builders and contractors believe that they are the ones who will lose most from widespread prefabrication. Instead of opposing the change they would do well to investigate the possibilities of dealing in readymade houses. As the salesmen of the new homes, they would have the work of erecting them and would be called on to make the repairs that will be needed inevitably. Most homes costing more than $5,000 will continue to be more or less craft-built, though on all levels of construction there will be a sharp movement toward prefabrication of such units as bathrooms, kitchens, playrooms, and heating systems. Since houses costing more than $5,000 have represented more than half of all construction in the recent past, the local contractor can expect to maintain a very substantial portion of his old business, to which he can add the new and probably lucrative occupation of dealing in prefabricated dwellings.

While the case for prefabrication is excellent, both economically and socially, several abuses are possible. The pre-war practice of the automobile manufacturers of changing models every year to induce people to buy new cars may be tried with houses. Bought on the instalment plan, they will seem almost as cheap as cars. Each year new designs may be advertised, and home owners may be encouraged to buy a new house, or a new kitchen or bedroom or living-room, on "easy terms." It may even occur to the less scrupulous that sales can be stimulated by making houses that will last only a few years.

Such practices could doom prefabrication and any extended building boom. A person buying a house must be reasonably certain that it will last, if not for a lifetime, at least for a long span of years, say long enough to raise a family. And since a prefabricated house can easily be enlarged by the addition of new prefabricated rooms, there is no reason for abandoning the original unit. It should be strong and durable—the basis for future growth. Nothing could be socially more unsettling than to have the nation living in three- or four-year houses. Prefabrication would degenerate into a racket.

But if these pitfalls can be avoided, prefabrication will usher in a new era in housing. "Shanty towns" will be replaced with communities of attractive homes costing from $1,500 up. If transportation keeps pace with the building revolution, slum clearance and decentralization will be vastly facilitated. Social planners have been working in this direction for years. Today important groups in industry realize that mass production of low-cost housing can provide a big "lift" to the postwar economy.

In the Wind

INVITED TO ATTEND a mass-meeting for Vice-President Wallace some months ago, Mayor Kelly of Chicago begged off in some embarrassment, explaining feebly that he would be at his summer home. On his return he discovered that without benefit of the party machine Wallace enthusiasts had filled Chicago Stadium to overflowing. Ever since, he has been offering city appointments to individuals who arranged the meeting.

HAMILTON FISH recently appeared before the executive board of the American Legion in a hopeful effort to have the board rescind the Legion's official condemnation of his conduct. Louis Johnson, former national commander, got wind of the appeal, and when Fish appeared he was confounded by the mass of material presented to show how he had extended the use of his franking privilege to subversive individuals. The board refused to rescind its condemnation.

NOTE OF HOPE: Marion Drew, astrology editor for the New York Daily News, offers her followers the following prediction: "During 1944 this smiling planet (Jupiter) will enter the sign of Virgo, and after the month of July there will be a change in the setup of these steady winners. Some new names will appear, such as Crown Prince Humbert of Italy, King Peter of Yugoslavia, Herr Hitler, Marshal Pétain, and Nazi Foreign Minister von Ribbentrop. All these men have been having a hard time of it lately, because they have felt Uranus and Saturn primarily, but they will get a new lease upon recalcitrant people and personal affairs late in the summer, and will benefit thereby."

THE INTERIOR MINISTRY OF SOUTH AFRICA announced a ban on the July 5 issue of Life, showing pictures of the Detroit riots, three months after the magazine was received and distributed.

SCRAMBLED METAPHOR OF THE WEEK: If the victorious Allies, warns former Ambassador Joseph C. Grew, try to put "a fence around Japan and let her stew in her own juice, they will be creating a festering sore." Or Suykuyaki.

FESTUNG EUROPA: A fight in a Vienna street car between Nazis and anti-Nazis assumed such proportions that traffic was halted in one section of the city and was not resumed until the following day. . . . At Narvik, Norway, four of the city's most enthusiastic young Nazis, including the son of the National Socialist mayor, were arrested recently for the theft of a large quantity of tobacco and cigarettes.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Who Will Rule France?

BY JULES MOCH

[Jules Moch, whose third article we publish below, recently arrived in Algiers to take his place in the French Consultative Assembly. Although partial comments concerning the subject with which Mr. Moch deals have appeared in the American press, this article is the first direct and authorized statement by a leading French politician who is playing an active part in the building of the new France.]

In PREVIOUS articles I have described the birth and growth of the resistance movement in France, its present strength among all classes of the people, and the coordination of the various underground organizations that has been achieved. Within France they are united in the Central Council of Resistance, and at Algiers they are represented in the Consultative Assembly. All recognize General de Gaulle as their leader. I come now to the question of how France, with eighty-nine of its departments administered by a pseudo-government under the enemy's orders and with four, together with the empire, excepting Indo-China, under the Algiers committee, can reestablish a regular government and constitutional order after its liberation.

The French people realize with bitterness that their country today has an international standing lower than that of the least of the Allied governments, that the man who personifies its aspirations does not enjoy abroad the authority which he exercises in France, and that the man who symbolizes the enemy is still recognized as Chief of State by some neutral governments. But they hold resolutely to certain principles with which I think my foreign readers are in full agreement:

- 1. The defeat of the Axis is only a matter of time. Whether Nazism goes down under the blows of the Red Army or as the result of an Anglo-American invasion, whether its fall is brought about by a revolution at home, by a sudden collapse of German morale, or by a general uprising of all the oppressed peoples, one point is indisputable: Nazism will disappear; the Germans will evacuate France.
- 2. Nowhere will the Vichy regime last an hour after the departure of the last German. Corsica confirms this. The men of Vichy will be swept out or will give up their offices of their own accord. The mayors named by Pétain, his prefects, and his ministers will seek safety in flight or as in Corsica pretend to a change of heart which will deceive no one. Sooner or later all vestiges of the enemy occupation and the "new order" will simultaneously disappear. No Frenchman questions that—not even the servants of Vichy.

3. France will of course be unable to get along without a government, but it could not, even temporarily, consent to a foreign military administration. In the battle areas and along the lines of communication the Allied Command must be allowed the widest powers—France recognized this in all the accords freely signed with its allies in 1914 and in 1939-but these powers will not extend to the administration of regions removed from the front, and certainly not to any control over the national government. No such control will be set up, first, because France is a sovereign state, secondly, because the Allied military authorities will dispose of neither the necessary effectives nor the necessary competence, and, finally, because such a course of action would do immeasurable harm to cordial relations between the allies and prevent the attainment of a just and lasting peace.

Local government will present no serious difficulties. In some places it will be reestablished as it existed before Vichy, in response to popular demand. In others the resistance forces will have already selected their men.

As for regional government, a de facto authority will have to administer each section as it is liberated. Both the enemies and the allies of France have been haunted by the fear that the Communists might seize power in Paris, the Socialists in Lille, non-political or Gaullist groups in a third city, and so on, while Pétain and Laval held fast at Vichy. Nothing like that will happen. The French are united; the unity achieved in the resistance movement is the proof. A single government will rule all France. And from the start it will receive such unanimous support as was never accorded to its predecessors. The rule of the victorious resistance will be uncontested.

The head of the central government can be none other than General de Gaulle. No other political or military leader enjoys the same prestige and authority. De Gaulle is not only necessary; he is the only possible choice.

Some may ask how I, a parliamentary republican, a Socialist who after the meticulous examination of his conscience permitted by prison life has renounced none of his former political convictions, can thus consent to raise one man to power. I can do so because I am thinking only of France. If De Gaulle was ever ambitious for personal power, the unanimous resolve of the French to rebuild their country in freedom has shown him the futility of such aspirations. Moreover, he has stated his position unequivocally. He has said that he will restore the ballot to the French people and that they shall choose their own government. We can trust both De Gaulle and the people. The man will keep his promise; the country, if the need arises, will insist on it.

We must view the problem realistically. When liberation comes, France must have a government. It must have a French government. The only man capable of preserving the existing unity among the resistance forces is De Gaulle. In the beginning, therefore, he must shoulder the burden of governing France.

The government of liberated France, if it is to reflect the country's wishes, will consist of men of the resistance movements, men representing all the political parties within the resistance. The changes in the personnel of the National Committee of Liberation which took place early in November point in this direction.

Like the Algiers committee this government will proclaim itself to be merely provisional. It will have no constitutional basis, and its task and its mandate will be essentially temporary. It would have a constitutional basis only if it were confirmed by the old Parliament or designated by a new constituent assembly. But any action taken by the Parliament of July, 1940, to lend its sanction to the new government would simply discredit that government in public opinion. With the exception of the eighty who opposed Pétain and a few others who joined the struggle against the invader later, the deputies and senators of the old Parliament disqualified themselves when they granted unlimited powers to the Marshal and in so doing struck down the republic which they were elected to defend. To save their skins they would probably vote for De Gaulle with enthusiasm, but public opinion would be so disgusted by the spectacle that no profit would accrue to the government. The Vichy assembly is forever dishonored.

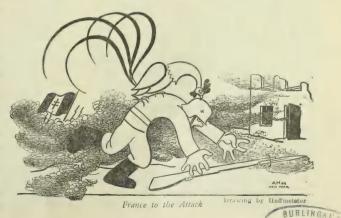

It would be worse than a mistake to resuscitate it.

Nor could the government be designated by a constituent assembly. A constituent assembly is chosen in general elections, and before any elections can be held there must be a central government to issue the call for them. Moreover, these elections could not in any case be held immediately. For the past three years France—and this is a fact its friends should not forget—has been divided into many parts and has suffered many kinds of martyrdom. The forbidden zone (Nord, Pas de Calais, etc.) has been attached to the military command in Belgium. Alsace and Lorraine have been annexed to Germany, and their citizens have been incorporated directly into the German army. The coastal area and the industrial centers of the occupied zone have undergone frequent aerial bombing and have been partially evacuated. The zone left unoccupied by the armistice was overrun by the Germans in November, 1942, and some departments in the south were under Italian rule from November, 1942, to September, 1943. Two million prisoners and forced laborers have been held in Germany. Some three or four hundred thousand Jews have been subjected to inhuman brutalities. Three departments in Algeria were liberated from Vichy by the Anglo-American landing without having been occupied previously by the enemy. The department of Corsica was liberated in September, 1943, by French troops and native patriots after ten months of Italian-German occupation. Finally there have been the Free French of London, those of the Leclerc and Larminat Corps, and the personnel of the Free French naval and air forces.

Amid such confusion and ruin how could France possibly proceed to hold elections immediately after the liberation? How, for example, could the French prisoners be expected to vote intelligently after such a long period of isolation from French thought? But if the elections should not be called too early, neither can they be too long delayed without engendering other evils. The pre-election period should not be measured in days nor yet in years, but rather in months.

French sovereignty emanates from the nation; this is a fundamental principle of the Revolution. Any definitive and permanent French government must be set up by the people through the exercise of their right of universal suffrage. As we have seen, this right cannot be exercised until a certain period of time has elapsed, and therefore the first government of liberated France will be necessarily temporary and provisional.

However, It transition Cabinet will be obliged to make decisions whose effects will be felt far beyond the present. For many of the problems confronting it there will be no precedents in French history. In another article I will discuss these problems and the circumspection with which they must be approached.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

POR more than a year the German regime made no prophecies about the war. In fact, it took great pains to avoid any definite promise of success in any specified operation. The unfortunate sequence to the announcement that Stalingrad was sure to fall—"you can depend on that"—was an effective deterrent. Of late, however, this hard-and-fast rule has been broken, and the Propaganda Ministry has been pouring out predictions about two coming military events.

One is the great Allied invasion. There is no attempt to deny that it is coming. On the contrary, Goebbels told the chiefs of the propaganda bureaus on December 14 that the Allies "have no other course than to make a desperate attempt at an invasion." But "we welcome it," he said, for "inevitably it will end, like Dunkirk and Dieppe, in a tremendous loss of life for them." The invading armies will be driven back into the sea; on this point the Goebbels propaganda has taken a firm stand.

The other definite prediction concerns Germany's secret weapon. Practically every day one of the top men of the regime finds some occasion to speak of the imminent use of this new weapon and to assert that it will mark the "turning-point of the air war." The government has pledged this so positively that a good observer like the Berlin correspondent of the Swiss Bund is of the opinion that the battle in which its promises are put to the test will have a decisive effect on morale. "The air offensive against England," he wrote on December 15, "will be the touchstone of German hopes. The people expect it to bring the cessation of British air attacks. If the prophesied 'turning-point' fails to materialize, the psychological effect will be devastating. The regime says continually, 'We are sure of the decisive effect of our new weapon.' So the German people await it with impatience, but also with anxiety. All their thoughts are concentrated on it."

The same correspondent gives a picture of the destruction in Berlin at the middle of December:

Areas as large as medium-sized towns have been reduced to dust and ashes by incendiaries and to a lesser extent by explosive bombs. The outer suburbs have been almost as badly hit as the center of the city. On some principal streets three or four miles long not a single house is standing. Many houses have been burned to the ground.

Any reconstruction work during the war is out of the question. For that reason there has not been much cleaning up in the most heavily bombed cities. The streets are cleared for traffic, but elsewhere piles of debris are allowed to remain.

The Berliners have shown remarkable composure. There is no hysteria. As soon as an alarm is over, people start covering their-windows with cardboard, for it is very cold and it may be months before glass can be obtained. There is no use waiting for workmen to mend a roof. Members of the family must do what they can to cover the holes. Electricity and gas are still lacking in the hardest-hit sections. Telephones do not work, and hardly trickle comes from the water pipes.

He concludes with a statement that is doubly interesting for its novelty. "Strangely enough," he says, "among most Berliners the determination to resist has become stronger." After the first raids there was a great deal of defeatism. People were ready to do anything to save the city and their belongings. But now that so much has been destroyed their reactions are different. "Everyone realizes that a defeated Germany could not rebuild the city or reimburse the property-owners for even 1 per cent of the damage. The middle class, like the great masses, would be reduced to pitiful poverty. People have decided, therefore, to keep quiet and give the regime its chance."

January 15 will be a black day for German children—and for the soldiers too. No more sweets of any kind will be manufactured after that date. For some months the supply of cocoa has been completely exhausted and no chocolate products have been made. Now sugar, which is plentiful in the Reich, will have to plug the hole made in the food supply by the failure of the potato crop. Human beings are to have their potato rations reduced 25 per cent, and pigs are to get sugar beets instead of potatoes. That means no sugar for candy.

In Leipzig at the beginning of December all barracks were surrounded one morning by the Gestapo and, after all means of communication with the outside world had been cut, thoroughly searched. This action, reported in the Aftonbladet of December 10, is so far as we know the first taken by the Gestapo, that is, the S. S., against an army unit. Not less interesting is the fact that the Gestapo found in the barracks a great quantity of leaflets calling on the soldiers to desert. "To save your life, join the National Peace Movement," one sentence ran. The appeal was signed by the "Committee for Peace and Liberty." No further details were obtained by the Swedish newspaper. Nothing could be learned about who had taken the leaflets into the barracks, how much effect they had had, or what else was discovered.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE HORROR SILENTLY WALKING ...

BY F. C. WEISKOPF

LTHOUGH the Nazis set up, immediately after seizing A power, an elaborate system of censorship and control over the whole field of literature, fiction and poetry could never be coordinated to the same degree as journalism or education. A good many of the writers who for one reason or another remained in Germany and had to become members of the Reichsverband Deutscher Schriftsteller still managed to find a way to avoid following the line of the "new decalogue of literature," as Hanns Johst called the prescription of the Reichskulturkammer, the "spiritual Elite Guard of Adolf Hitler." This way of escape led into "timelessness": the new Germany of National Socialism was simply ignored in the works of these writers, who took refuge in the remote spheres of history, myth, dream, fairy tale, pure nature, idyllic peace-time life. Even this form of opposition was not without danger. The Deutsche Rundschau, a literary and political review which printed too many contributions of the timeless kind, had to cease publication. One of the few really gifted young authors, E. G. Winkler, "committed suicide." And Ernst Wiechert, another author of considerable talent, twice experienced the rigors of the concentration camp at Dachau. Still, the hunger of hundreds of thousands of readers for books which are not "full of the present and the reality of the Greater German Reich" is so great that the publishers continue to bring out many new "timeless" works, as well as an extraordinarily increased number of reprints of the classics and of translations.

The magazine Das Deutsche Wort said some time before the outbreak of the present war:

One can state that about ten new books have reached the 30,000, 40,000, and 60,000 mark. Where are the other five hundred books? What has happened to the publishing business? The reader notes five or six names of writers wandering helplessly in the labyrinth of literature; the others are condemned to obscurity. No wonder that those who languish in obscurity try to make up for a lack of quality by quantity in order to attract at least some notice. Already publishers have drawn their conclusions from this state of chaos and are ceasing to publish books by new authors or new books at all.

And in answer to the question "What are the writers of Greater Germany writing about?" the magazine makes the following confession:

They manufacture. We are aware that we are formulating a general reproach, even an accusation, in using this word—140 biographies and biographical novels, 350 novels (90 of them love stories). Must one retreat into the past in order to describe the present? Are we living under the Holy Inquisition, which forced the men of science and art to write allegories and to transfer the movement of the earth around the sun to Mars? This is the century of the novel. But nowhere is the crisis of literature more evident to the reader than in the novel. Most novels are so feeble that they simply cannot be sold after Christmas. The big city as a literary theme is systematically neglected. Yet books about the big city are as necessary as books about peasant life. The vogue for "blood and soil" faded rapidly; only those authors are read who wrote good peasant novels before. . . . That is the reason we have so many novels which are not epic fiction but trash.

As the conflict dragged on, and as the newspapers began to hint at a new Thirty Years' War, the escape from reality in German fiction and poetry sometimes took a strange turn. Mysticism and apocalyptic visions made their appearance with increasing frequency, and there are clear symptoms that fear of the future is haunting the German heart.

Bruno Brehm, one of the earlier converts to Nazism and an ardent propagandist for Hitler in Austria and the Sudeten territory prior to their occupation, has written a series of stories about the "eternal German soldier." There we find this confession: "We are accused of loving death. But we love death only because we are seeds put into the earth for great future. . . . But what if the sowing was in vain? Oh, never mind, never mind!" Here, fear is only hinted at. It is fully pictured in historical camouflage in a novel by Brehm's old friend Werner Bergengrün, "Am Himmel wie auf Erden" ("In Heaven as on Earth"). Dealing with a "world's-end panic" caused by a false astrological prediction in 1524, Bergengrün feasts on horror. For him fear is a sickness which cannot be avoided by denying it. It is a plague which threatens to destroy "everything, the state, the authority, the faith, heroism, loyalty . . . and nothing remains but the wish to escape the gurgling waters of the deluge."

Of particular significance is the last work of Ernst Jünger. This intelligent and fanciful writer, long before Hitler's ascent to power, had glorified war and destruction and cruelty. He preached, with all the refined methods of a gifted modern author, a sort of heroic nihilism. He was, together with Wiechert, the center of a group of nationalistic writers of some literary merit-Schauwecker, Ernst von Salomon, Giesclher Wiersing. They had been clamoring for the Third Reich as Möller Van Bruck had visualized it, but they dropped out of the ranks of the Nazi literary army soon after the Third Reich of Adolf Hitler had been established. One after the other became silent or turned to timelessness. "What do we know?" laments Salomon, "We know nothing. We only know that we are to be thrown into the mêlée, that this is our fate, and we are ready to fulfil it." Ernst Jünger seems not to be as ready to fulfil this fate as Salomon. In his last novel, "Auf den Marmorklippen" ("On the Marble Cliffs") he sums up in an allegorical and mystical guise his idea of the failure of Nazism. It is the story of two friends, former officers, living in a sort of voluntary exile after a "victoriously lost war," and becoming involved in a new war, a gigantic upheaval brought about by the diabolic machinations of a dictator whose real strength is not so great but who is helped by the fear he is able to instil. Jünger describes with · certain relish the orgies of fear organized by the dictator in order to prepare the way for aggression. At the end the two friends have to leave for a new, and this time real, exile, taking with them the newly acquired wisdom that it is the "word before whose flashing stroke the power of tyrants pales; three in one are Word, Freedom, and Spirit." The publisher took pains to admonish the novel's readers not to see in it an allegorical picture of the present and not to draw cheap comparisons. Still we can hardly understand how such a book was published in the Reich of Hitler and Goebbels unless we assume that the censorship looked upon it as a sort of safety-valve. That the book met a real demand seems proved by the fact that it went through several large printings in spite of its rather complicated style and dark theme.

The fears creeping into the heart of the "armored nation"—to use the phrase of Baldur von Schirach—are reflected even more directly in poetry than in prose fiction. There are sometimes confessions of an astounding courage or naivete:

Und unser Wort, So lang gewöhnt zu lügen, Es taugt nicht mehr Zum heiligen Gesang

And our word, So long attuned to lying, Is no more fit For holy songs

These verses of Josef Leitgeb are matched by the poetry of Herbert Sailer, a member of the Hitler Youth. This young poet, who had been acclaimed by the Nazis as a new literary star, lately turned away from war songs full of fluttering flags and triumphant bugles and began to express feelings of loneliness and mourning:

Das Haus ist leer, das Bett verwaist Verwaist sind Tisch and Bank. Die Blumen, die im Fenster stehn, Sind alle blind und krank. Das Haus ist stumm. Die Nacht geht um, Und ist von lautem Gang. Es ist ein armer, bitsrer Trost, Dass mir dies Wort gelang.

The house is empty, the bed is deserted, Deserted are table and bench. The flowers standing at the window Are all blind and sick. The house is mute. The night is on And has a loud step. It is a poor and bitter consolation That I succeeded in writing this.

It is indeed a poor and bitter comfort for m German poet inside Germany in the fifth year of Hitler's war. And it is m comfort which cannot last long, for the fear, the great fear, comes creeping from the front.

Es winken ringsum Hügel Mit einem Kreuzchen drauf . . .

There are hills around
With little crosses on top . . .

This line from one of the most popular new soldiers' songs is significant. In the diaries found on the bodies of dead soldiers of the annihilated Stalingrad army there were verses like these:

Kein Ende schimmert namenloser Qual Und Winter ist, wo Hossen einmal war No end shines out to nameless misery, And only winter is where once hope was.

And there is also the outcry of an unknown admirer and disciple of that splendid poet Hölderlin, who has enchanted so many generations of German youth:

Wir verstanden den Tod nicht,
Dennoch wie Salz und Brot,
Wie Schwee am Dezembertag,
War sein Name um uns,
Und die Trauer gewöhnlich,
Wie Schlaf uns und Hunger,
Wie Angst im Zwiellicht gewöhnlich war.

We did not understand death.
Nevertheless, its name was around us
Like salt and bread,
Like snow on a December day.
And the mourning was usual
As sleep and hunger became usual to us,
As fear in the twilight.

But it is not the unknown soldier alone who is seized by the fear. Gerhard Schumann, a Nazi writer whose work has been honored several times by the Ministry of Propaganda, a member of the Storm Troops and an army lieutenant, begins a poem called "Ein Mann allein" ("A Man Alone") as follows:

In Frankreich sangen wir Lieder. In Russland wurden wir stumm. Vor uns schritt schweigend das Grauen. Manchmal sah es sich um.

In France we were singing songs. In Russia we fell silent. Before us silently the horror was walking. Sometimes it looked back at us.

The horror silently walking in front of them will look back at ever-shortening intervals until one day it will face about.

Romanticism of Jacques Barzun

ROMANTICISM AND THE MODERN EGO. By Jacques Barzun. An Atlantic Monthly Press Book. Little, Brown and Company. $2.75.

ROMANTICISM AND THE MODERN EGO" consists of eight lively essays on the nature, reputation, and value of romanticism in the modern world. Mr. Barzun begins by complaining that the term "romantic" is used in too many different and incompatible senses and by rejecting previous definitions of the word. Historical romanticism, he says, was an attempt to solve the problems of the dissolving eighteenth century. The barriers of classical correctness were

BORZOI BOOKS

of Lasting Distinction

METAPOLITICS

From the Romantics to Hitler

by Peter Viereck. An original and brilliantly revealing study of National Socialism's hidden roots.

$3.00

THE LAW OF CIVILIZATION AND DECAY

by Brooks Adams. A classic of American intellectual history with a superb introductory essay by Charles A. Beard. $3.50

THE WORLD OF SHOLOM ALEICHEM

by Maurice Samuel. "An extraordinary revelation of spiritual riches hitherto buried for most of us in the Yiddish tongue."— GEORGE SHUSTER, President, Hunter College.
$4.00

THE DEMOCRATIC SPIRIT

A Collection of American Writings.from the Earliest Times to the Present Day

Edited by Bernard Smith. A new, wartime edition of the famous 940-page anthology of America's great democratic writings. $3.75

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

A Study in the History of Political Ideas

by Carl Becker. The definitive study of America's greatest political document. $3.00

THIS WAS CICERO

Modern Politics in a Roman Toga

by H. J. Huskell. A full, readable and timely picture of one of the greatest—and most misunderstood—of the great Romans.

Illustrated. $3.00

THE STRUGGLE FOR JUDICIAL SUPREMACY

by Justice Robert H. Jackson. A brilliant historical study by the former Attorney General and Solicitor General of the United States.
$3.00

MODERN RUSSIAN HISTORY

From the Age of Catherine the Great to the End of the Nineteenth Century

by Alexander Kornilov. A classic in its field, with a new bibliography. $4.50

AMERICAN POLITICAL PARTIES

Their Natural History

by Wilfred E. Binkley. "The most comprehensive, useful and sagacious outline of American politics so far written."—Bernard DeVoto. $3.75

THE BRITISH EMPIRE BEFORE THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION

by Lawrence Henry Gipson. This is history in the grand manner. Five volumes are now ready; a sixth is in preparation. $5.00 each.

These books may be examined at any bookstore.

ALFRED · A · KNOPF · 501 Madison Avenue · New York 22

down, and broader human horizons were revealed. No longer confined to a prescribed nobility or a prescribed melancholy, man became freshly aware of the range of joy and sorrow, strength and weakness, good and evil. Hence the energy and robustness of the romantics, their moral enthusiasm, their belief in the potentialities of original genius.

At first, says Mr. Barzun, romanticism strove after a new synthesis of experience, but later it was simplified, falsified, reduced to a single term by some schools of thought: for instance, by the realists, who stood for "force without principle, matter without mind, mechanism without life"; and by the moderns, whose exclusiveness, preciosity, and yearning for the aristocracy of past ages is romantic in the vulgarthat is, the partial-sense. Romanticism subsided into simplification. Mr. Barzun points to two stages: (A) romanticism proper (1780-1850); (B) partial romanticism, which he subdivides as (1) realism (1850-1885), (2) symbolism and (the opposite simplification) naturalism (1875-1905). (B) is a revolt against (A), though a revolt of son against father; in the same way (B2) is a revolt against (B1). What has happened since 1905? In this book, though not elsewhere, Mr. Barzun stresses the vices and deficiencies of modernism: the "affectation of toughness" of Pound, the "rather uncertain whistling" of Cummings, the "collegiate inventiveness" of Eliot, above all a morbid growth in selfconsciousness or mauvaise honte. The small productivity of ■ Valéry is attributed less to perfectionism than to spiritual anemia. There has been nothing new. All modern movements have been refinements upon symbolism or upon naturalism-refinements, that is, upon refinements.

Mr. Barzun has reopened the discussion of romanticism and put it on a broader basis. Some will see the prime merit of his book as a destructive one. In pointing to the confusion of most considerations of romanticism, Mr. Barzun, it is to be hoped, has removed many half-baked notions and illconsidered preconceptions. He has also openly and reasonably challenged many views which have customarily been defended or attacked only by the tricks and snobbish gestures of modern critical method. But to me the positive element is greater than the negative. Mr. Barzun's contributions to recent discussion have all tended to one great revaluationthe revaluation of the nineteenth century. He has gone about his task in two ways: first by taking the cue from recent biographers and emphasizing the scope and intelligence of romantic endeavors; next by trying, in the light of modern scholarship, to see the nineteenth century as a whole. Drooping Ariels and ineffectual angels are forgotten. Mr. Barzun's nineteenth century is a rich and varied one which could not possibly be reduced to a formula. He interweaves the strands of national traditions, of politics, the plastic arts, music, and literature with remarkable skill.

The book has of course its limitations. One is brevity. Overcompression forces Mr. Barzun to mention too many names. There are also many challenging statements left entirely unelaborated—such as that "Faust" is the Bible of romanticism, "Madame Bovary" the Bible of realism. A further disadvantage of Mr. Barzun's synoptic method is that it practically rules out analysis of single works or even single authors, and interpretation comes to seem sketchy or superficial even when it is not so. A more serious limitation is

Mr. Barzun's anti-classicism. Despite many provisos and modifiers, the book gives the impression that romanticism is right and classicism wrong. Why is this? Perhaps Mr. Barzun's dislike of present-day classicism leads him astray, or, more probably, it is his genuine talent for polemics that drives him to present as argument what might be better as analysis. The following is typical in tone: "... Romanticism declined to be deceived by the sleight-of-hand with which classicism pretends that the truth has been found and can be handed to each shareholder in its limited-liability company. Classicism forgets that. . . . " Mr. Barzun weakens his case by so openly taking sides. The futility of Irving Babbitt's book arose from its so obviously saying, "The romantics' philosophy was different from mine. Therefore I repudiate them." Nowhere does Mr. Barzun actually maintain this kind of thesis, but in many places he seems, by nuance, joke, or epigram, to assume it.

It could of course be said that the philosophy which Mr. Barzun defends—that of William James—is not dogmatic like Babbitt's but rather a complete rejection of the dogmatic method. Yet lack of dogma can itself become a dogma, and sometimes Mr. Barzun is close to pronouncing a doom on all who are not followers of James. Like the dogmatist too, he grows lyrical over the prospects for his own cause: "For, the next time or the next, men will find the strength to throw away their ideal props and to stand up in the open, forsaking safety like those practical romanticists who, against all reason, though served by reason, forsook the earth and learned how solid was the sky." I happen very cordially to share these hopes of Mr. Barzun's. It is harder to share his faith.

Finally, though I think Mr. Barzun's description of early romanticism accurate, his definitions serviceable, and his judgments suggestive, I am not satisfied with his treatment of the period 1850 to the present. His emphasis on the earlier period prompts the highly dubious conclusion that the romantic revolt was not only a greater innovation in the cultural tradition than the work of the later years but also richer in achievement. The latter part of the century has, it seems to me, been very much underrated by cultural historians, who usually accommodate it with some such word as decadent and pass on. But Mr. Barzun, as one knows from other writings, is aware of the extraordinary vitality of that age. In literature alone what period in modern history can offer more than Nietzsche, Tolstoi, Dostoevski, Strindberg, Ibsen, and Shaw? Yet Ibsen, Strindberg, and Tolstoi are mentioned only once apiece in a book that reinterprets nineteenth-century culture. The fact is not necessarily decisive in itself, but it does suggest that Mr. Barzun has not taken us as far in the study of the modern ego as he takes us in the study of romanticism. It was not, perhaps, his aim to do so; but one hopes that soon it will be his aim and the aim of other historical critics.

A century of criticism and scholarship has gone into the elaboration of the idea of romanticism; though the diversity of the discussion has confused many, it should not be imagined that the history of culture can be evaluated without discussion. The years to come will see the investigation of the idea of modernity, which includes the lesser idea of modernism. The investigators may go back as far as Giordano

Bruno; they will have to go back to the romantics; but these are ancestors and forerunners. The real point of departure is the second half of the nineteenth century, the extraordinary generation of men which I have mentioned. It may even be, though it is as yet impossible to judge, that what is for Mr. Barzun the third stage of romanticism-namely, the age of symbolism and naturalism-will seem to later generations a more radical departure and a more productive venture than the revolt of Wordsworth and Hugo. If so, interestingly enough, in the van of this greatest cultural revolution of modern times will be-William James.

ERIC RUSSELL BENTLEY

Official-but Not Dull

TARGET: GERMANY. The Army Air Forces' Official Story of the VIII Bomber Command's First Year Over Europe. Simon and Schuster in Cooperation with Life. Paper, $1: Cloth, $2.

THE war books divide themselves into three classes on the basis of origin: (1) those written-or ghostwritten-by combatants; (2) those written by newspaper observers, which are semi-official in the sense that the manuscripts are subject to direct or indirect censorship approval; and (3) the official books published with government sponsorship whose authors are not permitted to sign their names lest the impersonal authority of the government be tainted. The last-named class of books originated in this war when the British Air Ministry was shrewd enough to assign Hilary St. George Saunders to write an air-warfare series which turned out to be immensely popular both because of the information which the books contained and because of the subsidized inexpensiveness of the finished product. The official book has one great advantage over either the semi-official newspaperman's book or the personalized combatant's book: the anonymous author has access to governmental records and therefore is able to see the picture more nearly complete. On the other hand, the official book usually has two large disadvantages, both deriving from the presence of goldbraided editors breathing down the writer's neck. First, it is apt to be written in the dull but authentic manner of a White Paper; and, second, it must advocate the point of view of the military group currently in the ascendancyotherwise its author would be transferred to the R. O. T. C. in New Mexico.

"Target: Germany" is America's first effort at an official book written for the best-seller market. The government was shrewd enough to take Simon and Schuster and Lifetimeman Luce into partnership. The book deserves to be a best seller. It completely upsets the tradition that government-blessed publications must be as dull as White Papers. It is not dull; on the contrary, it is the most absorbing aviation book that has come out of the war so far, including those written by reporters, by ghost-writers, and by fliers themselves. No other book, no news dispatch, has given the reader so vivid a feeling of riding an American bomber out of England into enemy territory.

The delicate question does arise, however, as to whether

26th WFFK

"As magnificent as any film has ever been." -N. Y. Times

PARAMOUNT'S

WHOM TH

CONTINUOUS PERFORMANCES

No Seats Reserved

DOORS OPEN AT 10:30 A. M.

Will not be shown at regular admission prices until 1945

B'wav & 49th St.

Nation Readers are cordially invited to attend a luncheon in honor of

HON. M. J. COLDWELL, M.P.

Parliamentary Leader of the C.C.F. in Canadian House of Commons

HOTEL COMMODORE 42nd Street & Lexington Ave., N. Y. City Saturday, January 15, 12:30

Subject: Canadian Progressive Forces on the March

DR. GEORGE S. COUNTS, Chairman Purchase tickets at once from LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY, Inc. 112 East 19th Street New York City 3, N. Y.

Luncheon Tickets: $2.50

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION 55 Fifth Avenue

New York 3. N. Y.

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscrib-ers should give us at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine. ☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8 3 Years $11 ☐ Introductory Offer: 13 Weeks for $1

Remittance is inclosed

Canada $1 m year extra Foreign $1 m year extra

Pan American Union requires no extra postage

NAME ..... ADDRESS .....

official history can be presented objectively while the guns are still firing. From a strategical point of view the work of the United States Army Eighth Air Force based in England has not yet emerged from controversial status. The Royal Air Force has been making enormous, spectacular night raids that blanket whole cities. The U. S. A. A. F. has been going out on a few clear days each month to do pin-point jobs.

A pin-point job is one in which the superior American bombsight enables the fliers, theoretically at least, to destroy a particular German factory making a particular war gadget. The question is whether the Nazi factory actually was destroyed beyond repair, and the full answer cannot come until after the war. The question was raised by the British. They asked: Wouldn't it be better if American fliers were retrained for night bombing, and the planes adapted, so they could do blanket raiding by night when enemy fighters are least effective?

"Target: Germany" replies that American planes with their pin-point attacks are doing a complementary day job at least comparable in effectiveness to the R. A. F. wholesale night jobs. Facts are skilfully marshaled to make the reply convincing. Probably the thesis is correct. Nevertheless, the book is a very able presentation of one side—but only one day a government may conceivably sponsor a book which bites right into an argument and boldly presents both sides.

The book has a chapter which is derisive of armchair strategists at home, presumably meaning the so-called military experts who earnestly try to explain the war to newspaper, magazine, and radio audiences. No doubt these far-away military critics do lay themselves open to ridicule at times. One reason is that the army, the navy, and the air force are so chary about sharing the facts. The armed services probably wish they could abolish back-seat drivers and do away with civilian opinion. They have pretty well learned that this is impossible; and in presenting a book such as "Target: Germany" they have taken a long and entertaining step toward supplying facts needed for intelligent opinion. The authors of an official book, however, have a heavy responsibility to be careful that it seeks merely to inform, not to mold, public opinion. MARCUS DUFFIELD

A Working Democracy

NEW ZEALAND. By Walter Nash. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $3.50.

FTER his arrival in Washington in January, 1942, as New Zealand's Minister, it took Walter Nash but short time to gain a solid reputation as a liberal spokesman. He poured out a stream of articles and speeches, all forthright, all liberal in tone, all reflecting, to those familiar with New Zealand, the particular "line" New Zealand Labor has developed in recent years and applied as the government of the country since 1935. So publicity-wise did Mr. Nash prove himself that the American public could be forgiven for concluding that Walter Nash was New Zealand and New Zealand Walter Nash.

This book helps confirm that impression. Of its 313 pages, 33 are given over to a sketch of Mr. Nash's career by Eric Estorick and 120 to his personal essays on war and post-war problems. Of the remainder 39 are devoted to sketches of New Zealand's history and present condition and 117 to an analysis of New Zealand at war from Mr. Nash's pen and consequently in large part a statement of his views on the subject. The book is therefore not so much a presentation of New Zealand as of Mr. Nash and his New Zealand.

I say all this not to scoff, for I have the friendliest feelings both for Mr. Nash and New Zealand, but to give the reader a clear idea what the book contains. No one who has ever sat with Mr. Nash in his office in Wellington and listened to him talk about the policies he was charged with administering can ever thereafter doubt that he has been close to the heart of New Zealand's Labor government, or that the man at the heart was anything other than a master administrator. Mr. Nash's lucid spoken analysis of the problems and the Labor solutions of them, so many of which he sponsored, has its written counterpart in this book. It is, above all, masterpiece of reasoned and reasonable exposition. But when I went away from the Parliament buildings and called upon the major sources of opposition to Labor in Wellington, Auckland, and elsewhere, or read their blasts in pamphlets and newspapers, I found a hatred of Labor and Mr. Nash which in virulence far surpassed anything I had observed against the New Deal at home. What I find in this book is, therefore, Mr. Nash as he appears in his office and, presumably, to his Labor associates. What I do not find is the Mr. Nash the opposition sees and execrates. Not that I admire the opposition-far from it-but if a rounded portrait of Mr. Nash and of New Zealand is wanted, the opposition should be represented. Within its limits, the book is firstrate, but what lies outside the limits is also necessary to an understanding of New Zealand.

What Mr. Nash says is, in drastic summary, this: New Zealand is a small country dependent for its well-being upon the world market prices of dairy products, meat, and wool. The downswings of these prices have caused intense suffering. Traditionally New Zealanders have believed that the state can and should take action to correct economic difficulties and injustices. The Labor Party has utilized this widespread conviction to try to realize (a) security for ownerproducers by guaranteed prices and state responsibility for marketing, (b) planned diversification of production, especially through expansion of manufacturing, and (c) an elaborate social-security system with benefits for all. To reach these objectives Labor had, before the war, elaborated a system of economic and financial controls which, when war broke out, served admirably to facilitate an intensive war effort which has won New Zealand honor at home and abroad. After the war New Zealand will resume its campaign for security and will hope that all other nations will move in similar direction. "New Zealand today," the book says, "offers a practical example of the kind of social organization-the kind of laws and institutions-that may well become typical of most democracies tomorrow." There is indeed reason so to believe, but I would like to call attention to the fact that it was while contemplating life from a post at the University of Otago that Allan G. B. Fisher evolved the disturbing thesis expounded in "The Clash of C. HARTLEY GRATTAN Progress and Security."

Fiction in Review

ONTRAN DE PONCINS'S "Home Is the Hunter" T (Reynal and Hitchcock, $2.50), although perhaps not so direct in its romantic appeal as "Kabloona," the same writer's account of his journey among the Esquimos, is still one of the notable books of recent years, shining out of the mist of most contemporary writing with the full light of M. de Poncins's remarkable personality. To read the books of M. de Poncins is to be unusually aware of the author as an individual: he seems at once very worldly and a very internal person, monastically intense in spirit. One has the impression of an intelligence peculiarly of the French aristocratic tradition; and indeed "Home Is the Hunter" is a reconstruction-or a commemoration, if you will-of the almost feudal background against which, we can guess, M. de Poncins was himself bred. It is published as fiction, but it is not strictly a novel. Rather, it is both elegiac poetry and penetrating sociological research into a culture which was already vanishing glory when the author was a small child before the last war.

M. de Poncins's fictional device is to tell the story of Jean Ménadieu, for forty years a servant of the d'Ombres family, who in his old age returns for a few days to the d'Ombres estate. Moving from room to room in the old château, pausing over all the objects which hold his affections and his memory, Jean recreates the history of the d'Ombres family and his own life in his long years of service; through the old man's eyes we see the movement from past to present as a movement from a world thick with meaning to a thin and barren modernity. There was a time when both masters and servants accepted their responsibilities, when, for a servant like Jean, there was a religious dignity in service and, for his masters, no greater satisfaction than in the fulfilment of their duty to their tenants and to the estate itself. But now, even in rural France, that time has passed; the old values have disappeared, and modernity has supplied no adequate new values. Once a broken pot, a bit of string, an old brick, anything that belonged to the château, was something to be permanently cherished because, having once been useful, it was always beautiful. The easy prodigality of the present generation sums up for Jean, and for M. de Poncins, the meaninglessness of modern living. And, in another day, a servant could feel that he too had a beauty in his life because he was useful. If, to contemporary readers, Jean seems too good to be true, that only proves M. de Poncins's point, that in our present-day society a devotion like Jean's has become unrecognizable. And if it has also become undesirable-if, steeped in the egalitarianism of democracy, we are offended by the excess of humility with which Jean devotes himself to his masters in order to achieve his sense of purpose—then we can guess that M. de Poncins would ask us what democracy, shorn even of religion, has offered Jean in substitution for humility and service.

I am very sorry, but I am not surprised, that "Home Is the Hunter" has been dismissed as a statement of political reaction. Certainly, issuing in a poignant assertion of values which have disappeared from modern life, it can too easily be read as an anti-democratic document, and this despite the fact that M. de Poncins's complex and subtle intelligence has perfectly comprehended the emotional price that his old society often paid for its virtues. But it seems to me that democracy makes a bad mistake to shut itself off so quickly from criticism like M. de Poncins's by giving it an unpleasant political label. Culture no less than nature abhors vacuum, and democratic culture, while it is so jealous to guard against encroachments from the right-calling them mystical or religious on the one hand and degrading to the individual on the other-is surely insufficiently aware of the mysticism and degradation of the individual which invade it from the left. For example, in the same week in which I read "Home Is the Hunter" I read Ben Field's "The Outside Leaf" (Reynal and Hitchcock, $2.50), a novel about Connecticut tobacco farming, as easily marked as of the cultural left as M. de Poncins's book is marked as of the right: it would be hard to find a stronger argument in support of M. de Poncins's indictment of modern culture than Mr. Field's book.

"The Outside Leaf" is the story of a young man, Moe Miller, who at the age of twenty takes over the running of his father's tobacco farm. More interested in the Talmud and in people than in success, the father has failed, but Moe cares nothing about the Talmud or people, about family affection, nature, or anything except his work (his devotion is more extreme than Jean's devotion to the d'Ombres family). Moe believes religiously in tractors, farm implements, and sweat—of which an inordinate amount drips RACIAL conflicts are founded on tensions which are fed by rumor. In this remarkable book are tracked down and analyzed over 2000 inflammatory rumors prevalent in the South during the past two years—from the relatively harmless "Eleanor Club" stories to invitations to violence of the kind typified by: "The Negroes have bought up all the ice-picks in town and are just waiting for the next blackout." RACE AND RUMORS OF RACE holds a mirror up to certain American communities with disquieting results, for the pattern of the rumors shows clearly how deep the cancer lies and how great the task of education and adjustment that lies ahead.

Just published, $2.00

PURLIC LIABARY

The University of North Carolina Press

through the pages of this book; indeed, sweat is Mr. Field's prime test of reality, from which any sign of inner or outer grace would be a seduction. I can recall no novel I have ever read with so repellent a hero as Moe Miller, and yet that Mr. Field thinks of Moe as heroic, and not as a danger-ous monomaniac, is proved, against our most fervent hopes, at the end of the book when the young man wins a very nice wife as reward for his subhumanity.

There are certain things to be said in praise of Mr. Field's book: it is written with an effective sparseness; it takes as much trouble with its secondary characters as with Moe; and it is as informative as an encyclopedia article on the process of raising tobacco. These are negligible virtues, however, when we take into account its horribleness as an exposition of what the progressive novelist thinks meaningful in life. "The Outside Leaf" is certainly more in tune with the times than "Home Is the Hunter"; it will never be attacked as reactionary. But in effect what it is saying is that the less man tempts the spirit and the closer he approximates the mindless force of the machine, the more he asserts or is one of the most constructive and stirring things I have encountered in a long time. It is a real challenge to the American people. Both you and Amlie deserve unstinted commendation for your enterprise in making this fine piece of work available to your readers. It should be sent to every Congressman, and, more important, it should be read by every labor official in the country, for there are still far too many of us in the labor movement whose economics follow the line of the National Association of Manufacturers.

Thomas A. Amlie's Nation Supplement-

LOST: One Trillion Dollars

AL SESSIONS, News Editor Olympic Press Oakland, California

Copies of this 32-page supplement, "Employment After the War," are still available for ten cents apiece. Special rates for bulk orders of 100 copies or more will be furnished on request by

The NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York 3, N. Y.

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (post free) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C.O.D.

Readers' Service Division

The Nation . 55 Fifth Avenue . New York 3, N. Y.

·

helps create the values desirable in a democratic society; and against so frightening a threat from the left we could do far worse than reexamine the values which M. de Poncins finds in an outmoded social tradition. It seems to me to be simple and wrong to assume that in order to preserve certain old values, we must necessarily move backward in political and economic organization. Such narrow reasoning is itself reaction, and none the less dangerous because it characterizes so much of present-day liBeral thinking. DIANA TRILLING

Film Notes

GUY NAMED JOE" is just a title. The story is about a ghost named Pete (Spencer Tracy) who, solid and cheerful as ever-except that the living cast cannot see or hear him-gets busy like the other dead aces, showing neophytes how to fly, fight, and make love. His star pupil (Van Johnson) becomes interested in Pete's former sweetheart (Irene Dunne), who is still inconsolable, and Pete's hardest job is to divorce her from the remembrance of the easygoing, slick-paper love scenes she played with Spencer Tracy. It is, as you can see, a story about war-time love and death, a theme lacking neither in dignity nor in appositeness. Like "Happy Land" it neatly obtunds death's sting as ordinary people suffer it by not only assuming but photographing a good, busy, hearty hereafter. I am of course in no position to offer contrary proof, and can indeed imagine the general idea not only as believable but as dramatically amenable to very good use. But I don't care to see it so blandly used, as unqualified aspirin, before an audience of which the majority, I fear, believes everything it sees on a screen, nor can I respect the dramatic uses to which the idea has been put here. Miss Dunne feels nothing like real love or anxiety over Pete while he is alive, and only a nominal, ornamental, plotextending grief after he dies. Pete and the audience are also spared what might have happened if she had really got either frozen or tender with Mr. Johnson, while Pete looked on. So, when she matures in her bereavement, every genuine bereavement and maturing which the film by implication claims to reflect and preach to is cruelly exploited and insulted for the sake of what is, at best, an otherwise harmless and medium-silly romance. If you are so generous as to overlook these minor faults, however, the picture will serve as well as two hours spent over the Woman's Home Companion. Spencer Tracy is better than the show deserves, and Victor Fleming's direction is of itself, as usual, likable enough.

"Riding High" is a musical show featuring Western land-scapes in Technicolor, Victor Moore as a swindler, a blood-curdling sucker-delighter named Cass Daly, some loud, cheerful, uninteresting tunes, and Dorothy Lamour. Miss Lamour wears one costume which must be seen to be believed, and which hopefully suggests to me that the gentlemen or ladies of the Hays office either refused to believe their eyes, did not see at all, or modestly take care never, when a lightly-dressed woman appears, to look below the wishbone.

Erratum: The title of "Destination Tokyo," reviewed last week, was incorrectly given as "Destiny, Tokyo."

JAMES AGEB

MUSIC

ISTENING to several performances broadcast from the Metropolitan Opera House-listening, then, with ear undistracted by eye-I have been struck, first of all, by the badness of much of the singing. Pinza's singing in "Boris Godunov" was almost unvaryingly loud, coarse-textured, and insensitively inflected: Thorborg's was shrill, and in "Tristan und Isolde" a week later her voice had a terrific tremolo, except in the warning from the tower where it was steady and opulent. In "Tristan" Traubel's voice too was clouded by tremolo much of the time and was earpiercing in some of the high notes, but was clear and beautiful and beautifully inflected in the finale. As for the male voices in this performance, Melchior's started with some remnants of timbre which it lost as it went on, leaving a mere hoarse shout in the last act; Janssen's was wholly without the beauty it once had; and only Cordon's had a richness of sound that made one willing for once to endure the boredom of King Marke's lament. Warren's abuse of his fine voice with the bellowing he did in "Rigoletto" was an old story; but Kullman's forcing and his indulgence in other practices of Italian tenors were-after the beautiful singing and musical taste of a few years agoa shock. New in Pons's voice was a tremolo in the lower register; the upper register had its old crystalline clarity and beauty, but with its old sagging pitch: in Caro nome, after hitting one high E exactly right, she missed a second one and kept pulling herself up to it and slipping off.

The general impression conveyed by the performance of "Boris" was one of shabbiness, slackness, confusion. To get an impression of the "Tristan" conducted by Beecham it was necessary to hear both orchestra and voices; but the performance was broadcast in a way that caused the orchestra to disappear when the singing began. The broadcasting of "Rigoletto" was better, and enabled me to appreciate the firm, coherent, powerful outlines which Sodero's conducting gave to the work.

Poor balance of voices and orchestra was not the only technical defect of the "Tristan" broadcast: the sound was clouded by distortion of a kind which also spoiled a couple of Toscanini broadcasts. "Boris" a week earlier and "Rigoletto" a week later were free of this distortion; but they suffered from normal defects of presentation. In the Metropolitan Opera House itself the performance is given for people who are assumed to be there because they are interested in the performance; but the American broadcasting mind finds it inconceivable that anyone will listen to a broadcast of music out of interest in the music, and can believe only that the New York Philharmonic-Symphony must be baited with Carl Van Doren and his "American Scriptures," the N. B. C. Symphony under Toscanini with a talk on scientific research by Mr. Kettering of General Motors, the Boston Symphony with an unctuous sermon by Clifton Fadiman, and that the way to hold radio listeners for "Tristan" or "Rigoletto" is to fill the intermissions with the vulgarity which, in its various forms, is the special American contribution to broadcasting,

My explosions, in conversation, over this intermission vulgarity, over the shoddy stuff that is broadcast about the music itself, over the trash that is published in books, over some of the critical performances in newspapers, led someone to suggest that I adopt, toward all these, Jack Dempsey's attitude toward Gene Tunney's Shakespearereading. Asked what he had to say about Tunney's various highbrow activities, Dempsey is reported to have made one of the great statements of all time: "If that's his racket it's okay with me." Dempsey was indifferent to behavior which didn't affect him or anything important to him; I can't be indifferent to record reviews which make difficulties for me; and I am angered by writing about music and performance and the entire musical scene which doesn't hurt me but does hurt things that matter to me.

"People have pointed out evidences of personal feeling in my notices," wrote Bernard Shaw in 1890, "as if they were accusing me of a misdemeanor, not knowing that a criticism written without personal feeling is not worth reading. It is the capacity for making good or bad art a personal matter that makes a man a critic. . . . When people do less than their best, and do that at once badly and selfcomplacently, I hate them, loathe them, detest them, long to tear them limb from limb and strew them in gobbets about the stage or platform. . . . In the same way, really fine artists inspire me with the warmest personal regard. . . . " That is the way I feel, not only about music but about everything that affects music, including criticism which affects people's understanding of music and their attitude toward it. The critic whose own understanding increases the understanding of his audience, I have "the warmest personal regard" for; the one who misleads his audience with his own ignorance or misconceptions or confusions, I "hate...loathe...detest..." Most of what is written and talked about music is a racket; but it isn't okay with me.

It was a pleasure to hear Copland's music for "Billy the Kid" with the beautiful sound that it had when played by the Philadelphia Orchestra; but some of this music—hard, sharp, astringent—acquired Mae Westian curving outlines from Ormandy's prettifying diminuendos and ritardandos. I continue to regret that Copland, in putting together the concert suite, omitted the music of the pas de deux, and that he did not omit instead the dance of celebration over Billy's capture, which is the poorest music of the work. B.H. HAGGIN

CONTRIBUTORS

ADOLF STURMTHAL, professor of conomics at Bard College of Columbia University, is an American citizen of Austrian extraction. He is the author of "The Tragedy of European Labor, 1918-1939," and other books.

FRANCIS WESTBROOK, JR., is editor of Textile Age, a trade monthly.

JULES MOCH, a Socialist deputy and minister in pre-war France, has been active in the French underground movement. He is a commander in the Fighting French navy.

F. C. WEISKOPF is a German-Czech writer. From 1933 to 1939 he worked on the largest anti-Henlein magazine in the Sudetenland. He will shortly publish a novel, "The Firing Squad."

ERIC RUSSELL BENTLEY teaches English at Black Mountain College in North Carolina.

MARCUS DUFFIELD is on the staff of the New York Herald Tribune.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN has traveled extensively through the British dominions. His books include "Introducing Australia," "The Deadly Parallel," and "Why We Fought."

Letters to the Editors

National Feeling on the Clyde

Dear Sirs: When Freda Kirchwey visisted the Clyde—of which she wrote in your issue of October 23, just arrived—she seems not to have noticed one thing. Perhaps it is something of which she, like most good liberals, rather disapproves of, and therefore does not see. This is national feeling.

She is right in saying that the Clyde workers are all out to win the war. But maybe we aren't such fools as we look; we want to get something out of the war and the war promises. Scotland is a small nation which has had a tough deal for a couple of hundred years. It wants a chance now. Nobody hates England; but we feel the English don't always understand; they haven't even noticed there's anything wrong with us up north. But, before the war, Scottish industry was in a far worse state than English; we have been temporarily rescued by armaments in one form and another. But a great deal of our "floor space" has been used for storage instead of production, and every month Scottish skilled and unskilled labor is being drafted down into England. Some people say that labor is more docile away from home and old associations and organizations.

This is resented, and resented in a nationalistic way. The Scottish Nationalist Party is small; very likely Freda Kirchwey never met a member, nor vet a member of the non-party organization Scottish Convention. But these two bodies-and there are others, as well as purely cultural organizations like An Commun-only represent the consciousness of a vast, half-conscious stirring and worrying. Probably the same kind of thing is happening all over Europe. Yet where you sympathize with the Balkans -or the Irish-you are only surprised at us Scots. But we represent the thing in a more intelligent form and at a stage where a solution is possible and practicable without violence or even bad feeling. Most of us nationalists who belong to small nations believe in federation of one kind or another; you won't catch us thinking in terms of sovereign states. But we think that some things are most appropriately organized in the family unit, others in the factory, village, or street unit, others by counties or boroughs, some in land blocs or in nothing less than a world, but a good many in units of the small nation.

Will you remember this about us? A Highland fisherman, wearing his kilt -his best clothes-was bitterly offended by an American soldier in a Glasgow tea shop who asked him to get up and let him look. I tried to explain that the American didn't mean any harm, that it was really a kind of compliment. But the Highlander knew only too well that this newcomer had never for a moment taken Scotland or the symbols of Scotland-remember, my fisherman's greatgrandfathers had been forbidden, on pain of transportation, to wear the kilt -in any way seriously. President Wilson spoke of self-determination of nations; it meant very little then because it was taken as being compatible with the survival of large empires and bodies which were too big to be nations but which yet could arm and tear one another to pieces. It might be real now. NAOMI MITCHISON

Campbeltown, Argyll, Scotland December 2

The Iron Age

Dear Sirs: Do you pay much attention to the industrial press, of which the Iron Age is the perfect flower? No one can complain of the job that most of them do in their handling of technical and industrial news, because their readers get a lot more than they pay for directly. But the editors of some of them have invaded the vasty realms of politics and economics with rather painful impact upon reasonable people, if not upon the stuffed shirts whose prejudices and misinformation they apparently deem it their duty to develop and protect.

They appear latterly to have assumed the function of stirring up the s. s. to drastic—and physical—action, as witness the editorial that appeared in the December 9, 1943, issue of the Iron Age.

Any normally analytical mind has reason to question the facts upon which this screed is based. They are quite too pat to be accepted without proof. We are to believe that the ingenuous editor, having dropped in on an official of a war "matériel" (that word!) plant, presumably for a cozy spot of tea and a bit of comradely chitchat, is shocked beyond measure by a succession of interruptions, over a period of two hours, by Harry, Bill, and two anonymous lay figures. Only two are anonymous, but the four are unanimous in announcing, with unearthly aplomb, the shutting down of their respective departments by "quickie" strikes. Soon thereafter, probably during the same day, the Mahatma converses with one of MacArthur's furloughed heroes who also is steeped in wisdom and patriotism. This man of Mars, surely as authentic as those of Orson Welles, on hearing of the dastardly doings, offers to educate (or execute) the 20,000 malcontents, in cooperation with twenty warlike buddies, presumably through the medium of machine-guns, bazookas, flame-throwers, and hand grenades.

An occasional critical analysis of one of these childish outbursts would not only afford amusement and instruction to your readers, but also would probably have a salutary effect on the effer-vescent editors themselves, for I am inclined to think that they are most sensitive, next to the pocket nerve, in their self-esteem.

J. I. CAPPS Chicago Heights, Ill., December 20

Now Is the Time

Dear Sirs: Is it not now the time to object strenuously to anti-Semitism, race prejudice, and all fascist ideas wherever they arise?

E. P. Dutton has recently published a murder mystery, "Death and Bitters' by Kit Christian, a trivial story but read by who knows how many people. The leading police officer, a good man, not the comic cop, in interviewing a certain McGregor hints that he conceals an awful thing. What is this fearful secret? He, a most obnoxious individual, is a Jew. To be sure he has been pretending to be otherwise, but the hero and heroine of the book then and later can insult him no more than calling him "Mr. Levine." And the final scene of the novel has the hero and heroine, in vaudeville manner, giving Levine a kick.

Is this small stuff? I think not. I think when E. P. Dutton publishes a book containing this sort of anti-Semitism it is helping to support a truly fearsome thing.

I wrote a letter to E. P. Dutton. though I didn't like doing it, and decent-minded folk everywhere should protest—to publishers, radio stations, motion-picture studios—whenever this type of thing crops up.

R. S. STEWART Berkeley, Cal., November 8

Letter from Sicily

Dear Sirs: Readers of The Nation will be glad, I hope, to take cognizance of a letter sent to me by an Italian American who is serving with our armed forces in Sicily. To spare him headaches I do not give the name of my correspondent. I will only state that he was wholly unknown to me before I received his letter.

GAETANO SALVEMINI

Cambridge, Mass., December 6

The August 7 issue of The Nation carried your article entitled Freezing Fascism In. In it you placed your finger on precisely the chief point the islanders raised during the months our unit fought through the invasion and the months immediately following it. I don't know that any of the observations I make are either new or interesting to you: perhaps what impels me to write is your concern and your expressed wish that the Allies help lay skilfully and firmly in place those cornerstones of policy that will result in building a fine democratic government in Italy, as elsewhere. As a soldier, I could deeply appreciate also your concern for helping to win and preserve the peace in this first occupied territory the Allies have wrested from the Axis.

Since I'm an American soldier of Sicilian extraction I had many opportunities to talk to the islanders during our stay there. We were bivouacked near a town, and since we were there for quite some time, there was a chance to meet and know some of the townspeople to the point where they talked out of their hearts and minds. In their talks these people argued in somewhat this vein: "You say that you came to get rid of Fascism. And in the pamphlets dropped over our towns by Allied planes, you asked us to rise up and oppose the Fascists. We were glad when invasion came, and we did nothing to oppose you; we even helped when it was possible, and soon the island was yours. But you left practically everybody connected with Fascism in power and in office. In our town not a single Fascist was relieved of office. Some of the men now sitting in the Town Hall have sent to prison those who dared to express their disapproval of the Fascist government openly, and refused jobs and caused suffering to the families of those who did not fully cooperate with the Black Shirts. You say one thing, and do another. What are we to believe? We like the Americans. And we like the American officer in charge of our town. He is kind and courteous and approachable. Best of all, he is honest. When he says something, he means it. But the real power is still with the office-holders, and the landowners who are their friends. Few of us dare to speak up with such a combination in power."

As an educator, you can appreciate the desire of the people of this island for reforms. The grown-ups I've talked with have had little schooling-most of them not more than three years-but they have common sense. They realize the need for reforms in labor standards, in wages, housing, opportunities in work other than farmwork, and education. They want for their children something more than a fifteen-hour working day at back-breaking labor that still leaves them in debt at the end of the year. They are ripe for change, and they are eager for change. They also look to us for leadership to start them on the long road to democracy. I won't say that the prevailing note of the people I've talked with is skeptical or cynical, but these people were still waiting for some constructive plan and for responsible leadership when our unit left.

Should you find that the discussion has been general in reference to regions and places and people, it is done in order to conform with army censorship regulations, sir.

Somewhere in Sicily, November 16

The Great Problem

Dear Sirs: No matter whether educated and uneducated persons agree or disagree with the book "Liberal Education" by Mark Van Doren, there is one thing we ought all to agree on—namely, that at least the author has dealt with the most vital subject of our time, which is definitely to his credit. If more such able writers would do likewise it is quite probable that the masses would thereby be released from their bondage in time.

The masterly review of the book in The Nation of December 11 by George S. Counts points out the serious defect in our elective system of education. At the same time Professor Counts nails the fallacy that the substitution of "great books" would be a cure-all for the defect. This would, at best, lead to but a cleaner flood of words. But words it would be and nothing more. Consequently the futile struggle between the learned and the so-called ignorant masses would go on. We mean in respect to what constitutes moral education, not education in the arts and technology.

How to get on solid moral ground by means of moral education (there is no other way)—that is the great problem which must be solved before humanity will be able to live rationally together. In the meanwhile all talk of human liberty is either demagoguery or wishful thinking.

We regret that in his review of the book Mr. Counts confined his remarks to the disease without a few plain words of direction as to the cure. His closing paragraph to this end is too scholarly for the common people to understand. However, he makes it clear that no right system of moral and ethical education is yet in sight. It is, therefore, not a question of opinion but of fact that the cause of humanity's misbehavior lies in its moral and ethical mis-education.

So the question is: Why do not the forward-looking men and women of our land join themselves together for the purpose of curing this evil? Except for winning the war this is the most urgent need of our time; as otherwise the people will not win the peace—will win only another war. To say there is no cure for this evil proves only mental bankruptcy.

ALBERT JOHNSON
Los Angeles, Cal., December 20

O Little Towns . . .

Dear Sirs: We should have more descriptions of the workings of the virus of anti-Semitism in particular instances, like that of Litchfield, Connecticut, by Willson Whitman in her article, O Little Town . . . (Restricted) in your issue of December 25. They are preferable to the general accounts and reports that anti-Semitism is rife. Too many people know Litchfield, Connecticut, at they and others will know other such towns described, not to feel the sting of the truth that no place, not even their own

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 46

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 One who is dissatisfied with his state
- 5 Causing friction is hardly in his line
- 9 Panes (anag.)
- 10 His works are plays
- 11 Most mares produce these animals
- 12 You'll get no rag from this instrument
- 13 He swam the Hellespont twice nightly
- 15 A bit of harness
- 17 Goes bad in foreign wine-shops
- 19 From what we know of certain meet-
- ings, he's not likely to be put out
- 21 The last word, and I'm it after fifty 23 This complaint is not due to the dep-
- redations of a certain agile insect 25 Shacking stories—no wonder you get a queer feeling in the middle of them!
- 26 Strange sound of an American lake
- 27 Si's rest is disturbed
- 28 The workman starts an incomplete

DOWN

- 1 Net used in fowling and fishing
- 2 "&"
- 3 Dance of Argentine origin, with Parisian developments
- 4 The common stag (two words, 3 and 4)
- 5 We require them to look at the fair creatures when they have lost their heads

- 6 Tore a bale (anag.)
- 7 It would have helped Goliath had he been wounded in the arm
- 8 Train with metallic interior
- 14 Fingered flower
- 16 In the case of these, inflation is the only remedy (two words, 4 and 5)
- 17 Turn the head of this head of a bed to adapt it for a nipper
- 18 Army undercover men
- 19 I sail S. E. for a country in Central Europe
- 20 Perceive
- 22 These nests are not concrete
- 24 "Ch. - with temper whose unclouded ray Can make tomorrow cheerful as today!" (Pope)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 45

ACHESS:-1 BARITONE: I SLIVER; 10 HUMIRCH: II ORATORY: 12 ALS: 13 ROVER: IN TREDICUS; 19 HERON: 29 SKATES; 22 RESTATE; 23 IDIOCT; 25 LIFTHE: 2 HEAREN: 3 ZOLA: 22 DRYAD; 35 ASSA: 36 AUSTRIA: 37 NEW-GAFE: 30 PROGRESS.

DOWN;—I BEHEAD: 2 RAMPAGE: 3 TEIM: * NIMROD; 4 LEAR: 7 VIOLENT; S ROTALIST: 9 RODEO: 13 RED-EYED: 14 VICTORY; 15 RUSTLED: 17 TORE: 18 SKEIN: 21 SITZ BATH: 24 ILLUSED; 24 HOSTAGE: 28 ARRAY; 21 TANNER; 30 CAMELS: 34 TRUE; 35 TWIG.

community and themselves, is free of anti-Semitic feeling. It is easier to pass off a general account with, "Not us, not Connecticut, not Maine, not New England—at least not nearly as bad as this!" Litchfield is too much the prototype, in fact or desire, of the New England town for more of us not to get the point.

Although I write from Maine, I was, till last year, pastor of the Kent, Connecticut, church, which is not far from Litchfield. Miss Whitman might have included all of Litchfield County. Although all the communities have not because they haven't tried. Of one of the mentioned successful towns, Sharon, Miss Whitman might be happy to know that she would have had a more satisfying reception and interview by the ministers there, as well as in several of the other communities of the county.

With the hope that Christmas may truly come again.

Wilton, Maine, December 26

P. S. Wilton, Maine, a small industrial town, has only one Jew, a German refugee, who is the town doctor. He has replaced two doctors called into the army. He surprised most of the town: "He is not very different from us and fits in rather well, and is a very good doctor." His position is similar to that of the lawyer in Litchfield.

L. A. D.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

- The Conscibution of Holland so the Sciences.

  A Symposium Edited by A. J. Barnouw and B. Landheer. Querido. $3.50.
- The Erablishment of Constitutional Governness to Bulgaria. By C. E. Black. Princeton, $5.75.
- Likeline: The Ships and Men of Our Merchast Manage at War. By Robert Carse. Morrow. $2.75.
  - Winning the Peace in the Pacific. By S. R. Chew. Macmillan. $1.50.
- Bridging the Albutici Anglo-American Fellouting as the Way to World Peace. A Survey from Both Sides Edited by Philip Grobs, Doubleday, Doran, $2.75.
- The White Reignale, By Robert Goffin. Doubleday, Doran, $2.
- Journey into the Fog. The Story of Visus Bering and the Bering Sea. By Cornelia Goodhue, Doubleday, Doran $2.50.
- The Hamphorn Tree: Some Papers and Letters on Life and the Theater. By Paul Green, North Carolina. $2.
- The Return of Opportunity. Leaders in Many Fields Discuss the Outlook for Work and Careers, Edited with an Introduction by William R. Kuhns. Harper. $3.

AMERICA'S LEADING WEEKLY SINCE

VOLUME 158

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 15, 1944

NUMBER 3

IN 1H15 155UE
THE SHAPE OF THINGS	57
EDITORIALS
Border Impasse	59
Justice Denied	60
	61
ARTICLES
Marshall and the Second Front by I. F. Stone	6:
Profiteers on the Rampage by Karl Keyerleber	6
The South American Conspiracy by Manuel Secane	60
75 Years Ago in The Nation	6
Why War Workers Strike by Victor H. Johnson	68
In the Wind	7
POLITICAL WAR
Germany, 1944 by A. del V.	7:
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus	7
BOOKS AND THE ARTS
Power and the Common Man by Albert Guerard	7:
The Best of Military Thought by Donald W. Mitchell	70
Poetry in Review by H. P. Lazarus	70
Marshal Smuts by C. Hartley Grattan	80
Films by James Agee	8
Music by B. H. Haggin	82
LETTERS TO THE EDITORS .	8
CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 47 by Jack Barrett	84

Editor and Publisher FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER Washington Editor I. F. STONE

MARGARET MARSHALL

Editor Political War Section J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Associate Editors

MAXWELL S. STEWART

KEITH HUTCHISON

Drama Critic

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL LOUIS FISCHER

JONATHAN DANIELS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 55 Fifth Ave., New York 3, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THE NEW YEAR HAS OPENED OMINOUSLY FOR the Axis. In the west the American and British airmen are methodically pursuing the task of reducing German war potential with a view, to quote General H. H. Arnold, of making "the coming invasion of Germany as economical as possible." Berlin has suffered two more smashing blows; the port of Stettin, supply base for the eastern front, has been devastated, and the great chemical center of Ludwigshafen is reported knocked out as the result of an American daylight precision attack. At the same time huge fleets of light and medium bombers have been hitting at the "invasion coast," seeking to destroy enemy installations and to tempt the Luftwaffe's fighters to combat. But all this air activity is chiefly significant as foreshadowing future defeat: in Russia defeat is already in sight, General Nikolai Vztutin's First Ukrainian Army has enlarged the bulge west of Kiev into : huge fist which is breaking the German line in two. One of his columns has captured the city of Sarny, thereby cutting the railroad which connects the German central army with that in the north; another is driving toward Zhmerinka, a junction on the main line between Odessa and Warsaw. The Nazi forces remaining in the Dnieper bend, already dangerously threatened by these moves. are now menaced from a new direction by the Red Army's capture of the key point of Kirovograd. There seems no alternative left to the German command except to accelerate its retreat. So far it appears to have been able to keep its forces together, but now the question arises whether it has not held on too long in the south. Reports of big hauls of prisoners by the Red Army offer hope that the word "rout" may soon be substituted for retreat.

PERHAPS THE SORDID HISTORY OF THE Allies' relations with the Fighting French has made us unduly suspicious. We hope so, because if the new, and still tiny, cloud of smoke over North Africa originates in fire, as we cynics have learned to believe smoke frequently does, the flame is ominous to a degree. The smoke in this case consists of reports that the British, supposedly with American sanction, have expressed concern over the fate of certain prominent fascists who have been arrested as traitors by the French authorities, particularly Peyrouton, Flandin, and Boisson. Some stories have it that the British "demanded" the release of the prisoners, some that their release was merely urged. Harold Callender, reporting to the New York Times from Algiers, writes that "Washington and London suggested going easy" on the gentlemen in question, and still another version is that the British only asked permission to make sure that these veteran collaborators with the enemy were being well treated. But why should the British and Americans display any interest at all in these individuals, much less ask their release? Sentiment can hardly be the explanation. Nor can it be pressure from the Giraud faction within the Liberation Committee, now that Giraud himself has shrunk to such minor proportions in the French picture. Is this a hint to the men of Vichy that it is not too late to turn coats once more? That if they come over to our side at the moment of the invasion they will be spared the price of their crimes and perhaps—purely out of expediency of course-even left in positions of power? Until Pétain's recent and roundabout feeler concerning the restoration of constitutional democracy, it was the policy of the OWI to tell Frenchmen regularly that they were to put no stock in rumors of future Allied dealings with the Marshal. This assurance, we understand, is no longer being broadcast. So much for the smoke; you can do your own speculating about the fire.

*

ACQUISITION OF THE JAPANESE-MANDATED islands by the United States after the war is a matter on which all of the Big Four powers are agreed, according to the authoritative Army and Navy Journal. It is even suggested that China would have no objection to the establishment of an American base on Formosa, although it would not be disposed to make a similar grant to Great Britain or the Soviet Union. It is impossible to check the accuracy of this story or find out whether a definite agreement has been reached. But there can be no doubt that many influential Americans, including some army and navy leaders, assume that such an expansion of American interests in the Pacific will take place despite the explicit statement in the Cairo declaration that we have no thought of territorial acquisition. The disposal of the mandated islands presents . real problem. Obviously, they cannot be allowed to remain in Japanese hands. While some of the islands might be capable of self-rule, none is capable of selfdefense. But the United States has no ethnological or historical claim to the islands. Possession of them would be essential to American defense only if no system of collective security were established. Several other countries, notably Australia and New Zealand, have a stronger and more legitimate interest in the islands than we have. The only way that all these interests can be served is by placing the islands under some sort of international custody—with rights to their use as bases and responsibility for their protection shared equally among the Pacific powers.

×

THE REPORT ON LEND-LEASE ASSISTANCE during the first thirty-three months of the program shows that after a disappointing start the United States has faithfully carried out its obligations as the "arsenal of democracy." Aid extended during the first eleven months of 1943 was valued at $10,365,000,000, or considerably more than that of the previous twenty-three months. Shipments to Russia scarcely started until early in 1942, but were moving at a rate of nearly $300,000,000 a month by the third quarter of 1943. The figures show that Great Britain and Russia together have received more than half of our lend-lease assistance and that the bulk of the aid to these countries was in the form of munitions. Although more food was exported than in 1942, the amount remained small in relation to domestic consumption. Lend-lease shipments of butter amounted to less than one-seventh of an ounce per week, for example, for each American civilian. Once again the report makes no attempt to balance our lend-lease expenditures against the value of reverse lend-lease—the assistance given to the United States by other countries. We are told only that such aid is substantial and is growing. Some of it is tangible, like the butter supplied our troops in the Southwest Pacific by Australia and New Zealand, but who can place a value on the contribution that the Russian army, the British navy, and the R. A. F. are making to the defeat of our common enemy? The most we can claim is that our planes, tanks, and food have helped make their achievements possible.

×

THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE IS GUNNING for big game. Encouraged, perhaps, by Eric Johnston, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, and other apostles of "free enterprise" who have been preaching against cartels in general, Assistant Attorney General Wendell Berge has set his sights at a very particular international cartel and probably the biggest of the lot. The complaint he has filed accuses du Pont, Imperial Chemical Industries, and the Remington Arms Company of uniting to divide world markets and asks the court to enjoin the defendants perpetually from forming or adhering to agreements of the alleged monopolistic and restrictive nature described. The billiondollar du Pont concern we are all familiar with, and Remington Arms, the largest American producer of sporting arms and ammunition, is merely one of its bigger satellites. Imperial Chemical Industries is to Britain what du Pont is to the United States, only more so. Its total resources may not be quite so impressive, but its degree of monopoly in nearly every type of chemical production is greater since it has had no anti-trust laws to hinder its growth. Moreover, it is strongly intrenched in every part of the empire. After filing the suit Mr. Berge called it "a warning to American and foreign monopolists" and declared: "The arrangements between these groups . . . are nothing but private treaties -as far-reaching as any governmental action but free from Congressional sanction. Their production quotas and divisions of markets are private tariffs enforced without legislative consideration. However well-meaning these private groups may be, they have assumed sovereign and governmental powers—contrary to the American system of free enterprise." Now, Mr. Johnston, now, gentlemen of the free-enterprise claque, how about a big hand for the Department of Justice?

*

WOTAN HAS LET THE GERMANS DOWN pretty badly and he will have to go. The Nazis are efficient and businesslike, and if a god doesn't stand up well under actual battle conditions they replace him with another model. But that is only one of the explanations for the "back-to-church" movement decreed for all Germans by that saintly man Heinrich Himmler. It seems ironic, with half the country in flames, to drag happy pagans away from their ready-made bonfires; and even more ironic to make Arthur Rosenberg chief missionary. There must be more pressing reasons. In his first Epistle to the Storm Troops the man who pledged the complete elimination of the church, both Catholic and Evangelical, from the life of Germany, shed little light. Cogitating on the meaning of death, as well he might, he merely reminded his flock that the coming of Christ was "the birth of a new era establishing contact between our earthly life and eternity." The Hamburger Fremdenblatt, explaining that "religion has again become modern," suggests, more revealingly, that Germans may fall back on the church to find solace and bolster their morale. And Himmler himself offers still another advantage in this mass rush to the altar. "Through your attendance," he says, "the faithful will believe that National Socialism can cooperate with the church and religion." Undoubtedly the Nazi chieftains hope that the Vatican will also believe it and use its good offices for promoting a negotiated peace. Our own explanation of the phenomenon is that the Gestapo has just got wind of the fact that the meek shall inherit the earth. After all, isn't that the objective?

IDA M. TARBELL WAS THE LAST OF A SMALL but notable group of journalists who were dubbed with the unpleasant but honorable name of "muckrakers." Her death last week at the age of eighty-six leaves a gap among American writers that will never be filled. For Miss Tarbell was a pioneer in every sense of the word. She was one of the first graduates of a coeducational college; she was one of the first women to achieve notable success in the field of journalism; her articles revealing the cruel and inhuman practices by which the Standard Oil Company gained its dominance in the oil field not only ushered in a new period of journalism but a new era in public policy as well. Her biography of Lincoln is still a standard work—forty-two years after its publication. Although some of her most recent works, particularly her life of Gary, lacked the boldness and penetration of her earlier ones, few writers have left a more definite or more constructive imprint on the social thinking of their generation.

Border Impasse

NCE again the Polish-border question is disturbing the unity of the United Nations, and no accommodation between the positions of the Soviet government and the Polish government in exile appears in sight. Both parties are exhibiting an intransigence which bodes ill for the future peace of Europe. An official Polish newspaper in London has hailed the great victory which has driven the Germans back beyond the pre-war Polish border as a harbinger of "the most serious political and moral crisis of the war," and has asked: Are the Russians coming as liberators or invaders? The government in exile itself has issued orders to its underground which seem to suggest an attempt to observe neutrality as between the Soviet and Nazi armies.

For Moscow the border question is settled. Anyone even hinting that it is, or ought to be, still open for discussion is likely to find himself blasted in the manner which has so taken Wendell Willkie aback. His article in the New York Times, "Don't Stir Distrust of Russia," was clearly designed to combat anti-Soviet feeling, which remains regrettably prevalent in this country, and it was welcomed as such by the Daily Worker. But that did not save the Republican chief from being accused of trickery and political gambling. We do not know whether the Soviet government really believes that this is the way to make friends and influence people in this country. If it does, it is being badly served by its Washington embassy.

The Russian position with regard to eastern Poland rests on three main arguments: (1) The inhabitants of the disputed territories are racially identical with those of the White Russian and Ukrainian Soviet Republics. (2) The inclusion of these lands in Poland was accomplished by force majeure, when the Western powers, ganging up on the struggling Soviet Union, compelled it to sign the Treaty of Riga in 1920. (3) The return of these lost provinces to Russia in 1939 was the result of a democratic decision of their peoples.

The first and second of these propositions are indubitably true; the third is less impressive. The election of "assemblies"—it was not a formal plebiscite—was held a few weeks after the Red Army marched in under conditions hardly propitious for a free vote. Few details reached this country, but a totalitarian model of balloting appears to have been followed, with the electors having the privilege of indorsing a single slate. This does not mean, however, that a really democratic vote would not confirm the result, if by a less overwhelming majority. Long oppressed by absentee Polish landlords, the White Russian and Ukrainian peasants in this area might well be expected to welcome the opportunity to rejoin their brothers under the hammer and sickle.

Controverting the Russian arguments, the Poles can claim that, whatever the circumstances under which the Treaty of Riga was signed, the Soviet government never suggested frontier revision between 1920 and 1939. On the contrary, it signed two non-aggression pacts with Poland during the thirties, thus tacitly acquiescing in the territorial status quo. Only when Poland was reeling from the Nazi blitz were Russia's claims resurrected, enforced by invasion, and tamped down by a partition agreement with Hitler. No government in exile that was not wholly under the Russian thumb could be expected to accept this fait accompli. If such a surrender of territory is to take place without leaving a permanent legacy of bitterness, it must come as the result of negotiations between the Soviets and a freely elected Polish government.

That means that a real bilateral settlement of this problem can only be achieved, no matter what ukases Moscow may issue, after the defeat of Germany. We do not see, therefore, what Russia would have to lose by announcing that while it holds firmly to its claim that lands inhabited by White Russians and Ukrainians must remain within the Soviet Union, it is prepared to discuss the actual boundary in a generous spirit. The line which it now insists the Poles must accept was a line negotiated with von Ribbentrop. It places within Russia some cities like Lwow which are mainly inhabited by Poles and are historic centers of Polish culture. Would it not be possible to agree upon a new boundary which, while satisfying Russian ethnic claims, would not divorce such cities from Poland?

If Russia really believes in the spirit of the Declaration of Moscow, it can hardly afford to set the precedent of unilateral decisions in settling territorial problems created by the war. But still less can the Poles afford to pursue their furious anti-Soviet vendetta. Nobody is going to fight Russia to enforce dubious Polish demands for a return to the pre-war status quo. Any attempt to drive a wedge between Russia and its Western allies on this issue would be more than criminal; it would be suicidal, for Poland would be the first casualty.

Justice Denied

E SUPPOSE this is a hopeless suggestion. But we wish that Conservations wish that Congress by legislation or the Supreme Court by voluntary action would provide for publication of the votes taken in chambers on applications for certiorari. According to testimony given some years ago by Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes, certiorari is granted when four, or sometimes even three, justices vote for it. The denial of a review is a serious matter, and the public has a right to know how the justices have voted on it. We think a little publicity might have a healthy effect in some cases; justices are only human. We should like to know, for example, how the court voted last week when it turned down the appeal of the convicted Trotskyites in the so-called Minneapolis case. This rejection of a hearing, by a liberal court, seems to us a shocking thing. For in denying these eighteen defendants a hearing, the court permits precedents to stand which seriously endanger civil liberties in the United States. The rejection of the appeal for a hearing is made the more disturbing because the Department of Justice itself did not oppose the grant of certiorari.

The record of this prosecution is one to shame every decent American. The Minneapolis local of the Teamsters' Union is one of the few unions in this country dominated by Trotskyites. The Brotherhood of Teamsters seems to have had little objection to their revolutionary theories until the local, in the summer of 1940, voted to leave the A. F. of L. and affiliate with the C. I. O. At this point Dan Tobin of the Teamsters appealed to the White House for action against this "nest of radicals," and the late Marvin H. McIntyre passed Tobin's complaint on to the Department of Justice, with a notation that the President was disturbed by it. The department began to collect Marxist and Trotskyite pamphlets, and a case was worked up under both the Seditious Conspiracy statute and the Smith Sedition Act of 1940. The defendants were acquitted under the former but convicted under the latter, our first peace-time seditiousopinion statute since 1798.

The highest state courts, notably those of Oklahoma and New Jersey, have held in recent years that persons can be punished for revolutionary opinions only if it is proved that there is a "clear and present danger" of their being put into effect. This is the famous Holmes-Brandeis doctrine. The state courts were doubtless influenced by the belief that a liberal United States Supreme Court, containing so many justices who purport to revere the Holmes-Brandeis tradition, would reverse lower-court decisions which held otherwise. But in this case the Department of Justice argued and the lower federal courts ruled that men can be convicted of sedition in peace time without a showing of "clear and present danger." A review by the Supreme Court was called for, not merely in the interest of justice—a question that begins to seem too abstract for some members of this present court—but in order to decide exactly what rule the lower courts and the state courts are to follow in the future. By refusing to grant a review the court implies that it is satisfied with the rule applied and the result reached in the lower courts. This may be expected to have a serious effect in future cases.

We hold no brief for the Trotskyites and have differed deeply with them on most concrete issues. But we think them unjustly and unfairly condemned, the victims of a cheap bit of labor politics. It is a crime to send them to jail because they believe in the principles of the Communist Manifesto. But a greater crime is the injury done the Bill of Rights by their prosecution and by the dangerous precedents established, from which the court has averted its face.

Labor on the Spot

By FREDA KIRCHWEY

TOT many years ago I talked to a friend who had been a member of President Wilson's War Cabinet. He had signed contracts with industry involving the expenditure of hundreds of millions. He had been responsible, directly and indirectly, for wage agreements with organized labor. During the last war labor was accused, as it is accused today, of profiting from the national emergency. "I always took the position," said my friend, "that labor had a right to its share of the swag." He knew, he said, that such a remark sounded immoral. But what was really immoral was the fact that there was swag. He hadn't been able to prevent it. War profits were pouring into the pockets of business men and farmers; why not war wages into the pockets of workers? The place to crack down first, if cracking was possible, was at the other end-the price-and-profit end. Only then could you ask labor to forgo higher wages.

In this war, as in the last, prices and profits and wages have been handled as separate and largely unrelated problems, and the same scramble for advantage is under way. Again, as was the case last time, labor is singled out for special attack, while the other chief interested groups remain relatively immune from criticism. A recent example of this discrimination was General Marshall's much-debated statement on the railroad strike. I do not believe the Chief of Staff is anti-labor. I have no doubt that his single concern is the solid support of the war by every section of the public; as Raymond Swing said a few nights later, "he was pleading, in effect, that the home front join the war..." The strike threat, followed by the government's seizure of the roads, was such a dramatic declaration of inner discord that General Marshall seized upon it and made it the text of his sermon. But it was a bad tactical mistake, for it served an opposite purpose by increasing labor's sense of grievance and intensifying the public's antagonism toward labor. And it failed altogether to get at the basic elements in the conflict now raging between private interest and national need.

During the very week when the Chief of Staff gave his off-the-record opinion of labor's behavior, another major economic battle was being fought. The issues of that struggle are described in an article on a later page of this issue, Profiteers on the Rampage, by Karl Keyerleber. Can anyone who has followed the fight over renegotiation of contracts believe that the Timken-Detroit Axle Company and other corporations now lobbying to retain their swollen war profits constitute a lesser threat to the war effort than the railway workers? And how about the farm bloc's new legislative assault against the Administration's effort to hold food prices down?

Undoubtedly General Marshall would agree that farm and business groups should be forced, along with labor, to subordinate their interests to those of the nation. But he might assert that at least they have been able to get what they want without making much noise about it. A strike is a highly visible and challenging event. It makes good copy. And the press and radio, both inevitably dominated by a business point of view, are not inclined to play down the aggressive activities of organized labor. The result is that every strike or strike rumor becomes a major event and is communicated to Hitler's agents as fast as it is to the American public. How different the handling of the high-pressure tactics of business and the farmers! The appearance before a Congressional committee of a well-known industrialist pleading for guaranteed profits is reported, if at all, briefly and with respect. The more important arrangements, made behind closed doors, are not reported at all. What General Marshall would doubtless advocate for labor is the strategy employed by business; if the workers have grievances, let them seek redress inconspicuously.

At this point I would urge General Marshall to read another article in this issue—Why War Workers Strike, by Victor H. Johnson. From this round-by-round story of the effort of one local union to get a ruling on its grievances without resort to strike, he would learn what even the most patriotic workers are facing under our war-time setup. The government machinery to deal with complaints is slow, cumbersome, and, as Mr. Johnson points out, "working a single shift." A premium is put on striking by the very system designed to prevent it. Secretary of Labor Perkins reported at the year's end that labor's no-strike pledge had been kept "better than 99 per cent." This is the marvel—not the fact that some workers have struck.

As Congress settles down to work, it should consider these facts. Labor cannot be asked to accept the major responsibility for "holding the line" in the face of successful raids by other organized interests. And labor cannot even be expected to operate through negotiation and the processes of peaceful bargaining unless it knows where it stands. What is needed is a consistent federal labor policy, developed as part of an overall system of economic controls, and efficient, well-staffed machinery for settling disputes when they start, not after they have exploded into open warfare.

Marshall and the Second Front

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 6

Washington, January 6

Twashington, January 6

PM or the Chicago Sun or the New York Post or the St. Louis Post-Dispatch or Star-Times or the Philadelphia Record. (The three Patterson-McCormick papers were also excluded.) But I have talked to men who were there, and I have carefully gone over all the accounts of what happened. I should like to begin from an angle the daily press has generally ignored: the light the published accounts throw on the General's attitude toward the second front and the European war generally.

We were told that Teheran decided the question of the second front. The joint communiqué issued at Teheran said, "As to the war, our military staffs have joined in our round-table discussions, and we have concerted our plans for the destruction of the German forces. We have reached complete agreement as to the scope and timing of operations which will be undertaken from the east, west, and south." This seemed clear enough, though somewhat less precise than the glosses upon it.

A different attitude is indicated by accounts of the Marshall conference. The accounts agree that he said he had hoped for an internal collapse in Germany some time around February of this year, that he now felt strong German resistance would continue through the summer and that this would require large-scale invasion operations on our part, with heavy loss of life. This does not sound as though General Marshall considered that any very definite agreement had been reached at Teheran on the second front. The Teheran agreement was announced on December 1. He spoke on December 31.

The attitude of mind which seems to be indicated by reports of the Marshall conference was described by George Fielding Eliot in his column on January 3. This column carried no reference to the Marshall conference and seems to have been written before it occurred. Major Eliot has proved one of the ablest of our military commentators. He complained of an "unhealthy glow of optimism" and of "wishful thinkers" who still thought Germany could be bombed into submission. He wrote, "So many bombs would be dropped upon them [the Germans], we have been assured, that the invading armies would merely have to occupy territory and mop up a few scattered snipers." The OWI in a report released on January 4 similarly warned against overoptimism and the hope of a quick German collapse. General Marshall seems to have shared these illusions until the abortive steel strike and the threatened railroad strike changed his mind. One would have thought those illusions had been abandoned at Teheran.

General Marshall seems to have believed that m collapse or a change of policy was imminent in the satellite countries—Croatia, Hungary, Bulgaria, Rumania—and that this would shorten the war by six months. I don't pretend to know anything about military matters, but this calculation seems dubious to me. I should think all four of these countries together would weigh very little in the scales. However restive they may be, all of them seem securely under German military control, and it is hard to believe that their peoples or armed forces could throw off that control. I should think we would have to fight for these territories and that there was no easy way to obtain them short of a decisive Nazi defeat. With all due diffidence, this again seems to me the nourishing of over-optimistic illusions.

Writers in the daily press have amply demonstrated by now that Axis propaganda has paid very little attention to the strike situation. Dorothy Thompson has pointed out that both the Hitler regime and its truncated Italian partner are playing up to Socialist sentiment, of however distorted a variety. The Axis radio may consider it poor business to let Hitler's harassed, overstrained, and underfed workers—particularly those in the satellite countries—know that in America labor is still free to explain away the testimony of American and British radio -monitoring services. One is that the news of the strike has just been whispered by the Gestapo into the proper ears. The other is more curious.

Correspondents and columnists who can be trusted to echo official views can go over to the War Department and hold hands with certain colonels who provide "off-the-record" background. I think Mark Sullivan's explanatory column of January 5 was the result of such a conversation. Sullivan reviewed the whole background of the Marshall conference. He said that the army "has at all times accurate, up-to-the-minute knowledge of the morale of the Axis peoples" and that from this information "the army believed recently that there might be a crack-up of the German people, or more likely of the satellite peoples, some time fairly soon, perhaps during February." Sullivan said that at this point along came the taking over of the railroads and the "threatened" steel strike and that these changed the army's opinion. Sullivan went on to make an interesting admission. "The army," he explained, "did not need to wait to get reports of the changes through its intelligence services. The army knew that the strikes in America would be exploited by the German propaganda machine. . . . In view of this development in Germany, our army changed its view about the likelihood of an early crack-up within the Axis." It would seem from this that the army was guessing, and from the records of the Axis radio that it guessed wrong.

I have the highest respect for the men running the War Department, for men like Judge Patterson and Assistant Secretary of War McCloy. But I have talked with some of these colonels who funnel out army intelligence "off the record," and I am not impressed either with them or with their information. The combination of General Marshall's conference and the kind of stuff ladled out to Mark Sullivan doesn't change my opinion. It seems to me that both the quality of the information and the manner of its presentation indicate poor judgment. I would agree with Ernest Lindley—certainly a much less radical observer than myself—that Marshall's statement was itself of great propaganda value to the enemy, perhaps much more so than the threatened strikes, which I do not defend.

General Marshall has yet to be tested by events. We know that either he himself or someone in his immediate entourage was responsible for the famous "offthe-record" press conference predicting a Russian defeat within thirty days or so of the German attack, and we know that the General Staff long blocked lend-lease shipments to Russia in the imminent expectation of such a collapse. We know that General Marshall might have used this same "off-the-record" device to disassociate himself from the "beat-Japan-first" bloc when they used his name in Congress and over the air last spring to throw a monkey wrench into the President's conferences with Churchill. We now have another glimpse of him in action. I do not object to his appeal to labor. On the contrary I think a well-considered appeal, couched in persuasive terms, might have done a great deal of good. But this angry and exaggerated attack, made on vague grounds and under cover of an unmanly anonymity, bore the earmarks of an attempt to stir popular support for further anti-labor legislation or to make labor the scapegoat if coming invasions should prove costly or unsuccessful. I hope the impression I have gained of General Marshall is proved unfounded by coming events.

Profiteers on the Rampage

BY KARL KEYERLEBER

FOR every business man who assails the renegotiation of war contracts it would be possible to find ten or a dozen who regard it as a valuable part of government procurement of arms. Yet the few have played their cards so well that one of the most powerful single factors in reducing the cost of the war is in serious danger of being scrapped.

A block of legislators who include Chairman George of the Senate Finance Committee is determined to repeal the renegotiation statute. Changes incorporated in the revenue bill now before the Senate will gain very nearly the same end without repeal. If they become law they will make price adjustments in war contracts unworkable.

While renegotiation is to the average fellow a polysyllable of uncertain meaning, to a small and fractious minority it has become a fighting word—the industrial Old Guard's equivalent of "Remember Pearl Harbor." Two suits to test the law's constitutionality are now in the courts. Trying to whip up a disturbance that will pass for widespread public indignation, manufacturers have importuned employees and fellow-members of chambers of commerce to write to their representatives in Washington. They assert that renegotiation takes away so much of their profits that it is destroying their business, and then they go on to say that most of this money would be captured by taxation anyway. They call the statute undemocratic, arbitrary, and vicious, although the practice of adjusting prices after manufacturing costs are determined has good peace-time precedents.

That renegotiation takes money from business there can be no doubt. It has already saved the American people about two billion dollars on the cost of the war, a direct saving that would not have been effected by taxation or any other means—indirect savings probably run into more billions. But the fundamental issue is not one of economy. The issue in the renegotiation controversy is whether a fortunately placed few shall profit.

PILL C LIBU

excessively from the war effort. Pledges that they shall not have been put on the record by President Roosevelt, both major parties, and almost every national organization, including manufacturers' associations.

Once our rearmament program got under way, it became obvious that these pledges must be implemented. Even before Pearl Harbor profits were soaring. When contracts had to be "shoveled out" early in 1942, it became clear that the ordinary processes of procurement could not insure fair pricing and that the tax laws were not flexible enough to prevent exorbitant profits. Mass production of items never before mass-produced created situations in which neither government officials nor contractors could tell what the costs would be. Recognizing the danger of widespread profiteering to industry itself, some companies reduced their prices voluntarily before the renegotiation law was passed by Congress in April, 1942. They renegotiated their own contracts.

Price adjustment is not a revenue measure. It is not necessarily punitive; it does not stigmatize the contractor. It is part of the process by which government agencies have met the most prodigious procurement task in all history, and its primary purpose is to accomplish fair pricing in an emergency which keeps the ordinary controls of competition from operating. Most business men regard it as sound war-time policy and credit the adjustment boards with working conscientiously at a difficult job. This is not to say they like renegotiation; nobody likes to have his profits put through a wringer. But they feel that the losses and occasional inequities are preferable to the risk of post-war reaction of the kind to which Secretary Morgenthau alluded when he said the changes incorporated in the revenue bill by the Senate Finance Committee contained "the seeds of national scandal." Senator Walsh, a member of the committee, found it necessary to add that "when the record of profit-making on war contracts is disclosed, the American people will be shocked."

Though most industrialists who look beyond today's unprecedented opportunity for profit favor renegotiation, crippling amendments to the law have been pushed through the House and on to the Senate floor. The most significant are these: exemption of standard commercial articles; exemption of subcontractors whose goods do not enter into the final product—this was made retroactive; provision for post-war reconversion funds; permission for appeal to the courts, also retroactive.

VOLUME AND PROFITS

The argument that there is little likelihood of excessive profits, and therefore no need for renegotiation, in the manufacture of standard commercial articles is fairly plausible. "I sold this same article for $150 before the war, and that is what I am charging the army," says a manufacturer. "Why apply renegotiation to goods that you can go uptown to a store and buy?" asks another.

Yet it is precisely on standard goods that some of the biggest war profits have been made. Any business man, or for that matter anyone who recalls the effect of volume production on the price of automobiles, knows that a price which is fair when a plant is turning out 500 units a year is not fair when volume jumps to 10,000. It is a business maxim that larger volume and narrower profit margins go hand in hand.

The Sperry Corporation, one of the largest war contractors, making its regular peace-time product, reported early in 1942 that profits on government business were "larger than had been anticipated or desired" and subsequently slashed its prices. Timken-Detroit Axle makes standard articles for war. Testifying before the Senate Finance Committee last month, Under Secretary of War Patterson revealed that this company made $39,839,000 in 1942, against a peace-time annual average of $2,116,-000. After returning $12,500,000 as a result of renegotiation and paying war taxes, the company still had left $5,070,000, about half as much as it made in the whole pre-war decade. But unlike Sperry, the company complained about renegotiation, and when a new contract was broached asked an even higher price for its axles. Joseph M. Dodge, chairman of the War Department price-adjustment board, told the Senate Finance Committee of a company, "not by any means the most unusual," which jumped its volume of business from a 1936-39 average of $16,500,000 to $50,000,000 in 1942 and its average dollar profit before income taxes from 7.4 per cent on sales to 25 per cent. He told of ten lumber companies whose profits in the same base period, 1936-39, were $5,000,000 and in 1942 reached $25,900,000, the ratio of profit to sales rising from 11.8 to 26.1 per cent. Profits of twenty-five woolentextile companies averaged $3,200,000 for the base period. In 1942 that profit just took on another cipher and became $32,000,000.

Should these standard-product contractors be exempted from price adjustments? And where would the exemption line be drawn in the aircraft industry, which has become the biggest in world history by expanding from an annual output of $200,000,000 in 1939 to $20,000,000,000 in 1942? (An illustration of the fantastic profits in this industry is found in the salary increase of an executive of the Cessna Aircraft Company, as reported to the Securities and Exchange Commission. In 1940 this executive earned $2,325; in 1942, $89,851.) The definition of standard products would be good for endless legal arguments. Even battleships and tanks use many standard products.

Exemption of subcontractors whose goods do not enter into the final product would open the way for large profits in the lower tier of contractors, where they cannot be reached by procurement officers. And overpricing here, though creating higher costs for contractors at the top, would also raise their profits, since it would increase their dollar volume. This amendment would free from renegotiation such companies as the toolmakers. According to Mr. Dodge, nineteen companies in this field increased their sales volume from $29,400,000 in the base period to $172,000,000 in 1942, and in the process their net profit jumped from $5,000,000 before taxes to $62,-000,000 before taxes and renegotiation. The retroactive provision would open the way for recovery by industry of large sums already refunded, such as the $5,500,000 paid back by Warner and Swasey of Cleveland. This company made $20,222,000 in 1942, against a peacetime average of $1,900,000, and even after renegotiation and taxes made a profit of 50 per cent on its pre-war capital investment. The Lincoln Electric Company of Cleveland, which has refused to pay a renegotiation refund of $3,250,000 determined by the navy board, would also escape through this loophole. Incidentally, James F. Lincoln, head of this company, whose suit to test the constitutionality of renegotiation is scheduled for trial in federal District Court next month, first suggested the amendment exempting subcontractors.

PRUDENT PROVIDERS

A strong case can be made for the claim that manufacturers should be allowed to salt away large sums to finance the return to peace-time production. But renegotiation will not prevent their doing so. In the first place, the big profit-makers have a lot of money left after renegotiation and taxes, in most cases more than they ever made in peace years. The evidence is spread on the record of Congressional committee hearings. In the second place, the tax laws make considerable provision for reconversion, including a post-war refund of 10 per cent of excess-profits taxes paid. Treasury estimates indicate that by the end of this year as much as $26,000,000,000 may be available for post-war refunds. And in the third place, when some of these war contractors begin talking of reconversion funds they appear to want provision not only for known needs but for every contingency that could possibly arise, not excepting earthquakes.

If the profits under consideration were normal profits made out of civilian business it would be easy to go along with these prudent providers. But the money has come from the public till and must be paid out of taxes. If we admit that corporations should set aside for their own use millions made out of the war effort, we are saying that Smith, whose automobile agency was closed by the war, and Jones, whose business failed because of war shortages, should be taxed to insure that Brown suffers no loss while his war plant retools for velocipedes. And we are saying that in order to underwrite a job for War Worker Williams, Private Doakes should be taxed when he returns from his slit trench.

To argue that employment for Williams also will benefit Doakes is to miss the point here, which is not that there should be no reconversion funds but that they should be handled in another way. If they are to be charged to the war they should be distributed on the basis of need, not on the basis of who made the most money. For the manufacturer who made the most is likely to need the least help.

The provision for court review as now written not only would permit appeals on all future renegotiation proceedings but would reopen cases already decided. Two questions arise here: Will not court fights over renegotiation be so long drawn out as to make the entire statute ineffective? Are courts to decide fact as well as law, and if so, how is justice to be determined?

By the end of this month the War Department expects to complete renegotiation of 17,800 cases involving 1942 contracts. About 7,600 others have been or are being handled by Navy, Maritime Commission, and Treasury boards. An impossible burden would be thrown on the courts if a large proportion of the contractors involved in these cases decided to appeal. Litigation might drag on for years.

As for the second question: the courts can decide equity, but there is no legal precedent for renegotiation in determination of equity. Unless Congress passes a whole set of rules clearly defining costs, on what basis are the courts to decide cases? If a sufficiently flexible formula could be invoked, it could be set up to guide the price-adjustment boards. None has yet been found that will do the job. What makes renegotiation work is the fact that the boards can get at a company whose expenditures or profits are bloated and cut them down before the damage is irreparable—before excessive profits are put beyond reach and excessive costs reflected in inflationary prices. From this standpoint both court review and taxation are measures that lock the barn door after the horse has been stolen.

On this we have the word of business men themselves. The Sperry Corporation has called renegotiation "the only practical means yet developed to prevent unreasonable profits on war business." S. C. Allyn, president of the National Cash Register Company, whose contracts were renegotiated last year, told me recently: "I still think that renegotiation is the best way yet found or suggested to fulfil a necessary war-time function. Good faith is the saving factor and the unwritten element in every contract which protects both manufacturer and government. Renegotiation is nothing more than a means of exercising that good faith."

The list of business men who indorse the statute could be extended indefinitely. But a fighting minority, estimated by Under Secretary Patterson as less than 2 per cent of war contractors, have established a beachhead on Capitol Hill and are likely to win the battle unless the government officials who have been stoutly resisting them are strongly reinforced by public opinion.

The South American Conspiracy

BY MANUEL SEOANE

Santiago, Chile (by Air Mail)

THE Argentine movement has needed only six and a half months to spread to Bolivia; as with every epidemic, its germs found a propitious field in a country whose resistance was low. Bolivia was one of those "democracies" to which we have become accustomed—pro-democratic in foreign policy, dictatorial in internal policy. It was a clear target for local fascists.

Just as Napoleon after his death was still winning battles, so German Nazism advances in Latin America at the very moment it is bleeding to death in Europe. Make no mistake about it. What has happened in Bolivia has been a triumph for Hitler and a defeat for the puerile policy of "non-intervention" of the United States State Department,

I predicted the Bolivian coup d'état when I analyzed the rise of General Ramirez for the readers of The Nation.* I declared that under the dual slogan of combating Yankee imperialism and communism the Ramirez regime would devote itself to the creation of an anti-democratic coalition in Latin America. Bolivia has been the second act in a drama which will be prolonged through more than the conventional three.

To understand the real significance of the change of government in Bolivia one must look back over the last two years. The Bolivian state was headed by a soldier without a grain of political sense. During the Chaco war. Enrique Peñaranda Castillo rose from simple private to be one of the highest officers in the Bolivian army. On April 15, 1940, he became the constitutional President of Bolivia. For two years he respected the constitution. Then the social inequity under which Bolivia was living led to demonstrations which he felt obliged to suppress. In December, 1942, several hundred workers were massacred in Catavi by the forces of the government. A great clamor of protest rose from all Hispanic America. But General Peñaranda had learned in the Chaco the use of the smoke screen, and in March, 1943, he embraced the Four Freedoms for the benefit of foreign public opinion and declared war on the Axis. Two months later he was invited to the United States. Dressed In academic robes, this soldier of the Chaco, this military dictator, was given an honorary degree by Columbia University.

Once a Doctor of Laws, General Peñaranda returned to this country with the conviction that he was one of the leading artisans of victory. He grew more aggressive.

" Argentina's New Rulers. July 10, 1943.

Now softly, now blatantly, he demanded a port for Bolivia. It was his best card in countering internal opposition. President Vargas of Brazil, actuated by his hostility to Argentina, promised Peñaranda an outlet through Santos, several thousand miles distant from Bolivia, and with no connecting railroad. This was surely very generous of the Brazilian dictator, but he rendered his Bolivian colleague no great service. Peñaranda's campaign for a port was rapidly discredited, and he returned from his tour of the United States with little more to offer his people than his academic triumphs.

Although no concrete news about it has leaked out, a secret clique of officers, patterned after the one operating in Argentina, is almost certainly at work in Bolivia. We do know about the recent activity of the Movimiento Nacionalista Revolucionario, which was responsible for the overthrow. This movement is composed of former veterans of the Paraguayan war and of extreme nationalists who are as violently anti-United States as they are anti-Communist—in other words, exactly the same type of men as those who rule Argentina. It is well known in Santiago that Ramirez agents have visited Bolivia and that one of the most prominent leaders of the Bolivian movement, Colonel Taborga, was in Argentina for three months conferring daily with the colonels who engineered the Argentine coup.

Certain leftist elements, hating the Peñaranda government for its submission to the big mine-owners, were ready to support a revolt. Now they deny that Nazi groups had anything to do with the successful coup. Their protestations are unconvincing. The German Minister to Bolivia, the notorious Herr Wendler, Himmler's brother-in-law, who was thrown out of Bolivia because of his conspiratorial activities, was behind the movement Its organ is his newspaper, La Calle, whose editor is Armando Arce. La Calle is printed on German paper, stocked in La Paz. It is served by the well-known Nazi news agency, Trans-Ocean, and has always been suspected of secret dealings with the Japanese.

The ideological leader of the movement, Victor Paz Estenssoro, combines youth with brilliance and determination. A very capable lawyer and a member of Parliament, he is known as one of the most effective speakers in Bolivia. In an effort to secure the cooperation of all Bolivians, Peñaranda offered him the Ministry of Finance in 1940. Paz Estenssoro accepted but soon broke with Peñaranda and now, speaking over Radio America, a station which had been closed for its pro-Nazi activities, attacks him as the evil spirit of Bolivia.

If Paz Estenssoro is the most showy personality in the movement, Walter Montenegro, also a young man, is considered its one-man brain trust. He has spent a great deal of time in Argentina, and is known for his passionate anti-imperialism. He is extremely subtle and so elastic in policy that he is able to obtain support from both sides.

Other important figures are Aliguato Céspedes, who lived in Chile for many years and is the author of two rather impressive books—"Sangre de Mestizos" ("Mixed Blood") and "Metal del Diablo," a violent satire on Patiño, the great Bolivian mine-owner; Hernán Siles Suazo, thirty-year-old lawyer, son of former President Siles, a man of honesty and energy and with a solid reputation, who will soon be prominent in the Bolivian press; and José Pinto, a cavalry colonel, who did not hide his sympathy for the Argentine colonels when he visited Chile recently.

It was unfortunate that the Argentine revolt was not taken as seriously as it deserved. It will be equally deplorable if the gravity of the Bolivian situation is minimized, or if public opinion is misled by the support of men who undoubtedly belong to the left and who have clean records. Certain indisputable facts must be kept in mind.

First, the coup d'état will have great inter-American repercussions. Peñaranda, a friend of Brazil, has been overthrown by partisans of Argentina. And the second step in the creation of a Grand Fascist Alliance in South America has been successfully carried out. Second, this success is undeniable evidence of the failure of United States policy toward Latin America, evidence which no diplomatic cleverness will be able to cover up. It proves the futility of trying to maintain cordial relations with dictatorships which have no internal support and which may be destroyed overnight, despite benedictions spoken in Washington. It proves that only genuine democratic regimes can win popular support and that an appeal to the people is the only way to counter the extraordinarily powerful fascist offensive now under way in Latin America. Third, it is a sign that we must be prepared for all kinds of incidents and conflicts in the Western Hemisphere. Of course, the new Bolivian government will continue the state of war with the Axis. It will not retreat an inch from the line laid down by Peñaranda. But behind it and within it are the elements which are trying to Nazify South America and all those fervent nationalists who are ready to precipitate conflict with Chile around the old issue of a port for Bolivia.

And now the third act of the conspiracy is in preparation. The agents of Argentine fascism are active here in Chile, but it is in Peru that they have the most immediate chances of success.

75 Years Ago in "The Nation"

TALY HAS HAD PEACE throughout the year just closed, but peace without tranquillity. . . . Brigands still infest the mountains. The finances of the country are at a low ebb. The King has lost his popularity. His foreign policy is undefined. The Parliament is rent with factious strifes. The people are restless. Garibaldi in his island is preparing for new adventurous attempts. Mazzini—from his sick-bed at Lugano, in Switzerland—preaches a new crusade against the Pope and his supporters. Final pacification is impossible as long as Rome remains severed from the kingdom.—

January 7, 1869.

THE NEWS FROM SPAIN IS BETTER than it was last week. The insurrections which broke out in Seville, Cadiz, and Malaga have been suppressed with little trouble and little bloodshed, the republicans showing nearly as great readiness in surrendering as in rising. The cause of these disturbances is . . the long delay in taking the national decision on the form of government and the belief of the republicans, whether well or ill founded, that the Provisional Government is using the delay to intrigue in favor of a monarchy.—January 7, 1869.

THERE IS, WE ARE ASSURED, no doubt that the Civil Service bill will be opposed by the leading men of both parties, and that there is little chance of its passing this session without strong pressure from public opinion. Practically the power of appointment to subordinate positions in the public service is now in the hands of Congressmen, and they use it for their own private benefit and that of their friends; and he must be a very sanguine person who expects them to give it up without a struggle.—[annary 14, 1869.

ON THURSDAY A BILL WAS INTRODUCED in the Senate to give Mrs. Lincoln a pension, on the ground that her husband being killed while in the discharge of his duty (and because he discharged it so well) as commander-inchief of the army and navy, his widow deserves a pension as much as the widow of any soldier or sailor.—January 21, 1869.

SCIENCE VERSUS PREJUDICE. Tobacco and Alcohol. I. It Does Pay to Smoke. II. The Coming Man Will Drink Wine. By John Fiske, M.A., LL.B., 16mo, cloth $1.—(ADVT.) January 21, 1869.

HARVARD LAW SCHOOL, Cambridge, Mass. Two terms beginning February 22 and September 13, 1869. The resident Professors are Theophilus Parsons, LL.D., Emory Washburn, LL.D., and Nathaniel Holmes, A.M. Gentlemen of distinction in the profession lecture from time to time on special topics. Application may be made for circulars or further information to either of the resident Professors.—(ADVI.) January 28, 1869.

Why War Workers Strike

The Case History of a Shipyard "Wildcat"

BY VICTOR H. JOHNSON

E SET off on our junket to Washington with considerable hope. We were happy to have avoided for at least a week the shutdown of two of the biggest and fastest naval shipyards in the country. Labor's "no-strike" pledge had been kept; through pleading and the faith of the men who work side by side with us we had held 43,000 rebellious shipworkers on the job. What, in turn, would Washington do for us in the way of adjusting the grievances of those men and keeping production going?

Washington was not cold or indifferent. In fact, I was surprised to find, in the same city that houses such a viciously anti-labor Congress, some understanding labor people. True, the story of trouble in the shipyards had preceded us, and the officials we reached knew we were not casual visitors.

The first telephone contact made by the two rank-and-file members of our delegation of five was with Dr. John Steelman, head of the United States Conciliation Service. Dr. Steelman is one of the most down-to-earth government men you could possibly talk to. What his influence and power are among the other government labor people, I don't know. I suspect, though, that he is too straightforward and democratic to be popular with the red-tapers.

Dr. Steelman was already familiar with our case. After a few minutes of questions about details, he undertook to help get action. The mark of his sincerity was his giving us a definite time when he would have news; the mark of his democracy was the way he talked to us. "I know, Bud," he would say. "You have to have something to take back to those guys."

Dean Wayne Morse, one of the four members of the War Labor Board representing the public, was our next man. (We knew that the four labor members would go along with us; we expected the four employer members to stall; ultimately the decision would be up to the public members.) On the West Coast Dean Morse had a good reputation as a conciliator. In Washington he is known among union people as "the Dean," and they will tell you that he is a good man on vacations and substandard brackets but a tough adherent of the Little Steel formula.

Morse looks more like the male half of a Latin dancing team than a government official. He is young, lithe, dark; lacking the age and flesh of older officials, he has assumed the dignity of judicial detachment. As he studied our reports and statistics, we were certain of one thing: this man would either do something about our case or plainly tell us he wouldn't.

"That's a pretty big speed-up you have," he said, apparently making comparison with other yards. "The accident report shows it, too. And you were close enough to a strike—there seems no doubt about that. What do you think it would take to straighten out the situation?"

"Two things," one of us answered. "The first is retroactivity—so the men will know that whatever they do get will go back to the time the old contract expired. They don't like the idea of being gypped during negotiation time. The second is vacations, vacations have already been granted in other plants, and our people are burned up because other workers are getting vacations and they're not. The argument for vacations is the company's accident report; a 72 per cent increase in accidents over the last six months shows that the men need a rest."

Morse looked relieved. "There I think I can do something for you. On anything that is not against the President's wage policy the board will do whatever it can. But any blanket wage increase for shipyards is out. Those orders are from the President. We will carry them out, that's all—until the White House decides otherwise."

On vacations and retroactivity, two concessions we believed would prevent a strike while the rest of the contract was being negotiated, the Dean moved quickly enough. First he discovered that our case was what is known as "in the files"—that is, it was buried with hundreds of other cases waiting consideration by the WLB. By telephone he consulted other board members, and we heard him advise interim orders on vacations and retroactivity, and argue that sufficient precedent had already been established in other cases. One of the other board members did not believe this and thought the company might jump the board for deciding a case without taking full evidence. Morse then asked if this legalistic fellow would join, if not in an order, in a strongly worded recommendation for vacations-strongly enough worded to be tantamount to an order.

We left the Dean's office with our case out of the files and with the conviction that he would live up to his promise to push it.

William Hammond Davis, chairman of the board, is the other extreme from Steelman and Morse. He is an old man—his white hair, his round, involved manner of speaking, his smug self-assurance are like those of an old-time mechanic who takes his superiority for granted and resents any innovations. Whereas with Morse we could come quickly to the point, we had to listen while Davis told us what the WLB would do if our men struck. All of this was foolish and beside the point, since we were entirely familiar with the WLB's policy of refusing to act during a strike. We had come to ask Davis's help in warding off a strike.

Where Morse had looked at the problem from a psychological viewpoint, with the obvious intention of stretching legality to fit an acute situation, Davis seemed bent on making the situation fit legality. Production speed, accident increase, the angry temper of a night shift that had already walked off the job, two big shipyards already shut down for four hours—none of these facts seemed to penetrate Davis's mind. Smug in his dictatorial economic power over millions of America's war workers, cracking his not very witty wisecracks about what he had done to John L. Lewis (interpreted by us as what he had done to 500,000 sweating, underpaid miners), and threatening sweetly to do likewise by our men, who had not struck, Mr. Davis would take up our case with the board "sometime in the near future."

Neither the president of our union, a fairly able pinner-downer, nor the rank-and-filers accompanying him could pin this old patent lawyer down to a definite time of action. We felt discouraged when we left his office, and feared that he would sabotage what Dean Morse and Dr. Steelman were trying to do. Meanwhile, the week our membership had given us to get results was sliding by.

Since Davis had given us what amounted to a polite brush-off, the next move was political pressure. Our shipyards are within the sphere of influence of Mayor Frank Hague of Jersey City. Mayor Hague, take him or leave him, is an important cog in the New Deal political machine. He is a figure on the Democratic National Committee, a power in the backrooms; his Hudson County turns out a solid vote for F. D. R. Our delegation returned to Jersey City, consulted some people on labor's political-action committees, then took off for Washington again.

Representative Mary Norton and Mayor Hague telegraphed Davis urging action; down to Washington by plane came Hague's nephew and personal representative, Commissioner Frank Eggers of Jersey City. He and the shipyard delegates went to Davis's office.

The hand of Hague made a difference. Our delegation was not politely dismissed this time with, "Well, gentlemen, I am glad to have seen you." Instead, Mr. Davis leaned back and talked business—the business he should have talked in the first place. The Shipbuilding Commission was being reorganized with representatives of the procurement agencies—the navy and the Maritime Commission—left out. Our case would be one of the first heard by the new commission. Retroactivity, vacations, reclassifications, and other points—we were given to understand the new commission would consider these "favorably"; the implication was that they were in the bag.

At a mass-meeting of our membership held in Jersey City we reported on our Washington trips and the promises made by Davis. Our men are not unreasonable; they are as conscious of the war and of our obligations as any other group of citizens. They were pleased that the Shipbuilding Commission was being reorganized, that their case was out of the files. The War Labor Board was not dead; we had seen some of its members in the flesh. The meeting voted, in good spirits, to accept our recommendation to await action by the WLB.

REWARD OF VIRTUE

Some of the responsibility for what subsequently happened in the two big shipyards we represented falls upon the shoulders of our delegation. We took Mr. Davis's promises, made after the intervention of Mayor Hague, at face value; we believed we had actually succeeded in getting the WLB to speed action on a case. Our president went off on a week's vacation, certain that he would have something definite to report to the membership next week. We who worked in the yard had the same hope.

But it was only wishful-thinking. After two weeks our phone calls to Washington grew more frantic. The day shift going out wanted to know when we were going to get action. The night shift coming in asked the same question. The WLB's regular answer was, "We're working on it." Sometimes when we'd call around three o'clock to try to get news for both shifts, we'd be told that Mr. Davis was out of town or "not in." The men standing around the phone would crack, "Suppose we go out of town, too?"

The union men who came into the office of who worked side by side with us, we could hold against a strike. Our problem was the unorganized, those who did not know what was being done, or what the situation was in Washington. Our union people, besides being better informed, also realized their responsibility to the "norstrike" pledge and the future of their organization. The unorganized were more for striking than the organized. Non-unionists baited us for "being afraid to strike."

A month of waiting brought an unorganized exodus from the yards. Discontented and wondering if the WLB would take six months or more as it had in other cases, many men decided not to wait for a vacation they might or might not get, or for possible petty raises under reclassifications. Ways were shut down for lack of men; superintendents complained that production was "going to hell." Around the yard appeared the slogan "No dues till we get action!"

Two months of the WLB's "working on it" produced no results as far as the men in the yards could see. Even sober old-time trade unionists, who knew that a strike would cost us public support and perhaps bring organizational disaster, spoke bitterly of "teaching that War Labor Board crowd a lesson." Spontaneous work stoppages, slowdowns, sitdowns multiplied. Union officials had a busy time nipping departmental demonstrations in the bud and keeping resentment from crystallizing into a general walkout. We tried to prevent news of the trouble from reaching the public; and so did the company, apparently.

Finally, we got a sitdown that we couldn't keep from the public or from the WLB. The hookers-on in the steelyard and plateshop sat down and refused to budge. The company tried to break it up by sending the men home. They went home, to return the next day and sit down again. After vain pleading by local union officials, John Green, national president of the Shipyard Workers, flew to the yards from Washington. It was a sad sight, the old leader of the shipyard workers standing on a flat-car, his gray head bare, valiantly trying to uphold the C. I. O's "no-strike" pledge. He was not met with boos and catcalls—just a respectful, deadly silence. The men were still sitting when he left the yard forlornly.

That was a critical night in the shipyards. The company ordered what it euphemistically calls its "riot squad" to stand by for a strike. Feeling for a sympathy strike with the hookers-on, as well as for our own grievances, ran high. We rank-and-file leaders of the swing shift in my yard called a meeting during our twentyminute lunch period. Nine hundred men crowded around the pipe-bench from which we spoke, and we didn't know whether we'd be mobbed or allowed to get away free. There was no word to be said in defense of the WLB. It stank-but Green had brought us certain information from Washington, information that could not be given out officially. If we could hold tight for another week, he felt sure that some of the clauses of the proposed contract would come through. Meanwhile, we had talked with spokesmen from the hookers-on; they asked us not to spread the strike. They were meeting with Green the next day and hoped to get their grievances straightened out. The War Labor Board, which we had thought dead, was not dead-it sent a telegram stating there would be no further consideration of our case until the hookers-on returned to work!

In the face of this coercion from the WLB and after taking up a collection for the hookers-on, the swing-shift crowd returned half-heartedly to work. The sitdowners next day voted to resume production; the welders put off their walkout. Our repeated plea for action was echoed by the returning hookers-on. But this time it was different. Though no open threat was made in the politely worded telegram we sent to the WLB, Washington could draw its own conclusion. Unless there was action in the capital there was going to be action in the shipyards—plenty of it.

RUEING FROM WASHINGTON

The next week the Shipbuilding Commission issued a directive covering, with the exception of reclassifications, all the points at issue in our proposed contract. (On that one point the commission ruled that more time was needed to study other scales in the industry.) The union immediately put out a leaflet hailing a great labor victory. The men in the yards were led to believe they had really won. However, when we checked up on what had actually been granted, we found, in highlight, this: the union had obtained (1) a company check-off of dues under the maintenance-of-membership clause; (2) the right of shop stewards to operate on company time and property so long as they didn't interfere with production; (3) the right to use company bulletin boards for union notices.

These were all excellent gains for the union as an organization. On the demands affecting the rank and file, the following rulings were handed down;

- 1. One week's vacation was allowed for one year's service, provided that the employee had been employed in the yards before July 1, 1942. (This clause almost completely shut out the workers in one of the two yards from a vacation, inasmuch as the yard didn't open for production until after July 1, 1942.)
- 2. Two weeks' vacation for five years' service, effective in 1944. (In other words, men with five years' service were promised a vacation after July 1, 1944.)
  - 3. Sick leave was denied.
- 4. Hospitalization and a liberalized insurance clause were denied.
- 5. Retroactivity on reclassifications was given to us at the start of a paragraph but was taken away at the bottom by a clause leaving final discretionary power with the Shipbuilding Commission. (The union leaflet published only the first part of the paragraph.)

With production up five times over that of peace time, with costs of living up but wages held down by the WLB, it would seem that the shipyard operators would have jumped at such mild terms as Washington proposed. But the operators didn't jump. They appealed from the order, hitting chiefly at vacations on the ground that they were in reality "a wage raise."

THE LID BLOWS

Again our case went back to the WLB. Again the strike fever in the yard mounted, with little stoppages, numerous slowdowns. After another month of waiting, the yard "blew." Thirteen thousand men hit the bricks over the pleas of union officials and shop stewards. We were on a big-time wildcat strike. It tore and screeched over the radio; it tangled claws on editorial pages. And it shook Mr. Davis up in Washington.

President John Green of the Shipyard Workers was ordered by Davis to intervene, on the tacit understanding that the WLB would act when production was resumed. Being somewhat wise in the ways of John Green and knowing his desire to protect the check-off already granted, we started the back-to-work movement even before he arrived. It was better to get the men back at work at the peak of their wildcat strength than to have the strike broken slowly by the union, Green, WLB pressure, and the draft boards. And, as we foresaw, Davis did act. The point is, he could have done it months before without being forced at the point of a strike.

From this experience and from the nature of the clauses granted and the clauses denied, to both the union and the company, and from other evidence too far afield to be covered in this article, I have drawn some definite conclusions about the War Labor Board and the general set-up of Mr. Roosevelt's war-time labor-grievance machinery:

- 1. War-time labor adjudication has not kept pace with the rest of the war program. War industry is generally working three shifts; government labor-grievance machinery works but one, and apparently not too conscientiously at that.
- 2. The WLB is a cautiously reactionary instrument under the domination of William Hammond Davis. The window-dressing of liberals like Wayne Morse amounts to that—window-dressing.
- 3. The policy of the War Labor Board is to give workers the minimum that will keep them from striking.
- 4. For selling to their memberships the meager gains made under WLB rulings, union officials are rewarded by maintenance of membership, closed shop, and automatic company check-off of union dues. If union leaders fail to sell WLB decisions to the membership, Mr. Davis threatens to withdraw the union-favoring clauses.
- 5. Many of the wildcat work stoppages, strikes, and slowdowns, and partial responsibility for some of the labor turnover in war industry, can be laid in the laps of Messrs. Davis, Vinson, and Byrnes. Besides erring frequently in their judgment as to how little they can give workers without bringing about a strike, their procedure is so slow that all official Washington is damned in the eyes of the workingman awaiting action. He decides, rightly, that the only way to get action is to strike.
- 6. Come election time it will be difficult for Mr. Roosevelt to explain away the activities of these gentlemen. Undoubtedly the closed shop, maintenance of membership, and check-offs will hold the top labor officials, both A. F. of L. and C. I. O., on the President's bandwagon. But rank-and-file workers who have been through the ordeal of the WLB, and who have been more or less coerced into acceptance of its decisions, will be on the lookout for a liberal candidate of Presidential stature who will give the whole set-up the blasting it deserves.

In the Wind

R. MAX BRAUER, who was mayor of a large German city during the Weimar Republic and is now working for the Federated Churches of Christ, addressed at Yale last week AMG officers studying the background of Germany. He had been asked to speak as an expert on municipal government in Germany, but instead spent most of his time urging reestablishment of the German Reich as it was in January, 1933, minimizing the importance of the Jewish problem, and offering the AMG officers advice on how to act toward civilians who might wish to establish a Soviet in Germany. The officers complained to the director of the school. He admitted that Dr. Brauer, who had been okayed by the OWI and other agencies, was guilty of bad judgment.

THE WALL STREET JOURNAL REPORTS that "Spike" Movius, secretary to Senator Nye, had a hand in Nelson Sparke's book, "One Man—Wendell Willkie."

LABOR SHORTAGE: When J. W. Canant, publisher of the Monte Vista Journal of Colorado, and three of his printers became ill last week, an emergency call was sent to the war prisoners' camp at Monte Vista. The officer in charge canvassed the Nazis to find out whether any of them had had printing experience. A type-setter, a stenographer, and a press feeder were discovered. They were rushed to the Journal office, and the newspaper appeared on time.

AN AUCTION SALE at Christie's in London brought $200 for sixteen bottles of Scotch whiskey. Nine bottles of Irish whiskey went for $95, and five bottles of gin for $64. A bottle and a half-bottle of Chartreuse sold for $48, and $35 was paid for a half-liter of green and a half-liter of yellow Chartreuse.

THE MOST POPULAR AMERICAN BOOKS during the last five years in Uruguay: "The Microbe Hunters" by Paul de Kruif, "Gone with the Wind" by Margaret Mitchell, "The Good Earth" by Pearl Buck, "Grapes of Wrath" by John Steinbeck, "World's End" by Upton Sinclair, "Tobacco Road" by Erskine Caldwell, "The Wild Palms" by William Faulkner, "Manhattan Transfer" by John Dos Passos, "Native Son" by Richard Wright.

FESTUNG EUROPA: Five Czechoslovakians were hanged on telegraph poles in retaliation for the wrecking of a freight train. The victims were four boys, one of them fifteen years of age, and a girl of sixteen. . . . A Czechoslovak woman was executed for failing to denounce her brother and sister-in-law to German authorities. . . . The Czechoslovak government has determined that the man responsible for the razing of Lidice is Hauptsturmführer Wiesmann, chief of the Gestapo in Kladno at the time.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Germany, 1944

POLITICAL warfare this year has one supreme objective—destruction of the Third Reich. In 1944 the United Nations must deal the decisive blow to Germany, in the political as well as in the military field. To understand the processes which will carry Germany to final defeat and through the period of transition that will follow its surrender, one must be intimately acquainted with the internal situation of Germany, its economic problems, frontier issues, the prospects of labor, the strength of the political opposition, and other factors which will determine the course the country will pursue once the National Socialist regime is destroyed.

In the coming year this section intends to devote particular attention to German problems. In an early issue it will begin a series of articles dealing with the subjects mentioned above. The commentary of Argus will continue to be a valuable background to this analysis. From the start his column has been welcomed by laymen and specialists alike. We know definitely that more than one official agency in the United States considers "Behind the Enemy Line" among the most accurate and serious sources of information on Germany.

We recently have had new evidence, in two important documents, of the exactness with which Argus has been interpreting German developments. One is a book; the other, a letter from Spain written by a person who has lately visited Berlin, and who was in a position to obtain information from authoritative sources.

The book, "Behind the Steel Wall" by Arvid Fredborg, will be brought out this week by the Viking Press. It covers a period which American journalists, obliged to leave the country after Pearl Harbor, have never been able to report on. Mr. Fredborg quit Germany only in the summer of 1943. He was able to feel the German pulse, to witness the immediate reaction of the people to some of the major events which changed the course of the war-the winter campaign of 1941-42 on the eastern front, the beginning of war weariness in the spring of 1942, Rommel's failure to bring his spectacular drive in Libya to a victorious conclusion, the catastrophe of Stalingrad, the final struggle in Africa, the intensified air raids of 1943, the deterioration of the German submarine war, and the decline of German prestige even among pseudoneutral states and satellites.

That the author is not distinguished either for imagination or political shrewdness is manifest in the last pages of the book, when he writes of the structure of post-war Europe. Probably under the spell of the comfortable Scandinavian monarchies, Mr. Fredborg finds nothing better to suggest for the Europe of 1945 than a universal return to monarchy. He becomes childish when he tries to read the future, but when he talks of the present he reveals a remarkable power of observation which recognizes the smallest detail as an integral part of the whole. His very lack of imagination gives the book the imprint of veracity. Mr. Fredborg is not a man of great vision, but as a chronicler of fact he is unexcelled.

Among the first impressions one gets from the book is that none of the evils and difficulties awaiting the German people as they move toward defeat will be anything new. Except for the final collapse itself, the Germans have already gone through the most trying experiences possible. In the coming months those experiences may, of course, be repeated in such aggravated form that they can no longer be endured. But in evaluating them, one should keep in mind Mr. Fredborg's observation. "Often," he says, "I had occasion to reflect on the fantastic tenacity that the Germans displayed; their endurance seemed only short of the miraculous.

The encouraging stories we have read, from Ankara and Stockholm and Berne, of growing unrest in Germany must be scrutinized with a sense of proportion. To begin with, neither the degeneration of morale, nor the internal feuds among Nazi leaders, nor the difficulties in obtaining food, nor the decreasing faith in Hitler, nor the late of the people for the party, nor the acts of sabotage are unprecedented. All through 1942 and 1943 Mr. Fredborg was a witness to these developments, and he reports them with his customary scrupulousness but without ever deluding himself that they are sufficient to bring Germany to its knees.

As early as the summer of 1942, Mr. Fredborg states, "morale was declining in many ways." A wave of rumors suddenly swept over Berlin. Characteristically, they referred primarily to the most hated and feared person in the country—the chief of the German police. Some rumors said that he was dead; others that he had been injured in a plane crash on his way to Norway; others that the General Staff had forced him to retire after he had drawn a revolver and shot a general in the presence of Hitler. As in most rumors there was in these a kernel of truth. Just about the time they were circulating, Berlin bookstores received a secret letter from the Propaganda Ministry instructing them to remove pictures of Heinrich Himmler from display. But very soon after he had apparently fallen from favor, Himmler's influence was restored. Instead of diminishing, his power steadily increased until he became the most important minister of the Reich. Even Air Marshal Göring, after persisting for several months in his determination not to give up a single unit of the Luftwaffe, finally yielded to Himmler enough planes to build up an air corps for the S. S.

Every fresh lapse of confidence resulted in new powers for the Gestapo. Mr. Fredborg gives interesting details about its present strength, which he estimates to be at least 500,000 men equipped with every modern weapon. He tells how the Gestapo has been trained in the art of street warfare; how it has developed a system of internal espionage that exceeds the most dramatic underground reports; how it stimulates the slightest symptoms of articulate opposition into real rebellion, using the methods once followed by the Czar's secret police, thereby making possible the arrest of everyone suspected not only of illegal activities but of "illegal thinking."

Just as Himmler has emerged victorious from his various disputes with more moderate elements, so does every other conflict with the conservative forces of the country result in their defeat. Dissatisfaction with judges who still exhibited a pedantic respect for tradition was settled by the appointment of Dr. Thierack as Minister of Justice, with the party fanatic, Rothenberger, as his assistant minister. (A cable on January 3, 1944, stated that the latter had been dismissed from his post; the reason was not given, but possibly he went too far in disciplining the tribunals.) Judges are treated as puppets. No deference is paid to impartial justice. Even as old a party member as Governor General Frank of Poland had to pay for the crime of having said in a lecture that the totalitarian system was compatible with security under law and that the National Socialist state should not degenerate into a mere police state. Within the party it was expected that Frank would be appointed to the post Thierack now occupies, but a Germany that is rapidly losing the war cannot leave the administration of justice to such a flabby disciple of National Socialism.

Also, much of what we have heard about disagreements between the Führer and his generals is true. When the man who was considered the brains of the German army, General Halder, was replaced as chief of the General Staff by an unknown officer who only a month before had been a simple colonel, a break between the party and the Reichswehr seemed imminent. All the foreign correspondents in Berlin were after the story. But nothing grave happened then or later. Since December, 1942, General Zeitzler, piling defeat on defeat, has performed his duties as Chief of Staff, with no higher qualification for his post than his ability to get along well with the supreme commander.

The Swedish journalist's account of two years in Germany describes frequent periods of extreme pessimism. He shows a people which sees its chances of victory rapidly vanishing, cities and houses destroyed by continuous air raids, working hours increased until ten hours a day is the minimum and eleven or twelve the average. It is exactly the same picture drawn in the interesting letter mentioned above, dated November 30—just five months after Fredborg left Berlin.

"Suddenly," the writer says, "Germany has become a land without joy; the men in uniform look like automatons, and only one emotion illuminates their faces—a growing sense of fear. People walk mechanically on their way to the factories and on their way home. They still eat abundantly, but they no longer enjoy their food. Much stronger than the desire to eat is the desire to get an extra hour of sleep to compensate for the sleepless nights to which the bombing raids are subjecting the population of the large cities."

"Until recently," the letter continues, "the soldiers who had permission to return from the front were systematically used to encourage the home population. Now their efficiency for any kind of psychological propaganda has diminished enormously. They don't come home enthusiastic and aggressive, but complaining of the lack of German planes and of the terrific tenacity of the Russians."

In the midst of those pathetic, pessimistic masses a growing section of the German people is seeking the way out. Mr. Fredborg is particularly cautious in speaking of the present strength and chances of the underground. What role the opposition in Germany may play in the future he does not know. He has divided the opposition into four main groups-monarchists, liberals, Socialists, and Communists. In the autumn of 1942 it was estimated that 150,000 persons had joined the underground. During 1943 their number increased. They have even obtained weapons, chiefly by bribing the men who supply military depots; these are ready to report abnormal "losses" of the arms in their charge if they are paid with coffee or with other scarce foodstuffs. "But from a purely technical point of view," Mr Fredborg states with certainty, "the opposition is still hopelessly inferior to the regime."

Under such circumstances it is difficult for a Minister of Propaganda to find successful new slogans, but there is still one that acts as a stimulant. According to Mr. Fredborg, even in the summer of 1942 "Never Again 1918" was the best propaganda slogan the National Socialists could have wished for. It is the one most frequently used today. It runs through Hitler's last New Year's proclamation, and apparently its force is recognized by Herr Goebbels, on whose audacity and energy the author of "Behind the Steel Wall" and the writer of the letter agree. "Nazi leaders," says the latter, "now frequently address the workers. They are listened to in silence or with forced applause. Only one man is still more or less successful in warming up the crowd. That is Dr. Goebbels. After he visits a factory, a vague optimism prevails and lasts for a few days-but not much longer."

"Never Again 1918" sounds quite firm. But can another 1918 be avoided? Is there any chance for the Third Reich to escape defeat? According to the Swedish journalist, some leading Nazis still believe there is. They like to point to the situation in 1762. Toward the end of the Seven Years' War, when Frederick the Great stood alone against two great empires, Austria and Russia, it looked as though nothing could save him. But the Empress Elizabeth of Russia died, and her successor, Peter III, offered Frederick a separate peace. "Perhaps once more," they say, "rescue may come from Russia."

But when Mr. Fredborg left Berlin, the Teheran conference had not yet taken place, nor had the Russian armies crossed the Polish border.

A. DEL V.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

ONSTANZ is a small German city of 34,000 inhabitants on the Swiss border. When a person in Konstanz dies, the family, in accordance with German custom, inserts a death notice in the local newspaper, the Bodensee-Rundschau. A Swiss newpaper conceived the idea of examining the back numbers of the Bodensee-Rundschau to see how many of the death notices since the beginning of the war were those of soldiers and officers killed in battle. It discovered that up to the middle of December 3,794 of the announcements referred to men fallen at the front.

This figure, however, included soldiers from the surrounding region as well as from the city of Konstanz and therefore could not be set against the 34,000 inhabitants-it would have represented a frightful percentage. But it could be compared with the region's losses in 1914-18. During the First World War the population of Konstanz was just about the same as now, and the Bodensee-Rundschau printed the death notices of 3,083 soldiers. If Konstanz can be considered typical of the country as a whole, and if these deaths are a reliable index, 20 per cent more men have fallen in this war than in the last.

The Swiss newspaper which dug up these bare facts, the Schaffhausen Arbeiter-Zeitung, rounded them out in its issue of December 23 with some human-interest details. Many of the recent notices, it said, were inserted by elderly people who "announced the death of their last son." In others "peasants mourned the last prop of farm and field." "Some parents have lost three sons; one eighty-year-old woman has lost seven grandsons in Russia. . . . Women have become widows a few days after their wedding; old people have committed suicide from grief; young girls have drowned themselves in Lake Constance or taken poison. There have been no fewer than seventy-six suicides in Konstanz since the Russian war started."

Information of a more general character about German losses and the present strength of the German army has been gathered by another Swiss newspaper. Germany's Winter Army Number 3 is the title of an article in the Zurich weekly the Weltwoche for December 3. Based on facts obtained from apparently reliable sources, it begins with the following statement:

Nearly all German men between seventeen and fiftythree-those born between 1890 and 1920-are now in uniform. Those born in 1898 and later-forty-five years old and younger-are in combatant service at the front; those born before 1898 are serving behind the lines. The sixteen-year-old boys, born in 1927, must register for military service in January, but about onefifth of the boys of this class have already enlisted.

The most decisive factor in the present situation, according to this account, is the continually decreasing strength of the army in spite of the regime's efforts to drain the last drop from the man-power reservoir. For about sixteen months "losses have exceeded new enlistments." The numerical strength of the German army "reached its peak when the Germans were approaching Stalingrad and Cairo; at that time 16,000,000 troops of all categories had been called to the colors." Today the total strength of the German army, according to "reliable estimates," is "somewhat less than 10,000,000. Thus in spite of the mobilization of new classes and the induction of men combed out of various kinds of civilian work, the effectives of the German army have diminished by more than one-third in the past fifteen months."

But though the number of soldiers has decreased, the number of divisions, this article declares, has remained the same. Thus "the average strength of a German division has grown steadily less for almost two years. Today division of 16,500 men is the exception. Most divisions contain about 13,000 men, and some stationed in occupied countries are even smaller. In France, for instance, six months ago fifty-five railroad trains were required to move a division; today forty suffice." Even the thirty to thirty-five armored divisions, though they still exist, have no longer their old strength. Hardly a one has the normal quota of 360 tanks. And what is most important, while a short time ago every German armored division had behind it both a "replacement" and a "reserve" division, now in almost every case the reserve division has disappeared.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Power and the Common Man

COMMON CAUSE. By G. A. Borgese. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $3.50.

Y SOLE objection to this magnificent book is that "the bride is too fair." Borgese does not believe in an economy of scarcity. He will not plow under any felicity of speech—allusion, alliteration, or even the lowliest pun. His pages are masterpieces of baroque art: every nook is adorned, and every ornament beckons with dramatic urgency. Others may prefer chaster modes—Spartan, Calvinistic, or Voltairean. But I am using "baroque" as a definition, not as a stricture. We cannot forget that Shakespeare is the supreme achievement of the baroque.

A stylist, but no mere stylist, for the thought is as luxuriant as the form. "Common Cause" is a Summa: a truly philosophical book which embraces religion as well as history, politics, and economics. Vast as the sweep is, the details are not blurred. The discussions of Catholic policy and of Churchillian Toryism, for instance, are masterly—and deadly—in their definiteness.

It is impossible to sum up such a book without destroying its unique quality. Reduced to common terms, the Common Cause is that of the Common Man, and it has been adequately voiced by Henry Wallace. This is not "war as usual" but Armageddon; in Wilsonian phrase, the war to end war. Material victory is necessary, but not sufficient. Who is to surrender, and to what? Material blueprints for peace—Culbertson's is the most glaring example—are pathetic. Peace is of the spirit. We have not begun to fight, for we have not voiced the faith that is in us.

The cause of the common man "everywhere in the world." Anything short of that, any form of privilege, selfishness, or greed, means a shift of power, not peace. Nationalism is the arch heresy. Imperialism is but an exaggerated case: if we crave power and prestige, it must be at some other; expense. A name for the special brand of Anglo-Saxon nationalism or imperialism might be "peculiarism"—splendid isolation, limited liabilities, special reservations in the common law. The second curse is "pecuniarism"—Mammonworship, the profit motive, now camouflaged as "free enterprise." The third and worse is racialism, the refusal to admit our common humanity. Caste in India, the Herrenvolk fallacy, Kipling's "lesser breeds," our immigration quotas based on the Nordic myth, are all variants of racialism, all denials of the Common Cause.

Borgese wants to serve the Common Man because he has faith in him: "He is kind, he is temperate, he is orderly." Truly a touching Rousseauistic-Jeffersonian faith. Not unrealistic, Borgese would not preclude Taine's definition of the Common Man—"a ferocious and lustful gorilla." But any common effort has to be based on the social propensities of the Common Man, not on his anarchical instincts. In other words, every organized state, local or worldwide, is of necessity a striving for Utopia; it must embody the will to make justice prevail. Any state committed, within or without, to the fostering of selfishness is divided and shall fall.

The America of the Founders is committed to the Common Cause. Jefferson, Washington, Lincoln, Wilson, Roosevelt are high priests of one enduring faith. This is truly America's business: to raise a standard to which the honest and the wise can repair. But-and this was true even in the days of Washington-we are also filled with the fear of the Common Man, the fear of brutal revolution. Our second line of thought-often uppermost-is that of Burke. Joseph de Maistre, Metternich, Carlyle, Taine, Ferrero. The defense of privilege takes advantage of that legitimate fear and masquerades as a pessimistic view of human nature. The beast in man must be curbed—and the beast is the mass demanding an equitable share. Hence our anti-bolshevismwe have not yet suppressed Martin Dies-and the "Rather Hitler than Blum!" attitude which led us to shady deals with Darlan and Badoglio.

We, Sons and Daughters of the Revolution, must recognize that the Common Cause is revolutionary, so long as privilege clings to power. We cannot avert revolution without betraying our cause. But we have the power to effect the revolution ourselves, as part of the great upheaval of war. If our arms carry the Jeffersonian revolution to Europe—and India and China—the Common Man may prove to be what we know him to be among us, "kind, temperate, orderly." If we try to force upon him ancient wrongs, violence will ensue.

In such a schematic form this gospel might be dismissed as naive. But the incredible subtlety and richness of the book are the decisive argument. In its steady light it is the cynics who appear crude and unrealistic. Munich and the Darlan deal were very poor strokes of business. Intelligence pays.

Of course, among servants of the Common Cause there are points of difference—usually mere questions of emphasis. Borgese's defense of the "monarchical" principle sounds paradoxical. I agree that decisions cannot be reached without leadership. The parliamentary system has collapsed everywhere, even in England; and the spectacle of our acephalous Congress in 1943 is an irrefutable demonstration. But there is in Borgese's conception of the leader a tinge of the "hero" or "providential-man" fallacy which is almost pre-fascist. Executives we need, not supermen. The responsibility for the Common Cause lies with us common men. It is for us to force Roosevelt, Wallace, or Willkie to lead us the way we want to go.

Borgese denounces all privileges. Yet he seems to have faith in the privilege of mass or might. He thinks in terms of "the Big Two," which he calls the Britannistic world—mostly American—and Soviet Russia. This is a relapse into the "realism" of power. Power, he knows, is transient Tomorrow Japan's dream might come true: Pan-Asia united against the White Man. Who appointed the Big Two trustees for mankind? Trusteeship is another word for hegemony, the white man's burden.

These are differences in accent—Borgese says Mazzini when I would say Lamennais or Michelet; they do not alter our essential agreement. Servants of the Common Cause, this should be your Book.

ALBERT GUERARD

The Best of Military Thought

MAKERS OF MODERN STRATEGY: MILITARY THOUGHT FROM MACHIAVELLI TO HITLER.
Edited by Edward Mead Earle. Princeton University Press. $3.75.

T IS seldom that any book can lay claim to being unique, yet "Makers of Modern Strategy" has that distinction. In an extremely meaty volume of 550 pages no fewer than twenty authors, working under the leadership of Dr. Edward M. Earle of the Princeton University Institute of Advanced Studies, have summarized the best thinking and writing on war of the last three centuries. Their work makes readily available much valuable information which could hardly have been obtained in even the best American libraries.

Their method is mainly biographical. The doctrines of Machiavelli, Vauban, Frederick the Great, Jomini and Clausewitz, Foch, Lyautey, Churchill, Ludendorff, Stalin, Trotsky, Haushofer, Mahan, Douhet, Hitler, and others are studied through their lives and writings. The figures chosen for study will surprise many. Only two Americans, Mahan and General William Mitchell are among them, Napoleon's principles are examined only through his interpreters, and such able commanders as Lee, Jackson, and Marlborough are omitted, either because they left no written record of their theories or because their main contribution was in the field of tactics. On the other hand, Alexander Hamilton, Marx and Engels, Delbruck, and Lenin are included because of their contribution to the study of strategy in its non-military phases. Possibly as an offset to the predominantly biographical approach, two chapters—one by Theodore Ropp, the other by Alexander Kiralfy-discuss continental concepts of sea power and Japanese naval strategy.

As always in a volume representing many styles and points of view, the writing, though it shows uniformly high scholarship, is uneven in literary quality. A few chapters are by writers of no great talent and are frankly boring. In certain other cases it was evidently impossible to secure the most competent authority. But as a whole "Makers of Modern Strategy" reflects the highest credit on the editor, the Princeton University Press, and most of the authors.

Lack of space prevents any detailed account of a book of this type. Two of the three chapters contributed by the editor, one dealing with Hiller and the other with Lenin, Trotsky, Stalin, and the Soviet concept of war, are of especial interest at the present time. In the chapter on Hitler Dr. Earle presents an admirable synthesis and interpretation of known facts. The Nazi leader, he believes, is one of the ablest of all experts in political warfare but not of equal stature as a strategist. The material on the Soviets is not so well known and goes far toward explaining the reasons why the Red Army has amazed nearly everyone. In uncovering the genius of the despised and often overlooked Trotsky Dr. Earle does not in any way slight Stalin, whose able preparation for war through the various five-year plans and whose extremely harsh decisions in the present war were as certainly correct. Kiralfy, in discussing Japanese naval strategy, advances the view that the navy is regarded as an auxiliary to the army in carrying on land offensives in nearby territories. Our enemy, he believes, does not understand the meaning of command of the sea as the term is used in Great Britain and the United States. An American soldier writing under a pseudonym brilliantly describes the military sickness exemplified in the doctrines of Liddell Hart and Maginot, which paved the way for Hitler's early successes. One other chapter, written by Captain Harvey DeWeerd, is worth the closest attention. It discussed the civilian war leaders Lloyd George, Clemenceau, and Churchill, and their guidance of the often over-conservative and sometimes stupid military leaders of their countries into the correct decisions. There are other excellent discussions, but these half-dozen chapters stand out. DONALD W. MITCHELL

Poetry in Review

F TWENTY books of poetry I have read during the past weeks two separate themselves quickly from the sorry remainder. The two worth reading are Louis Aragon's "Le Crève-Coeur" (Pantheon Books; paper, $1; cloth, $2) and George Barker's "Sacred and Secular Elegies" (New Directions, $1).

"Le Crève-Coeur" comprises some twenty poems written between October, 1939, and October, 1940. They were published in France, banned by the Germans, and smuggled into England; and they are now introduced to the American reader by the English critic Cyril Connolly. Connolly hails Aragon as "the first poet of the United Nations to make music out of the war," and he trusts that Aragon's success will act as an impetus to other poets. I find myself less concerned, however, with the attribution of the title of "war poet" to Aragon than with the conviction that poets make music out of words, and that in time of war the very grammar of life, as well as of language, seems to fall apart. How, then, could Aragon experience the chaos and the personal attrition of the war with all its ingenious forces of deprivation, and translate that experience into poetry? Aragon speaks for more than himself when he says: "Presque chaque chose à quoi nous nous heurtons dans cette guerre étrange qui est le paysage d'une poésie inconnue et terrible est nouvelle au langage et étrangère encore à la poésie."

The theme of almost all the poems is not so much the war as it is the absence of love:

Femmes qui connaissez enfin comme nous-mêmes Le paradis perdu de nos bras dénoués Entendez-vous nos voix qui murmurent Je t'aime Et votre lèvre à l'air donne un baiser troué

In the second of the following stanzas from Le Printemps, note how the emotional effect is obtained by means of technical proficiency:

Mais nous sans yeux nous sans amour nous sans cerveau Fantômes qui vivons séparés de nous-mêmes Vainement nous attendions le renouveau Nous n'avons inventé que d'anciens blasphèmes

THE AMERICAN PEOPLE A REPORT TO

W-Leas WEAPON FOR VICTORY

By Edward R. Stettinius, Jr. UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE written while Administrator of Lend-Lease

A STORY OF Action!

Of rifles and ammunition being rushed to Great Britain when she stood virtually unarmed after Dunkirk.

Of American planes being used against the enemy by Russian soldiers.

Of American gasoline and spare parts being sped to the ever-growing air power of the United Nations over China

Of General Sherman tanks rumbling through Iran on their way to Russia.

Of supplies arriving in Egypt in time to help Mont-gomery defeat Rommel.

Of Australian soldiers fighting in Lend-Lease tanks in New Guinea.

This is the stuff of which this book is made: strong, sturdy contributions towards a common victory.

Here is the complete and authentic story of Lend-Lease. It explains to the American people how Lend-Lease stopped the aggressors and makes possible their ultimate defeat. This is an exciting book; one that brings its readers close to history, close to some of the most dramatically executed incidents of the war.

HERE ARE THE FACTS:

LEND-LEASE: Weapon for Victory answers the thousands of questions in the minds of Americans today. On what are our billions of dollars being spent? Why ship arms to other countries? Who decides what goes where? What is Reverse Lend-Lease? Shall we ever be repaid? Here are the facts, in this stirring record of the United Nations on the road to victory.

$3.00

A STORY OF Cooperation!

As you read it, you will feel the drive of this powerful weapon of war in action.

You will watch the coordination of the work of every branch of our Government; of American industry, labor, and agriculture, and of men and women in uniform, speeding the execution of this stupendous task.

Here, in truth, is the story of mighty weapon for vic-tory, one which is being wielded by all the United Nations against our common enemy.

> Illustrated with many official photographs, maps in full color, and numerous pictograms.

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

NEW YORK

Allons-nous retrouver la vie ô faux défunts Car est-ce une porte qui s'ouvre enfin car est-ce Enfin le printemps qui arrive et son parfum Bouleverse le vent ainsi qu'une caresse

Here are the last two stanzas of perhaps his best poem, Zone Libre, written in September, 1940:

> J'ai perdu je ne sais comment Le noir secret de mon tourment A son tour l'ombre se démembre Je cherchais à n'en plus finir Cette douleur sans souvenir Quand parut l'aube de septembre

> Mon amour j'étais dans tes bras Au dehors quelqu'un murmura Une vieille chanson de France Mon mal enfin s'est reconnu Et son refrain comme un pied nu Troubla l'eau verte du silence

Discipline in poetry is twofold—the inherited tradition in which the poet writes, and the poet's technique, the means by which he uses his tradition to express his own meaning. Aragon, like other serious modern artists, is aware that he must subject his talents to the greatest possible amount of self-imposed opposition. That is, the struggle between what the poet wants to say and its expression within the literary tradition must be made difficult or the poem, the resolution of the struggle, will not be worth achieving. Moreover, it frequently happens that the opposition must be exerted in the field of the poet's greatest facility. If it lies in his sensibility—or in his imagination, or in his intellect—it is just that quality he must discipline most or fall victim to his own facility.

Aragon's extraordinary concern with the technical matters of poetry-especially his employment of new kinds of rhyme and rhyme schemes and varied and complicated stanzaic forms-goes far in accounting for his success. Rhyme is much more important to French poetry-which, generally speaking, has no fixed accent-than it is to English verse, and Aragon uses run-over rhymes, as well as end-stopped and internal rhymes, originally and with thrilling effect. Technical innovations are never exercised for their own sake; they are unobtrusive, and clarify rather than obscure his meaning. Nothing is more difficult than the communication of simple emotion in art. Indeed, the continual threat of the censors that forced Aragon at times to mask names and places served as an additional hazard assisting him to objectify, to "ground," what might otherwise have been the self-consuming tumult of his own feelings.

Rhyme and stanza provide the framework that contains and controls the emotion and causes it to emerge as an indissoluble part of the poem, because Aragon expresses himself within the whole tradition of French poetry. Without that connection his meaning would be isolated and merely personal. A good deal of his technical equipment is drawn from the reservoir of the past—from Old French and Provençal poetry, from the Renaissance poets, from popular and folk songs, and, indirectly, from the influence of post-comantic poetry on the language. His Alexandrines recall Racine as well as Baudelaire, and his octosyllabics bring both Villon and Apollinaire to mind. The point is that after years of exile Aragon has returned to his own tradition. He has recovered the lost thread of his poetry, ironically enough, at a time when he has been forced into involuntary exile from France. His poems are "heartbreaking" because he has returned to his tradition and because he is master of his medium, not because he has lived through three wars (and three betrayals), or because he is so much in love with his wife (Connolly calls it "the inestimable reward of thirteen years of live marriage"), or, finally, because for ten years he was trained in "political reality" as a Communist.

George Barker does have genius, and his new poems do show an advance over his previous work, but despite his sonorous verbal magnificence, one is again left with the impression of having been present at a pageant of sound without movement. He now manages to get more movement within the line by varying the caesura (all writers of blank verse should be compelled to read Milton); his beat is less regular; and he has more to say. Yet the total effect of the twelve elegies is monotonous. Barker tends to luxuriate in richness of sound, and the direct consequence of that surrender is lack of variety. Consider, for instance, the last stanza of the first Sacred Elegy:

Lovers for whom the world is always absent Move in their lonely union like twin stars Twining bright destinies around their cause: They dazzle to dark with a meridian present The wallflower world. Redundant it shall resent The kiss that annihilates it and the gaze that razes. O from their clasp a new astronomy rises Where, morning and evening, the dominant Venus, To let us kiss behind the mask of faces, Dismisses all sad worlds that turn between us.

Even a cursory examination of these lines will reveal how he makes his sound travel. Alliteration, assonance, imperfect rhymes are the medium in which vowels and consonants, like notes in a musical phrase, are anticipated, carried over, and reechoed; sentences rise, curve, and fall; and we have an orchestral accompaniment that overwhelms the meaning. Note especially, "Redundant it shall resent," which most certainly does have a clear meaning in the context. (Also "the gaze that razes.") The reduplication of sound and letters to the ear and to the eye, the insistent demand on the immediate senses, smothers or nearly effaces the meaning of the words. Prodigal use of repetition for musical effect is bound to become monotonous. And Barker's fondness for blank verse, almost as a musical measure, leads him-notwithstanding the imperfect rhymes-directly into the arena of his greatest danger; so that he will yield to the temptation of mere sound, and force his conquerors to "Thrash on the hotbed of their terrible onus." "Your eye on the income and the encomium" is another example.

Barker writes beautifully within his tradition, but as yet he does not command the technical means to represent himself simply and honestly. Technical incompetence can make a liar out of any artist. No, the problems obstructing his complete development as a poet must be met the hardest way and by the strictest discipline. If Barker is the serious poet I think he is, he must stop his ears, he must wring the neck of his eloquence, he must modulate his voice. Only then will he be able to say what he wants to say of love and

"We All Stand Before the Bar of History, Humanity and God"

These solemn words were uttered some months ago by the Archbishop of Canterbury in a speech urging action to prevent the mass extermination of the Jews of Europe by Nazi Germany.

We repeat these solemn words of the head of the Church of England, for the need for immediate action is now even greater.

The fiendish minds of Nazi Germany have set up an official "Extermination Commission" dedicated to murdering the Jews of Europe before the war ends. The number of Jews already murdered exceeds the combined total of all of the United Nations' war fatalities, excepting Russia and China. This constitutes one of the darkest pages in the annals of human history.

The conscience of our Nation has been deeply shaken by this ghastly situation. From the length and breadth of our Nation, expressions of sympathy and voices of anger are rising. But this alone cannot stay the hand of the murderers.

THERE ARE PRACTICAL MEASURES

The first prerequisite for action on such a vast. grave and urgent problem is to invest responsibility and authority in a group of men and charge them to concentrate their efforts and energies on this task.

It is with this in view that leading statesmen have introduced a resolution in Congress urging:

"the creation by the President of a commission of diplomatic, economic and military experts to formulate and effectuate a plan of immediate action, designed to save the surviving Jewish people of Europe from extinction at the hands of Nazi Germany,"

There are many practical measures for saving the Jews in Europe, measures which such a Commission will verify and effectuate.

Much can be done for the Jews in Europe WHERE

THEY ARE. The very creation of this Commission . . . announced by short-wave radio to the entire world, to the tormented victims as well as to the Godless enemy and his shaky satellites . . . will have a profound influence on the destiny of the Jews in Europe.

For the many Jews who can be taken out of Europe, there are nearby accessible territories . . . Cyprus, North Africa, Turkey, Palestine, and other countries near Europe . . . which can easily give temporary asylum to vast numbers of men, women and children now trapped in the ghastly ghettos and execution camps of Poland.

WHAT HAS HELD UP ACTION?

President Roosevelt answered this when he declared, "The heart is in the right place, but it is a question of ways and means."

The Resolution now before Congress provides the answer to the "ways and means" question.

The Jews of Europe will not be saved so long as special machinery for such action is lacking. That is why a Commission to Save the Jewish People of Europe should be created.

EXTERMINATION OR SALVATION?

The Nazis have created their Commission for the EXTERMINATION of millions of innocent men, women and children only because they are Jews. We, free Americans, should now create our Commission for the SALVATION of these human beings. Let us act with strength, nobility and compassion, in the finest tradition of America.

Monday opened the second session of the 78th American Congress. The Rescue Resolution still pending. A unanimous public opinion should express its wish that this Resolution be passed without delay. Wire or write your Senators and Congressmen. Request their cooperation.

Emergency Committee to Save the Jewish People of Europe MUrray Hill 2-7237

1 East 44th Street, New York 17, N. Y.

EXECUTIVE BOARD

CO-CHAIRMEN:

Peter H. Bergson Louis Bromfield Ben Hecht Mme. Sigrid Undset

VICE-CHAIRMEN:

Dean Alfange
William S. Bennet
Kontrad Bercovict
Jo Davidson
Oscar W. Ehrhorn
Treasurer: Mrs. John Gunther
Treasurer: Mrs. John Gunther

Fletcher Pratt A. Hadani Rafaeli Lisa Sergio Rep. A. L. Somers Dr. Maurice William

Stella Adler J. J. Amiel Theodor Bennahum Rabbi P. D. Bookstaber Bishop J. A. Cannon, Jr. Lester Cohen Babette Deutsch Rep. Samuel Dickstein Nathan George Horwitt

MEMBERS:
E. Jabotinsky
Rose Keane
Emil Lengyel
I. Lipshutz
Lawrence Lipton
Emil Ludwig
Gov. Edward Martin
Gov. J. Howard McGrz Howard McGrath Michael Potter Curt Reiss Arthur Rosenberg K. Shridharani Johan J. Smertenko Arthur Szyk Thomas J. Watson Gabriel Wechsler Alex Wilf

WON'T	YOU	HELF	?
-------	-----	------	---

This Committee considers it a sacred duty to do all humanly possible to save the Jewish People of Europe. Our offices and representatives in Washington and London, in Palestine and in Turkey are steadily working in this direction, trying to get large-scale government action. But we need your financial below We operate solely through voluntary contributions. By your support will be determined the speed, scope and effectiveness of our fight to save the Jewish people of Europe.

EMERGENCY COMMITTEE

TO SAVE THE JEWISH PEOPLE OF EUROPE 1 East 44th Street, New York 17, N. Y.

I enclose my contribution to enable you to carry out your tremendous task in the sum of $.....

NAME.....

By a ruling of the Treasury Department, contributions to this Committee are tax exempt.

Please make checks payable to Mrs. JOHN GUNTHER, Treasurer Please make checks payable to Mrs. JOHN GUNTITUE, Treasure, country, history, the river god of the blood, and whatever else. Then his sound will articulate his meaning. In the meantime, read this aloud:

PHULL

> O Golden Fleece she is where she lies tonight Trammeled in her sheets like midsummer on a bed, Kisses like moths flicker over her bright Mouth, and, as she turns her head, All space moves over to give her beauty room.

Kenneth Patchen's "Cloth of the Tempest" (Harper and Brothers, $2.75) makes me think of the saying that everything an artist spits is art. It is not true of Mr. Patchen. Unlike Aragon, and Barker (who is English), Patchen is unencumbered by either tradition or technique. The Walt Whitman school from which he vaguely stems is not a

BOOKS

PEARL BUCK testifies:

"This book tells the truth!"

LOUIS FISCHER'S

EMPIRE

Some 950,000,000 Chinese and Indians cannot be forgotten little men after the war. They will not allow themselves to be forgotten. Here is a strident, fearless presentation of the problems of imperialism as a barrier to peace by the author of Men and Politics and A Week with Gandhi.

Third Printing, $1.00

DUELL, SLOAN AND PEARCE

Buy Your Backs Through The Nation

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (post free) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C, O, D.

Readers' Service Division

The Nation . 53 Fifth Avenue . New York 3, N. Y.

tradition in the sense that it provides a working discipline: if the "song-of-myself" poet is to amount to anything he must start from scratch, an almost impossible task. Patchen has written 204 poems about everything from the childhood of God to the Supreme Court of the United States. He takes the position of primal innocence in relation to the world and the cosmos, which exist for him only in so far as he experiences them. He therefore tries to create miracles, as if everything could be beckoned into being by the omniscience of his feelings. But actually his poetic visions turn into mirages, for his images are so all-inclusive that they are open to all meaning and consequently have none-merely "phantomshaded fancyhood." Patchen is not a serious poet. And his fulsome self-indulgence, combined with the continual intrusion of a personality that insists on talking, singing, weeping, fighting, and cooing to itself, is very trying.

From the point of view of the state of contemporary American poetry Patchen is interesting. He represents, in effect, the latest formula—all that was new in poetry twenty-five years ago appropriated and devitalized to meet the demands of the reader who is ready for poetry only when it becomes an imitation of poetry. It is no more than to describe the operation of poetry justice to add that the reader who cares for poetry only as a commodity will leave him after a while, simply because of the small disturbing presence of the genuine talent the poet once had, and has so outrageously abused. Again, it is the abysmal depths to which criticism in the United States has sunk that, more than anything else, is responsible for these poems.

H. P. LAZARUS

Marshal Smuts

JAN SMUTS: A BIOGRAPHY. By F. S. Crafford. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.50.

UCH of the gilt assiduously applied to Jan Smuts's reputation by his ardent admirers is knocked off by this solid and conscientious biographical study written by an Afrikaans-speaking high-school teacher. Smuts remains nevertheless a complex and remarkable man who would be an exceptional figure in any environment. What he ceases to be, in the light of the facts of his South African career, is a disembodied, idealistic intelligence, bent exclusively on higher things.

Our views of foreign statesmen are often curiously distorted because we do not know the circumstances of their domestic careers which tell us how their idealism is practiced, or not practiced, and with what results. At home Smuts is widely disliked, not always for admirable reasons, but on Mr. Crafford's evidence he can be honorably disliked for his consuming lust for power, his dictatorial ruthlessness with opponents, his strong anti-democratic bias, his anti-labor and anti-native record, and his total dedication to the African imperialism of Cecil Rhodes. Smuts's life has been a problem in reconciling high-minded verbal idealism and practical decency in government, and he has notably failed to solve it. In fact, this is a contradiction which plagues the world today. It is therefore rather characteristic that Smuts the idealist is once more being vaunted to the skies, while the Smuts who settles strikes with gun fire and excludes the African natives from his philosophic "holism" is played down or ignored. Mr. Crafford restores a proper balance.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

FILMS

OST ANGEL" undertakes one of the few dramatic subjects worth a second thought: the bringing-up of a child. The child, who is, with occasional skids, very poignantly played by Margaret O'Brien, is a foundling whom a set of psychologists adopt, name Alpha, and do their worst with. By the time she is six she is an air-conditioned genius. Then a newspaper reporter flicks a wild card into her deck. For the first time she hears of, and experiences, the possibilities of the irrational, the irregular, the inexplicable, the magical. For the first time she becomes aware of love, and suffers it. Moral: Never trust your own, or anybody's, intelligence about a child; love is all that really matters.

There are grimly misleading and mismanaged things about this picture. Much as I mistrust the run of child-psychologists and progressive educators I don't like to see it implied, even in myth, that they are unaware of the indispensable importance, to a child, of parental love or the best available substitute. They are likely to militate against any fruitful love far more frighteningly through the antiseptic, utilitarian, neo-pietistic quality of their recognition than through ignorance. It is unlikely, too, that a child under their seal would see the city, or meet another child, for the first time, only after running away from them. Rather, the child would be so hermetically "well adjusted," so thoroughly anaesthetized, to both that a naked realization of either would be one of its gravest difficulties. I like hardly better seeing the loose sentimentalities of a narcissistic reporter (James Craig) set up as a working model for the cure-all. And I don't like at all such needless complications as the gunman who is tossed in for New Yorkerish laughs, or the general unimaginativeness through which "magic" is shown the child by means of the remarkable things of a city street at night -sandwichmen with neon shirtfronts, etc.-rather than the unremarkable. Almost anything, in such contexts of childhood, can seem miraculous; and through the child's eyes and mind the wonder of a city, which is intrinsic in a wellused camera anyhow, could have been shown many people, instead of the easily glamorous mist, a pipe-smoking dog, some Chinese, a night club, and similar easy outs; and could have become one of the most beautiful sequences I can imagine. But barring a brief examination of a popcorn machine, that chance is forfeited.

Nevertheless, I was often moved, impressed, and excited by this film. It does get down something of the detachment and paradoxical defenselessness-inviolability of a young child, and—for all its softening and cheating—some broad warnings against attitudes one should fear. And toward the end it had, for me, a good deal of the beauty and power of Mann's "Early Sorrow," all the more because I would hardly have expected it on the screen. I can only hope it will be more useful then deceitful; either way, I think it is important.

ALFRED HITCHCOCK'S
PRODUCTION
BY JOHN STEINBECK
STARHING

TALLULAH BANKHEAD
with WILLIAM BENDIX
and Walter Slezak

Mary Anderson
John Hodiak • Henry Hull • Heather Angel
Hume Cronyn • Canada Lee
A Twentieth Century-Fox Picture
Now Playing ASTOR

B'way at 45th 5t.

"A definite hit . . . gay, glib, daffy — enormously funny,"

—Morehouse Sun

RUTH GORDON

OVER TWENTY-ONE
MUSIC BOX, 45th St. W. of B'way. C1 6-4636—Evgs, 8240, Mats. Thurs, & Sat. 2:4

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
55 Fifth Avenue
New York 3, N, Y,

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give us at least two weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine:

- ☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8
  - ☐ 3 Years $11
- Remittance is inclosed
- □ Bill me

INTRODUCTORY OFFER TO NEW SUBSCRIBERS ONLY:

10 Weeks $1

Canada $1 m year extra Fore:gn $1 m year extra Pan American Union requires no extra postage

AME
DDDDESS

1-15-44

JAMES AGEE

MUSIC

A ROUND 1890 Bernard Shaw was writing about the "performances of 'Lucia' solely to show off Madame Melba's singing," and the opera companies with "five leading tenors and no stage manager. For want of a stage manager, 'Orfeo' was murdered. For want of a stage manager, the first act of 'Otello' was laid waste. For want of a stage manager, 'Tannhäuser' was made · laughing-stock to every German who went to see it. . . . " The recent Monday night performance of "Rigoletto" at the Metropolitan that I attended could have been given for Lily Pons to use the phrases of Caro nome to shoot off her vocal fireworks; and the effect of her china-doll get-up and movements and vocal tones in Verdi's somber and violent work was that of a blockbuster in Berlin. In the cast were two singers, Jan Peerce and Leonard Warren, with superb voices which they abused-Peerce by constriction in production and occasional forcing, Warren by frequent bellowing; and Warren's make-up for the title role was poor, his acting of the lunge-and-clutch variety. There was conductor, Cesare Sodero, and an excellent one by the evidence of the orchestral portions, or as much as one could hear of them miles away, from row Z in the world's hugest opera house; however, he apparently did not have the authority to impose a musical style on the singing, but had to use his musicianship to create an appearance of musical continuity, style, and sense around the phrase-destroying vocal exhibitionism. There was a stage director, Desire Defrere, who had produced on the stage not dramatic sense but nonsense; but even if he had had the talent to do better he would not have had the authority to deal with Pons's get-up, Warren's lunging and clutching-any more than Dr. Graf once had been able to prevent Lehmann from using a certain negligee in "Der Rosenkavalier" or Tibbett from wrecking the opening scene of "Otello" with his posturing. It was, in sum, a performance which gave one an excellent idea of some of the strengths and weaknesses of the Metropolitan as a producer of opera. If the Metropolitan's performancesoften employing good singers and conductors, but undisciplined, insufficiently rehearsed, confused, tastelessare worth saving with the latest $300,-000 which the Metropolitan is asking the public for, it is not because they are something for the world to marvel at but because they are the only ones we have, and moderately good sometimes, and better than nothing.

Listening to singing as it is picked up at a Metropolitan broadcast by the microphones near the singers and amplified for transmission, one gets an impression of nearness and of a power which the voice may not have even in a less huge auditorium than the Metropolitan. Pons's voice does not have it; nor did Albanese's voice, when I heard her at the Metropolitan in "Figaro" two or three seasons ago, have the power it appeared to have in the recent broadcast of "La Traviata." As a matter of fact she seemed to be forcing, which she had not done in "Figaro"; and, possibly as a result, there were other differences: there had been a vibrato. but this time it was terrific; the voice, though small, had been lovely and accurate, but this time it was often acidulous and sometimes badly off pitch. She sang better, however, as she went along; and very beautifully in the last act. The Alfredo was Jan Peerce again; the Germont was Tibbett, with what I suspect was the hoarse remains of a voice built up to impressive volume by the broadcasting microphones and amplification.

A reader who wrote that he agreed with me about the excellence of the Budapest Quartet's performances-but who added sternly that he did not carry admiration to the point of being uncritical-asked me whether I had noted a tendency in the group toward slightly fast tempos. "I think their slightly faster than average pace in the first movement of Beethoven's Opus 135 spoils the reflective spirit that is present in the Léners' reading. And their interpretation of Opus 59 No. 3, which is magnificent in every other respect, misses by its rather flippant, fast pace the spirit of that mysterious section in the second movement, which Sullivan calls 'a memory from some ancient and starless night of the soul.' Certainly the slower pace of the Léners better captures the meaning here." I answered that I had been aware of the Budapest group's tendency toward fast tempos, but had been disturbed by it only in the performance of the first movement of Mozart's G minor Quintet. Then I listened to the group's performance of Beethoven's Opus 130 broadcast by WQXR from the New Friends of Music concert, and was very much disturbed by the effect of what seemed to me the unprecedentedly fast tempo of the first movement, and especially of the development—after which I was uneasy about the tempos of the third movement and the finale. Later I played the recorded performance of several years back, and found that the first movement was in fact slower and more relaxed and better, and that this removed uneasiness about the others.

In that broadcast of the New Friends concert Beethoven's Opus 59 No. 3 was cut off, at 7:00, before the great concluding movement, which would have taken until 7:06. Thus, even when a well-intentioned commercial sponsor like the Book-of-the-Month Club sets out to give the public a complete concert it is defeated by the on-the-hour scheduling of American broadcasting that is a result of its commercial basis. Remember that when you hear about what American commercial broadcasting gives you; ask yourself whether you would be willing to pay the $2.50 a year that the Englishman pays, for what he gets-the broadcast of a concert continued to the concert's end; music without incessant, inescapable talk; opera without gossip-columns and quizzes.

"Speaking of the Metropolitan," a reader writes at this point, "how about the 6-ring circus it has become under commercial sponsorship? Many people have commented on this to me. [Let them comment to the Metropolitan and to the Blue Network—B. H. H.] General Motors has some way to go yet (Kettering et al.) before it beats this display." His mention of the Metropolitan is the question what about Mozart; and I too ask what—in this eighth week of the season—about "Figaro" and "Don Giovanni"?

B. H. HAGGIN

CONTRIBUTORS

VICTOR H. JOHNSON was a firstclass mechanic and shop committeeman in the yard described in his article. He has since shipped out as second assistant engineer on a merchant vessel.

MANUEL SEOANE, journalist and former leader of the Aprista Party in the Peruvian parliament, is now living in Chile. He is The Nation's regular Latin American correspondent.

KARL KEYERLEBER is on the staff of the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

ALBERT GUERARD is professor of comparative and general literature at Stanford University. His latest book is "Napoleon III."

Letters to the Editors

T. S. Eliot on Kipling's Anti-Semitism

Dear Sirs: Your issue of October 16 has only recently reached me, containing Lionel Trilling's interesting and, I think, valuable essay on my volume of selections of Kipling's verse. Mr. Trilling permits himself the following observation:

Mr. Eliot, it is true, would not descend to the snippy, persecuted anti-Semitism of ironic good manners which, in The Waster, leads Kipling to write "etc." when the rhyme requires "Jew"; but Mr. Eliot must have been at some trouble to procure the poem for his selection, for it is not included in the Inclusive Edition.

I used, in making my selection, the "Definitive Edition" published by Hodder and Stoughton in London. I am informed that this edition is published in New York by Doubleday, Doran and Company, and that Mr. Trilling can find the poem in question on page 525 of the 1940 impression.

Second, I would observe that in one stanza, at least, the rhyme required is not to do but to done: and the obvious rhyme for done is not Jew but Hun.
Kipling made several opportunities for expressing his dislike of Germans; I am not aware that he cherished any particularly anti-Semitic feelings. In any case, the interest of the poem lies rather in his criticism of the English than in any aversion to Jews, Germans, or Scotsmen that may be imputed to him.

T. S. ELIOT

London, December 15

Mr. Trilling Replies

Dear Sirs: I mistakenly supposed that the Inclusive Edition of 1938 was the latest and most inclusive of the several Inclusive Editions of Kipling's verse; in that edition The Waster does not appear. But the poem is one of the small group of additional poems which appears in the 1940 edition. I therefore owe Mr. Eliot an apology, which I offer sincerely.

But I cannot admit Mr. Eliot's second objection. The gist of The Waster is that the English, because of their public-school code, are always being beaten by certain unscrupulous racial groups. In the first and last stanzas they are beaten by the etc.-Jew because they believe that "There are Things no Fellow can do": in the second stanza they are beaten by the etc.-Hun because they think that there are "Things that Are Never Done"; and in all three stanzas they are beaten by the Pict. (It is probable, by the way, that for Kipling the Pict is not the Scotsman, as Mr. Eliot implies, but rather the Irishman and perhaps even the low-born Englishman; in A Pict Song the Picts speak of themselves as "the Little Folk . . . Too little to love or to hate," who, if left alone, "can drag down the state.") It is of course true that the poem criticizes the English for being the victims of their own code; but the criticism, because of the nature of the comparisons by which it is made, is so ambiguous as to be almost a kind of praise.

As anti-Semitism goes these days, I suppose Kipling is not—to use Mr. Eliot's phrase—particularly anti-Semitic. I certainly should not think of isolating for discussion what anti-Semitism he has, but only of mentioning, as one aspect of a complex xenophobia, his queasy, resentful feelings about lews.

LIONEL TRILLING

New York, December 31

Our Clever Contemporary

Dear Sirs: I wonder if you really mean it when you say, on page 684 of the December 11 issue of The Nation, "... but publications ordinarily as far removed from political concerns as our clever contemporary, the New Yorker."

I believe you can find in the New Yorker's "Talk of the Town" at least as far back as 1936 some comment or other which indicates a strong, shall we say, editorial bias (?) or economicpolitical concern. Reflecting on this, I have sometimes wondered whether these homeopathic doses of liberalism to a wide audience, many of whom must be unreconstructed conservatives, does not mark this journal as a significant agent of liberal forces in the land. I do not mean to belittle the more outspoken liberal journals, but it does seem that journal of this sort, with its wide circulation and its subtle infusion of liberal slants on many current items, must be a useful ally in the struggle. Don't you

AUSTIN B. WOOD Brooklyn, N. Y., December 9

Negotiated Peace— What Kind?

Dear Sirs: The German war lords have only one avenue of escape to save their hides now and only one chance to start new war of revenge in the future—a negotiated peace based on a split among the United Nations. This fact is recognized by every student of the international situation. But it is also high time to take cognizance of the nature and the scope of such a peace trap, devised to deceive the Western allies and especially America.

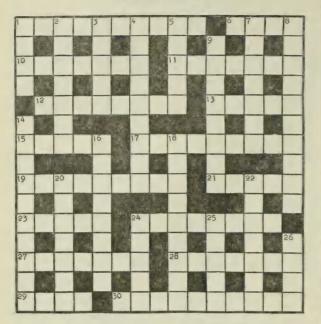

The main features of this negotiated peace are already known. It is no secret that about a year ago a certain emissary of the German war lords visited this country and sounded out influential conservatives in the East concerning this peace plan. Its basis was the promise of the German military to restore nominal independence to Norway, Denmark, the Netherlands, Belgium, and France, in exchange for which Germany would be given a free hand in Southeastern Europe and would retain at least Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Poland.

What escaped attention at that time was the strange fact that exactly the same plan was proposed three years ago by Senator Burton K. Wheeler, then as now a leading isolationist, in his reply to President Roosevelt's speech of December 29, 1940. In his proposal Senator Wheeler advocated the incorporation of Czechoslovakia and Poland in Germany as "autonomous" territories. For Austria he did not even demand autonomy.

Finally, let me point out another strange coincidence. Many war maps published in this country (by the National Geographic Magazine, Rand Mc-Nally, etc.) consistently show Austria, Czechoslovakia, and often Poland territories of Germany, in spite of the fact that Czechoslovakia and Poland are full-fledged members of the United Nations, are our allies in this war, and are recognized by the United States government and by all the United Nations. In my mind there is no doubt that the publication of such maps is but a psychological preparation for the proposed German peace plan, which, if realized, would add to the old Germany 50,000,-000 people and vast territory with rich natural resources, give it the control of

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 47

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 If we had it tomorrow, somebody would probably be against it!
- 6 An able seaman turns his back on the Royal Navy
  10 Laughs . . . "I've laid"

- 11 Big house with a good cellar no doubt 12 Where the sulphate of iron which makes your writing fluid may come
- from 13 Egg-shaped, and consumed finally

15 Chuck up the sponge

- 17 Most of Ring Lardner's stories were written thus (two words, 2 and 7) 19 A wise form of indulgence
- 21 Nature's cup-and-ball 23 "Music hath charms to soothe the savage breast, To soften - - - -, or bend a knotted oak" (Congreve)
  24 Not the fisherman's catch, but a kind
- of wicker cradle
- 27 You know it better as a rowlock, perhaps 28 Circulation that interests the marine
- stores (two words, 3 and 4) 29 What tree would you back to lose?
- 30 This form of puzzle first became popular in 1924

DOWN

- 1 A thousand to one it's familiar to a magistrate
- 2 Needed for a car or a bar 3 Foreign devil
- 4 I ran on set (anag.)

- 5 An obliging relative, sometimes
- 7 Mean, but not too bad 8 An article upset before you and me
- taking a meal. It's sickening! 9 Nora between her parents makes a pretty picture
- 14 Our system I alter and make it difficult to understand
- 16 A laughing-stock
- 18 Bandages
- 20 You will recall that a treaty was signed in this Swiss town some years
- 22 Naturally you can get it on a pier by arrangement (two words, 4 and 3) 24 His dozen is more than twelve
- 25 Disabled ships, and automobiles, may be taken thus (two words, 2 and 3)
- 26 Tidings from the four points of the compass

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 40 ACROSS:-1 TRAITOR; 5 GREASER; ASPEN; 10 DRAMATIST; 11 MARMOSETS; 12 ORGAN; 13 LEANDER; 15 SNAFFLE; 17 BODEGAS; 19 STEWARD; 21 LIMIT; 23 PHLEBITIS; 25 THRILLERS; 26 EERIE; 27 RESISTS; 28 ARTISAN; DOWN:-1 TRAMMEL; 2 AMPERSAND; 3 TANGO; 4 RED DEER; 5 GLASSES; 6 ELABORATE; 7 SLING; 8 RETINUE; 14 DIGITALIS; 16 FLAT TIRES; 17 BOL-STER; 18 SAPPERS; 19 SILESIA; 20 DIS-CERN: 22 MARES; 24 BLEST.

Southeastern Europe, jeopardize the independence of the democracies on the western seaboard of Europe, and enable the German militarists to plunge Europe and the world into another blood bath.

If these three instances pointing to one definite peace plan of a negotiated peace are mere coincidences, they are strange coincidences indeed!

Beware of the peace trap set up by the cunning leaders of the Wehrmacht -and watch for new coincidences.

JOSEPH MARTINEK

Chicago, Ill., December 15

Proposals for Litchfield

Dear Sirs: If Willson Whitman in O Little Town (Restricted) in your issue of December 25 is telling the truth, Litchfield, Connecticut, is a degenerate community which any decent American should be ashamed to live in. To carry out anti-Semitism logically in its community life, it should adopt at least the following municipal measures: (1) Banish the Bible from the churches and substitute "Mein Kampf"; (2) Tear down and rip out all crosses in the churches and substitute the swastika; (3) Take down in public buildings all pictures of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln and put up portraits of Adolf Hitler; (4) Prohibit in the hospital use of any and all medical and surgical discoveries or inventions of lewish scientists; after which chisel over hospital entrance this motto: "All hope abandon ye who enter here"; (5) Prohibit investment of municipal funds in war bonds as long as Secretary Morgenthau's name is signed thereto; (6) Remove from the public library all books by Jewish authors, including Bible aforesaid; (7) Adopt as town slogan and engrave over the door of the town hall this legend: "In order at least to prevent the worst, one begins to take the sod out of the Jew's usurious hands by making the acquisition of soil legally impossible for him" ("Mein Kampf," Chapter XI, page 427).

Great work, Nation, keep it up! If there are any more of these Sodoms or Gomorrahs in this country let us know about them.

I am sending copy of this to the Litchfield Enquirer and to the rector and ministers of the Episcopal, Congregational, and Methodist churches of Litchfield and to the priest of the Catholic church.

AUGUSTUS LORING RICHARDS

Remsen, N. Y., December 29

THE Vation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 158

IN THIS ISSUE

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 22, 1944

NUMBER 4

THE SHAPE OF THINGS	85
EDITORIALS
The Five-Point Plan	88
Stalin's Choice by Freda Kirchwey	89
ARTICLES
F. D. R. and National Service by I. F. Stone	90
50 Years Ago in The Nation	91
Guns in Palestine by Jesse Lurie	92
Brains in the Kitchen By Edith M. Stern	95
In the Wind	96
POLITICAL WAR
Patriot's Notebook By J. Kessel	97
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus	100
BOOKS AND THE ARTS
Goya by Luis Quintanilla	101
Post-War Primers by Leigh White	102
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling	104
Drama by Margaret Marshall	105
Films by James Agee	108
Dance by Virginia Mishnun	108
Art by Clement Greenberg	109
Music by B. H. Haggin	110
LETTERS TO THE EDITORS .	111
CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 48 by Jack Barrett	112

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor Music Critic

J. MITCHELL MORSE B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATH

JONATHAN DANIELS
REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX

LOUIS FISCHER

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U.S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 55 Fifth Ave., New York 3, N. Y. Entered second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 5, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THE LATEST SOVIET BLAST AT THE POLISH government in exile has withered the faint hopes of agreement which sprang up last week. After Moscow's declaration that the 1939 (Ribbentrop) frontier was not "unchangeable" and its indicated willingness to negotiate on the basis of the 1919 "Curzon Line," which is more favorable to the Poles, great pressure was put on Premier Mikolajczyk's Cabinet to make a move toward rapprochement with the Russians. The effort was not entirely successful, but the rather non-committal Polish statement at least refrained from polemics. It failed utterly, however, to mollify the Soviet government, which has reacted by declaring (1) that the Poles had evaded the question of the Curzon Line; (2) that their proposals for opening negotiations were "misleading" since the Soviet government cannot negotiate with a government with which diplomatic relations have been broken; (3) that in the opinion of the Soviets the Polish government has demonstrated once again that it "does not desire to establish good-neighborly relations with the Soviet Union." It might appear that the second of these points had been met by the Polish suggestion of Anglo-American mediation, but it is clear that the real barrier to conciliation lies in Moscow's aversion for the present Polish regime, which it regards as fundamentally hostile to the U.S.S.R. The only method of breaking this deadlock seems to be the evocation of that clause of the Moscow agreement providing for cooperation among Russia, America, and Britain "in the examination of European questions as the war develops." This would appear to cover the Polish problem, which in view of its many facets can hardly be considered a private affair between Russia and Poland.

*

GENERAL DE GAULLE AND THE NATIONAL Committee of Liberation are being squeezed. On the one hand they are under strong pressure from the American and British governments, which are urging them to be gentle with the collaborationists they have taken into custody; on the other they are being violently pushed by the Provisional Consultative Assembly, which insists on swift and drastic punishment of traitors. When the Assembly came together it was commonly regarded in this country as no more than a rubber-stamp for De Gaulle.

But under the leadership of delegates representing underground France it has quickly shown its independence. The Assembly is not taking orders from de Gaulle; it is giving him instructions in the name of the French people. It is all very well for those who have never been within 3,000 miles of a Gestapo torture chamber to deplore harsh treatment of men like Pevrouton, Pucheu, and Flandin-willing assistants of the Nazis in enslaving France. Men who have been fighting the Nazis, living from hour to hour in deadly danger, may be forgiven for being less charitable. Such men, in the course of the Assembly's debates, have sharply criticized the National Committee for sloth in carrying out the promised purge and have even threatened to deal with traitors by underground methods. It is fully recognized that Anglo-American interference is the real reason for delay. No doubt the State Department, having plucked Peyrouton from his safe retreat in Fascist Argentina to exercise his "administrative abilities" in North Africa, feels some responsibility for his safety. If so it should say so openly and offer him honorary American citizenship. For the French "will not live with traitors."

*

IN ALGIERS THE FRENCH CONSULTATIVE Assembly is urgently demanding arms and other supplies from the forces of liberation within France. The French guerrillas, fighting in the mountains of Savoy and the Vosges, as well as the army of civilian saboteurs, lack equipment. Tens of thousands also lack sufficient clothing and food. The resurgence of France is one of the great and inspiring developments of the past two years, but it is not fully credited even now. So far the British and American authorities have been slow to accept the facts brought out of France by the delegates of the Resistance in North Africa. In the Political War section this week we publish a remarkable story, Patriot's Notebook, which brings to life the reality of the French struggle. Nothing could better demonstrate the need of prompt and generous assistance for the French underground. We commend it particularly to the attention of all Americans who have come to think of the French as decadent people who have lost the capacity to fight and die for freedom.

THE SOVIET EMBASSY IN WASHINGTON HAS written a conclusion to the farce of our diplomatic victories in Spain. A fascist who calls himself a liberal, who publicizes the release of Spanish Republicans, and who praises Tito's guerrillas may be able to fool Archbishop Spellman and certain gentlemen in the State Department. Not more than three weeks ago a high official of that august institution boasted at a dinner that "we have Franco in our pocket." Possibly he was accepting at face value the declarations of Ambassador Hayes, who, aside from his sympathies with Franco, is anxious to prevent his mission to Madrid from turning into greater catastrophe than Sir Neville Henderson's classic failure. But the improvised "liberal" fascist could not fool the Russians. In the latest issue of its official bulletin the Soviet Embassy utterly rejects the American and British contention that Franco has been won over to the cause of the United Nations. The bulletin states very specifically that a Spanish legion is still "on one of the sectors of the Volkhov front," that a Spanish air squadron "which systematically receives replenishments" is also stationed on the eastern line, while "Franco's gendarmes arrest people even for distributing the press bulletin of the British Embassy in Madrid." The United States can find further proof of its mistaken policy in the charges made by Pais, a Venezuelan newspaper, that "not fewer than 200 Germans, carrying out pro-Nazi activities in Venezuela, receive money from the Spanish Embassy in Caracas." After the official statement of the Soviet Embassy, our government and the British government would do well to consider whether the continuation of diplomatic relations with Franco can be reconciled with the solidarity of the United Nations, which, according to President Roosevelt, was reaffirmed at Teheran.

THE EXIGENCIES OF WAR TRANSPORT PROVED the decisive factor in the selection of Chicago is the scene of both the Republican and the Democratic conventions. Naturally the capital of isolationism was not Wendell Willkie's first choice, but he has accepted the decision calmly, although unfriendly commentators are describing it as a defeat for him. According to the same sources Mr. Willkie slipped badly during the G. O. P. National Committee meeting last week, but to less biased observers he still appears to be a formidable contender for the Republican nomination. Governor Willis's blast at his enemies, the "four-year locusts," delivered from the rock-ribbed citadel of Vermont, seems to have made an impression on the committee members in Chicago. We note also that the plans of the party bosses were upset by the election of Mrs. Frank G. Tallman of Delaware, a Willkie supporter, to a vacant place on the executive committee. An informal poll of fifty-seven committeemen at the gathering showed Willkie and Dewey to be running neck and neck with twenty-one votes apiece and the rest of the field nowhere. Undoubtedly there is widespread support for the New York governor, who in the eyes of many Republicans is the best "safety-first" proposition in sight. They would prefer Governor Bricker, of course, but he doesn't seem to have even Dewey's modest endowment of political "it." Dewey's henchmen, however, are not in too easy a position. They can only convey their candidate's willingness to run by nods and winks, since his official attitude is still that he intends to remain governor of New York for his full term. And, indeed, in view of his solemn vows he can hardly reverse this stand without leaving himself wide open to attack.

*

OF COURSE, IF HARRISON E. SPANGLER, National Chairman of the G. O. P., is right it does not matter very much whom the Republicans nominate; they can, he asserts, win with "anybody." This statement has alarmed some good Republicans, who resent the implication that the June convention can safely nominate a "nobody." Such pronouncements by the head of their machine make them begin to wonder whether the party can afford to be saddled with a chairman who so perfectly exemplifies the famous Irishism-"every time he opens his mouth he puts his foot into it." It is, in fact, hard to explain the choice of this gentleman for his office except on the theory that the President-a master of political black magic according to his enemies-managed by some occult means to wish him on the Republicans. What could be more inept, for instance, than Mr. Spangler's proud announcement that he had asked four Republican officers in England to conduct a survey among their men on how they intended to vote in 1944? Imagine the howls of indignation which would have rent the air if Postmaster General Walker had commissioned four Democratic officers to carry out a similar task. Political canvassing of this kind is contrary to military regulations and, in any case, is highly improper. That it is also valueless, since soldiers are likely to have a shrewd idea of their officers' political views and to give answers calculated to please them, is beside the point. It is not surprising that the Republican National Committee, wishing to keep a tighter hold on its chairman, should have forced him to agree to call together the executive committee, which he has steadily ignored since he took office, at least once a month.

×

THE WHITEWASHING OF PATROLMAN DREW by a special three-man board appointed by Mayor La-Guardia does not reassure us either with respect to Drew's innocence of the charges against him or the dependability of the New York police department in dealing with anti-Semitic offenses. Since the case against Drew was a complicated one, involving alleged connection with several subversive and anti-Jewish organizations, it is difficult to see how the board could have made an adequate investigation, including the subpoenaing of witnesses, in the two weeks it spent on the case. A further indication that the Mayor is more interested in trying to cover up a nasty situation in the police department than in protecting New York citizens is provided in his failure to take action on Commissioner Herlands's long-awaited report. The Commissioner cited eight specific cases in which the police failed to take adequate action to punish anti-Semitic outbursts and deplored the tendency of the police to minimize such incidents as ordinary acts of neighborhood hoodlumism. That an ugly and even menacing situation still exists despite the recent outcry is indicated by a recent incident in which the police released, without questioning, four members of a gang that had participated in the beating up of several Jews and the wrecking of a Brooklyn poolroom. Commissioner Valentine's order, long overdue, forbidding policemen to affiliate with anti-Semitic organizations would have a beneficial effect if it were quickly enforced. But the Mayor's refusal to back up Herlands and to take more drastic action in the Drew case, together with his refusal to release the evidence against Drew, does not make for optimism.

THE PLAN FOR A NETWORK OF NEW ROADS recommended by the President is significant as the first program for creating jobs after the war to be officially laid before Congress. A total of 34,000 miles of modern super-highways is contemplated at a cost of about $750,000,000 annually for the next ten to twenty years. It is estimated that the project will normally provide direct and indirect employment for approximately two million persons, and in the event of a severe depression work could be speeded up to employ a greater number. So far there is little indication of what action Congress may be expected to take on the proposal. Although the idea of planning ahead with respect to post-war jobs has failed to rouse our legislators, the need for better highways is so great that we suspect Congress may overcome its lethargy sufficiently to indorse this project. It must be recognized, however, that the two million, or three million at the most, that can be put to work in road-building constitute a very small proportion of the number of persons likely to be unemployed six months or a year after the end of the war. If Congress is ever to be prodded into formulating plans to provide jobs for the rest, it must be in the months preceding the election.

AS WE GO TO PRESS WORD COMES OF THE delayed Pravda dispatch from Cairo quoting reports from "reliable Greek and Yugoslav sources" that two leading British officials have recently conferred with Von Ribbentrop in Spain. The important fact about this item is not the charge it makes but its publication by Russia's most responsible journal and its announcement over the Moscow radio. What can be the object of the Soviet government in broadcasting ugly rumors at a time when the need of close and confident relations between the great allies is so overwhelming? Nothing could damage more seriously the ties established at Moscow and Teheran. An explanation by the Soviet government may have been published before this comment appears, but no explanation can wipe out the shocking evidence of disunity which the incident provided.

The Five-Point Plan

T WAS inevitable that the President's message to Congress should produce exceedingly diverse reactions. To many citizens it seemed a fine fighting speech, a salutary warning that the war is not yet won, that not less but greater national effort is needed to speed victory. Others, whose views are represented in our Washington letter, are unconvinced; they feel that Mr. Roosevelt has made a new turn to the right; they fear that his primary aim is not total mobilization but the shackling of labor. In view of the kicking around labor has been experiencing, we understand and sympathize with this fear. Nevertheless, we believe that on its broad merits the President's five-point program should be supported.

Although the President went out of his way to stress the integral nature of this program, it is only natural that popular attention should have been caught chiefly by his proposal of a national-service law. Each of the other points had been stressed previously, but until now the President had carefully avoided calling for compulsory labor service. At first thought, his timing seemed badly awry. Two years ago, or even a year ago, the public was better prepared for such a demand because of the urgency of the war situation. But today, with the talk of cut-backs in war production and an apparent easing in the man-power crisis-to say nothing of the widely held hopes for an early end to the European phase of the conflict-people were frankly unprepared for the President's request. Moreover, the timing of the proposal suggested that the President was thinking of universal service more as a weapon against strikes than as means of dealing with the man-power shortage.

Actually, the timing is not as far off as it seems. With the beginning of major offensives against both Germany and Japan promised in the very near future, the toughest part of the war lies just ahead. It will be a period in which we must strain for maximum production and for speeding up every phase of the war effort. And although some workers will be freed by the projected cut-backs, the fact remains that our over-all man-power resources have been badly stretched. The War Manpower Commission estimates that an additional 900,000 workers will be needed between now and July 1, mostly to cover withdrawals by Selective Service. Women must necessarily make up the bulk of the 900,000, but reports from various sections of the country indicate that women are getting out of war industries almost as fast as new ones can be hired. A considerable withdrawal of men from war jobs to civilian occupations-has also been observed. In the absence of compulsory-service legislation this loss of trained personnel might readily become critical if additional victories on the war fronts intensified the impression that we were nearing the end of the war.

Moreover, compulsory powers are essential to curb the hoarding and uneconomic use of skilled labor which is still practiced in many parts of the country. Compulsion, however, is not a substitute for a carefully integrated man-power policy. There is real justification for the fear that the passage of a national-service act would leave us without a proper framework for man-power mobilization.

But the prospect that a national-service act may be badly administered is not enough to rule it out of a program calling for sacrifices from every section of the population in the difficult days ahead. Effective control of prices and profits and the imposition of a sound tax program would far outweigh any injustices. grievances, or maladjustments that might be entailed in national service if it were as poorly managed as our man-power program has hitherto been. But labor fears, with reason, that this five-point program, like Mr. Roosevelt's older seven-point program, may break down on the price, profit, and tax fronts and serve only to hold labor in line. Certainly the prospects for adequate taxes -rightly placed first in the President's list-seem no brighter today than before the President spoke. Senator George has indicated that the Senate's reply to Mr. Roosevelt's budget request for at least $10,500,000,000 in new taxes will be to pass the feeble $2,275,000,000 measure approved in committee. While hopes for a continuation of renegotiation and a compromise on the subsidy issue have brightened, the fight is still on.

Unless these battles are irrevocably lost, we feeldespite the considerations advanced elsewhere by Mr. Stone—that labor is ill-advised in coming out flatly in opposition to the President on the national-service issue. In Britain national service has been accepted from the beginning by every class and party, and its essential fairness has not been questioned. Instead of indiscriminate opposition, American labor might better concentrate, first, on pushing through the other measures in the President's program, and, second, on getting a national-service bill which contains the safeguards necessary to an effective and democratic system. The Austin-Wadsworth bill, for example, fails to provide proper safeguards. It is a measure which would make impossible any closed-shop, unionshop, or maintenance-of-membership agreements. Nor is any provision made for protecting the seniority rights of workers who are shifted to war industries. Defects such as these can and should be attacked by organized labor. But unless labor shows that it is willing to put up with some inconveniences and to accommodate itself even to demands that are sometimes unreasonable, it has not the moral right to ask sacrifices of capital and the farmers. And if the spirit of self-seeking, business as usual, and sparring for position is to be allowed to dominate our home-front policies, the result will not only be felt in a lengthening of the war but in a worsening of labor's position, both relatively and absolutely.

Stalin's Choice

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

If THE Communist Party indorses the recent proposals of Earl Browder, it will cease to exist as a party and will become a "political association," and its purpose "for many years into the future" will be to encourage national unity through the support of free enterprise. In this role it will do its best to help avert an explosion of class conflict when the war ends. It will run no candidates for public office but will operate through the accepted medium of the two-party system. Mr. Browder came out flatly for the reelection of President Roosevelt next fall, but he made it clear that Communists are now free agents and may join either the Democratic or the Republican Party.

But the pivotal point of the Browder encyclical was Teheran. It is to further the aims announced at that historic meeting that the Communist Party is now divesting itself of its name and its character and its principles. Indeed, Browder's whole position is founded on the premise that, just as victory in the war necessitated an intimate union of forces among the great allied powers, so a "coalition peace" is the only alternative to "the spreading of civil wars over vast areas, culminating . . . in a new world war between nations." To prevent this utter catastrophe it is necessary to abandon the fight for socialism—at least in America.

Such is the Browder thesis, abbreviated but I think not distorted. What is the reality behind it?

The war will end with Russia the strongest power on the Eurasian continent. The only other power in the world comparable in strength will be the United States. Russia's two chief problems after the war will be the restoration of its shattered industrial plants and security against new wars. The first problem can be met by long-term commercial agreements with the Western nations, particularly the United States. The second problem can be met by the creation of a sound working system of collective security. This, in turn, requires a stable Europe dominated by states friendly to Russia and not infected with expansionist ambitions.

It is in the light of Russia's basic needs and desires that Browder's speech should be examined. It has no meaning apart from them.

Toward America, Stalin's course is clear. The Roosevelt Administration is well disposed toward Russia. At Moscow and Teheran the Secretary of State and the President agreed to a common course of action. Their political prestige is tied to the fulfilment of the agreements reached with Russia. Already, without any doubt specific plans for expanded trade between the two countries have been discussed. Russia's best hope for the crucial years immediately following the war lies in the continuance of a Roosevelt regime in Washington and in post-war economic stability.

Other, more long-range, considerations point the same way. The ending of Democratic control in Washington is likely to mean a sharp swing to the right, with extreme reactionaries riding into power on a wave of resentment against war-time taxes and controls, against labor, against every remnant of the New Deal. In place of pre-war isolationism the country might move into a period of intense imperialistic competition. Antagonism to Russia would certainly rise; plans for international cooperation would go by the board—and a new war would come striding out of the future.

So the Russians presumably argue. And faced with such alternatives they prefer to take no chances. The Communist Party offers at least a modest obstacle to Russia's interests in America; consequently it must go.

The end of the party was foreshadowed when the Comintern was dissolved. At that time the Communist parties in Canada, Cuba, and Costa Rica died and came to life in new, presumably less objectionable, forms. The same fate seems to have been designed for the American party, but its liquidation was delayed. For several months the Communists in this country tried to ingratiate themselves with all sorts of persons and political tendencies, from Frank Hague on the right to their opponents on the left. The Party was apparently doing its best to prove that it could serve the aims described above.

It didn't work. As always the attempt to lure corrupt reactionaries into the same bed with political progressives further alienated both elements. The suspicion and hostility generated by Communist behavior during the past and by the gyrations of the party line could not be overcome. And the Administration itself showed not the least gratification over the activities of the Communists in its behalf. In short, the unity move was a flop.

The party's transformation into an association may also be a brief expedient. Under any name communism smells about the same to the people who don't like it. The new set-up, too, may prove to be more nuisance than help to Moscow. Or it may die for lack of nourishment. A radical party wins support by militant, aggressive action in support of a radical program, not by serving as an uninvited handmaiden to the party in power.

But the fate of the Communist Party in America is far less important than the plans of Moscow for the Communist movement in the rest of the world. Does the present move mean that the party everywhere is to dissolve? Does it mean that Communists will everywhere work for capitalist stability? These questions cannot yet be answered. It is possible that the policy announced by Browder was designed particularly for America and will not be applied fully anywhere else. Already one can find some evidence that it is adopting a varied, ad boc policy to fit conditions, and Russia's interests, in each country.

Obviously Russia's interests in America are very different from in Europe. In America the danger of reaction and the desirability of returning Roosevelt to power may seem to outweigh the dubious services of the Communist Party. In Europe the leading elements in the underground are largely recruited from the ranks of Socialists and Communists. Their desperate struggle is animated by more than a determination to drive out the Nazis; they fight for a new Europe and an end to the domination of interests that gladly made deals with fascism. To ask them to avert class conflict and work for the stabilization of capitalism would be to take the life and meaning out of their movement. It will be very difficult to apply one strategy to America and a contrary one to Europe, but it would seem that Stalin has no other choice.

F. D. R. and National Service

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 13 N JANUARY 8 the Army and Navy Journal predicted that the President, in his message to Congress, would recommend national-service legislation. The accuracy of the prediction lends weight to the Journal's further statement that the "off-the-record" remarks made by General Marshall on December 31 were inspired by the President. The Journal implied that the Marshall press conference was planned to prepare the public mind for a national-service act. This might have been accomplished by a frank and moving appeal from Marshall to labor. The effect of the "off-therecord" talk was not to appeal to labor but to inflame public opinion against it. I think the approach reflects (1) the kind of thinking done by the right-wingers like Byrnes with whom the President has increasingly surrounded himself, (2) the kind of thinking common among regular army and navy officers with little knowledge of civilian life and problems, and (3) the basic anti-labor bias of the small group of Wall Street men who fathered the Austin-Wadsworth national-service bill. This group has much influence in the War and Navy departments, both of which have indorsed the bill. I think this background important in evaluating the President's message.

There are two possible reasons for asking for a national-service act. One is to prevent strikes. The other is fully to mobilize man-power. Judging from the Marshall press conference and the Army and Navy Journal, the military are thinking only of the first. The remedy is a doubtful one; national service hasn't prevented strikes in Great Britain. Mr. Roosevelt in his message gave both reasons. He wants national service to "prevent strikes" and to attain "nothing less than total mobilization of man-power and capital." I think it significant that he should say that he would not recommend a national-service act except as part of a five-point program designed "to keep down the cost of living, to share equitably the burdens of taxation, to hold the stabilization line, and to prevent undue profits." For these questions bear only a moral or a demagogic relationship to that of national service. If we face a serious man-power problem that can best be met by compulsory means, we ought to have a national-service act no matter what the other conditions on the home front. The questions which the President and his advisers must answer are: Is there a man-power shortage? Can it best be met by compulsion?

The facts, so far I can obtain them, show that we passed the peak of our man-power difficulties last November. In November the War Manpower Commission listed seventy-seven cities as critical labor areas where no more war contracts were to be placed and where existing contracts were not to be renewed. The number of cities in this category has since fallen to sixty-seven. Three important war-production centers-Dallas, Bridgeport, and Dayton-were among the ten removed from the critical list. Bureau of Labor Statistics figures show that the rate of turnover in war industries began to fall last autumn, with the news of further cutbacks in war production. It is no secret that the War Manpower Commission, from McNutt down, and the regional directors meeting this week in Washington do not think compulsory service necessary to replace the 900,000 men to be drafted this year. The New York Times on January 9 reported that "surprise was general" that the President should be considering national-service legislation "at a time when the man-power situation was improving." If this general impression is false, it is up to the President to correct it.

Mishandling of man-power cannot be cured by mere enactment of a statute. A national-service act would do more harm than good unless coupled with reform in the field of labor policy and reform in the field of industrial mobilization. Most of our difficulties arise from Mr. Roosevelt's failure in both fields. The effect of overlapping labor agencies, inconsistent labor directives, and surrenders under threat has been to reward the John L. Lewises and penalize the Philip Murrays. In many plants employers feel that the no-strike pledge permits them to ignore grievance committees. These grievances and the War Labor Board's unsatisfactory method of handling them have as much, if not more, to do with labor unrest than have wage questions. I hate to think of what these employers would do if given the additional weapon of a compulsory-service act, and of what the effects would be on labor efficiency.

Even more important is the fact that efficient use of labor power can only come as part of an integrated and total mobilization of our economy. If some readers think this too vague and general an objection, I refer them to the report made last November 6 by McNutt's top management-labor policy committee opposing a nationalservice law. I do not share the committee's basic theoretical opposition to national service. But I am impressed that so diverse, representative, and well-informed a group of men,* writing in November of 1943, should make the same criticisms that have been leveled at the war effort on the home front since 1941 by one Congressional investigation after another, including those under Truman, Tolan, Kilgore, and Pepper. The committee complained that critical man-power situations in various areas were the "results of dislocation, maldistribution of contracts, and ineffective man-power utilization rather than of inadequate over-all supply of labor." The committee reported that full utilization of labor cannot be achieved until "all agencies of government concerned with procurement, production, and manpower are administered under a coordinated and wellunderstood arrangement." It was to correct this that a powerful bloc in Congress early last year sought to pass the Pepper-Tolan-Kilgore bill for an Office of War Mobilization, and it was to block passage of this bill that Mr. Roosevelt set up an Office of War Mobilization under Byrnes; but it was an Office of War Mobilization in name only.

Byrnes has been more complaisant than the War Production Board about big-business resistance to effective mobilization by government, and he has been the willing accomplice of the War and Navy departments in their reluctance to coordinate their efforts with civilian production and man-power agencies. Those commentators now praising Mr. Roosevelt for a "strong" policy in recommending a national-service act would do well to examine his record on the mobilization of industry and the integration of war agencies; the record is one of weakness, not strength. They would also do well to consider that Byrnes and the War and Navy chiefs backing national service have been the principal opponents of that total mobilization and coordination which alone would make national service palatable and effective.

*For labor: Howard Fraser of the Brotherhoods, Green of the A. F. of L., Murray of the C. I. O. For agriculture: Albert Goss of the Grange, Ed O'Neal of the Farm Bureau, Jim Patton of the Farmers' Union. For management, Conrad Cooper of Wheeling Steel, Fred Crawford of the N. A. M., and Eric Johnston of the United States Chamber of Commerce.

50 Years Ago in "The Nation"

TALY MIGHT HAVE LIVED happy and contented if she had kept out of the combinations (what the Germans call the constellations) of the great powers. She entered the Triple Alliance, and condemned herself to expenses which are too large for her financial capacity; she begins now to pay the price of her ambition, and is passing through a most dangerous crisis.—January 4, 1894.

AN EVENING JOURNAL in this city received the following by special messenger a few days ago: "Sir: In publishing names of attendants at the Charity Ball will you kindly mention Mr. and Mrs. ——. If you mention costumes, Mrs. —— in pink and Nile novelty satin 'décolleté,' old lace, diamond ornaments. We were late and missed the newspapermen. If there is any charge, kindly let me know by bearer and greatly oblige, Mr. ——."—January 11, 1894.

IT IS UNFORTUNATE that the Republican National Committee has indorsed the proposition to admit as states Utah, Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma. . . . The rights of statehood ought not to be conferred upon a territory like New Mexico, whose population is largely composed of ignorant Mexicans and Indians, or like Arizona, which had only 59,620 people (thousands of Indians included) when the last census was taken.—January 18, 1894.

IT HAS ALREADY BEEN ANNOUNCED that the Carnegie iron and steel works have taken the place formerly held by the Britishers as bugaboos to the American manufacturers. In other words, the Carnegies have so far outstripped all their domestic competitors in the completeness and perfection of their machinery that the latter need protection against Carnegie rather than against John Bull.—

January 11, 1894.

CECIL RHODES, since his victories over the Matabeles, has become a great hero in the eyes of the Cape Colonists, and his success has doubtless done much to turn his head, or, as our slang would say, to enlarge it. Accordingly, he has made a speech in which he substantially bids defiance to the home government, and says that if they do not let him have his way, they may have to face an agitation for the independence of the Cape Colony.—January 25, 1894.

THE SWINE AND THE FLOWER

I shrank to meet a mud-incrusted swine,

And then he seemed to grunt, in accents rude,

"Huh! Be not proud, for in this fat of mine, Behold the source of richness for your food!"

I fled, and saw a field that seemed, at first,
One giant mass of roses pure and white,
With dewy buds 'mid dark green foliage nursed,
And, as I lingered o'er this lovely sight,
The summer breeze that cooled that southern scene
Whispered, "Behold the source of Cottolene!"

Cottolene, the Vegetable Shortening. (ADVT.)-January 25, 1894.

Guns in Palestine

BY JESSE LURIE

URING the last war Palestine was an enemy base offering a serious threat to the Allied communications belt. Today Palestine may serve as springboard for an Allied invasion of the Balkans: the Palestine Post reveals that the country is teeming with Allied soldiers-American, English, Indian, Australian, Polish, Greek, Yugoslav, South African. But whether or not this role materializes, Palestine is playing an important part in implementing the Allied war effort in the Mediterranean theater. Jewish engineers have built a new military road in the Lebanon. A Jewish cooperative enterprise has been awarded the contract for important installations on the Persian Gulf, the main place for unloading American supplies for Russia. Some 23,000 Palestine Jews, from a community of 550,000, have volunteered for the British army. Civilian production for the army has quadrupled since 1940. Of all this little has appeared in the American press.

Lately, however, we have read a number of confusing cables from Jerusalem concerning arms searches in Jewish villages and trials of Jews for gun-running and concealing arms. These incidents are more significant than they seem, for they are bound up with the problems attendant upon the establishment of a Jewish homeland in Palestine. They cannot be understood without reference to the events which form their background.

One of the most recent dispatches told of the sentencing of seven men from the Jewish village of Hulda to two to six years' imprisonment for the illegal possession of arms. The name Hulda has little meaning for Americans, but to Palestinians it is symbolic of the patience and courage which forged a modern industrial and agricultural community from hitherto untilled earth. Hulda is an outpost of Jewish Palestine in the south. It is situated in the southern foothills of the Judean Mountains, a few miles north of the Negev, the wilderness of Beersheba. For its communications it is dependent upon a dirt road, almost impassable in winter, which runs westward to the main north-south highway. This road, which is hardly more than a camel track, is entirely on Arab land, and passes through the Arab villages of Monsoura and Agger. East, south, and north of Hulda are three other Arab villages.

In August, 1929, Palestine was racked by riots and pillage incited by the Mufti of Jerusalem (who, incidentally, is now in Berlin) through false stories of Jewish designs on Moslem holy places. Hulda's existence was threatened. Ephraim Chizik, a member of the Haganah, the "illegal" defense organization which the Jews of Palestine had organized out of dire necessity, came from Tel Aviv to lead the twenty-four Jewish settlers in the defense of their homes. Thousands of Bedouins from the southern desert, incited by promises of great loot, attacked Hulda that night. Wave after wave was repulsed by the Jews. Ephraim Chizik was killed leading a sally to clear out a nest of snipers who had taken one of the village houses.

When British troops arrived in the morning, the Arabs were gone, and the "illegal" arms with which the village had been defended through the night had been hidden. The British commander insisted that the position of the village was untenable and, despite the strenuous opposition of the settlers, ordered them evacuated.

In that same week in August, 1929, I happened to be visiting Tel Hai, a Jewish village at the other end of Palestine, on the Syrian border. This northern outpost had been attacked by a French-paid Arab gang in 1921, during a British-French border dispute, and possessed a box of "legal" arms for use in emergencies. I watched the settlers break its seal and take out a few old hunting rifles. To rely upon them was to invite slaughter. Fortunately, the Haganah was on the job.

In 1930 the Jews went back to Hulda to rebuild their homes. They took with them a tractor. The neighboring Arabs thought it was some kind of powerful weapon which would be used to punish them for the 1929 attack, but when they finally learned its peaceful uses they borrowed it, and its Jewish driver, for their own fields. The Jews of Hulda brought the first pedigreed bull to southern Palestine, the first chicken incubator, the first gramophone, the first orange grove, introduced intensive vegetable growing and modern sanitation. Hulda has the only doctor and dentist for miles around, and not a day passes without the appearance of several Arab patients, who are treated without charge.

The Jewish village prospered and so did its Arab neighbors. When the Mufti and his cohorts again started trouble in 1936, the excellent relations between Hulda and the surrounding countryside continued. Though it felt obliged to be ever-vigilant, Hulda was not attacked. But in 1938 German military sappers, with the connivance of the Mufti, were smuggled into Palestine to try out some of their new road and anti-personnel mines. The dirt road which was Hulda's sole link with the outside world was an excellent testing ground. The mines proved to be extremely effective. Seventeen young men and women of Hulda were blown to pieces.

Then came war and the invasion of Poland. Most of the settlers of Hulda had originally come from Poland. Only a fortunate few have heard what became of their parents, brothers, and sisters. The relatives of most of them are presumed to have been slaughtered in the Nazi death ditches and asphyxiation chambers or to have died fighting in the epic defense of the Warsaw ghetto. All the Hulda settlers wanted to enlist. But since food is an important weapon, and since the production of Hulda, like that of other villages, had to be more than doubled to feed the armies and civilian war workers, everyone could not go. A lottery was held. Every man and woman who wanted to fight put his name in a bowl, and the names of twenty-two, seventeen men and five women, were drawn out. These joined the British army. (There is no government conscription in Palestine.)

On October 3 of last year hundreds of British and Polish soldiers, led by a British brigadier, surrounded Hulda and instituted a house-to-house search. Their pretext was that they were looking for Polish deserters. The insinuation was a calumny. Would the brothers of those who defended the Warsaw ghetto harbor a deserter? Would a village which had voluntarily given the best of its young men to the British army aid the enemy?

No deserters were found, of course, but the real object of the search, seizure of the settlement's defensive weapons, was attained. Several boxes of ammunition were discovered, and seven leading members of the community were arrested and taken to Jerusalem. British censorship refused to allow the Palestine press or foreign correspondents to print the news until the middle of December, when the seven men were brought to trial and sentenced.

Meanwhile, an even greater injustice had been perpetrated in Ramat Hakovesh, another isolated Jewish village in the Sharon plain. Ramat Hakovesh is in the midst of the Arab villages of Tireh, Misky, and Qalqilia. Its communicating road, like Hulda's, goes through Arab land. In 1938 a Ramat Hakovesh truck carrying men and women to work in the fields was blown up. Eight persons were killed and many others wounded. (In all Palestine 292 Jews were killed and 649 wounded by Arab terrorists in 1938. In 1936, 81 Jews were killed and in 1937, 33.)

The search for arms at Ramat Hakovesh was considerably rougher than that at Hulda. Again the trumpedup excuse was a mythical Polish deserter. Bearded Indian troops, accustomed to the methods used on the Northwest Frontier, surrounded Ramat Hakovesh and herded all the men into a barbed-wire inclosure. In the ensuing confusion Shmuel Wolinietz was shot by a British policeman. Although the village doctor warned against his being moved, and although there are nearer and better-equipped Jewish hospitals in Petah Tikvah and Tel Aviv, Wolinietz was taken to the government hospital in Nablus. He died there, five days later. Thirty-five settlers were arrested, but no charges were brought against them, and after ten days they were released.

No arms or "deserters" had been found; one Jew had been killed; and for ten days thirty-five farmers had been kept from producing food for the Allied armies.

If the Palestine government undertook these searches to provoke disturbances at a time when the country should have been united against Nazism, it almost succeeded. On the day Wolinietz died, anger spread over the country like a burning khamsin wind. Hot-headed youths attacked the government offices in Tel Aviv, and according to a Palcor cable twenty-one civilians and eleven British policemen were injured; war factories closed down as the funeral cortège passed; all Jewish transport left the roads. But calmer heads soon prevailed. The main enemy was still in Berlin, not in Jerusalem. The war workers went back to their jobs.

The Palestine arms trials which were reported in the American press a few months ago showed the same provocative pattern. Leib Sirkin, secretary of the Seamen's Club of Haifa, and Abraham Rachlin, a taxi driver. were sentenced to ten and seven years, respectively, for buying 300 rifles and 105,000 rounds of ammunition. These had been stolen from army dumps by two English deserters, who were sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment. The trials were publicized extensively by the Palestine Press Office, a branch of the British Ministry of Information. The purpose of the trials apparently was to prove the extent of the Haganah's arsenal and the Haganah's connection with official Zionist organizations. In the course of them various accusations were leveled against the Jewish Agency, which is recognized by the mandatory power as the representative Jewish body to be consulted on all matters connected with the Tewish homeland.

Nothing has been given out by the Palestine Press Office about the Arabs' possession of arms, but the correspondent of the London Times made his own investigation and cabled his paper: "It is common knowledge that the majority of Arabs are armed with rifles that were bought or stolen from Allied troops—one of Vichy General Dentz's last acts in Syria was the delivery of French arms to Syrian Arabs, who sold them across the border to Palestine."

The Palestine government has made no search for this Arab arsenal: its interest in illegal arms is entirely superficial. The motive behind these searches and trials is political one. A significant cleavage exists between the Palestine administration and important sections of the British War Cabinet over the White Paper issued by the Chamberlain government in 1939, and the Palestine officials are trying to strengthen their position by destroying confidence in the Jewish population. The administration is definitely committed to the policies of that document, which will end all Jewish immigration to Palestine after another 31,000 persons have entered. It also forbids the sale of property to Jews in the greater part of the country, while in the remaining part, where prices have of course quadrupled since these laws were instituted, Jew can buy land only if the High Commissioner approves his purchase.

How the White Paper works in practice may be illustrated by the dilemma of one American Jew who has developed a large citrus grove in Palestine. He was visiting his sons in the United States when the war broke out and was unable to get back to Palestine. His return visa has long since expired. Now he fears that the White Paper quota will be filled by refugees and that he will never be able to go home. He sometimes wonders whether he should transfer his property to a non-Jewish son-in-law, who would not be subject to the White Paper's restrictions. Meanwhile he has been trying to buy a piece of Arab property adjoining his grove, but he finds it difficult to get the High Commissioner, who is naturally occupied with the war emergency, to sign on the dotted line. With every delay the Arab owner raises his price. If the Jewish grower wanted to buy a piece of unwatered waste land a few miles away-which he could irrigate with pipes from his overflowing wellit would be impossible. Not even an appeal to King George would help. The land lies within the Arab reserve, which covers two-thirds of the country.

By implementing the White Paper the Palestine government expects (1) to end Arab agitation against Tewish immigration and the sale of land to Jews by complete capitulation to Arab demands: (2) to improve Britain's relations with neighboring Arab countries which contain important oil deposits; and (3) to be able to speed up its program of equalizing the Jewish and Arab economies. After the last war, when the bureaucrats came to Palestine from Kenya, Jamaica, and other colonial training schools in administrative inefficiency, they were more or less overwhelmed by the problems presented by the speed of Zionist construction. They saw the Jews beginning to develop a modern economy alongside an Arab feudal society. Governing such a country, they said, was like trying to drive a spirited mare in harness with a plodding ox. Rapid Zionist settlement in accordance with the terms of the Palestine mandate would be, they decided, unfair to the Arabs.

Their solution was to hamper Jewish enterprise as much as possible. That meant binding Jewish activities in yards of red tape, filing requests and then losing the files; it meant discriminatory tariffs which ruined infant industries; and it meant declaring the Jewish defense organization illegal. Implied in this solution was the intention of raising the living conditions of the Arabs at least to approximate Jewish standards, but only a few men in the Education Department were interested enough to try to carry out this intention. (Actually, the Arabs have benefited much more from the influx of Jews into Palestine than from any efforts of the administration. They have learned how to work their land and how to care for their houses and children. Jewish hospitals have cured their trachoma and introduced them to sanitary arrangements.)

The White Paper was the final slap at the Jewish experiment, and the final gesture of appeasement to the Arabs. It must inevitably quench Jewish initiative in Palestine and effectively neutralize what has been already accomplished there. The plodding ox will frustrate all efforts of the spirited mare.

Many leaders of the British War Cabinet were opposed to the White Paper when it was issued by the Chamberlain government and are opposed to it now. Mr. Churchill himself voted against the White Paper in 1939. "This pledge [the Balfour Declaration]," he said, "of a home of refuge, an asylum, was not made to the Jews in Palestine but to the Jews outside Palestine, to that vast, unhappy mass of scattered, persecuted, wandering Jews whose intense, unchanging, unconquerable desire has been for a National Home. . . . That is the pledge that was given, and that is the pledge which we are now asked to break." Herbert Morrison, Labor member of Churchill's War Cabinet, declared during the same debate: "We regard this White Paper and the policy in it as a cynical breach of pledges given to the Jews and the world, including America. This policy will do us no good in the United States, where we need to be done good, and where we need the good-will of the great American people. It comes at a time of tragedy and apprehension for the Jewish race throughout the world, and it ought not to be approved by the House today."

Dr. Chaim Weizmann, president of the Jewish Agency for Palestine, has been conferring with Churchill, Morrison, Amery, and others in the present British government who opposed the White Paper in 1939 on a new statement of policy on Palestine. Other members of the Jewish Agency executive have also left Jerusalem for London. Whether or not these negotiations will result in a modification of the White Paper is still doubtful. What we cannot doubt is that the present Palestine administration, which will stand or fall with the White Paper, is doing everything in its power to disrupt the negotiations by discrediting the Jewish population and its self-defense organization. Nor can we doubt that eventually Palestine will be included in the territories protected by the Atlantic Charter and enjoying the Four Freedoms. Let us hope that in the final settlement the seven men of Hulda will not be forgotten and that all Palestinians will be granted another freedom, one for which the American colonists fought the redcoatsfreedom from "unreasonable searches and seizures."

Brains in the Kitchen

BY EDITH M. STERN

Pierry DAY, to desperately understaffed Washington hospitals, come messages from graduate nurses: "Sorry, I can't report for duty today, but the maid didn't show up." New York City social agencies, the head of a large one estimates, have lost 25 per cent of their trained case workers, young married women who have to stay home because they have no domestic help. "A considerable proportion of the alumnae who would be glad to help in the war effort are limited in their availability by . . . family obligations (we wish expert mathematics teachers did not have to stay at home with children of school age because maid service has gone into factories)," laments Katherine S. Doty, of the Barnard College Occupation Bureau.

War agencies are crying for statisticians. Yet a friend of mine, an expert statistician, has just quit her government job. Figuring deductions, carfares, lunches, maid's wages ($4.20 to $5 for an eight-hour day in Washington now), she found she cleared just $300 a year on her forty-eight hours a week plus twelve hours' traveling. Eager to help in the war effort, she would have continued if she had been able to get a reliable worker to take over her housework and the care of her threeyear-old after nursery-school hours. But after struggling with six maids in one year, using up her leaves and more because of their unexplained absences, and seeing her child become a behavior problem, she gave up. I could tell similar stories about a physicist—and how the Navy Department wants women physicists!-a lawyer, a teacher, and one of those badly needed expert secretaries who could replace four of the inexperienced clerical workers now milling around government offices.

Unfortunately we have no statistics on the relation between the waste of skilled woman-power and the shortage of competent domestic help. Unfortunately nobody knows how many officers doing desk work might be released for service overseas if trained women could be relieved of dish-washing, mopping the kitchen floor, and hanging out the family wash. But surely it is pretty clear that the "servant problem" plays a large role in the woman-power problem and should be a matter of national concern.

Indeed, it should have exercised us long ago, when women first began to step out of kitchens into college halls, laboratories, and offices. The lack of competent domestic workers is not new; the war has simply brought it into sharper focus. While the supply of labor may have diminished quantitatively—according to the Women's Bureau of the Department of Labor, "there is no real shortage of 'domestic help' but there is a real shortage of 'good, well-qualified, trained domestic workers' "—the qualitative deficiencies we have always had with us. Only in times of deep depression has the kind of domestic help the professional woman requires been obtainable. Your woman doctor, attorney, writer, scientist, social worker, or teacher needs someone in her home not only to do the physical work but to plan, manage, and execute with a minimum of supervision, like an administrative assistant—someone with as much feeling of responsibility for kitchen and nursery as she herself has for her laboratory, office, or classroom.

But what kind of person is the run-of-the-mill domestic worker? Nearly always her job is Hobson's choice, and so she cherishes a deep, perhaps unconscious resentment that makes her something of a psychopathic problem. Seeing no future in her work, she is understandably indifferent about doing it well; there are no long-term penalties for absenteeism, unreliability, and carelessness with property. Often she has been discouraged from taking the initiative—this is especially true of the Southern Negro—and therefore she cannot be depended on to exert the necessary authority over tradespeople, or to cope with the emergencies that arise with regular irregularity in even the best-run households.

The housewife who stays at home and keeps a watchful eye on children and property, who can spend hours trying to get hold of repair men or standing in line at market, can muddle along with this kind of help at no greater cost than irritation. But the professional woman finds it a continual drain on her time and socially useful creative energy. Professionally trained women are therefore driven into joining one of three groups. In the first are those perhaps sensible women who foresee the losing battle and jettison their long and expensive education soon as they marry. In the second are women like my statistician friend who struggle along for a while and then decide that, rather than continue to sacrifice their families and themselves, they will let society at large get along without them. The third is made up of women with terrific drive, with special talents, with burning ambition, or now with fervent patriotism, who take on a double job that would faze any man, at unrecorded cost in terms of jagged nerves to themselves, their husbands, their children, and their professional potentials.

"But," you will hear from those who have never played this exhausting game of home versus career, "everybody has trouble with inefficient employees. Why, the things I go through with my factory hands, or my stenographers!" Ah, my dear sir—you must be male, or you would know better—there's a difference. The difficulties you have with your employees are an intrinsic part of your work. The career woman's difficulties at home are not only in addition to those in her office but over and above them. Not many normal women put career before home. Most of us, whether because men have sold us a bill of goods, because the mores are strong, or because of biological instinct, put our homes first and take pride in creating good ones.

A successful homemaker, however, does not have to perform or supervise every detail any more than a good business executive has to type his own letters or count the items in the shipping-room. A mother has duties, such as taking Sally to the doctor's to have him check up on her general condition or beaming upon her in her dance recital, which she would not and should not delegate. But someone else can take the children to be fitted for the same kind of shoes as those they have just outgrown, buy their toothpaste, make certain that their milk is warmed-and without detriment to the children's psyches. Pro bono publico, a woman capable of solving chemical problems or writing books should be able to depend upon a domestic worker to make out an accurate, comprehensive marketing list and not be obliged herself to inspect pantry and icebox. Often domestic workers fall so far short of this that they cannot even follow simple, written directions, thought out when the employer might be planning her own day's work.

What is the answer? So simplify the house that we can do without a domestic worker? The women's pages are full of bright suggestions. But you may use paper napkins, put away anything that needs polishing, eat out of cans (if you have the points), and there still remains an irreducible minimum of actual labor that must be done before and after office hours, enough to wear down any woman who needs her energies for other work. Constant attention is needed to keep even a new house decently clean, and the dinner that cooks itself is still only on the advertising pages. Nursery schools for the smaller children, after-school play groups for the older ones are also only a partial solution. They do not cover the beginning and tail end of the day or the frequent occasions when the youngsters are at home with colds.

There are only two ways out. The first is to dignify and professionalize domestic work so that it will attract a higher type of worker. You have your analogy in nursing, a calling for paupers and drunkards a century ago, today affording the opportunity for a master's degree. Actually, homes are pleasanter places in which to work than factories, and many women are better suited to domestic tasks than to office work. Remove the social stigma of the servant status, give the job and its complex skills the respect that is rightfully theirs, standardize training, for a beginning at least as much as stenographic training is standardized, and a new vocational group will come into being. Everywhere, except in the home, we practice specialization. Only by training and honoring specialists in homemaking can we release other specialists, feminine gender, for their full social usefulness in war and in peace.

The second way out is simpler. Let no woman ever go beyond elementary school.

In the Wind

N DECEMBER 25 The Nation published an article, O Little Town (Restricted), on the genteel Hitlerism of Littchfield, Connecticut, where by immemorial custom no Jew may own property. On January 7 the United Press released a brief story on the will of Benjamin Epstein, who had lived in nearby Winsted and left a fund of $5,000 to maintain free beds in the Litchfield County Hospital.

THE NATIONAL OPINION RESEARCH CENTER reports that the public favors federal control of soldier ballots by two to one. A Southern share-cropper's wife, asked by the interviewer why she favored state control, replied, "That way the Nigger soldiers can be kept from voting."

THE SOUR ILLITERATE: Benjamin De Casseres, a Hearst columnist, offers these thoughts on the life of the mind: "Eight out of ten of our professional Ph.D. 'intellectuals' are mental zombies. I don't belong, . . . and yet nature endowed me with a rather goodly share of 'intellect' out of her brain barrel."

HEADLINE in the business section of the New York Times: "Excess of Swine Grows in Chicago."

IMMACULATE FERTILITY: From Maurice Samuels's "The World of Sholem Aleichem," page 283: "Jews were too busy having children to bother with sex."

REPRESENTATIVE EDITH NOURSE ROGERS of Massachusetts, interviewed by the Boston Herald, said subsidies to keep food prices down were unnecessary: "I am sure that public opinion, public protest, and the refusal of the people to buy at exorbitant prices would keep prices at a reasonable level. . . I think, though, the average person would rather pay a few cents more for eggs than to go without them."

FESTUNG EUROPA: Since tea is unobtainable in Belgium, the German-controlled press has suggested boiled briars as a substitute. . . . An ammunition warehouse in a suburb of Oslo blew up and set off a succession of explosions that rocked the city and killed many people. "We were not afraid," said an eyewitness. "We thought it was the invasion."

[The $5 prize for the best item received in December goes to B. ]. Morris of Milwaukee for the story of Wheeler McMillen's platform for 1944. It was published in the issue of December 18.]

Patriot's Notebook

BY J. KESSEL

[Although the names of persons and the details of the incidents in this story are fictitious, it is an authentic account of the Frênch resistance today. M. Kessel has only recently come from France. He is now engaged in adapting his material on the underground struggle for a film which will be produced in England.]

Y HOST now is the Baron de V____, and I live in a beautiful Louis XIII château. The estate includes a park, a lake, rich and widespread lands. It would be hard to imagine a safer or more pleasant refuge. The Baron has put himself entirely at my service. With his long nose, complexion tanned by wind and sun, and hard little eyes, he is somebody; he takes after both wolf and a fox. He cares for nothing except his broad acres and his hunting. A retired cavalry officer, needless to say, whose wife and children live under the Terror. The only person to stand up to him is his elder sister, an old maid never out of her riding breeches. The Baron de V--- was a sworn enemy of the Republic. Before the war he had organized his farmers and his kennelmen and huntsmen into a squadron armed with shotguns and revolvers which in the event of a Royalist rising was destined to take the nearest prefecture by a cavalry charge.

This squadron, perfectly organized and perfectly trained, still exists. But it will go into action against the Germans. Arms are there in plenty, and many escapes have been made to the land of the Baron. He belongs to no underground organization, but he helps them all. After his wife and children have gone to bed he rides out with his sister, both mounted, to receive new recruits. It is to this feudal character that our local chief, the secretary of the syndicate, has intrusted me. I teased the Baron de V—— on his alliance with a revolutionary; he gave his hunting boots a loud slap with the riding whip which he always carries, swore, and said to me, "Je préfère, monsieur, une France rouge à une France qui rougisse."

A country priest has come to say mass at the château. He spends his days and nights going round the farms. "You," he says to a peasant, "you have room to hide three men who won't go to Germany." "You," he says to another, "you must feed two more," and so on. He knows exactly what each one can do. He has a lot of influence and everyone obeys him. His name has been given to the Germans, and he has been warned by the French authorities. "I've got to hurry up," he says, "for before I go to prison I want to place three hundred!" It has now become a kind of sport. A race against time.

The number of those who refused to work in Germany were a few thousand when I went to England. Today you can count them by the ten thousand. Many are swallowed up by the countryside. But many more have fled to the natural strongholds or have taken to the maquis—the maquis of Savoy, of the Cévennes, of the Pyrenees, of the Massif Central. Each holds an army of young people. They have to be fed, organized, and armed so far as is possible. It is a new and terrible problem for the Resistance. Some groups have sorted themselves into communities. Sometimes they edit a paper. Like tiny republics, they have their own laws. Others salute the colors every day, the flag with the Cross of Lorraine. The next mail for England will include photographs of these ceremonies.

But most of these lads, young workmen, students, clerks, need strong and intelligent leadership, money, and outside connections. Chose a committee of three from our lot to look after them: Félix, Lemasque, and Jean-François. They have the virtues and faults which complement each other.

Sent off a reception team for people and parcels coming from England. The team consists of a fireman, mutcher, a secretary of the mayor's, a policeman, mudoctor. Means of transport—the policeman's car and the butcher's van.

Examined a great many reports. For the people in the Resistance the margin of life is always growing narrower. The Gestapo multiplies its arrests and the German courts their death sentences. And now the French police automatically surrender the Frenchmen they hold to every demand of the enemy. Before, there was prison, the concentration camp, forced domicile, or a simple warning from the authorities. Today it is nearly always death, death, death.

But on our side we kill and kill.

The French weren't ready, weren't disposed, to kill. Their temperament, their climate, their country, the state of civilization which they had reached kept them a long way from bloodshed. I remember how difficult it was for us in the first days of the Resistance to contemplate murder in cold blood, ambushes, planned assassination. And how hard it was to get recruits for that. There is no question of these scruples now. Primitive man has reappeared in France. He kills to protect his home, his daily bread, his loves, his honor. He kills every day. He kills the German, the accomplices of the German, the traitor, the informer. He kills rationally and unconsciously. I would not say that the French people have grown hard, but their edge has been sharpened.

*

Accident? Good fortune? Premonition? Instinct?

I left the château a week ago. Two days after my departure the Baron de V— was taken, at the same time as the railwayman, our section chief. Both have already been shot.

I am living in a big city, at the house of a juge d'instruction, as his servant. It's good cover. Unfortunately, I have to see a great many people. Such coming and going in a quiet household is quickly noticed. I can't stay here much longer.

Mathilde has come back from her tour. She has made a complete report on our sectors for me. She has seen everyone and spent every night in the train. She finds it less tiring than looking after a large family in poverty. To tell the truth, she no longer looks like a housewife, I think that her new way of life and her cold fury and despair have entirely changed her expression and her way of moving. But she has been practicing as well. She told me that on her travels she changed her personality several times. Sometimes she powdered her hair and wore a severe black dress; at others she used make-up and dressed conspicuously. "I change fairly easily from the old lady bountiful to the old tart," said she in her business-like way.

One of the most important things she has done has been to etablish relations with the local heads of other groups to avoid overlapping and interference in operations. It sometimes happens that two or three different organizations have the same objective at the same time—sabotage, train-wrecking, assassination, or execution. If we are without contact, the squads are multiplied uselessly and so are the risks. It is also necessary to avoid the risk of a minor operation bringing the police down on a district where a major operation is in preparation. And yet the exchange of plans increases the danger of an indiscretion.

It is the eternal problem of underground life. To take people into our confidence is an imprudence, but recruiting can't be carried on without it. The only remedy is to partition everything, so as to limit the havoc. The Communists are the great masters of partitioning, at of everything connected with the underground city. Mathilde returned full of admiration for the strength, discipline, and method which she found among them. But short of working underground a quarter of a century, one can't catch up with them. They are the professionals; we are still paying our apprentice fees.

Off again. Room taken under a fifth alibi. My papers: colonial officer on leave. Inoculations against malaria, Mathilde, as a nurse, comes to give them.

Visited Lemasque's sector.

I am not emotional, but I do not think I shall ever forget what I have seen. Hundreds and hundreds of young people returning to savagery. They can't wash. They can't shave. Their long hair hangs over cheeks burnt by the sun and the rain. They sleep in holes, in caves, in the mud. Their food is a terrible daily problem. The peasants do what they can, but that can't last indefinitely. I've seen boys wearing old bits of tire for shoes, or even bits of bark tied around their feet with laces. I've seen others whose only costume was an old potato sack split in two and tied round the loins. One can't tell any longer where these boys come from. Are they peasants, workmen, employees, students? They all wear the same hunger, the same misery, the same anger, and the same bitterness on their faces. The ones I visited were well disciplined under Lemasque and his helpers. We get them as much food and as much money as we can. But there are thousands of fugitives in the various maquis. No secret organization can look after even their most primitive needs. Either they must die of hunger then, or take to looting, or give themselves up. And winter hasn't come yet. Cursed be those who put such a choice before our young men.

>

Mathilde has made a discovery which confirms some information about which we weren't quite sure. The dressmaker where Mathilde has taken an attic has a son of about twelve. This little boy works as a page at the Hotel T——. The job is a good one, not so much for the salary as for the scraps from the restaurant that he is sometimes given. Mathilde was asked to share one of these feasts. She said nothing was more pathetic than to see the little boy pretending that he wasn't hungry so as to give more to his mother, and the mother enacting the same comedy, when neither could take their eyes off the food.

Well, lately, the child has been sleeping terribly. He moans, cries, screams in his sleep, and seems to suffocate. The shivering fits which seize him are almost convulsions. He seems delirious and calls out, "Stop hurting her. Don't kill her. I implore you not to cry like that."

In desperation his mother consulted Mathilde, whom she still takes for a nurse. Mathilde spent part of the night listening to the little boy's nightmares. Then she woke him up gently. A woman who has had as many children as Mathilde, and loved them so much, knows how to speak to boys. The dressmaker's son told her everything: For about a week he has been put under the orders of the guests who occupy the third floor of the hotel. He has to wait on the landing and answer the bell. The whole floor, he says, is occupied by ladies and gentlemen who speak French well but are all Germans. They entertain a great deal. There are men and women who always come between two German soldiers. And these French people's eyes always look unnatural, as if they are afraid and do not wish to show it. And they are always taken to the same room, No. 87. Almost always cries, and peculiar noises, and moans are heard. The noises stop and then go on again. And again. "Till it makes you ill, I assure you, Madame," said the child to Mathilde. "The screams of the women they are hurting, they are worse than anything. And if you could see in what a state they leave. Often they are taken into another room, and then they bring them back. And it begins again. I didn't want to speak to anyone about it because I was afraid to think about it."

That was how we discovered the whereabouts of the Torture Chamber for this town.

Next day Mathilde asked me what advice I would have given the dressmaker about her son.

"But to take him away from the hotel at once," I said. "Well, I persuaded her to let him stay on," said Mathilde. "It is so valuable to have a spy in such a place. Above all, an innocent one." Her mouth narrowed, and she looked at me inquiringly with a very sad expression. I had to force myself to tell her she was right.

*

A long talk with Louis H——, chief of a group with which we often cooperate. We discussed first of all a very urgent question. Louis H—— has three men in a concentration camp to whom he is particularly attached. The Gestapo has claimed these three men. They are going to be handed over to it by train in four days. Louis H——'s organization has been terribly tried in the last month, and he has not got enough men to rescue his comrades. He has come to ask me if we would undertake the operation. I shall give the necessary orders.

Then, without wishing it, as old schoolmates or regimental or war comrades do, we let ourselves drift into reminiscences. Both of us are among the veterans of Resistance. We have seen a lot of water and blood flow under the bridges. Louis H—— worked out that of four hundred who formed his group at the beginning only five were left now with their life and liberty. If we have a greater proportion of survivors—a matter of luck, perhaps of organization—the work is the same, tremendous. And the Gestapo strikes without stopping, always harder and closer. But the enemy cannot succeed in suppressing the Resistance. It's too late. We decided that a year ago the Germans, if they had shot or arrested a thousand picked men, could have beheaded all our groups and disorganized the Resistance for a long time, perhaps till the war was over. Today that's impossible. There are too many resisters, and substitute resisters, helpers, and accomplices. If all the men were deported the women would remain. And there are some surprising ones.

After Louis left, I had a fit of depression. It's not good to count the missing. And then I haven't been sleeping well these days. I think of the Mont Valérien, where not a day passes without executions, of that park of Chaville where every day a lorry brings the condemned before an execution squad, of the rifle range of Z——, where not a day goes by without our comrades being machinegunned.

I have thought about the cells of Fresne, the cellars of Vichy, about room 87 in the Hotel T——, where every day, every night, they burn women's breasts and break their toes, and stick pins under their nails, and send electric currents through the sexual organs. I have thought of the prisons and the concentration camps where people die of hunger, of consumption, of cold, of vermin. I have thought of the team of our underground newspaper, completely renewed three times over, of the sectors where not a man, not a woman, remains of those who saw the work begin.

And I asked myself as a practical thinker, as an engineer who designs a blueprint, do the results we obtain justify these massacres? Is our newspaper worth the death of its editors, its printers, its distributors? Are our little sabotages, our individual assassinations, our modest little secret army which will perhaps never go into action—are they worth our terrible losses? Are leaders like us, who inflame and train and sacrifice so many stout fellows and brave men, so many simpletons, for a war in secret, of famine and torture—are such leaders, in short, really necessary for victory?

As a practical thinker, as an honest mathematician, I have to admit that I have no idea; and even that I don't believe we are. In numbers, for all useful purposes, we work at a loss. Then, I have thought, we should in all honesty give it up. But the moment the thought of giving up has come to me I have known it was impossible. Impossible to leave to others the whole weight and care of protecting us, of rescuing us; impossible to leave the Germans with the memory of a country without a comeback, without dignity, without hatred. I have felt that an enemy killed by us who have neither uniform nor flag nor land, that such an enemy was heavier and more efficacious in the scales which weigh a country's destiny than a whole holocaust on the field of battle. I know that we have waged the French people's most glorious war. A war of little material use, since victory is already assured us, even without our help. A war which no one compels us to wage, a war with no glory, a war of executions and assassinations, in fact # free war. But this war is an act of love and an act of hate. In short an act of living.

"For a people to be so generous with its blood," said the boss one day, with his quiet smile, "that proves at least that its corpuscles are red."

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

OWHERE has the Nazi race theory failed so miserably as in Alsace-Loraine. And nowhere has its failure been illustrated more dramatically than in the incident of the University of Strasbourg, or, if you prefer, the University of Clermont-Ferrand. For some weeks we heard only vague rumors about new Nazi brutalities; then gradually we learned more about the affair from reports smuggled across the Swiss border into the news room of the Journal de Genève.

When war first broke out, Strasbourg was evacuated, and the university, together with all its teachers and students, was transported to Clermont-Ferrand, where it was allowed to use the equipment of the local university. Then came the surrender. Alsace was annexed by the Germans. A new German university was founded in Strasbourg. Thereupon the Nazi authorities sought to induce the Alsatian students and teachers to leave Clermont-Ferrand and return to Strasbourg. But although most of these were, in Nazi terminology, "racially German," few could be persuaded to go back. Moreover, a steady stream of Alsatian youth who had no desire either to study at a Nazi university or to serve in the German army trickled over the demarcation line to the university in exile.

When all France was overrun in November, 1942, the Germans intensified their efforts to get the Alsatians to return. Representatives of the student groups were haled before the occupation authorities and given an ultimatum. It was on one of these occasions that student is said to have answered, "My comrades and I would rather live in poverty with vanquished France than become servants of victorious Germany." Some arrests were made; persons disappeared—among others, Professor Hauter of the Department of Protestant Theology. When all this availed nothing, the Nazis abandoned their attempts to lure back their Alsatian "Volksgenossen" and employed their familiar methods of "annihilation" and "extermination." The Gestapo went into action.

At ten o'clock on the morning of December 2 an S. S. battalion armed with machine-guns seized the main building of the University of Clermont-Ferrand in the Avenue Carnot. All Alsatian students and professors found there, about five hundred, were rounded up.

Without even being allowed to get their coats and hats. they were forced to march out into the winter cold. holding their arms above their heads. A professor of Greek, M. Collomb, who refused to put up his hands, was shot on the spot. A professor of theology, M. Eppel, was mortally wounded. Toward evening the procession reached some barracks. There they found other hundreds in the same situation, for the Gestapo had raided not only the main building of the university but a halfdozen other schools-the physics and chemistry institutes, the law seminar, even the municipal library. What happened after that we do not know. Nothing has been heard from any of the persons arrested. The Alsatians who escaped arrest went into hiding. The next morning the Gestapo chief issued the statement: "The University of Strasbourg in Clermont-Ferrand is no more."

For the first time in this war Germany is experiencing a serious food crisis. At the beginning of the fall the weekly potato ration for the winter period was set at nine and a half American pounds, and the people were urged to buy their entire winter's supply at once, so far as that was possible, and to store it in their cellars. Special purchase stamps were given out for this purpose. But by the end of November it began to be apparent that the plan had struck a snag. First, further purchases of potatoes for storing were forbidden. Then came announcements that "the potato crop this year did not turn out to be as large as would have been desirable:" Finally all previous rulings were scrapped. The weekly ration was "revised"; cut almost in half to five and a half American pounds. But since then, in large parts of the country, even the allotted five and a half pounds a week has not been obtainable. In Dresden, for example, all through November the ration was reduced to three and a third pounds.

It is a safe conclusion that the sudden scarcity was due not only to the bad harvest but to the progressive loss of the Ukraine. We know how much the German regime had counted on the Ukrainian "bread basket"; at the least the armies on the eastern front were to be fed from it in 1944. In any case the potato shortage is a fact, and the Nazis face a food problem of serious proportions. For not only are potatoes an extremely important item in the people's diet, but they are also used extensively as fodder for animals. A decree published on December 23 states that "the poor potato crop makes it necessary to slaughter great numbers of pigs prematurely; if their slaughter were put off, the consumption of potatoes would be undesirably high." When the same necessity caused the same action to be taken during the last war, it was called "hog murder." And it is ironical that in the Nazi agitation of later years this "hog murder" was described as "a criminal Jewish trick" to ruin Germany.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Goya

THE COMPLETE ETCHINGS OF GOYA. Foreword by Aldous Huxley. Crown Publishers. $3.50.

F ALL the artists whose life and works have inspired a literature Goya perhaps stands first. Art critics and biographers are still examining into what manner of man this was, and what are the excellences of the work he has left us. Writers in very different fields still draw strength from Goya in the development of their own ideas. Ever since the first books appeared about him—Laurent Matheron's in 1858 and Charles Yriarte's in 1867—the publications of all sorts, commentaries, articles, even poems, which had to do with him have been endless and abundant. Some of them are influenced by the legend which accompanies him, some by historical considerations; some take the novel form; some—and perhaps the fewest—analyze his art; it is, of course, true that the best guide to understanding the art of a great artist is that artist's life.

The concept of what is characteristically Goyesque springs in all this literature, good and bad, from Goya's engravings. Their creator divided the most important of them into four groups, and gave those groups the following titles:

The Capriccios: these were printed between 1792 and 1799, and some 240 impressions were made of them.

The Art of Bullfighting: Goya printed this series himself, about the year 1815, but there is no record of the number of impressions made.

The Disasters of the War: these were printed in 1863, thirty-five years after Goya's death, and 500 sets were made of them.

The Proverbs (also called by the untranslatable title Los Disparates): the first 250 impressions were made in the year 1864 by the San Fernando Royal Academy of Fine Arts.

Earlier, Goya engraved copies of twenty-five of Velázquez's paintings (nine of these engravings have been lost), but though the work of Velázquez left a profound mark on Goya's painting, it had no effect on his black-and-white.

In one of the hundred and thirty-odd letters written to his friend Don Martin Zapater, Goya told him, "My teachers were nature, Rembrandt, and Goya." This he said in explaining the aesthetic orientation of his engravings. There is no better analysis. If we try to go farther back, we very quickly find that the three cardinal points on which the engravings rest are Goya's eyes, his magical temperament which put something of himself into everything he touched, and the art of Rembrandt, which also moved within the engraving method. Madrid still preserves a magnificent collection of the Dutch master's prints, which Goya must have studied with the utmost care. But unlike Rembrandt, Goya was too restless, too dynamic in temperament to squander time tracing an infinite number of delicate lines on a copper plate for the purpose of getting the shadings, the translations from white to black which he desired. So he invented the resin bath called "aquatint"-resin dust sprinkled on copper plate leaves small free points which, when the acid bites into them, gives those deep or delicate grays which form his backgrounds. This new method is so characteristic of the technique of Goya's engravings that Plate 32 of the Capriccios is in itself sufficient to acquaint one with the quality of the prints.

The eighty Capriccios form a kind of intimate diary of one period of the artist's life. In them Goya took the lid off his passions, and with an irony which was at times both brutal and bloody, criticized the society he was then occupied in painting. Kings and nobles, priests, politicians, friars, light women, witches, devils, and common people move in and out of the series, exhibiting the vices of their souls as well as of their bodies. The strangest of compositions carry the most confusing of legends under them, for Goya was intent on cloaking these Capriccios in mystery, and in spite of the most meticulous searching of scholars, the mystery still holds. We assume that the famous Duchess of Alba, King Charles IV, his licentious consort Queen Maria Louisa, the enfant terrible Ferdinand VII, the court ministers, the sages, churchmen, and even the social concepts of the period appear and disappear in these Capriccios. It is not impossible that those two subtle writers, Cean Bermudez and Moratín, who were both friends and models for Goya, may have added the richness of their ideas to this work—a work drawn with such spiritual violence and monstrous exaltation that it became the forerunner of the school of caricature favored by graphic newspaper commentators throughout the nineteenth century.

The Capriccios were followed by the Art of Bullfighting, which is an engraved history of that art in twenty prints. We do not know whether, as the legend claims, Goya actually took part in a bullfight, but Moratín wrote in 1825, "Goya says he was a bullfighter in his day, and that with a matador's sword in hand he fears no one, and this in spit of the fact that he will be eighty in two months." It can be added that he understood the fine points of bullfighting perfectly and delighted in drawing them. Some of the prints in this series are among the most beautiful of all his etchings.

The Disasters of the War were inspired by Napoleon's invasion of Spain. It is more than possible that Goya made this group of eighty war prints as a relief and an outlet for the saddest moments of his existence. His eyes saw no theatrical brilliance in those triumphant marches, that military heroism. His eyes saw misery, ruin, maledictions, hatred, death; and Goya gave up all the comforts of his charming Palacete on the outskirts of Madrid and installed himself alone in a small workshop in a humble city street. There, like an old sorcerer manipulating acids, he went on engraving destruction, fire, crime, blood, rapine, disease, and hunger. He watched the Spanish people struggling for their independence, and out of an interpretation of their anguish came a prophecy for the future. Print number 78, which shows a horse attacked by mad dogs while other dogs sit by and watch, is entitled "He Defends Himself Well,"

French writers of the middle of the last century explained that the meaning of the print was to be found in the situation of the Spanish people, then attacked by foreign armies with the approval of powerful countries which prevented Spain from defending itself. The bit of history which Goya saw in 1808 was repeated with great violence in 1936.

After the Disasters of the War, Goya engraved the Proverbs, or Los Disparates. Surely he was trying to blot out the memory of that enormous tragedy by plunging into a world of fantasy, of absurdity, of the beautiful and mysterious pirouette which by saying nothing says everything.

The latest edition of these four groups of engravings was made in the midst of the horrors of war, in Madrid in 1937, and may with good reason be called extraordinary. Five copies were made on special Japanese paper as a way of bidding farewell with all due honor to the famous engraved copper. For, as the head of the printing house—La Calcografia Nacional—which had cared for them for some thirty years wrote at the time, the present state of the copper plates does not permit the making of more prints without danger of destroying the engraving.

This work of Goya, together with thirty-nine other prints, carefully reproduced, has been made into a beautiful book by Crown Publishers. In a prologue Aldous Huxley gives us a brilliant impression of Goya, his restless temperament, and the manner in which he made these engravings. It is very laudable that now, when the present bloody regime in Spain has dedicated itself to the destruction of Spanish art and artists—an art and certain artists that are universal—the United States should have undertaken to spread Goya's fame abroad.

LUIS QUINTANILLA

Post-War Primers

ROAD TO PEACE AND FREEDOM. By Irving Brant. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.

BUILDING FOR PEACE AT HOME AND ABROAD. By Maxwell S. Stewart. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

DOTH these brief volumes are intended to chart a way out of the maze of inconsistencies and confusion which threatens to entrap the mind of the average American before this war is even won. The first book attempts to solve this dilemma by reducing the world problem to American political terms; the second attempts to solve it by expanding the American problem to world economic terms.

Mr. Brant, basing his argument on what appears to be somewhat hurried research, arrives at the optimistic conclusion that "the only ultimate choice which exists for the United States today is between socialism and capitalism regulated for the benefit of society." His chapters on North Africa, Occupied Europe, and China are too brief to be anything but superficial, but they are fundamentally sound. His chapters on Foreign Policy, State Department, and Russia are much better for being longer.

After surveying the State Department's bungling of our political warfare to date, Mr. Brant, who is the Washington correspondent of the Chicago Sun, concludes that "the department cannot be trusted to make decisions, cannot even be relied upon to furnish the simplest factual information, in matters most vitally affecting the destiny of the world." I question, however, that our disastrous foreign policy is merely the consequence of an "ideological conflict between the democratic President and his anti-democratic State Department." I think Mr. Brant has too much faith in Mr. Roosevelt's "democratic principles and his understanding of the menace of fascism," and too glibly excuses the President for his share in the shameful political role our government has been playing in North Africa and Italy.

In regard to Russia, he capably synthesizes the many arguments pro and con; and without overlooking the shortcomings of Soviet foreign policy concludes: "The revised record does not prove Soviet Russia's trustworthiness in the postwar world, but it strips away some false ideas of past untrustworthiness, and tends to show that the Russians are not so different from ourselves where the safety of their country is concerned." In attempting to rationalize Russia's territorial ambitions, however, he sometimes ventures a little beyond his depth, as when he states that northern Bukovina was occupied "in 1939 . . . to give Soviet Russia and Czechoslovakia a common boundary. . . ." (Actually, Bukovina was not occupied until June 27-30, 1940, when Czechoslovakia had ceased to exist and when the Sub-Carpathian Ukraine had been occupied by Hungary.) In any event, says Mr. Brant, Russia after the war will be so powerful that she "can rule all Europe by force if she so desires." But he doesn't think she will, because her "dependence upon the American machine-tool industry . . . in the ten years following the war will offer a firmer guaranty against revolutionary intrigue than the dissolution of the Comintern."

Mr. Stewart, dealing with less controversial materials than Mr. Brant, proceeds on more solid ground. His book is addressed "to the common man—to 'Jim Hogan,' " and is a summary of the means of attaining "two practical and immediate goals: (1) the provision of jobs for all Americans who want work after the war; and (2) the prevention of World War III."

In discussing the many post-war reemployment programs, he opens some very encouraging vistas. Agricultural acreage, he believes, could and should be doubled, which would ultimately engage or reengage several million workers; at least two million additional men could be employed for years in providing us with adequate housing; and expanded health, education, and recreation projects could easily absorb a million more. But how is it all to be paid for? Mr. Stewart skilfully explodes the many myths which confuse our postwar thinking, among them the myth that governmental fiscal policy has to obey the shibboleths of private finance. He holds with Alvin Hansen of Harvard that post-war depressions can be avoided "by a carefully planned program of combined consumer and public spending," and with Mordecai Ezekiel of the Department of Agriculture that the secret of maintaining employment is to keep wages high and prices low-by means of government subsidies, if necessary -thereby preventing "the accumulation of surplus buying power in the hands of a few." He summarizes and criticizes these and other plans-including those put forward by David Prince of General Electric, the magazine Fortune, and industry's Committee for Economic Development-showing how they can all be combined and rationalized if only the

ONE VICTORY FOR HITLER?

Of all Hitler's grandiose and megalomanic ambitions, he retains only one—the complete annihilation of the Jews of Europe. All his other ambitions he has had to abandon one by one, under the irresistible onslaught of the victorious armies of the United Nations. In his gloomy New Year's message he announced his intention to win one great victory this year—over the Jews! He declared: "Our whole life, our efforts and our existence must be directed to only one end . . . the complete extermination of Jewry all over Europe."

It is for that purpose that he set up an official "extermination commission," dedicated to murdering the Jews of Europe before the war ends. The number ulready murdered exceeds the combined total of all the United Nation's war casualties, with the exception of Russia and China. DEMOCRACY CAN AND MUST DENY HITLER THIS VICTORY!

In this late hour, the Emergency Committee is determined to multiply its efforts in order to obtain from the Government quick action to save the remaining millions of the Jewish people of Europe before the war is over. For there is definite danger that if it is not done now—swiftly—untold thousands of Jews will perish before victory is won.

This Committee Was Created to Speed the Rescue of the Jews of Europe . . . LET'S LOOK AT THE RECORD!

Our first achievement is the fact that we have proven to the world that the Jewish people in occupied Europe can be saved. It was for this purpose that the Emergency Conference of experts in diplomatic, military, economic and transportation fields was called. The participants, the most distinguished representatives and experts of all shades of American thought, reached the unanimous conclusion that the Jewish people of Europe could be saved.

This conviction was later confirmed when the epic story of how the Danish-Jewish population was saved came to the open.

We brought the problem of the Jewish disaster to the masses of American people by nation-wide advertising in the leading newspapers in this country, and through national and radio-broadcasts, books, periodicals and leaflets.

We organized mass expressions of public opinion demanding immediate action, through mass petition movement, mass rallies and dramatic pageants.

We organized the pilgrimage of five hundred Rabbis to Washington.

We obtained the cooperation of all faiths. A Week of Compassion and Prayer by the six thousand Christian Churches was organized.

We initiated the movement to pay tribute to Sweden and Denmark.

We organized the protest against the omission of the Jewish disasters from the Moscow statement on atrocities.

Now, we are able to state with satisfaction that the President, at his press conference on November 6 of last year, and Secretary Hull, in his last historic appearance before the joint session of Congress, specifically mentioned their concern with the Jewish tragedy. The ring of silence around the catastrophe of the Jewish people was broken.

Our offices and representatives in Washington and in London, in Palestine and Turkey, are urging the respective governments to undertake large-scale action to save the four million Jews in Europe's death trap.

More than that: In all our activities, we put forward as the first and most immediate demand, the creation of a specific Governmental Agency with the task of effectuating the rescue of the millions of Jewish people still alive in Europe.

Now in a bi-partisan resolution recommending such an agency has been passed in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Prominent men from all walks of American life testified before hearings of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House urging this resolution's passage.

The nation's press was unanimous in demanding the immediate passage of the resolution. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee has already unanimously approved it. We are confident that it will pass both houses of Congress in the very near future.

Last Monday opened the second session of the 78th American Congress. A unanimous public opinion should express its wish that this resolution be passed without delay, Wire or write your Senators and Congressmen. Request their cooperation.

ONLY BY SWIFT ACTION CAN WE WIN THE RACE AGAINST DEATH

You can do your part, too, to carry out our tremendous plan of activities. You can help us mobilize public opinion from coast to coast. You can help us keep alive our head-quarters in Washington, London, Palestine and Turkey to continue our work for meople in deepest agony and despair. You can help us to spread our appeal among many more millions of Americans in order to arouse them to their possibilities. It is imperative that we place this message in hundreds of newspapers throughout the country and through national hook-ups. For each day dooms thousands that might have been saved. This is truly a race against death.

We need your financial help immediately—NOW! You can sign your name below and enclose your contribution to speed the effectiveness of our work to save the Jewish people of Europe. Whatever you give is evidence of your conviction that human life is worth saving.

Emergency Committee to Save the Jewish People of Europe

EXECUTIVE BOARD

OO-CHAIRMEN: Dean Alfange, Peter H. Bergson, Louis Bromfield, Ben Hecht, Rep. Andrew L. Somers, Mme. Sigrid Undset.

VICE-CHAIRMEN: William S. Bennet, Konrad Bercovici, Jo Davidson, Oscar W. Ebrhorn, William Helis, Prof. Francis E. McMahon, Dean George W. Matheson, Herbert S. Moore, A. Hadani Rafaeli, John J. Smertenko, Lisa Sergio, Dr. Maurice William, Fletcher Pratt.

MEMBERS: Stella Adler, J. J. Amiel, Al Bauer, Y. Ben-Ami, A. Ben-Ellzer, Theodor Bennahum, Rabbi Philip D. Bookstaber, Bishop James A. Cannon, Jr., Lester Cohen, Babette Deutsch, Rep Samuel Dickstein, Nathan George Horwitt, E. Jabotinsky, Rose Keane, Emil Lengyel I. Lipshuts, Lawrence Lipton, Emil Ludwig, Gov. Edward Martin, Gov. J. Howard McGrath, Michael Potter, Victor M. Ratner, Curt Riess, Samuel Rosen, Arthur Rosenberg, K. Shridharani, Rabbi Eliezer Silver, Arthur Syzk, Irevin Tattel, Homas J. Watson, Alex Wilf.

TREASURER: Mrs. John Gunther.

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR: 8. Merlin.

SECRETARY: Gabriel Wechsler.

All accounts of this Committee are audited by the firm of Louis J. Yampolsky, C. P. A.

WON'T YOU HELP?

We operate solely through voluntary contributions. By your support will be determined the speed, scope and effectiveness of our fight to save the Jewish people of Europe.

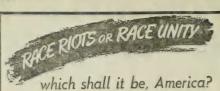

EMERGENCY COMMITTEE TO NA4
SAVE THE JEWISH PEOPLE OF EUROPE
1 East 44th Street, New York 17, N, Y.

I enclose my contribution to enable you to carry out your tremendous task in the sum of

Address....

[By a ruling of the Treasury Department, contributions to this Committee are tax exempt]

Please make checks payable to Mrs. JOHN GUNTHER. Treasurer

We must face the facts—the facts that prove the insincerity of our democratic claims of equality. This series of books mirrors the shortcomings in our relations with the Negro—shows why it has happened, and how we can proceed to practice the democracy we profess.

An American Dilemma

THE NEGRO PROBLEM and AMERICAN DEMOCRACY

By GUNNAR MYRDAL

Prof. Social Economy, University of Stockholm

An over-all study of the entire Carnegie study of the American Negro. "Exhaustive and objective . . . a real contribution. Recommended to all who take their 'American creed' seriously."—Library Journal. Just published! 2 vols., $7.50

The Negro's Share

By RICHARD STERNER
Noted Swedish Social Scientist

Job opportunities, housing facilities, public assistance made available to the Negro—reinforced by numerous tables to offer a shocking revelation. "Complete, authoritative and up-to-date information on the living standards of the American Negro."—Book-of-the-Month Club News. $4.50

Patterns of Negro Segregation

By CHARLES S. JOHNSON
Dean of Social Science, Fiske University

The disturbing facts about discrimination against the Negro in the armed forces, in industry, the professions, business, education, etc. "Scholarly and alive."—Survey Graphic. "Objective and comprehensive."—New Republic. $3.50

Myth of the Negro Past

By MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS, Ph.D. Prof. of Anthropology, Northwestern University

Overwhelming scientific evidence is here presented to refute widely accepted beliefs concerning Negro inferiority, a myth due chiefly to failure to appreciate the past of Negro civilization in its true light. "Absorbing and significant."—New York Times.

$4.00

Coming February 16th

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE AMERICAN NEGRO

Edited by Otto Klineberg. An evaluation of Negro intelligence, anthropometric measurements, and other aspects of psychological differences. $4.00

Note: The Negro in American Life Series

Order these books from your bookseller and irect from

HARPER & BROTHERS - 49 E. 33rd St. - New York 16

American public desires post-war security strongly enough to force our politicians to provide it. The extent of our international cooperation after the war, Mr. Stewart believes, will depend largely on how successfully we can put our own house in order. If we succeed, then there will be no insuperable obstacles to our taking the lead, with Britain and Russia, in organizing the world's economy so that a Third World War can be prevented.

The only trouble with this useful little book is a fundamental question which Mr. Stewart himself brings up in his concluding chapter. Will the average American, the "Jim Hogan" to whom Mr. Stewart speaks, be influenced by postwar primers such as these? Mr. Stewart has his doubts. "Experience has shown," he writes, "that [public complacency] is not likely to be jolted by intellectual appeals, whether they be presented in books, pamphlets, on the radio, or in the movies. . . ." In other words, simple, concise, well-reasoned books like these—books that should but won't be read by the common man—are doomed to insignificant sales, and will be read chiefly by persons who, like this reviewer, are already in essential agreement with their authors. And we need stronger meat.

Fiction in Review

IANA" by Martha Gellhorn (Scribner's, $2.50) is for me reminiscent of last year's "Tropic Moon" by the French writer Simenon, not only because both novels are triangular love stories of the French tropics and share a sophisticated concern for the way colored people are treated in the colonies, but because they both manage to achieve an emotional, almost a literary, effect quite beyond their literary merits. Possibly this is the result of their non-intellectuality -or rather, of their perfect blending of intellectual and emotional pitch. There is more atmosphere, for instance, in Miss Gellhorn's book than the author seems to work to produce, and more suggested meaning in the human relationships than characters such as hers usually yield. On the surface, or even several layers down, "Liana" is not much more than another stereotyped, not-so-lush-as-it-could-have-been narrative of tropical miscegenation: the richest white man of the island marries his mulatto mistress and then, neglecting her, loses her to the school teacher, also white but more decent; and even the fact that the novel ends with both white men becoming more interested in each other and in politics than in the girl can scarcely raise it to a level where, say, it would disturb its neighbors in a woman's magazine. Still, there are reverberations from Miss Gellhorn's simple story, as there were reverberations from Simenon's novel, which must be recorded on the credit side of the ledger; it is always a good thing when a novel gives off more effects than can be readily accounted for.

E. Arnot Robertson's "The Signpost" (Macmillan, $2.50) has the virtue of at least starting out as a war novel of the type which appears to be English bread and butter but which in my experience is not even caviar on the American war menu. I have not come across a single American novel which tries to say a word of truth about this war: those of our novelists who are concerned with the war either write elaborate fictions about this happy land worth dying for or take out their patrioteering in forced re-creations of the past, intended to prove that America through all its history has been whole-woven of the purest idealisms. But even second-string English novelists don't appear to feel the need to protest so much. Accepting their country, they acknowledge its faults, and they dare to speak up in the kind of criticism which novelists in this country seem to think is subversion; they even dare, like Miss Robertson, to uncover doubts in the mind of an R. A. F. flier. But, as I say, this distinction obtains in only the first chapters of Miss Robertson's book; for the rest of a long way "The Signpost" deserts the hear: of England at war for the heart of Ireland in uneasy peace—which is perhaps no less courageous but is certainly, in this instance, less interesting.

If Kay Boyle's "Avalanche" (Simon and Schuster, $2.50)
—it is extended from a Saturday Evening Post serial—had been content to be only what the slogan on the jacket describes, "a novel of love and espionage," I should be glad to accept it as simply another commercial exploitation of the drama of these hard times. I have never found it in particularly bad taste, nor an offense against the serious truth, that writers should spin adventure stories out of the struggles of the European undergrounds. But Miss Boyle's excursion into French anti-Nazi activities is offensive in the extreme against the serious truth because by the introduction of italicized passages of literary exaltation and by the parade of her whole familiar bundle of literary mannerisms she pretends to more and better than pot-boiling. Reality immediately asserts itself, in all its tragic grandeur, against such an encroachment.

Jesse Stuart's "Taps for Private Tussie" (Dutton, $2.50), winner of the 1943 Thomas Jefferson Southern Award, came out some weeks ago; it has not only sold many copies but received very special praise for its authentic American character and its ballad flavor. And you will remember Mr. Stuart, author of "Man with the Bull-Tongue Plough," for his reputation as a "native" writer, a poet who refuses to desert his land and its people. Well, to my taste, "Taps for Private Tussie," recounting the adventures of the Tussie clan when on the death of a son in service it inherits his $10,000 insurance, is an unpleasant comic strip of a book; its chief point seems to be the superiority of Mr. Stuart's reading public to those amusing Kentucky mountaineers who know no better than to live in animal squalor and by animal trickery and to squander their relief subsidies for moonshine. DIANA TRILLING

DRAMA

ART, mishandled, has with kickback that with shotgun would envy. And the drubbing that Maxwell Anderson has had from the reviewers of his latest play, "Storm Operation" (Belasco Theater), is as nothing to the beating he has taken from the Muse herself. Reverberations of the encounter came through in the form of newspaper bulletins about rewritings and a postponement. But Mr. Anderson's attempt at appeasement obviously didn't work; the Muse was not amused. Nor did the fact that Mr. Anderson meant well all the time save him, for the Muse is nothing if not vindictive. And the

THEY SHALL NOT SLEEP

by LELAND STOWE. Not only great war reporting, but a passionate and moving discussion of the peace that may or may not come—based upon what Stowe saw and learned in Burma, India, China, and Russia, and written, at last, without fear of foreign censorship. By the author of No Other Road to Freedom.

$\frac{\partial}{\partial} \text{9.00}$

A PREFACE TO PEACE

by HAROLD CALLENDER. A critical analysis of American foreign policy, as it was shaped, unshaped and misshaped in the prewar years, and as it is now being revised to meet our changing needs and the requirements of a durable peace. By a member of the New York Times Washington staff, $3.00

WORK AND PLAY

by JULES ROMAINS. The eleventh volume in the vast Men of Good Will. Europe in the mid-1920's, ... Outwardly quiet, inwardly the continent begins to seethe again. Meanwhile, elections, murders, speculation in stocks, divorces: the stuff of life between two wars.

THE RUSSIAN

by WALTER KERR. The former Moscow correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune presents the facts-and-figures story of the fabulous Red Army: its personnel, organization, training and equipment, 8 battlefront maps illustrate brilliant analytical descriptions of the battles for Moscow and for Stalingrad.

SEVEN MYTHS OF HOUSING

by NATHAN STRAUS. The First Administrator of the United States Housing Authority dispels many popular misconceptions on the subject of slum clearance and public housing and takes a strong stand on the controversial issues of government participation and postwar projects. $2.75

ALFRED · A · KNOPF

Invest in Victory with War Bonds

... A new kind of autobiography –
... by a Japanese anti-fascist –
... who is an important American artist.

New Sun

by TARO YASHIMA

• One of the most distinguished and moving books we have been privileged to issue during this war is the autobiography, in words and pictures, of a young Japanese liberal. Taro Yashima suffered jail and torture in his homeland because he championed, with his brush and his pen, the cause of the people against the militarists. He and his wife escaped to America, where he wrote and illustrated the story of his life — a book extraordinary not only for its beauty and simplicity but because it brings to America the first real news of the liberal underground movement in Japan.

"Surprising proof that a Japanese underground movement does exist."—N. Y. Post

"Taro Yashima is a fighter for democracy worthy to rank with his Japanese-American cousins battling the Nazis with the Fifth Army."—St. Louis Post

"It is a new kind of book, with something new to tell—something tremendously encouraging, something to renew hope and faith."—Oakland Post Inquirer

"An original and powerful work."—Boston Herald.
"A simple and moving document... The black-and-whites tell the story with eloquence."—N. Y. Times.

The publishers have issued, for Japanese-Americans, a booklet of the text of THE NEW SUN, in Japanese, keyed to the drawings on each page. It will be supplied free of charge to anyone who requests it with his order for THE NEW SUN.

$2.75 AT YOUR BOOKSTORE

HENRY HOLT AND COMPANY 257 FOURTH AVENUE • NEW YORK 10

NOW ON EXHIBIT . . . DRAWINGS by Taro Yashima in a one-man show at the A.C.A., gallery, 63 E. 57th St., N. Y., through January 29th. ruthlessness with which she trips him up, sends him stumbling into a cul de sac, and leaves him there is something to see.

As I have said, Mr. Anderson meant well. A good many months ago he paid a visit to the front in North Africa. He was greatly moved by his experience, particularly by the sight of plain ordinary American soldiers, in their infinite variety, going about their business in a strange land. Out of this reservoir of feeling and observation he has drawn a few characterizations that are authentic.

To the relatively pure gold of these characterizations Mr. Anderson added the dross of a plot having to do with military operations and a love story involving a sergeant and a nurse. This was legitimate. But Mr. Anderson made the fatal mistake of assuming that he could write a significant play without an idea or a point of view. And that is his undoing. Art, like nature, abhors a vacuum, and since Mr. Anderson had nothing to say, or chose to say nothing, about war in general or this war in particular, it was inevitable that the plot or the "love interest" would fill the void. The "love interest" wins. Instead of being, as it was obviously intended to be, a bit of sugarcoating, it gets completely out of hand and swamps the show. I have seldom heard so much talk about marriage even in a play ostensibly dealing with that great institutionand no play dealing directly with marriage would dare to discuss it on such a simple-minded level of "I'll keep house for you"-"You really want to keep house for me?" The scene of this play is an encampment at the front, but toward the end of the evening everyone on the stage is so engrossed in the marriage of the sergeant and the streamlined nurse that the spectator begins to wonder if the whole cast shouldn't be sent to some quiet sector behind the lines, say Hollywood, and a new one sent up to get on with the war. The final ludicrous impression is that what Maxwell Anderson brought back from his visit to World War II was a new belief inmarriage. No wonder I thought I heard the Muse chuckling in the wings.

There is some accurate reporting, especially in the first act, of the very elementary reactions of American soldiers to their experience, but we have heard them before from newspaper correspondents, and they are not put to any significant use. What is worse, one is never sure they are not Mr. Anderson's reactions, since he establishes no attitude of his own. The level of awareness and intelligence, in other words, is no higher than that of the least naive character in the play, and I find it difficult to decide who that was.

There is a "situation" between the American sergeant and an English captain which is further complicated in the most unlikely fashion by the fact that they are both in love with the nurse. The situation is duly resolved according to a pretty shopworn formula, and in the climactic scene the English captain, who is also a lord, performs the marriage ceremony by virtue of his having once studied for the ministry—which explains why he carries a Bible! There is a Frenchman whose "intensity" about the war is made light of, and an Italian prisoner who is presented in the, to me, infuriating stereotyped guise of an obsequious "wop" coward. Needless to say, he has a brother in America.

In performance "Storm Operation" exercises the same fascination as a slick bad movie. It didn't bore me. The settings are nicely suited to this exotic Arabian Nights war of Mr. Anderson's. The cast acts well and is in general well cast, though the nurse (Gertrude Musgrove) with her fashionable long back and her incredibly well-tailored and impeccably pressed slacks does seem a little out of place even in this incarnation of the North African theater. Myron McCormick, as the American sergeant who describes himself as a retired steel worker, brings more to the part as actor than he gets out of the script. And I quite fell in love with Cy Howard, whose part is mostly written in double talk. In my opinion he dies in vain. MARGARET MARSHALL

"Over Twenty-one" (Music Box) has become an established hit without the help of this column. It is the sort of play that was sure to succeed in this sort of season. The dialogue is funny-not subtle or witty but just funny. The total absence of plot is artfully concealed behind a lot of diverting activity. Things are always happening, absurd or comic or, just occasionally, rather moving things; and it is only afterward that you realize you have been lured into not noticing how little else the play has to offer. Such trickery is itself, of course, an evidence of superior craftsmanship. Between them, Ruth Gordon, who wrote the play and has the leading role, and George Kaufman, who directed it, know how to perform this kind of stage magic. By every gesture and inflection Ruth Gordon enriches her part. She knows how to be maliciously insinuating at one moment and artfully simple the next; she is at her best when she whirls into sudden violence. Her cast supports her well. The set is perfect—so innocently and nicely awful. Almost anybody would have a good time at "Over Twenty-one."

CONTRIBUTORS

JESSE LURIE, New York correspondent of the Palestine Post, worked as a newspaperman in Palestine for many years. At present he is writing a novel based on the experiences of an American soldier in Palestine.

EDITH M. STERN, a housewife and free-lance writer, is working on a manual for attendants in mental hospitals under the sponsorship of the National Committee for Mental Hygiene and the Commonwealth Fund. It is coming slowly, she reports, for the reasons mentioned in her article.

LUIS QUINTANILLA, eminent Spanish artist, served with the Loyalists during the war in Spain, and has been in this country since it ended. "All the Brave," a book of his war drawings, was published here in 1939.

LEIGH WHITE was a foreign correspondent for the Columbia Broadcasting System in 1941 and 1942, spending much of his time in the Balkans.

In early issues of The Nation "Persons and Places: The Background of My Life" By George Santayana REVIEWED BY NEWTON ARVIN "Where's the Money Coming From?" By Stuart Chase REVIEWED BY MORDECAI EZEKIEL

MOTION PICTURES

MERLE GEORGE

In 20th Century-Fox's masterpiece of murder mysteries with

SIR CEDRIC HARDWICKE

SARA ALLGOOD AUBREY MATHER

> Plus a Sensational IN-PERSON SHOW Chamber Music Society of Lower Basin Street Helen Forest

Now

Playing

7th Ave at 50th Street

Let's ALL Back the Attack! Buy War Bonds!

"A tremendously provocative film . . . absorbing in its revelations of character and its brilliantly pictorialized details."

-Bosley Crowther, N. Y. Times. ALFRED HITCHCOCK'S

TALLULAH BANKHEAD with WILLIAM BENDIX

MARY ANDERSON . JOHN HODIAK HENRY HULL = HEATHER ANGEL = HUME CRONTH . CANADA LEE

A Twentieth Century-Fox Picture

Continuous Performances ASTOR

B'way at 45th St .=

STAGE PLAY

"A definite hit . . . gay, glib, daffy - enormously funny."

RUTH GORDON IN A NEW COMEDY

WENTY-ONE MUSIC BOX, 45th St. W, of B'way. Cl 6-4636-Evgs, 8:40. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

BIRLINGAME

FILMS

ROCODILE tears over the alleged decline of Alfred Hitchcock have for years been a favorite cocktail among those who take moving pictures seriously. That has always seemed to me an impatient and cheap attitude to take toward any kind of change, or disturbance, in the work of a good artist. It still does. Nevertheless, because my space is limited, I am going to use it almost exclusively to specify things which strike me as limiting, or disappointing, about "Lifeboat."

The initial idea—a derelict boat and its passengers as microcosm—is itself so artificial that, like the problems set by keeping a story moving for two hours within a gunwale frame, it sets the whole pride and brain too sharply to work on a tour de force for its own sake.

These two handicaps, adequately undertaken, could have become leverages upon great advantages, working like, say, the formal stringencies of a sonnet.

It seems to me that the only way to counteract the basic artificiality and to bring it through to absolute success the more so when you count in the necessary stripping away of the sort of detail of streets, machines, garments which Hitchcock has a genius for putting to work—would have been through (1) an implacable physical and psychological realism, which was not attempted, (2) squeezing the poetic and symbolic power out of the final intensities of this realism—the essence of most good cinema—rather than tempering the realism to the allegory.

As allegory, the film is nicely knit, extensively shaded and detailed, and often fascinating. But the allegory itself is always too carefully slide-ruled. None of it gives off the crazy, more than ambiguous, nascent-oxygen quality of firstrate allegories like those of Shakespeare or Kafka or Joyce. And little of it effloresces into pure human or even pure theatrical emotion; it is too thought-out, too superficial, and too much in thrall to its somewhat sentimental intelligence. Though every performance has, within the limits which seem so arduously and coldly set, fine spirit and propriety, only William Bendix occasionally transcends those limits and becomes an immediate human being.

The handling of the cinematic problems is extremely astute, in spite of a smell of studio about most of it. But since too little was ventured of what followed as a logical obligation out of the root of the idea, it remains an interesting, disappointing demonstration of possibilities at a second or third remove. What disturbs me is the question whether Hitchcock recognizes this, as I would certainly be inclined to assume: or whether, like too many good but less gifted film artists, he has at last become so engrossed in the solution of pure problems of technique that he has lost some of his sensitiveness toward the purely human aspects of what he is doing. A friend of mine justly remarks that "Lifeboat" is more a Steinbeck picture than a Hitchcock. In "Shadow of a Doubt," too, I felt that Hitchcock was dominated by his writers. In his finest films he has always shown, always cinematically, qualities of judgment and perception which to my mind bring him abreast of all but the few best writers of his time, and which set him far beyond the need, conscious or otherwise, of going to school to anyone. But too many people rock "Lifeboat"; and they lull what had every right and need, if it were undertaken at all, to be a great and terrifying film. JAMES AGER

DANCE

THERE is a sharp difference between the utilization of unconscious forces in the creation of a work of art and the facile superimposition of psychoanalytic formulas on the material of art. The latter is a dead-end road which, like the earlier fad of "social significance," is unfortunately being followed by many practitioners of the arts. Its disastrous results in the field of the dance were tellingly demonstrated by Martha Graham's latest program.

If you can imagine three Borgias simultaneously wrestling with their pasts on a psychoanalytic couch, then you have "Deaths and Entrances," the major new offering of the evening, and a grueling exposition of female frustration. In a dumb-show display of case histories, the fury-driven protagonists react to each other on the same level but without any of the intentional irony of Thurber's characters in the War Between Men and Women. What is exhibited ultimately in this composition, as in "Salem Shore," a new and lengthy solo, is the narcissistic enjoyment of individual suffering. Here Miss Graham's fatal error is to confuse the dissection of the neurotic under layer with the discovery of the soul; the former is a clinical procedure, the latter a dynamic process

For— AN EXPERT ANALYSIS OF VATICAN POWER POLITICS— of the AIMS AND ACTIVITIES OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH
Subscribe to:
"THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC MAGAZINE" Edited and Published by a Group of Former Roman Catholic Priests
STRICTLY FACTUAL — CAREFULLY DOCUMENTED
SUBSCRIPTION ONLY $1.00 a Year (10 Issues)
Begin with the January Issue
Order Form:
THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC MAGAZINE, 229 West 48th Street, New York 19, N. Y.
Enclosed is $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC MAGNZINE.
NAME
ADDRESS
CITY ST.1TE

that cannot be achieved through the application of therapeutic techniques. Unlike the divine frenzy of the Maenads, Graham's possession derives from individual imbalance, and as it lacks divinity, it also lacks humanity.

Now the business of the choreographer is to create, to be a "maker," not of fragments, but of wholes; to create a form, a milieu in which actions occur, in which feelings are engendered-for the artist is not simply a window dresser filling space with articles of display. Moreover, although a single moment in a given composition may carry the germ of all that follows, in the complexity of a work of art there must be reference and cross-reference, a necessary and inevitable development, so that no isolated moment is complete until the whole is realized. Exhibitionism in the dance, as in the other arts, seeks merely to create an effect by display; it is not concerned with establishing that two-way flow between artist and audience in which a complete experience in a particular medium is communicated, an experience potentially as real as any in the everyday world. It is Miss Graham's indulgence in the exhibition of neurotic conflicts for purposes of display rather than of communication that marks her basic failure as an artist.

To turn to lighter subjects, "Punch and Judy," an earlier composition, has many agreeable moments, most of which are provided by Erick Hawkins's dancing. He alone of the entire company seems to derive pleasure from physical movement, which, all theories aside, is still the stuff of which the dance is prop-VIRGINIA MISHNUN erly made.

ART

ECHNICALLY one of the most gifted of all painters, Derain has always suffered from a bad character. His technical accomplishment is not merely a matter of dexterity: it is so solid and profound that it assimilates to itself some of the traits associated with genius. The Chardinesque frying pan in the 1939 "Still Life with Fish" (in the show of his work at the Pierre Matisse Gallery through January 29) is painted with what I can only call a purchase on the resources of his medium that no painter of the age can match. Yet the picture as whole suffers from a heavy matter-of-factness, numbness, which converts it into controlled demonstration of Derain's prowess and maneuver of his vanity. It fails to impress one as an end in itself. But tradition can at times humble Derain by the accumulation of its great examples and force him to paint on his knees in spite of himself. And certain mysterious aspects of nature quell his ego. His forest interiors, with their green-yellow gloom and scaffolding of brown tree boles, where light becomes one solid among others, show the artist mis à nu. The theme compels him to measure himself frankly against the past and to confess how much his art lacks the completeness which can only be attained by an infinity of reverberations. Derain's natural bent is toward an art rationally founded, breathing the sentiment of space defined by massive forms and impermeable surfaces, all organized in a clear, logical system. His most valid feeling is what might be termed the sentimentality of materialism, which Courbet had too. On the other hand, when he mistakenly follows the example of Cézanne, who ventured into a sphere where Cartesian logic and Newtonian physics cannot operate, Derain betrays his disorientation by his failure to concern himself with more than mere surface. His obtuseness is exposed by the very brilliance with which he achieves just what he has set out to do and no more. See the big brittle landscape called "Valley of the Lot at Vers," painted in 1912. As for Derain's portrait heads, much that is good in them is smothered by the ambition to contrive a new thrill out of the solid and the chic.

Derain's place in modern painting, as well as that of Vlaminck and Dunoyer de Ségonzac, has never been fixed satisfactorily. I think it can be said that all three of them are revising the academic or traditional in terms of some of the discoveries made by Cézanne. Abandoning the expanded color ranges they handled while Fanves, though retaining the higher color keys, they go back to the unity of tone of the old masters, whose range of values-or darks and lights-far exceeded their range of color intensities. The gradual transitions from value to value which were axiomatic for the old masters and expressed their sense of the unity of life are replaced by abrupt contrasts and broader and flatter definitions of values-which give the modern sense of the disunity of life and the superior unity of art. For modern art is able, apparently, to reconcile the most violent contrasts, something that politics, philosophy, and religion have been incapable of doing lately. Derain, Vlaminck,

FIRST AID

WRITERS STUDENTS TEACHERS

SPEAKERS LAWYERS LIBRARIANS EXECUTIVES . ETC.

To keep you well-informed and up-to-date, you need

FACTS-ON-FILE

World News Digest

Would you like to condense 100 hours of weekly reading into 30 minutes, without missing a single important fact or event? Do you wish to have every major subject and news event at your finger-tips-condensed, sorted, filed and indexed for ready reference? FACTS ON FILE does it for you by means of a weekly 8-page digest that covers world news in capsule form, stripped of verbiage, opinion, and

FACTS ON FILE Saves you Hours of Reading Time, Improves Your Fund of Knowledge, Gives you all the News of the World including World War II, National and Foreign Affairs, Latin America, Finance, Business, Arts, Education, Religion, Sports, Obituaries, etc., in handy reference form. Authoritative, concise, easy to read.

With FACTS ON FILE you can discard your clippings, notes, and stacks of magazines. Acclaimed a "MIRACLE OF CONDENSATION" FACTS ON FILE is endorsed by prominent leaders in all walks of life as invaluable for quickly locating facts, checking dates, figures, speeches, and names. Busy executives, speakers, governments, schools, libraries, business firms subscribe to FACTS ON FILE as the ONLY publication of its kind in America. Each weekly Digest comes to you with a Cumulative Index that keeps FACTS ON FILE up-to-date automatically.

SPECIAL OFFER

TRY FACTS ON FILE for 5 weeks for only $1.00 (value $2.50). Regular subscribers at $25.00 m year receive a handsome loose-leaf DE LUIM BUCKRAM BINDER FREE OF CHARGE (Size 9/4 x 11½ inches). Holds m year's supply of Digests and Indexes.

Send the coupon below with only $1.00 for special 5-weeks' trial, which includes latest Quarterly Index FREE OF CHARGE.

FACTS-ON-FILE "THE NEWS OF THE WORLD IN CAPSULE FORM" 516 5TH Ave., New York 18, N. Y.

☐ I enclose $1.00 for Special 5-weeks' trial service to FACTS ON FILE, which entitles me to latest 22-page Quarterly Index FREE

Name				۰	٠			٠		۰						۰	•		۰
Address														۰	0		۰				,

and Ségonzac are thoroughgoing conservatives in every respect except their art, and even there they are not by any means radicals. The narrowness of their palettes manifests their concern with unity and order. Their painterly virtues lie in the manipulation of values, not of color. They may flavor their painting occasionally with a pinch of intenser color-Vlaminck being the most daring in that he imposes his system of values over two or three intense colors and sometimes even expresses value by intensity-but essentially, they are what can be called, for lack of better terms, "tonalists." CLEMENT GREENBERG

MUSIC

CHICAGO reader, who reports that the Chicago Public Library has many of the books of David Ewen and those of Sigmund Spaeth, Charles O'Connell, Deems Taylor, etc., but does not have, among others, Tovey's "Essays in Musical Analysis" and some of Ernest Newman's books, goes on to make this comment: "But the influence of the first group is not permanent. I know; for I devoured all of them, adopted their opinions about music I hadn't heard often or at all, and discarded them just as quickly as I began to use my ears and intelligence." The comment establishes one rather important fact-that the critic is subject to check by his reader, or at any rate by the reader who, in the words of my correspondent, "listens to music with good ears and a sound mind." It is, indeed, from this check that the critic gets or fails to get his authority as critic with his reader. One critic likes Toscanini and not Koussevitzky while another likes Koussevitzky and not Toscanini; the reader then listens for what, in the performances, each critic says he hears and likes or dislikes: he finds it or doesn't find it, agrees with the critic's reasons for liking or disliking it or doesn't agree; and he decides after a sufficient number of instances which critic has and which has not the perception, insight, and understanding that are what give him authority.

When Virgil Thomson remarks that Mitropoulos has taken over the New York Philharmonic like an army of occupation, or that Stella Roman doesn't sing in phrases but only in single notes which she exploits with a spectacular technique of crooning and crescendo, a reader with ears and intelligence can listen to a Mitropoulos or Roman performance and hear what the statement describes; and he will feel pleasure and gratitude for the brilliantly expressed perception which has increased his own understanding. When Mr. Thomson says Toscanini's tempos are a shade fast the reader can sometimes hear confirmation of that. But when Mr. Thomson works out a demonstration that Toscanini's performances have meter but not rhythm, the same reader will listen to a performance and hear the fact that contradicts the demonstration. Or when Mr. Thomson writes that Toscanini's performance of Beethoven's Seventh was a mere highly dramatized outline taken at too fast a pace for the orchestra to execute detail with clarity, and that in the performance of the Missa Solemnis "there was no continuity in dynamic gamut" but instead a constant "unsubtle contrasting of force with weakness," the reader will hear in the one performance the clearly executed detail, in the other the "continuity in dynamic gamut" wherever Beethoven asks for it. And having heard, the reader will decide that there is no profit for him in either the pat schematizations about Toscanini's work as it is in Mr. Thomson's imagination, or the reports of concerts at which Mr. Thomson hears not what happens in Toscanini's performances but what should happen to fit the pat schematizations.

But not all readers have good ears and strong minds; and there are occasions when these are not enough. For example, Mr. Thomson makes the statement that the Boston Symphony, Philadelphia, and New York Philharmonic orchestras are as different from one another as the cities that created them and forged them slowly into the image of each city's intellectual ideals. Conductors have been had in to aid this formation, and a few of these have left traces of their own taste on that of the cities they have worked for. But chiefly their function has been to care for a precious musical organism . . . and to allow it to mature according to its own nature and . . . its community's particular temperament. . . . [Of] Boston, the intellectually elegant and urbane, [the orchestra] makes thin sounds, like the Paris orchestras, thin and utterly precise, like golden wire and bright enamel. Nothing ever happens that isn't clear. . . . So perfectly turned out is any of its executions that, whether becoming to the work or not, it has way of separating itself from it. It neither conceals the work nor presents it; it walks down the street beside it, rather very much as piece of consummate dressmaking will sometimes do with the lady who thinks she is wearing it . . .

To cope with and evaluate this statement, a reader would have had to hear the completely different sounds, styles, and characters of the 1917 Boston Symphony conducted by Muck, the post-1920 Boston Symphony created and conducted by Monteux, the post-1924 Boston Symphony re-created and conducted by Koussevitzky, or the New York Philharmonic conducted by Toscanini and the same orchestra the next week under another conductor; he would have had to understand from all this a great deal about the functioning and relations of orchestras and conductors: he would. then, have had to know that the 1917 orchestra of Boston did not make thin sounds like golden wire, and that the sounds it did make were dictated by the temperament not of Boston but of Karl Muck. And a reader would need such experience and understanding, in addition to good ears and mind, in the other instances where the general cultural and social background to which Mr. Thomson relates the musical phenomenon under discussion is a magician's hat into which he can put fact and perception, and out of which he then can pull the oddly, amusingly fantastic products of a mind at play that are suitable for tossing about in cocktail-hour chit-chat, or the serious conclusions-in the articles about the New York Philharmonic a couple of years ago, for example-that have no more relation to realities.

Into a discussion of things of this world as they exist and happen Mr. Thomson disconcertingly introduces, as though they were equally real, things from some private world as he would like them to exist and happen. Thus, he writes hard-headedly that the Metropolitan management is paralyzed by its fear of its intellectual inferiors instead of being animated by a fear of its intellectual betters; that the opera house is acoustically poor and inefficient and expensive to operate; but that first-class opera has been given there and can be given there again. But then he adds that first-class opera will be demanded by the nation-wide radio public after the war-this radio public demanding the first-rate being one that exists only in the Thomson world, in which there are American composers ready for a New York Philharmonic five-year plan to build an American repertory for an American audience, and other things of the sort. The mixture of real and unreal is disconcerting; but the worse trouble is that it often takes an experienced reader to be disconcerted.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Why Is It?

Dear Sirs: You will be interested in . speech by Dr. Francis E. McMahon delivered on Saturday evening. December 11, 1943, before the Calvert Club, a Catholic organization composed of students of the University of Chicago, to which he was appointed after his ouster from Notre Dame. As closely as I remember them, his words were as follows: ". . . Why is it that so many of our great Catholic thinkers have been so wrong about so many things so much of the time [Franco, Russia, etc.]. whereas periodicals like The Nation and the New Republic, which by no stretch of the imagination may be called in viewpoint Catholic, have been so consistently right in calling the shots? Because our thinkers, given to dealing cleverly and logically in easy generalities like 'Love good and shun evil,' have not developed the knack of evaluating the concrete situation for what it implies here and now the way these periodicals have. It is not enough to state an ideal belief or general truth. The test is in the concrete situation. How will you behave there? How must you evaluate it now? The Nation and New Republic do these things remarkably well. We don't-and err to the great harm of our nation and church.'

Somewhere in Pennsylvania, January 3

Hague and Longo

Dear Sirs: Mr. Coleman's splendid article on John Longo and Frank Hague was an indictment of power politics and "party loyalty" not soon to be forgotten. As long as such a situation exists in this country we are in no position to teach democracy to those unfortunate countries which do not know its "blessings."

I deeply regret that the number of persons who read this article will run only into the thousands instead of the millions. The American mind may be politically sluggish; however, it is situation like this that can rouse the public out of its lethargy long enough to demand punishment of all such Gauleiters.

I fail to see how Franklin Roosevelt—party affiliations notwithstanding—can sit idly by and look above and beyond Hague's dictatorship. When I was in school I was duly impressed by our Bill of Rights. Does it still exist? Apparently not. The President should, if necessary, call into use federal troops and investigators to wipe out Hagueism and all its manifestations. If the government would prepare the case, even Hague's own judges could do nothing but junk the machine.

HERBERT TURMAN Los Angeles, Cal., January 16

Locations Given

Dear Sirs: In his review of my book "Georges Seurat" (The Nation, December 25) Clement Greenberg observes that "as a matter of editing, the locations of the works reproduced should have been given." May I say that, as a matter of reviewing, Mr. Greenberg should have studied my book more carefully; he would have found in the List of Illustrations (pp. XI-XVI) not only the locations of the works reproduced, but also their size and medium.

JOHN REWALD

New York, December 27

Guilty.—c. G.

One of the Unrecognized

Dear Sirs: As just an unknown one among the "unrecognized allies" I wish to thank you for the publication of Kurt Grossman's article in your issue of December 11.

I am only one among many who have felt deeply hurt ever since Pearl Harbor. We were eager to serve this country in one way or another, and, with the exception of our boys, who are subject to the draft, we were excluded from all activities connected with the war

More recently some fields have been opened even to us, but I for one have lost most of my enthusiasm. Not that I am not doing anything at all: besides buying bonds regularly I have donated one gallon of blood, and I continue to donate regularly. But I am still classified as an enemy of this country, though I left Germany because the Nazis were my enemies and I was theirs.

In this connection I would like to answer an argument which is frequently raised by Americans to whom we present our plight. "But look how the Germans are treating the Americans!" they tell us. I would like to say to that, that the Nazis make very good use of any American whom they find sympathetic to their cause. Fortunately, there are not many of the caliber of Bob Best, but the Nazis are treating them as valuable friends. I am sure that many among us could render services just as valuable to the government of this country if only we were allowed to do so.

In closing I would like to call attention to the fact that even parents whose sons have given their lives do not lose their enemy-alien status.

ALIEN OF ENEMY NATIONALITY Allston, Mass., January 5

In Defense of Manualists

Dear Sirs: I yield to no one in my admiration for Mr. Kronenberger's reviews. I still feel that the job he did some years ago on Woollcott's fatuous "Reader" is the most deservedly devastating review I have ever read.

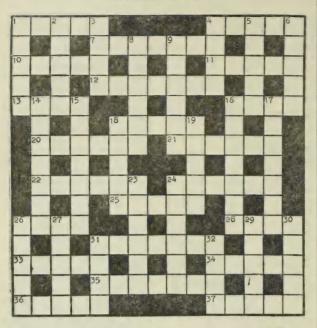

But he was too hard upon the academic handbook writers in the first paragraph of his otherwise excellent review of "The Reader Over Your Shoulder" in The Nation of December 11. Not all of them are such pedants as he insists they are; in fact, some of them are broad-minded and even charming. The perhaps unintentional effect of his review is certainly to place even the worst professional writers of handbooks of composition head and shoulders above such helter-skelter amateurs as Graves and Hodge.

I have room for only one exception to his stern generalization. Foerster and Steadman, in their "Writing and Thinking," list "enthuse" as a colloquialism, or informal English. On page 333 they record the colloquial use of "kind, sort" as plurals. Nowhere do they, or any of their colleagues, stamp colloquial English as bad English. Neither of these competent writers would, I am sure, welcome "motivate" any more willingly than does Mr. Kronenberger. Nor would they confuse "affable" with "friendly." Of course, Mr. Kronenberger has particular culprits in mind, no doubt; but he should choose more convincing examples of pedantry and cease to beat all manualists with the same stick. L. R. LIND

Lawrence, Kan., January 1

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 48

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 There may be one or two "gees" in this vehicle
- 4 Good at golf-bad at sea
- Its meaning is hard to understand 10 "Golden lads and - - - - all must, As chimney-sweepers come to dust" (Cymbeline)
- 11 That clinches it 12 "A brief summary of the news," perhaps
- Source of a certain kind of beer
- 16 Four letters of introduction 18 A double sheet, but not for a bed 20 People here? No, a stone
- You may get blamed for this
- 22 Steeled
- In the circumstances you can scarcely overlook this
- Held by the merry
- You don't consult an oculist if it is constantly before your eyes A situation for builders
- Tenacious hangers-on
- Tomorrow it will be yesterday
- 34 Common sense
- 35 Tea tile (anag.)
  36 This vision may be armed 37 Excuses that just fail to satisfy

DOWN

- 1 A case of risking the stake for one's convictions
- 2 Dress on nothing! A screen star shows you how
- 3 Follow this guide when in doubt
- 4 Here is what you want
  5 He may lose his heart, but if he loses his head it will be all over

- 6 Like every coin in your pocket
- 8 A suit presser
  9 The perfect island state of Sir Thomas More's political satire
- 14 The oilman's a Turkish subject, it
- appears A Chinese puzzle
- 16 Weighty gifts
- 17 A peculiar start to a scrap 18 Must consist of at least four men for keeping accounts
- Moist (anag.)
- Face about Sergeant-Major! Choose or choice-with or without the first letter
- Not doomed but made much of
- American author-statesman in residence
- A publication to come out
- These jugs don't sound like mine It kept the hound of old in check
- 32 Requires one or two to make a dance

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 47

ACROSS: - 1 MILLENNIUM; 6 BARN; 10 CACKLES; 11 CHATEAU; 12 INKSTONE; 13 OVATE; 15 YIELD; 17 IN DIALECT; 19 TOLERANCE: 21 ACORN: 23 ROCKS: 24 BASSINET: 27 OARLOCK: 28 NET SALE; 29 SLOE; 30 CROSSWORDS.

DOWN:-1 MACE; 2 LICENSE; 3 EBLIS; 4 NESTORIAN; 5 UNCLE; 7 AVERAGE; 8 NAUSEATING; 9 PANORAMA; 14 MYS-TERIOUS; 16 DERISION; 18 DRESSINGS; 20 LOCARNO; 22 OPEN AIR; 24 BAKER; 25 IN TOW; 26 NEWS.

For the Record

Dear Sirs: Unreconstructed newspaper publishers no doubt will get their freedom-of-the-press wind up (and how it can how!!) over an item in In the Wind in The Nation of January 1 which implies that the Newspaper Guild, in retaliation for the dismissal of a "liberal columnist" by the Lynn (Massachusetts) Telegram-News, caused the firing of a purveyor of "anti-New Deal, anti-Semitic, anti-Russian propaganda" by refusing him Guild membership under a "closed-shop contract."

The facts, which too many publishers still do not choose to believe, are that under its constitution the Guild can bar no eligible persons from membership because of anything they may write for publication, no matter how offensive it may be to the Guild or to any of its members. Furthermore, the Lynn contract is a Guild shop contract, under which eligible employees of the paper must be Guild members, but which does not control the publisher's personnel employment policies.

Frederick W. Enwright, publisher of the Lynn Telegram-News, has himself testified to these facts. In a letter to George A. Harris, New England regional vice-president of the American Newspaper Guild, he said, re the piece in In the Wind: "These two individuals submitted features for our Sunday paper . . . [but] were not employees of this company, and their severance had absolutely nothing to do with the Guild or its contract with this management. I also wish to refute the statement in The Nation that the Guild contract is a 'closed-shop' contract and that the Guild 'had served notice on the publisher.' I know full well that I have the right to hire and fire under the contract, and the Guild shop is a modified form of the 'union shop.'"

WILBUR H. BALDINGER, Editor, Guild Reporter

New York, January 7

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

Economics of Military Occupation: Selected Programs. By Henry Simon Bloch and Bert F. Hoselitz. Foundation Press, Chicago. $1.25.

A Preface to Peace. By Harold Callender. Knopf, $3.

The American House. By Virginia Chase. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.75.

China Handbook, 1937-1943: A Comprehensive Survey of Major Developments in China in Six Years of War. Compiled by the Chinese Ministry of Information. Macmillan. $5.

THE Vation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 158

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 29, 1944

NUMBER 5

	I	N	T	H	IS	IS	SI	UE
--	---	---	---	---	----	----	----	----

THE SHAPE OF THINGS	113
EDITORIALS
Bankers and Smugglers	115
Franco in Modern Dress	116
Fotich Should Resign by Freda Kirchwey	117
POLITICAL WAR
The Plot Against Yngoslavia by Boadan Raditsa	118

ARTICLES
Facts for Mr. Stimson by I. F. Stone	12
25 Years Ago in The Nation	12
A Settlement for Poland by Louis Witold	12
Rank-and-File Kilowatts by McAlister Coleman	12
In the Wind	12

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Art Young by Margaret Marshall	130
Santayana's Memoirs by Newton Arvin	131
Lend-Lease Saga by Alan Barth	132
Polls Versus Elections by James Loeb, Jr.	134
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling	135
Music by B. H. Haggin	137
Films by James Agee	137
CDOSS WOODD DITTTIE NO 40 by Jack Barrett	144

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 49 by Jack Barrett

Editor and Publisher FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Associate Editors

Assistant Editor N.
3. MITCHELL MORSE B.

Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Critic Drama Critic

AGGIN JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATH.

JONATHAN DANIELS
REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX

LOUIS FISCHER

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U.S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 55 Fifth Avc., New York 3, N.Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N.Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

IF THE INTENTION OF THE SENSATIONAL Pravda report was to test popular feeling in the Allied countries toward a separate peace, the Russians have their answer. The genuinely outraged tone of the English and American press and the tenor of comment, official and unofficial, should suggest to the men in the Kremlin that their suspicions are fantastic. They have been notified, in effect, that Winston Churchill, hero though he is, would be swept out of power in a day if he were to attempt on the eve of victory what Chamberlain did not dare to do on the brink of defeat. This notification-to Germany as well as to Russia-is a net gain no matter what motive inspired the Pravda story. As for the motive itself, we would welcome an end to speculation, and we prefer to do no guessing of our own. We can take with a bag of salt the official Russian protestation that the government had no prior knowledge of the Pravda report and nevertheless accept this explanation as a tacit admission that the Soviet government would like now to minimize the whole affair. It was a foolish and disruptive move, but if the Russians really want to bury the incident, their allies should do nothing to postpone the interment.

×

THE POSSIBILITY OF FAVORABLE ACTION IN Congress on the President's five-point program is, if anything, weaker than it was at the time his message was delivered. The Administration seems to be in process of winning some concessions on the renegotiation bill. The Senate Finance Committee has eliminated two of the provisions to which the President took exception-that exempting all standard commercial articles from renegotiation and that allowing court review of all contracts renegotiated. It remains to be seen what will happen on the Senate floor and in conference committee. On costof-living subsidies, the Administration has suffered a severe defeat in the ten-to-nine vote by which the Senate Finance Committee favorably reported the Bankhead bill after rejecting subsidy measures by Maloney and Taft. Maloney's bill would have allowed the expenditure of $1,500,000,000 on cost-of-living subsidies. After its rejection, Taft offered a compromise which would have made available $1,000,000,000 for food subsidies. The Bankhead bill is not an anti-subsidy measure. It would forbid subsidies to help hold down the cost of living but would continue special-interest subsidies to keep up the profits of the sugar growers and the producers of vegetable-oil seeds and fats. Prospects for a decent tax program are also black.

*

THE U. S. S. R. AND POLAND HAVE A JOINT interest in checking once and for all Germany's aggressive urge to expand eastward. Both countries need a prolonged period of peace to recover from their wounds and to carry out the colossal tasks of reconstruction. They have, therefore, as Louis Witold points out on page 125, a common interest in reaching a permanent settlement of their historic dispute. But such a settlement must be one that the public opinion of the world will ratify. It cannot be an imposed settlement, for the mortar of force is the least durable of cements. In the light of such considerations we are bound to deplore the recent tactics of the Soviet government. The power and prestige of the Russian state are now unassailable; the validity of its claims to a large part of the disputed territory cannot be denied; its disgust with the conduct of the Polish government in exile, and the shadow Cabinet of militarists which largely controls that regime, is understandable. Nevertheless, we believe that Moscow has weakened a strong case by its attempts to dictate a solution. Surely, it would have buttressed its position if in reply to the latest Polish declaration it had stated that, since it had not been able to reestablish diplomatic relations with the Polish government, it was willing to accept Anglo-American mediation on the border question, provided that the Curzon Line was agreed upon as the basis of negotiation. But instead of forcing the Poles off the fence it indulged in rhetorical denunciations of their bad faith and rejected by implication the proffered good offices of the Western powers. Thus it increased the suspicion that it intends to settle the Polish question by installing a government of its own choice. We should be sorry to see the Soviets imitating our own North African experiments in puppetry.

*

IN NORTH AFRICA THE BEST-LAID PLANS OF mice and diplomats appear to be suffering their proverbial fate. For more than three years American and British statesmen plotted the political elimination of General De Gaulle, resorting to every trick in the diplomatic code to discredit him, and a few tricks outside the code. Yet never have the General's prospects looked as bright as they do at this moment. So cordial was his conference with Churchill at Marrakesh last week that Algiers is rife with reports that the British are prepared to extend greater degree of recognition to the Committee of National Liberation. The return to Washington of Edwin C. Wilson, American diplomatic representative to the Committee, is interpreted as a preliminary move to obtain American agreement. Two factors stand out in the sudden reversal of policy. First, information from France has convinced the Allied leaders that no alternative group within the country has the prestige to govern even provisionally, once the armies of liberation march in; and, second, if an attempt is made to foist any other administration upon the French people, in the name of expediency, civil war is inevitable, with at least local Communist successes practically assured. This last possibility may go far, incidentally, to explain the coolness that has arisen between the Communists and the Committee in Algiers. Churchill is said to have remarked jokingly to De Gaulle at Marrakesh: "I see you have now become a parliamentarian." The change may lie with De Gaulle-or then again it may be that Churchill's vision has grown more acute. The point can be left to historians as long as the breach is healed, but this calls for a change of heart in Washington as well as in London.

ON APRIL 1 NEXT, BARRING SOME ACTION by the British government, Palestine will become forbidden territory for thousands of Jews. Under the terms of the White Paper of 1939, the transitional five-year period during which 75,000 immigrants were to be admitted will then expire, and the Arab community will thenceforth be able to exercise a veto power on the entry of further Jewish settlers. The fact that some 30,000 of the 75,000 permits are still to be issued affords a hope of temporary relief but it does not affect the vicious principle formulated by the White Paper. That principle is in total opposition to those of the League of Nations Mandate under which Britain governs Palestine and it is condemned by all sections of Jewry, Zionist and non-Zionist alike. The latest proof of this fact is offered by the memorandum presented last week to Lord Halifax, the British Ambassador in Washington, by the American Jewish Committee. This organization is not, as its statement made clear, an advocate of a Jewish state. But it insists that Palestine must be kept open as a haven for the Jews and that the sole criterion for Jewish immigration must be the principle laid down by the Mandate -the economic absorptive capacity of the country. The American Jewish Committee has also reminded the British government that Article 15 of the Mandate prohibits discrimination of any kind between the inhabitants of Palestine, while under the White Paper discrimination is being practiced against Jews in the matter of land purchase as well as immigration. Prime Minister Churchill knows that the White Paper was a breach of faith; his strong condemnation of it is a matter of record. But while he allows a clique of reactionary colonial officials to decide the policy of his government he cannot escape responsibility.

IN "THE CASE OF THE HOPKINS LETTER" A big-name cast is being shamefully wasted on a distinctly Class B mystery. The heavy-handed plot revolves about a letter from Harry Hopkins to Dr. Umphrey Lee, president of Southern Methodist University and supposedly an aspirant to Tom Connally's seat in the Senate. The letter, which falls into the hands of C. Nelson Sparks, a McCormick Republican and sworn enemy of Mr. Willkie, informs Lee that Willkie is to be the 1944 Republican choice and promises Lee "good cooperation from that quarter." Sparks and Senator Langer read in this message a conspiracy to rig the next election so that both parties will present "internationalist" candidates, and incidentally to send Texas Republicans into the Democratic primary in order to purge Connally. Langer harangues the Senate on this diabolical plot, which he interprets more fundamentally as a British attempt to reverse the outcome of the Revolutionary War. In the meantime Hopkins, with the aid of the Department of Justice, has exposed the letter as a forgery, and the Sparks-Langer crowd, in an uncomfortable position, try to pin the crime on Harold Ickes, who, Sparks reveals, harbors a burning grudge against his New Deal colleague, Mr. Hopkins. The plot grows sicker as Sparks produces letters addressed to him by George N. Briggs, one of Ickes's aides, who, it turns out, worked with Sparks in 1940 in behalf of the ultra-reactionary Frank Gannett. We won't tell you how the mystery ends, first, because we don't know yet, and, secondly, because the story is going down hill pretty fast. The solution now seems to revolve about the genuineness of certain letters alleged to have been addressed to Sparks by Briggs in which the writer remarks, "The forty bucks reached me. ... I am within a hundred bucks of my goal now." Which, in terms of melodrama, is a far cry from a conspiracy by George VI to snatch back the Thirteen Colonies.

CARLO TRESCA, TO HIS HONOR, WAS A political character. His assassination a year ago on January 11 was undoubtedly a political crime. And there is no question in our minds that the failure of the authorities to hunt down his assassin with the vigor and determination that they would devote, say, to finding the murderer of an Italian-American gangster has political significance. Carlo's overt enemies were fascists and neofascists, local, national, and foreign, who are still the objects of appeasement at home and abroad. We have no proof, of course, that this is the reason why his assassin has not been caught. But when an anti-fascist can be killed with impunity in the middle of New York City, we have a right to be suspicious, and the burden of proof rests not on us but on the officials charged with administering the American justice that Carlo Tresca fought so hard to make real.

Bankers and Smugglers

A TTORNEY GENERAL FRANCIS BIDDLE is to be commended on his courage in obtaining the indictment of the Chase National Bank and a prominent Belgian-Dutch diamond merchant. They are accused of participating in transactions which made it possible to smuggle industrial diamonds from Brazil and Venezuela to Japan, Italy, and Germany before Pearl Harbor. Transactions of this kind were violations of the Tradingwith-the-Enemy Act. Industrial diamonds are a strategic material of the greatest importance in war. Their exceptional and unequaled durability and cutting power make them ideal for the tips and surfaces of cutting tools and dies. Their use for this purpose serves immensely to speed operations in the manufacture of many weapons and other materials of war. The export of industrial diamonds without a license was forbidden by Presidential order under the Trading-with-the-Enemy Act in July, 1940. The funds used in the transactions which figure in these indictments had been frozen by Presidential order in May of 1940. In the light of these facts, the statement offered by Winthrop W. Aldrich in defense of the Chase Bank is hardly to the point. He said the transactions occurred before Pearl Harbor. This is merely to paraphrase the indictment, not to rebut it.

One aspect of these indictments has hardly been touched upon in the press. This diamond smuggling soon became known to every agency in Washington dealing with Latin American matters, though there seems to have been insufficient evidence for legal action. One of the agencies which were apprised of the facts was the Coordinator's Office for Inter-American Affairs. The head of this was and is Nelson Rockefeller, son of John D. Rockefeller, Jr., the dominant figure in the Chase Bank, Nelson is also the nephew of Winthrop W. Aldrich, chairman of the Chase board. Nelson's principal adviser in the Coordinator's Office was Joseph T. Rovensky, who has just resigned to resume his duties as a vice-president of the Chase National Bank. What we cannot understand is why these men were not asked to use their influence with the Chase Bank, either to answer the reports being made by intelligence agencies or to end the financial transactions which made the diamond smuggling possible.

This is the second such case brought to light. The other was that of the Lati Air Line, last Axis link with the New World before Pearl Harbor, a carrier to the Americas of spies, propaganda, and valuables stolen by the Nazis in their conquest of the Low Countries. The operations of this line were possible only because a subsidiary of Standard Oil of New Jersey continued to supply it with aviation gas in Brazil. Repeated requests from the State Department that sale of aviation gas to the Lati Air Line be discontinued were of no avail. Here again one wonders why Nelson Rockefeller could not have been requested to use his influence with his father, the dominant figure in Standard of New Jersey, to end this form of aid to the Axis. Similar questions were asked about Rovensky after the Catavi massacre in Bolivia, for Rovensky was a director of the Patino enterprises and is very close to the Bolivian tin magnate.

The jesuitical reply commonly given in "off-therecord" discussions with such people is that as government officials they must divorce themselves from their private interests. But anyone who knows Washington knows how profitably public office and private interest are mingled in the case of many dollar-a-year and other war-time officials. We make no such accusation against Rockefeller and Rovensky. We ask only that occasionally private influence be used for the government rather than against it. We find hard to stomach, and we should think Nelson Rockefeller would, too, a situation in which the left hand of the Rockefeller family is engaged in helping to fight the Axis while its right hand is accused of helping the Axis. The final piquant touch of the Chase Bank diamond story is that the bank has asked for a postponement of trial because its key witness, a vice-president, is in Spain doing preclusive buying for the Foreign Economic Administration, a post to which he was assigned under the old Board of Economic Warfare. This vice-president was in charge of the exchange transactions of which the government complains.

Franco in Modern Dress

IN RECENT weeks, unfortunately, we have seen too much uncoordinated thinking among the United Nations for anyone to be surprised by the contradictions and absurdities of which they have been guilty in regard to Spain. In one issue of the New York Times (January 20) we read a statement, on the first page, by British Foreign Secretary Eden, protesting the unneutral assistance still being rendered by Franco to Hitler in his war against Russia; and on an inside page, eulogies by Harold Denny of the triumphs recently achieved by the Allies in Madrid.

The American reader must make his choice. He can base his conclusions upon the categorical statement of the Soviet Embassy on which we commented last week, and on the energetic warning of the British Foreign Secretary. Or he can take Mr. Denny as his guide. For our part, we do not accept Mr. Denny. On the contrary, we believe that his series of articles could well compete with the declarations of Archbishop Spellman as the grossest misinformation published since the end of the Spanish War.

The Times correspondent supports the view that a subtle and inspired diplomacy has won Franco over to the United Nations with four, for him decisive, pieces of evidence: (1) General Franco's speech on the day of the Epiphany (January 6), praising the Yugoslav guerrillas and hinting that should Hitler try to halt Spain's evolution toward liberalism, Franco would become a second Tito. (2) A new influx of German agents into Spain to save a situation which has turned against the Axis. (3) The increasing power of Foreign Minister Jordana, whom certain Allied circles might use as a Spanish Badoglio should the hopes placed in a liberal Franco prove exaggerated. (4) The progress of Allied propaganda as against the bankruptcy of German propaganda, whose chief in Madrid, Lazar, has been shoved into a corner.

Every one of these great discoveries amounts to exactly zero. The only real discovery was made several weeks ago: that Franco, encouraged by the Allies' confidence in his final conversion, has decided to play the pro-Allied liberal while praying in his heart for a contrary turn in the war. Mr. Denny's attempts to prove that his shift is the result not of military developments but of the far-sighted policy of appeasement applied by the long-suffering State Department and the British Foreign Office is ridiculous, though it is not unprecedented. Happily, there is little danger that the imminent invasion from the west will suffer a disastrous set-back. But should that eventuality arise, Franco's reactions will be interesting to watch.

The speech of the Epiphany is full of "liberal" phrases, but more convincing would be the withdrawal of the Spanish legionnaires who, according to the Soviet Embassy communiqué, are still fighting on one of the sectors of the Volkhov front.

General Jordana may seem strong and promising to those who are counting on him to bring Don Juan to the Spanish throne and to create a moderate regime in Spain after the war. In reality, every elder officer of the Spanish army can inform Mr. Denny that Jordana is considered one of the weakest of the generals who surround the Dictator.

In Madrid, the Chief of German propaganda, Lazar, may have been advised to keep in the shadows for a while, but Spanish broadcasts to Latin America still show his inimitable style.

No one denies that the prospect of a Hitler defeat has obliged Franco to try to improve his position with the United Nations and, without too greatly annoying the Germans who still infest Spain, to prepare for a quick last-moment leap onto the Allied caboose. He must adopt the guise of a liberal in order to win the confidence of Western diplomats and people like Mr. Denny. But did the distinguished Times correspondent expect Franco to welcome him wearing the Iron Cross, and with "Mein Kampf" open on his desk?

Fotich Should Resign

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE long narrative in the Political War section this week is described by its author as "the story of a government that has been overthrown but pretends not to know it." But Mr. Raditsa's account of his progressive disillusionment as press chief in the Yugoslav Information Service is also the story of a man with a political conscience. In days like these, when the very outcome of the war depends upon the willingness of government officials to make clear-cut decisions, such a story is encouraging. Neither in high nor in low places have we been favored with enough examples of this particular kind of integrity.

The policy of the world is being made in large part by little men or scared men or confused men or by subtly dishonest men serving other interests than those for which they are supposed to fight. We have seen their maneuvers in our own government. This country's conduct of the political war against the Axis offers painful examples of the infinite capacity of officials to prefer immediate advantage—or what looks like it—to great objectives. Yugoslavia itself is an excellent illustration of the timidity and conservatism which have combined to make the political strategy of the western Allies the stumbling, uncoordinated thing it is today. For Yugoslavia has conclusively demonstrated the futility of depending upon political elements which represent the interests, national and social, of a limited ruling class.

One cannot help feeling some sympathy for Mihailovich and the government of King Peter. Never did any regime fit more neatly into the concept of legitimism, conservatism, and nationalism encouraged by the highest authorities in Whitehall and the State Department. The only earthly trouble with them was that they couldn't deliver effective blows against the Axis. It was the brutal logic of events, not any interest in a "popular" uprising or a democratic government in Yugoslavia, that forced the Western powers to switch their affections from the Royal Government in Exile to Tito's forces. The Mihailovich guerrillas were not fighting the Germans; the Partisans were. Russian support had gone to Tito from the time his battalions were formed, partly, one must assume, because he was a Communist and favored a close relationship with the Soviet Union. But Stalin's readiness to back any elements that offer real resistance to Hitler is well known; if the army of Mihailovich had been useful, it would have been used.

But the British and Americans were slow to see that only a movement from which the ordinary people could hope for a better future offered a basis for genuine resistance. Why should they see it in Yugoslavia when the fact had escaped them everywhere else? They stuck to the Mihailovich-Peter regime until Partisan successes and the imminence of an Allied invasion of the Balkans thrust upon them the necessity of supporting Tito. But while one must sympathize with the old-style Yugoslav diplomats who today feel shocked by the defection of their allies, one cannot allow one's sympathies to obscure the fact that the Royal Yugoslav Government in Exile is today only a shell. Its heart, if it had one, is dead. Its functions have moved to Yugoslavia. Its ministers of state and lesser officials are ghosts.

The facts revealed by Raditsa in this issue should cause Ambassador Fotich to resign. He doubtless will not resign because very few officials voluntarily give up power and position. But his job is ended and he can only go through the motions of representing his country in Washington. The initiative in ending this pretense must come from the United States and Britain. Both governments must withdraw recognition from King Peter's regime and establish relations with the provisional government set up at Jajce. And even before a formal break occurs, the Treasury must take steps to guard the gold reserve of Yugoslavia deposited in the United States. This reserve is held in custody on behalf of the Yugoslav people under war-time freezing orders. Every draft upon it has to be authorized by our government. Naturally, as long as the Yugoslav government-in-exile was in the same position as the Norwegian or Dutch governments, as long as it could be reasonably regarded as the accredited representative of the Yugoslav people, its drafts upon the reserve were authorized without question. While legally it can claim the same status now, it can no longer claim it in fact. The new provisional government, functioning on Yugoslav soil, is a challenge to its pretensions. The legality of further heavy expenditures out of the funds held in trust by the United States for the people of Yugoslavia will eventually, without any doubt, be questioned by the new government. Until the political situation is cleared, the Treasury should scrutinize with particular care the financial operations of the Yugoslav authorities in Wash-

We are very pleased to have the opportunity of publishing Mr. Raditsa's illuminating document. He has not only given up his position, but has risked his career, to tell the truth about the government he served. If more of the key men among Yugoslavia's ruling group cared as he does for the honor of their country and for its future as a democratic, unified state, the bitter internal struggle that today divides it might never have taken place. And if, in our ruling group, more people recognized the strategic necessity of working with the democratic elements in every occupied country, the diplomatic decision now facing the State Department would have been made long ago. Mr. Raditsa's story is a lesson in the elements of political warfare.

The Plot Against Yugoslavia

BY BOGDAN RADITSA

[This story, part of a much longer account of Mr. Raditsa's experiences, was organized and prepared for publication by Robert Bendiner.]

THIS is the story of a government that has been overthrown but pretends not to know it, a government without a country. Only incidentally is it the story of my modest connection with that regime, a connection which was important chiefly because it enabled me to observe at first hand the workings of the Royal Yugoslav government.

On the shameful day of March 25, 1941, I was in Washington as chief of the press service of the Yugoslav legation—now an embassy—a post I had assumed in 1940. When news reached us that the Belgrade government had signed the infamous Tripartite Pact with Germany and Italy, most of us in Washington were ready to resign in a body. But two days later, before we had had time to get our bearings, the collaborationist government of Premier Cvetkovich was overthrown, and within ten days Nazi bombers were raining devastation on Yugoslav cities. A blow had been struck which, as time would show, was destined to remake completely the nation of the Southern Slavs.

The attempt of the Cvetkovich government to drag Yugoslavia into the New Order, shocking as it was, had not been unexpected. Events were moving rapidly in that direction in the spring of 1940. I had just been appointed foreign press chief in Belgrade and was about to take over my duties at the time of the French collapse. Before I could do so I was given to understand that my appointment had been protested by Foreign Ministers Ribbentrop and Ciano because of anti-fascist sentiments I had expressed at Geneva. Ciano even threatened to withdraw Italian newspapermen from Belgrade if I was not removed. In an audience with Prince Paul I was asked by the Regent not to press the matter, and my assignment to Washington was suggested. In this repudiation of his own appointment under pressure from the Axis I saw the first of a series of larger and larger concessions, which were in the end to bring the Regent to complete capitulation. It was dark in Prince Paul's study when I left him late in the afternoon, and I came away with the gloomy conviction that the man had lost not only what courage he had possessed but the will to resist. Yugoslavia, he clearly felt, could consider itself fortunate not to be drawn into the war even if peace were purchased at the price of slavery to Germany.

At the same time I knew that the Regent's defeatism was not shared by the average Yugoslav. There was a widespread conviction among the people that because the Soviet Union was not yet involved, the war somehow had not really got under way. Only a small minority, including the rulers of the country, felt that Germany's victory was assured and were prepared to accept Hitler's rule over the whole of Europe. I was convinced of this gulf that separated the government from the country, and so was my wife, who upon our arrival in the United States on October 23, 1940, said to reporters: "If Germany tries to make a protectorate out of Yugoslavia, then Yugoslavia will fight, because we know what German protection really means."

This statement, far from eliciting enthusiastic support from our legation in Washington, brought me for the first time into conflict with Minister, now Ambassador, Constantin Fotich. No sooner had we reached our hotel in New York than the telephone rang and a glacial voice from Washington ordered us to give out no more public statements on Yugoslavia that might embarrass the government in its dealings with the Axis.

"A TIME OF SEPARATION"

When I arrived in Washington I reported at once to Fotich. I told him how tense the situation appeared to be in the country and predicted that a showdown with the Axis would come in the spring of 1941. I even took the liberty of adding my impression that Foreign Minister Cincar-Markovich would eventually be used as a tool in the hands of the Germans, that Prince Paul was losing his grip on the situation, and that our hope lay in the people, in whom we should have complete faith.

None of these sentiments proved in the least palatable to the Minister, and I should have known as much. I had first come in contact with Mr. Fotich in Geneva, where the phrase most frequently applied to him was fin, faux, et fourbe. Belonging to the charchija, Serbia's small ruling oligarchy, he had little sympathy with the Serb-Croat agreement of 1939, which for the first time granted the Croats a real measure of autonomy. He had even less consciousness of the widening gulf between the tiny ruling group and the mass of the Yugoslav people, or of the deep resentment that existed in the country toward the government itself, particularly the Foreign Office, which was widely regarded as a sort of fifth column within the administration.

The surrender to the Axis—which was precisely what the Tripartite Pact signed at Vienna amounted to should have served to embarrass Serb chauvinism, since the government that signed the agreement was clearly dominated by Serbs—Prince Paul, Foreign Minister Cincar-Markovich, and Prime Minister Cvetkovich. In taking the fatal step this trio had the advice and support of the army command, and it is worth noting that of the roughly three hundred generals in the Yugoslav army fewer than ten were Croats. From the immediate political consequences of their act the Serb chauvinists were saved by the overthrow of the regime, which occurred two days later.

The government of General Simovich, set up on March 27 to repudiate the linking of Yugoslavia to the Axis, was closer to a popular regime than the country had ever enjoyed. It constituted a genuine national coalition representing all parties, and although it included members whose extremely reactionary records exposed them to popular distrust, it was nevertheless a remarkable effort in the direction of Yugoslav unity.

Unfortunately the diehard Serb chauvinists, particularly those who operated in Washington, did not view matters in this light. From the day the new government took power, the atmosphere in the legation grew steadily more strained. Some of us hoped that the country's imminent involvement in the war would at last compel the unity so desperately needed. But the reverse proved true. The Minister and all the Serbian employees not only became markedly reserved toward their Croat colleagues but displayed undisguised coolness toward the whole conception of a Yugoslav nation.

Now that the "revolution" had occurred, they seemed to be taking all the credit for it, while at the same time ignoring the role of those Serb leaders who had promulgated the very pact which provoked the overthrow. So high did the tide of Serbian chauvinism rise in the legation that on the very eve of the German assault an official, in the presence of the Minister, bluntly told me: "After all, this is a time of separation. We Serbs can no longer accept Croatian autonomy and decentralization. The Croats have never been independent; they have never had a state, a history, or an individual national life. All Croatian history is an illusion. We do not want a division of power or collaboration. From now on we Serbs will conduct our own state affairs, and we will permit nobody else to mix in or hold responsible positions." As well as I knew Fotich, I could not understand his choosing this moment, when more than ever in our history we needed unity, to have me informed that separation or Serb domination were the alternatives.

I was soon to learn what Fotich had in mind and to understand that his aide was speaking not for himself alone but for the dominant clique within the government which was soon to go into exile. The Serb chauvinists had a threefold objective. First, they had to clear themselves of responsibility for the military disaster which in twelve days engulfed the country. Second, they sought to realize their dream of scrapping the whole concept of Yugoslavia in favor of a Greater Serbia, from which Croatia and Slovenia would be excluded or in which they would be subordinated. Third, they aimed to keep tight control over the popular forces which would inevitably emerge in the struggle against the invader, and which if unchecked would seriously threaten the corrupt economy that spelled social supremacy for a handful of Serbian families. In all the maneuverings of the Yugoslav government in exile, and especially in those of its Washington representative, this three-point program is plainly discernible. I had a unique opportunity to watch it in operation.

"BLAME THE CROATS"

From the devastation and horror that the Nazis brought to Yugoslavia there rose the inevitable puppet states and Quislings. Division was naturally a German policy, just as it was unnaturally a policy of the Greater Serbians. The country was dismembered, in theory at least, and among its seven Axis-organized remnants the most important were a puppet Croatia under Ante Pavelich and a puppet Serbia under the nominal rule of General Milan Nedich. It would have been an obvious act of statesmanship on the part of all anti-Axis Yugoslavs to condemn the traitors in both camps and to forge a unity of all nationals for the purpose of repelling the invader. This task was ultimately to be fulfilled by the Partisans, but until their emergence the Serbs—at least some of the leaders in exile—seemed bent on outdoing even the Germans in their effort to widen the gap between themselves and the Croats.

In the first place, certain high Serb officials, while rightly excoriating the criminal Pavelich and his fascist Ustachi movement, were loath to condemn their own General Nedich. In their eyes he could not be a traitor because he was a Serb. The government in exile itself had unearthed a revealing memorandum which Nedich had submitted to Prince Paul before his dismissal as Minister of War on November 1, 1940. The memorandum proposed that the Yugoslavs occupy Salonika jointly with the Germans at the moment when the Greeks were engaged in a desperate struggle with the Italians. Under this great Serb patriot a large section of the Chetniks, famous Serbian guerrilla fighters, were placed at the disposal of the enemy. They were installed in the same Belgrade building that houses the Gestapo. From these joint headquarters, once the Yugoslav Ministry of Justice, the Chetnik flag today floats side by side with the swastika. Nevertheless, two weeks after the German invasion, when Nedich's treason was out in the open, the Yugoslav Minister in Washington felt called upon to write to the New York Times in defense of the Nazi puppet, who happens to be Fotich's cousin. "The Minister of War, General Nedich," he said, "was a true exponent of the national spirit and tradition."

From this moment on, my work at the legation became progressively paralyzed. It was one of my duties to edit the official bulletin, and I soon discovered that every reference to Nedich as "puppet" or a "traitor" was strictly censored by Fotich, even when the words were quoted from the American press. As late as September 18, 1941, I was forced to publish a communiqué to the effect that "news concerning the 'government' of General Nedich, who is called Marshal, is false propaganda shrewdly spread by the Nazis in order to misrepresent the true state of affairs. Nothing has been changed in Belgrade, where the occupation authorities continue to rule exclusively. General Nedich and other heads of departments are merely executives of the occupying authority." As though that were not bad enough!

At the same time a gigantic campaign was in the making to throw the entire blame for the defeat on the Croats, as well as to hold them responsible for deepening the gulf between themselves and the Serbs. The search for a scapegoat began simultaneously with the flight of the government. As soon at the leaders of the regime reached Athens an official communiqué was prepared placing all responsibility for the collapse on the Croats. Fortunately this pronouncement was withheld on the protest of a few democratic Serbian members, particularly Sava Kosanovich, Minister of Supply. In private, however, there was no restraint.

The truth of the matter is that, both politically and militarily, all but the avowed fascist elements in the Croat population had clearly demonstrated their solidarity with the new Yugoslav government. On April 3, when the Germans had whipped to a frenzy their efforts to split the country, we received at the legation the following cable from Foreign Minister Nincich in Belgrade:

In connection with false reports which have been distributed during the past few days over the radio and through newspapers abroad concerning alleged disagreements between the authorities and the leaders of the Croat Peasant Party, I wish to state for your information and use: (1) Two important conferences were held yesterday in Zagreb by the leaders of the Croatian Peasant Party. The outcome of these conferences is that Croats and Serbs remain united whether at peace or at war. (2) Dr. Koshutich, vice-president of the Croatian Party, has reached a complete agreement with the Prime Minister, General Simovich, on all questions. Dr. Machek arrives in Belgrade tomorrow evening.

This was by no means the first time that Machek had demonstrated his loyalty to Yugoslavia and his enmity for the Axis powers. Nor was it to be the last. Rejecting exile, he said to a group of associates: "I am going to stay with my people and share their fate. I can die only once. You must continue to collaborate inside the Yugoslav government in exile and with our great allies. I shall never disavow you."

Again and again in the months that followed, Machek was offered power if only he would collaborate with the invader. Again and again he refused. He has been in and out of prisons and concentration camps for two years and would surely have been killed but for the extraordinary hold he has on the Croatian people. This is the man whom irresponsible Serb elements have branded at a traitor to Yugoslavia.

It must be remembered, moreover, that while democratic Croats were thus aligning themselves with the regime, some pan-Serb ministers of the government, reconstructed though it was, were still desperately trying to come to terms with the Axis powers. On taking office the government had declared its determination to abide by the terms of the Vienna Tripartite Pact, as long as they did "not impair our vital interests." Foreign Minister Nincich was all set to fly to Berlin for further talks, and Vice-Premier Slobodan Jovanovich to undertake a similar mission to Rome.

As for the military aspect of the picture, the first decisive breaks in the Yugoslav front occurred not in Croatia but at Kashanik Pass and at Skoplje in southern Serbia, where General Nedich was in command. It was there that the break-through occurred which was to lose the war. It is true that the army of the north was dissolved, on April 9 and 10, at the frontier of Croatia, but this disastrous step was taken on the orders of Serbian generals. The General Staff had capitulated without the knowledge of the Cabinet, as Jovanovich was later to confirm. The Prime Minister himself had given the order to General Kalafatovich without informing his colleagues.

These facts are a matter of record, but they did not stop the professional promoters of Greater Serbia from carrying on. In the summer of 1941 a delegation of Serb officials who had escaped from Belgrade arrived in Washington with the wife of General Simovich. They spread the story far and wide that the military collapse of the highly touted Serbian army in twelve days had been brought about by Croatian treachery. The General's Chief of Cabinet unwittingly revealed the real purpose of this wholesale slander when he remarked that Yugoslavia could be restored only under Serb hegemony.

THE MASSACRE AND THE "SRBOBRAN"

Propaganda against the Croats demanded something more solid than these thin allegations, however, and something more solid was soon made available. It came in the form of the notorious Dönkelmann report concerning the massacre of Serbs which took place in Croatia and Bosnia in the summer of 1941.

In discussing this dreadful event I wish to say first of all, as a human being and as a Croat, that I cannot find words to express my horror and my condemnation of those outlaws among my countrymen who perpetrated this monstrous crime. I do not know how many Serbs lost their lives in the massacre, but the number certainly ran into the thousands. What was almost as outrageous as the act itself, however, was the criminal way in which the tragedy was exploited by the enemies of a restored Yugoslavia.

The massacre was the work of the Ustachi, Ante Pavelich's band of fascist assassins, working hand in glove with the Nazi invaders who had brought them to power. The Ustachi no doubt needed little urging, but what prodding had to be done was done gladly by the Germans, since any deepening of the Serb-Croat gulf was all to their advantage. What was unforgivable was the enthusiastic way in which the Serb chauvinists leaped at this opportunity to make disunity irrevocable. R. W. Seton-Watson, perhaps the foremost British authority on Yugoslav affairs, pointed out that despite their deep grievance, "the Serbs have spoiled their case by enormous exaggeration of the number of victims, and seem incapable of realizing the extent to which they are playing into the hands of the Germans by a persistent and unjust identification of two such utterly different concepts as 'Croat' and 'Ustachi.' "

Mihailovich Opens & Second Front

Official word of the massacre reached the legation in October, 1941, in the form of a lengthy memorandum addressed to General Dönkelmann, commander-in-chief of the German occupation forces in Serbia, by Valerian, the Orthodox Bishop of Budim. Ostensibly the document was a plea to Dönkelmann to stop the slaughter, but whatever its original purpose it was immediately seized upon by the government in exile, then in London, as a perfect weapon for anti-Croatian propaganda. Professor Seton-Watson condemned the report as a "tendencious document" designed to lead the reader "to the conclusion that an unbridgeable gulf of blood must henceforth separate Serbs and Croats and render impossible the revival of Yugoslavia."

This viciously distorted memorandum was forwarded to Mr. Fotich by Prime Minister Simovich. The London government, it should be noted, had never felt called upon to publicize the sufferings of the Croats and the Slovenes at the hands of the Axis and its puppets, or the slaughter of anti-Axis Serbs by General Nedich. When I read the document I communicated at once to Mr. Fotich my conviction that this was a device whereby the Axis hoped to divide Serbs and Croats forever and make the resurrection of Yugoslavia impossible. I suggested that the memorandum should be published in our official bulletin provided it was set in its true perspective and accompanied by the fullest explanation and by a sincere effort to find in the enormous suffering of innocent people, both Serb and Croat, a new element on which to build the unity of the nation.

Fotich categorically refused. Yugoslavia, he said, was no longer important; after what had happened it would never be rebuilt. But he did not resign as Yugoslav ambassador. The document was to be used, Fotich made it clear, not to promote but to prevent a restoration of Yugoslavia. The Serbs, he said, had now not only been betrayed by the Croats but slaughtered by them as well. The sufferings of the Yugoslav people were to be used for the building of Serb dominance and the destruction of the Croat position in its entirety.

As a Serb and as an individual, Mr. Fotich is of course entitled to his own political views. But he is in this country not in the capacity of a private citizen or Serb propagandist; he is here as ambassador of the Yugoslav nation. He is paid out of the national treasury to represent the interests of all the peoples of Yugoslavia—Croats and Slovenes as well as Serbs. Yet he has not once risen to defend the Croats against the violent campaign of abuse which has been waged against them by Serb and Serb American elements in this country whose one great aim is to prevent the restoration of the nation which Fotich supposedly represents.

Not only has the Ambassador never repudiated the slandering of the Croats, but he has given substantial aid and encouragement to the campaign; he has used his position deliberately to deepen the division between the constituent parts of his nation; and he has carried on these activities in a country which has granted him the courtesies and immunities of diplomacy.

For his purposes Fotich found a ready-made weapon in the Amerikanski Srbobran, a daily newspaper published in Pittsburgh, with a weekly English edition, by the Serb National Federation. It was to this Serb organ that Fotich chose to send the notorious Dönkelmann memorandum, unaccompanied by the slightest suggestion that it be presented in proper perspective, that its gross exaggerations and their purpose be pointed out, and that care be taken to emphasize the distinction between Croat and Ustachi. On the contrary, Fotich unhesitatingly gave the signal for an unbridled campaign to divide his country.

Incensed by Fotich's conduct, Sava Kosanovich, a Serb and a Minister of State, addressed in March, 1942, a blistering note to the government in London. Some excerpts follow:

Yugoslav diplomats with sadistic pleasure are making the most harmful use of this tragedy [the Croatian massacre]. . . . In North America, for instance, Mr. Fotich, on November 2, 1941, in the Yugoslav legation personally delivered to the secretary of the Srbobran a copy of this memorandum . . . demanding that it be published "because that is necessary for the government." I have in my hand a paper marked "Confidential, Number 500, October 3, 1941," which Fotich originally sent to the Srbobran in order to launch the most repulsive campaign against the Croats, the government, and Yugoslavia. This campaign could not possibly have been better conceived from their own point of view by Hitler, Mussolini, and the Hapsburgs. The arguments inevitably arising out of this tragedy have been augmented by the addition of outrageous material and interpretations directed against the whole concept of Yugoslavia, and, what is worse, offered as the views prevailing in the Cabinet. . . .

Let me say in conclusion that for many months material most harmful to the cause of Yugoslavia has been published in the Srbobran. Through this newspaper the Serbian National Defense is being organized for the creation of a Serbia as against Yugoslavia, against the Croats, and against the Slovenes. This campaign was undertaken by the Srbobran at the direct instigation of Envoy Fotich and with his assistance.

As soon as it is indicated that the government in London does not approve of what the Srbobran is doing, such writings will lose all their appeal. I can assure you, in fact, that they will stop altogether. . . . Had Fotich even once during these past six months demanded on behalf of the government in London that this campaign cease, it would immediately have been discontinued, but he has not seen fit to do so.

[Continued on page 138]

Facts for Mr. Stimson

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 20

THE testimony of Secretary of War Stimson deserves the most respectful consideration. He has, in the course of his long public and private career, amply demonstrated his devotion to democratic ideals. I think we are fortunate to have a man of his high character at the head of the War Department, and what he has to recommend is not lightly to be dismissed. His advice on a national-service act cannot, however, be exempted from careful analysis and thoroughgoing discussion, and I am sure he would not want it to be. It is with this apology that I must say that I did not find his statement to the Senate Military Affairs Committee persuasive

I agree with his basic proposition: "The nation has no less right to require a man to make weapons than it has to require another man to fight with those weapons." I think he was giving labor and its leaders a warning they must heed if they are prepared, as I believe most of them are, to put long-range considerations involving the future of free government in America ahead of petty irritation or advantage. From all I can see and hear there is plenty of evidence for the Secretary's statement that "the industrial unrest and lack of sense of patriotic responsibility" it indicates "has aroused a strong feeling of resentment and injustice among the men of the armed forces." There was the tone of statesman-like appeal and not of threat in his warning: "I believe it is hazardous to belittle the effect which such a situation will have upon the ultimate welfare of our democracy." But it seems to me that what this adds up to is the strongest of arguments for maintenance of labor's nostrike pledge. Neither these statements nor the rest of the Secretary's testimony seemed to me to make out a case for a national-service act. For that is not a matter of emotional appeal, of however lofty and patriotic a character, but simply of how the job can best be done.

Secretary Stimson was arguing most to the point when he said that the war "is not almost over," that "we are approaching its most critical and difficult period," and that in this period "we shall require not only a large but flexible production." This reference to the need for "flexible" production is of the greatest importance. The Secretary explained what it meant when he said that this was the period "when we are likely to be confronted with new weapons of the enemy which will change the method of combat and require new weapons for ourselves." The ability to make quick shifts in the size of a gun, the design of a tank, or the form of a landing barge, not only in response to enemy changes but ahead of them, may spell the difference between victory and defeat in a whole campaign, Effective man-power mobilization is essential for those quick changes. But in justice to labor it must be said that the record of the last two years shows that the technological conservatism of the War and Navy departments and the reluctance of industry to acknowledge defects and make production changes have been the principal obstacles to such shifts. Even today we permit a situation in which we have three different types of engines in our medium tanks, enormously complicating the problem of parts' replacement and repair, and adding to the difficulties of production. because the three big automobile companies are too jealous of each other to permit choice of one engine. I might add that it was a labor leader, Walter Reuther, who first called attention to this more than two years ago.

I am not sure that the Secretary's advisers have fully informed him as to the facts. The Secretary said the army had to furlough soldiers to replace Montana copper miners and California airplane-factory workers who left their jobs for better pay. "Think of the waste of such a situation," the Secretary said, "taking soldiers from training for combat because they are the only persons who can be directed to stay where they are put!" With all due respect to the Secretary, this is neither correctly nor fairly expressed. I single it out not because I think it incorrect and unfair but because I think it indicates how poorly the War Department grasps the problem. It was not a shortage of workers, it was a shortage of workers with special skills, that forced us to furlough certain copper miners and aircraft mechanics and return them to industry. The pity and the waste are that specially skilled workers of this kind should have been drafted in the first place. The fault does not lie with labor. The fault lies with the failure of the War Department, Selective Service, and the War Manpower Commission, three poorly integrated and still conflicting agencies, to work out a program of occupational deferments. To paraphrase the Secretary, it may be no less important for one man to make weapons than for another to fight with those weapons. The men in charge of man-power-and the real authority here has rested and will continue to rest in the War Department-have never shown the patience, the knowledge, or the organizing ability to work out an orderly and sensible program of total manpower mobilization, military and civilian.

PUBLIC LIBARY

If the reader will look up the Baruch report on West Coast Aircraft Man-Power Problems, as made public last September 18, he will see that the statements I have just made are fully supported by that report, as they are by every Congressional committee which has looked into the man-power situation. "Proper handling of manpower," the Baruch report said, "has been made impossible by the failure of government agencies to work as a team with a clearly defined program." One of Baruch's principal recommendations was that "all necessary aircraft workers on the West Coast definitely be assured of deferment . . . so that war production is not jeopardized by disruptive drawing of workers into the army." And Baruch, it must be remembered, is a man who has usually taken the side of the military as against the civilian agencies in the controversies between them in this war.

Just how far the Secretary's statement falls short of providing the true picture may be seen if one goes on to read Baruch's discussion of labor hoarding. For side by side with this shortage of irreplaceable skilled labor Baruch found "much labor . . . being hoarded or poorly utilized" not only on the West Coast but "all through the country." He blamed "prevailing cost-plus-fixed-fee contracts," and responsibility for these rests squarely on army-navy procurement. The point is not the use of these contracts; a strong case can be made out for them in many instances. The point is that, having made them, it is up to army-navy procurement to see that they are not abused. As Baruch said, it is time not only to focus on the 5, 10, or 15 cents of the production dollar that goes into profits but to reduce "the 85, 90, or 95 cents of the production dollar represented by costs." This is of first importance, not to save money, but to save labor.

Here we arrive at the heart of the national-service problem, a system of inspecting and controlling labor utilization in the factory. This is part of what the Baruch report meant when it said man-power problems "cannot be solved by thinking solely in terms of labor controls. Control over production is equally important." What is needed is, first of all, a centralized and coordinated control in Washington of production, procurement, and man-power so that consistent and understandable directives can be given to the local agencies which must play a major part in any total mobilization. To this the army-navy bureaucracy and Byrnes have been strongly opposed. What is needed, secondly, is a labormanagement works council in the plant, from which alone can be obtained the detailed information necessary for effective inspection of labor utilization. The army-navy bureaucracy, generally speaking, dislikes both labor-management set-ups and anything that smacks of interference with the sacred prerogatives of management, including that of wasting labor. Without steps of this kind, national service would serve only to embitter labor by adding compulsion to confusion.

25 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THE NEWS FROM GERMANY changes from day to day, and the hope of an early restoration of general order and the development of a stable government is still dim. . . . The whole situation is the more disturbing because of the near approach of the peace conference, and the apparent disposition of France and England, not to mention other countries, to insist upon heavy indemnities and the imposition of a long period of tutelage.—January 4, 1919.

WE ASK THAT THE GOVERNMENT of the United States bring pressure to bear upon the Allies to abandon their present policy in Russia and secure, under threat, if need be, of complete dissociation from their plans, the withdrawal of all Allied troops. We ask that representatives of the Soviet government be admitted to the peace conference. We ask the prompt dispatch, in cooperation with the Soviet government, of food and clothing and necessary industrial and agricultural machinery. . . . We ask these things for the Russian Revolution and the starving people of Russia; but even more we ask these things in order that the United States may for its own sake share in righting an intolerable wrong.—January 4, 1919.

TO THE EDITOR OF The Nation: Sir: For some time I have looked forward to the arrival of your paper each week with real pleasure, but you are getting too Bolshevik for me. My family arrived in Philadelphia with William Penn and has been here ever since. . . You will do me I favor by canceling my subscription to The Nation I soon as possible.

—M. M. S., January 4, 1919.

IF THE POLICY which M. Clemenceau has championed . . . and by which he has declared that he intends to be guided if he is permitted to represent France at the peace conference prevails, the conference which is about to meet will be only another Congress of Vienna.—January 11, 1919.

LITERARY NOTE: An eyewitness's account of the Russian Revolution is soon to be published by Boni and Liveright in John Reed's "Ten Days That Shook the World."—
January 11, 1919.

TO LAY THE BLAME for unemployment, both actual and threatened, on the public authorities has become a common practice.—January 18, 1919.

ONE OF THE SOREST SPOTS in a world still full of wounds is the seaport town of Fiume. Out of all proportion to its size or general importance Fiume has managed to center upon itself the troubled attention of the diplomats of the world..., The Italian Cabinet is in the hands of the most complete irreconcilables.... The Yugoslavs show an equal determination to attain their "ancient rights."—

January 25, 1919.

A Settlement for Poland

BY LOUIS WITOLD

FOG of prejudice envelops the Russo-Polish issue on all sides. And yet the essential facts are not difficult to state. The two parties to the dispute have much in common. Both desire to get the Germans quickly out of Poland and to have their general staffs act in harmony. Indeed, the loyalist Polish underground movement must either work with the advancing Soviet forces or be disarmed by them: it cannot stay neutral in a battle zone. The U. S. S. R. needs a speedy settlement, and so does the Polish government in exile, which is anxious to prevent the emergence of a rival administration when the Soviet advance reaches a political center within Poland.

Both peoples are determined to prevent reemergence after the war of the German military menace. By accepting the Soviet offer to support the transfer to a "strong and independent" Poland of most of East Prussia and of Silesia up to the Oder, Poland would become dependent on Russian assistance, but it would gain a Russian commitment replacing the perennial menace of a Russo-German anti-Polish deal such as was consummated in 1939. The transfer of territory would also help Poland to solve its main domestic problem—by absorbing in a vast industrial development and in new settlements in the north the mass of its landless, or nearly landless, peasantty.

A negotiated settlement of the border dispute along the lines proposed by Russia would largely legalize the Soviet Union's seizure of land and people in 1939 and 1940. Poland would be strengthened both east and west by bringing all Poles within its borders, provided it obtained Lwow and the natural resources of Galicia, including oil. This would of course necessitate an agreed vast transfer of populations.

Both the U. S. S. R. and Poland want freedom from fear and from want. Both face a tremendous job of reconstruction. Soviet soldiers are likely to demand for their families the standards they themselves enjoyed during the war. Polish peasants, once they are in control of their government at home, will refuse to endure much longer their life of unremitting poverty. The two countries grimly realize that no freedom can be enjoyed if war is to break out soon again. They are equally in need of peaceful intercourse and trade with foreign lands. The Soviet Union is as nearly self-sufficient as a great power can be; yet it cannot reconstruct its shattered economy without some ten billion dollars' worth of imports from the United States, in addition to lesser purchases from other countries. For Poland, whose welfare is so largely dependent on foreign trade, free commercial intercourse is requisite to its national existence.

For twenty-five years, indeed until Teheran (Pravda notwithstanding), the U. S. S. R. was haunted by either the reality or the specter of foreign intervention. For twenty-five years Poland wasted 40 per cent of its expenditures on defense against Germany and Russia. A relationship of mutual friendship and assistance between Poland and Russia within the promised "international community" would permit both countries to concentrate on internal development.

But on this point grave differences have arisen. The U. S. S. R. evidently proposes to "take care" of its neighbors by proclaiming a Monroe Doctrine of its own in Central and Southern Europe east of Germany. It may or may not actually incorporate some of these nations in its union. Its present federal system is capable of infinite elasticity. The venerable Jan Smuts called for more elasticity within the British Commonwealth when he recently invited Holland and Belgium into a common union. May not Stalin be tempted to invite into the Soviet Union two or three of the neighbors in the sphere of his Monroe Doctrine? Stalin's invitation might prove much less popular than Smuts's. The European underground, including both the loyalist and the partisan groups in Poland, craves freedom as it is practiced in the Western democratic world.

Enjoyment of freedom in Russia, non-existent under the Czars, who were overthrown barely twenty-six years ago, is slowly developing. Young Soviet citizens point proudly to a progressive increase in their human rights. The Poles enjoyed political freedom during the first seven years of independence; it was severely curtailed from 1926 to 1939, but not to such an extent as in the U. S. S. R. The Czechoslovaks have always had it, and vet Benes signed in Moscow without misgivings a treaty of mutual assistance which involved agreement not only on foreign and military but also on economic policy. Before 1939 Czechoslovakia traded mainly with Germany; now its chief market will be the Soviet area. Its national economy is to be reshaped, its railroads, highways, and airways rebuilt accordingly. But like Poland, it can renounce neither its trade with other lands nor its close ties with Western civilization. A united Europe would suit Czechoslovakia best, but having been a victim of power politics in 1938, it intends to become a beneficiary if power politics regain control after

Can Poland do the same? Poland fought both Russia and Germany, depending exclusively on the West for support. The entry of Russian troops into Warsaw cannot but evoke memories of the past, of Imperial armies before 1915 and of Communist forces in 1920. Hence the suspicion which pervades all parties behind the government in exile. Premier Mikolajczyk is a cooperative-minded, well-to-do farmer-politician from Poznania, sharing Benes's hatred of Germany and his readiness to come to terms with Russia. His People's Party has a large following of farmers and is led by right-wingers sympathizing with the "green international." * But it includes very advanced peasant youth and claims to defend both rich and landless peasants as a class distinct from the squirearchy which for centuries ruled Poland. The Polish Socialist Party, with its tradition of opposition to the Czars, is essentially led by a romantic intelligentsia in control of pre-war trade unions and social-security machinery; intransigent on the issue of full national independence and passionately hostile to communism, it is influential throughout the country and shares with Mikolajczyk the control of the government machinery. To the extent indicated, the government in exile is a coalition of "peasants and workers."

But power in Poland before 1940 was in the hands of a military clique. At no time was power exercised in the interests of peasants or workers. The middle class was ruined by the Russian Revolution, the collapse of Austria, and the post-war inflation. The landed gentry lost its capital and most of its estates. Another fifteen years would have seen the disappearance of all land available for distribution. Deprived of its economic foundation, the gentry swarmed into the army as officers and seized power on behalf of Pilsudski. After Pilsudski's death their rule was legalized by an authoritarian constitution which is still in force. During the two or three years preceding the war a mass movement of protest was gaining in strength; municipal elections were won by the Socialist and Peasant parties, but power continued to be shared by the President-responsible, in terms of the constitution, only to God and history-and the commander of the army, Marshal Rydz-Smigly. They, together with Foreign Minister Beck, were "the government," dreaming dreams of Poland as a "great power," convinced of the inevitable downfall of the Western democracies and the advent of "strong government," Italian style, hostile to Czechoslovakia and to a Russia of whatever complexion. Having previously declined, two to one, a German alliance against Russia, they were compelled by pressure from below to stand up to the German challenge.

This regime collapsed in September, 1939. After an unsuccessful last-minute plot to maintain itself abroad, it was succeeded by a coalition of parties which for thirteen years had been excluded from office and which never in fact exercised power—men of the day before yesterday thrust into a situation which required vision and great political courage.

Since Sikorski was the one outstanding military man who had favored, in and out of season, the French and British connection and recognized the necessity of fighting Germany, he naturally took over. Unfortunately his officers belonged to the old regime. Interested mainly in their return to power, they kept their powder dry and their pens furiously working in an atmosphere of utter unreality, convinced of the inevitability of a clash between Russia and the Western powers.

Sikorski's policy of conciliation with Russia was blocked by them at every turn. Not that the Soviet Union facilitated an agreement. All Poles resident in Russia in 1941 were proclaimed Soviet citizens on the ground that they either belonged in areas in which plebiscites had been held or by their mere presence testified to their preference for Russia; tens of thousands of Poles were forcibly evacuated to Russia. After endless wrangling a lame compromise was in sight when the Katyn bombshell wrecked everything. Most Poles believed that the thousands of officers whose bodies were found were slain by the Soviet secret police when, after the fall of France, Russia decided to divide Poland with Germany. Despite this belief the people were in general eager for a reconciliation with Russia and considered the Sikorski appeal to the International Red Cross to investigate the massacre a tragic blunder.

Thus while Benes had a clear road toward a pact, the Poles are hindered by their uneasy past relations with Russia and by recent mutual recriminations and suspicion.

Both Poland and Czechoslovakia have learned that alliances will not prevent disaster. Both need security against Germany, but security requires the relinquishment of many sovereign rights in exchange for some kind of "super-national" machinery. Which is it to be? A three-power pact with the Soviet Union, or the "integrated Europe" suggested vaguely in the Churchill broadcast of March, 1943, and apparently coldly received by Washington? Or will it be the "international authority" announced at Moscow and Teheran and then left at that? No one today can say.

The Russian-Polish issue has raised many other European and world issues. How can certain German areas be transferred in the absence of a general Allied plan? How can individual countries agree on economic policies without an Allied decision about German industries? How can they enter into permanent security pacts before the foundations of a European and inter-continental structure have been laid? Poland may have blundered and the U. S. S. R. have been particularly heavy-handed, but no valid settlement can be effected until a coherent policy has been agreed on by the United States and the United Kingdom.

Rank-and-File Kilowatts

BY MCALISTER COLEMAN

EMEMBER the jokes about the salmon going up the ladders of the Bonneville Dam on the Columbia River that circulated when the dam was opened in 1937? Remember how the stout boys of the right grew apoplectic about the still bigger dam farther up the river, Grand Coulee? That was the "biggest boondoggle of them all," and all the dams along the Columbia were "white elephants in a wilderness." Why spend our taxes to produce cheap and abundant power 'way out there in the woods, with no industries around to use it? As recently as March, 1941, when the first generator turned over at Grand Coulee, even the most ardent New Dealers expressed their private doubts as to the immediate usefulness of the mighty projects. Maybe they would be valuable for irrigation, they said; Coulee would eventually irrigate an area as large as all Connecticut. But power? Well, that was something else again. How were the taxpayers going to get back the $174,000,000 for the Coulee dam and power plant, to say nothing of the $394,000,000 that would be spent in the next twenty-five to fifty years for all the contemplated reclamation, conservation, and power projects?

Pearl Harbor put a sudden stop to all talk of that sort. To be sure, there are signs that it will soon be resumed, but today critics of public power in the Northwest are silent before this formula: Grand Coulee plus Bonneville produces 1,250,000 kilowatts per day. And the bulk of those million and a quarter kilowatts is powering war plants in Washington and Oregon whose products will play an important part in the big push against Japan, as indeed they are vital today in the preliminary moves. Right now 40 per cent of all the aluminum used in the war effort is made with juice from the big Columbia River dams. And these are also energizing magnesium, electro-chemical, and electro-metallurgical works, shipbuilding and lumbering, military establishments, cooperatives, public-utility districts, and publicly owned municipal utilities. New generators at both Bonneville and Grand Coulee will provide still more power for the ever-increasing demands of our war industries. The Bonneville Advisory Board has recommended construction of storage dams at Albeni Falls and Cabinet Gorge on the Clark Fork of the Columbia River in Idaho, and at Hungry Horse on the Flathead River in Montana. Contract sheets for power from Bonneville and Coulee grow larger every day. And the salmon are getting up the ladders all right without benefit of "free" enterprise.

This is not to say that public power has won so sweeping a victory in our "Inland Empire"—Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and Montana—that its champions can rest on their laurels. Under the banners of "free enterprise," the privateers are launching a nation-wide assault upon the people's ownership and use of their own resources. In the Northwest two related campaigns are under way in the free enterprisers' current attempt at a glorious comeback. In one, private ownership is fighting public ownership in the field of electric light and power; in the other, private ownership is fighting public ownership over the disposition of the new war plants that have sprung up around the great dams.

The fight on the power front is at its hottest right now in Washington, where the public-power people are working for a referendum permitting the fast-growing Public-Utility Districts in the state to acquire and operate entire electrical systems, instead of being compelled as at present to operate only small portions of systems using Bonneville-Coulee power. A statement of Pacific Northwest labor men-C. I. O., A. F. of L., and railroaders-urging the passage of the Public-Utility District measure reads as follows: "The huge Alcoa plant at Vancouver, the Reynolds plant at Longview, the Olin Aluminum plant at Wenatchee—all of these are accomplishments of public power. Without public power, shipbuilding and airplane manufacture would still be bawling infants instead of the young giants they now are." These labor men are looking forward with lively apprehension to the situation which the Northwest must face immediately after the war, and at the same time they are combating the propaganda of what Amos Pinchot once called "the kilowatt klan."

A recent example of such propaganda was the sprawling advertisement of the Puget Sound Power and Light Company in the Seattle papers. This privately owned concern has long been a thorn in the side of City Light, Seattle's great publicly owned hydroelectric development, which has given the town its reputation as "America's best-lighted city." By order of the SEC and a Massachusetts court the Puget Sound Company was compelled the other day to hold an election for a new board of directors -one on which Eastern financial interests would not be so conspicuous as formerly. In the advertisement a picture of a number of substantial-looking citizens sitting chummily around a directors' table was accompanied by this blurb: "This is free enterprise in action . . . chance for progress in the American Way. This is public ownership, honest-to-goodness American style, with business management under government regulation. With Puget Power it is a case of pooling the money and talents of a lot of people for mutual benefit in the rendering of a valuable public service. We are working and will be working with you as partners in the building of an evergreater state of Washington—which, it can be truly said, has a future bright with promise."

Old-time battlers for City Light smiled sardonically when they read this, remembering how desperately and with what dubious tactics Puget Power had fought to destroy both the municipally owned plant and its fearless superintendent, the late James Delmage Ross, the Northwest's beloved "J. D." With a certain pride they pointed out that only in such a strongly held public domain as theirs would a private company attempt to sell itself as an "honest-to-goodness" public-ownership enterprise.

A more familiar argument along the old lines of "Pin the Bolshevik label on 'em" was used in this "stuffer" inclosed in the bills of a privately owned company: "Let's fight and work to keep our business system in the hands of free men. Let us turn a deaf ear to those who, under cover of war emergency, would lead us into a system of national socialism, which is the slavery typified by NAZI."

In Seattle at any rate, where residential consumers are enjoying the use of three times the national average of light and power at a cost of around one cent a kilowatt hour, the outcries of the private companies fall on deaf ears. When the Seattle owner of an "all-electric home" receives from City Light a monthly bill of only $5 for juice that runs an electric range and an automatic hot-water tank, in addition to his lighting and a number of electrical gadgets, he is not likely to be impressed with the "American Way" of free enterprise. Nor is the citizen of neighboring Tacoma, where the publicly owned plant charges the lowest rates in the country, or of the twenty or so other towns throughout the state that own their plants. Not long ago the Seattle City Council, by no stretch of the imagination a radical body, voted unanimously not to grant a franchise to Puget Power after its present franchise expires in 1952, thereby setting a precedent which future councils will find it difficult to ignore.

THE P. U. D.'s

Outside the cities, out in the grass roots and tall timber of the Northwest, the struggle continues. Here it is the rapid growth of Washington's "Public-Utility Districts" and Oregon's "People's Utility Districts" which the private interests are seeking to strangle. In Washington, which has one-fifth of the nation's hydroelectric power, with an aggregate potential of more than ten million horse-power, the Public-Utility Districts came into being as the result of an initiative enacted in 1930. The districts may buy and sell power inside and outside their limits, which are usually those of the county, and have the right of eminent domain—they may buy, condemn, or lease properties. Three commissioners elected by the district's voters run its affairs. Washington now has fifteen Public-Utility Districts in highly successful operation, saving customers huge sums in rates and making cheap and abundant power easily accessible to thousands of farmers and small home-owners. These P. U. D.'s are developing new types of public servants, who understand the problems of our future industrial and agricultural civilization. Instead of being high-pressure salesmen for Eastern holding companies, like the officials of privately owned utilities, the P. U. D. commissioners are farmers, workingmen, and small business men, responsive to the needs of the community.

Commissioner J. N. Erlandsen of Everett, Washington, for example, is an active unionist who has just announced that the Public-Utility District of Snohomish County will now proceed to construct its own system. He explains that this step is necessary in order to derive full benefit from cheap Bonneville power rates. The privately owned power company in the county wanted $13,500,000 for the properties involved in the condemnation suit, whereas the P. U. D.'s engineers valued them at no more than $4,000,000. Incidentally, the assessed value of the properties, on which the private company pays taxes, is but $900,000. Commissioner Doyle, of the militant Cowlitz County district, is a member of the Machinists' Union and former president of his local. Commissioner Marshall of Thurston County is a member of the United Mine Workers of America. It is significant that one of the first acts of the Washington Commissioners' Association was to insist that all Public-Utility Districts bargain collectively with unions.

While farmers are naturally more interested in the irrigation than in the power possibilities of the big dams, they too are strong for public power. The usually conservative Grange in both Oregon and Washington supports it wholeheartedly.

It was good to talk to those rugged men of the rank and file after a session with the watered-down descendants of the pioneers, city slickers calling themselves "free enterprisers." One district commissioner, a member of the C. I. O. Woodworkers' Union, said: "These private fellers can't get up enough enterprise, free or otherwise, to bring cheap juice from Bonneville right down the line. So we've got to get it for ourselves. We figure that's enterprising for everybody's good, the way it was out here in the early days. And we are appeasing nobody." This last was a reference to what many of the rank-andfile public-power men believe to be the over-cautious policies of some top men in the Bonneville administration. The commissioners don't accept the idea that we are heading for a reactionary regime after the war and so what's the use of fighting the privateers? Some would welcome the organization of a militant farmer-labor alliance for independent political action.

THE FIGHT LOOMS

Some sort of effective action in the political u well as the economic field must be taken-and soon-if there is not to be that mass exodus from the Northwest which forward-looking citizens fear when the curtain finally drops on the war. The plans of the capitalists in both old parties are plain enough, and the Northwestern delegation in Congress-which includes the progressive Homer T. Bone in the Senate and Representative John Coffee in the House—is now girding its loins against their political maneuverings. Evidently they hope to reduce the Northwest to its former subordinate position in the national economy, with shipping, lumber, and fishing its main enterprises. Indeed, S. W. Murphy, president of the Electric Bond and Share Company, has gone so far as to suggest that after the war Bonneville and Grand Coulee, together with the TVA, be sold to private interests for the purpose of "reducing the public debt." At a public meeting in December Henry Kaiser said that within a year after the war there would not be employment for more than 5 per cent of the workers now employed in his Portland shipyards. Behind the scenes there are moves to nip in the bud the hopeful start of a steel industry near the dams; though the coal in the region is mostly sub-bituminous or lowly lignite, geologists and engineers say that it could be put to productive use. Naturally the Alcoa crowd discourages the project of making aluminum from native clays in Oregon.

Already, through Jesse Jones's Defense Plant Corporation, the government has invested more than $170,-000,000 in the plants at the big dams, as compared with private industry's $27,000,000. The two chief products are aluminum and magnesium, the light metals of which tomorrow's world, according to the advertisements, will be fabricated. Nothing, of course, would please the ineffable Jones more than to give back the governmentsubsidized plants to the indicted Indians of Alcoa and Dow Chemical the minute the guns cease firing overseas. The erstwhile aluminum and magnesium monopolists are anguished to see Uncle Sam owning 70 per cent of the nation's aluminum-production facilities and 94 per cent of the magnesium facilities, and obtaining the power which is so large a factor in the production of both metals from publicly owned dams at $17.50 a kilowatt year-Bonneville's wholesale industrial rate.

The labor men whom I quoted above say that "thanks to public power the future of the Northwest is brighter than it has ever been before. Public power is cheap power, and cheap power is a strong industrial magnet." Hope for a continued high level of employment, they say, must be based on "the full utilization of the resources of the region. The most vital of these resources and the peculiar advantage of the Northwest is its hydroelectric energy, which exceeds that of any area of similar size on the continent." Here, they believe, "is the foundation for a post-war expansion unrivaled elsewhere on earth."

It is no private fight that is going on out there in our Inland Empire. We are all in it. If the present drive for a return to free enterprise succeeds in destroying the publicly owned projects in the Northwest, it will destroy the most hopeful opportunity in the United States for achieving full employment, production for use, and genuine industrial democracy.

In the Wind

REPRESENTATIVE MARCANTONIO of New York, attacking supporters of anti-poll-tax bills other than his own, has characterized one such opponent as "poll-taxer Dubinsky." The reference is not taken seriously by Mr. Dubinsky, president of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, but it must be sacrilege to the ears of Representative Rankin of Mississippi, who combines a fanatic devotion to the poll tax with a lively taste for anti-Semitism.

FROM THE NEW YORK Times account of a radio program whitewashing the record of the New York City police department in dealing with anti-Semitic violence: "Mayor LaGuardia declared that it was 'heartbreaking' that recent discussions have created the impression that there is racial or religious discord in the city."

THIS STATEMENT appeared not in PM but in the irreproachably conservative Printers' Ink, a magazine devoted to advertising and selling: "One huge defense plant has about four hundred Negro women in one separate division, mostly housewives. In effectiveness they outclass the main plant."

ON THE DISMISSAL of Dr. Francis E. McMahon from the faculty of Notre Dame University, the Catholic Herald-Citizen of Milwaukee has this to say: "Multiple harm to the church and to Catholic education is bound to result from such a happening. The smoldering forces of prejudice and anti-Catholic feeling existing in secular academic circles have been furnished ammunition for the favorite charge that Catholic education is purely authoritarian and basically in the fascist pattern."

FESTUNG EUROPA: The German Armaments Ministry reports that Allied air raids are keeping a million brick-layers busy on m full-time basis... The illegal newspaper La Libre Belgique reports that food prices have risen 350 to 750 per cent... Four Norwegian patriots called on m Quisling follower one evening recently, stripped him naked, carried him into the back yard, and stuffed him into his own garbage can.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—Editors the nation.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

ART YOUNG

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

THERE was something old-fashioned about Art Young, about his personality, his humor, his art, his radicalism. All were indigenous in the best sense of the word; all seemed to hail from a simpler, pre-industrial America, where individualism was personal, not political, where humor was broad, art was not a private language, and radicalism consisted of the moral conviction that all men are created equal and that it isn't fair for some people to have a lot while others have nothing.

This impression is reinforced by a reading of his autobiography. He grew up in the small town of Monroe, Wisconsin, where his father ran the local store. He began drawing pictures as soon as he could manage a pencil. And curiously enough, neither his parents nor the townspeople thought it was queer. On the contrary, he was praised and encouraged, in and out of school, and in his 'teens he held his first one-man show in the local post office. "There's a blank wall goin' to waste," said Bill Hoesly, the postmaster. "I guess Uncle Sam wouldn't object if you tacked up some of your masterpieces."

In Art's boyhood—he left the town in 1883—Monroe probably had more in common with the earlier America of itinerant painters than with the then burgeoning America of traveling salesmen. Money-grubbing was only beginning to be the national obsession. Artisans commanded more respect, and the distinction between artisans and artists was not so fiercely insisted upon; the fact that Art Young's mother was Pennsylvania Dutch may have contributed to the tolerance of art in the house. Then, of course, Art's subjects were the neighbors, and they were entertained by his pictures of them.

At seventeen, with no recorded opposition, he went to Chicago to make his way as an artist. He earned only a bare living, but he earned it doing what he wanted to do, and perhaps because of his early experience of being accepted on his own terms he seems never to have had the sense of being cut off from the general run of Americans or of being subject to any special hazards because he was an artist.

This uncomplicated assumption that there was nothing queer or sad about being an artist in America seems to me apparent in his work—in the direct, simple, self-confident line, the pleasure and spontaneity in attack, the absence of anything resembling personal bitterness, and the joyous inclusion of his well-rounded self in his cartoons.

His radicalism had the same healthy qualities. To him there seemed nothing queer or sad about being a radical either, and his attitude is perfectly illustrated in his picture of himself falling asleep at his own trial for "treason." He became a radical not because he had been hurt personally

To a leading lawyer of the village I expressed myself on the subject of war and militarism. I spoke particularly of the ex-soldiers sleeping in hallways and alleys of the cities—homeless and jobless.

"Oh!" said he, as if to dismiss the subject, "that happens after every war—it happened after the Civil War."

I was impressed as usual when reminded of a perfectly good precedent and a well-established custom.

but because what he saw going on didn't square either with his own feelings toward the next fellow, whoever that might be, or with the principles he had been brought up on in Monroe, Wisconsin. His "social consciousness," as we would say now, developed late—it began when he found out the truth about the Haymarket case—but it stayed put because it was an organic and indigenous growth. He was a Jeffersonian socialist, if I may coin a label. There was nothing exotic about Art Young.

I stress this fact because I'm tired of hearing the myth that socialism and internationalism are incompatible with the "American way." To Art Young they seemed a logical extension of the American way if the Declaration of Independence and the Bill of Rights mean what they say. And he was right.

The drawings reproduced here first appeared in these pages. Art Young began to draw for The Nation in 1922 when Oswald Garrison Villard asked him to contribute monthly page of his cartoons. It was called Looking On, and Art chose his own subjects. That was the beginning of collaboration and a friendship that never ended, though in his later years his work appeared all too seldom in our columns. I doubt very much that any of Art's thousand and one friendships ever ended, for his love of human beings was as irreversible as his hatred of the evils they invent.

Art Young Gets Busy

Santayana's Memoirs

PERSONS AND PLACES: THE BACKGROUND OF MY LIFE. By George Santayana, Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

THE philosopher who is also his own biographer—the metaphysician as memorialist—is not a familiar figure, not a classic type, in the history of literature; there are, of course, John Stuart Mill and Herbert Spencer, but unless Rousseau is a kind of exception, it is not very easy to think of others. Time was when one might have generalized against the possible union in one mind of a genius for dialectics and the autobiographer's gift of self-revelation; the editors of recent series-the "Library of Living Philosophies"have been undeterred by any such doubts, and the introductory personal essays in these volumes by men like Whitehead and G. E. Moore would seem to vindicate their confidence, for these essays are full of juice. In a similar volume, Irwin Edman's excellent edition of "The Philosophy of Santayana," there appeared A Brief History of My Opinions by Santayana himself, a vigorous fragment of autobiography which made one wonder what Epicurus or Spinoza would have done with a similar assignment; and now comes, by mysterious messengers from Rome, the first volume of what is apparently to be a very full memoir by Santayana—the story, this, of his childhood, boyhood, and college years.

It is an extraordinarily rich and delicate piece of writing: Santayana turns out to be a memorialist in the great tradition. The form, unlike that of the novel, is one in which he moves comfortably and with grace, and the qualities one failed to find in "The Last Puritan"—itself "A Memoir in the Form of a Novel"—qualities of vitality, of spontaneity, of naturalness and charitable humor—are abundantly here. In "The Last Puritan," one felt, Santayana was paying off too many old scores: they are paid now, presumably, and his spirit is free to expatiate over the past without acrimony, or with only the mild infusion of acrimony needful to give such work savor and character. There was an awkward disequilibrium in his novel between the writer's senses and his sentiments, between his perceptions of the outer world and his habitual abstractions; here, on the contrary, the two are polarized as they ought to be, and Santayana moves back and forth with an effortless irony and tenderness between the rather Goyaesque drawings he makes of Avila in his childhood and the "feeling" story of his early religiosity, between the jerry-built Back Bay of the seventies and the youthful origins of his pessimism, between a handed-down dress of his sister Susana's ("elaborate with a looped overskirt, yellow satin bow-knots, and scalloped edges") and the handed-down culture, as he saw it, of the Boston into which he was so traumatically flung at the very risky age of eight.

There is no doubt that it was a trauma, this shock of transplantation from his father's impecunious but slow-paced Old World household in Castilian Avila to the raw new mansions of Beacon Street and the improved methods of Miss Welchman's Kindergarten. The rather violent conflicts of direction and attachment that it produced have given poignancy and a rather stately pathos to all of Santayana's life as well as to his philosophy; a loss was suffered which he himself does not blink: "There was a terrible moral disinheritance involved," he says, "an emotional and intellectual chill, a pertiness and practicality of outlook and ambition, which I should not have encountered amid the complex passions and intrigues of a Spanish environment." But he adds that if his fate had been in one sense happier, and Spain or southern Europe his permanent home, he would not have been "the person that I am now"; he would certainly not have been the writer he ended by being, and the unique interest of his work as a philosopher-its curious, ambiguous, Mediterranean-Yankee unity in disparity-would have been replaced by something more acceptably uniform, perhaps, but surely less complex, less various, less vitally paradoxical. It was the tension between Santayana's Spanish heritage, his Spanish infancy, and that sensationally contrarious world of the Boston Latin School and Harvard under President Eliot that made possible "The Life of Reason" and "Realms of Being." We might have profited less from more coherent philosopher: we have after all, to that end, Unamuno-or William James.

Saved Again

Except for William James, as he remarked in A Brief History, Santayana's thought would never have taken just

-BOOK BARGAINS-

Original, handsome editions, new. Mailed postfree only in USA (Note: The first 50 orders will include a free copy of the "hord-to-get" Public Affairs Pemphle" The Races of Monkind.")
ABT YOUNG: His Life and Times (Autoblegraphy) profusely Hisstrated 467 pages 3.5 on list 2.65
THE DECLINE OF AMERICAN CAPITALISM: Lewis Garges,
8.50 pilet 1.75
ROOSEVELT'S FOREIGN POLICY (933-194), P. D. R.*; Unedited
Speeches, Messaces chromolocically arranged; inleved, 634 pp 9.75 Full 1.75
PREFACE TO SOCIAL ECONOMICS: John M. Cirk. 455 pp 2.75 F. M. 1.74
HOW TO FEEL BETTER & LOVE IT: Kimball & Allen. An outstending

MANNERS I MORALS OF BUSINESS: Max Radin. 270 pp. 2.50 Robert CRISIS OF THE MIDDLE CLASS: Lewis Corey, 379 pp. 2.50 Bist CAMBRIDGE HISTORY OF AMERICAN LITERATURE: Van Doren. Erskine & others, cognitice 3 volumes in 1. reprira DOWNTOWN BOOK BAZAAR, 212 B'way, ccr. Fulton St., N. Y. C. 7_

Will the Crash of 1929 Be Repeated . . . . How Soon?

To every person who knows that good Intentions and speeches cannot prevent another depression. . . .

To every open-minded person who will consider without prejudice a new concept of our economic system. . . .

ECONOMICS IS AN EXACT SCIENCE

By JEROME LEVY

shows algebraically how profits ann be raised to a level that will induce private industry to employ every worker . . . under conditions that give labor a greater share of the nation's wealth.

Over 500 pages

Use coupon below

NEW ECONOMIC LIBRARY 1270 Broadway, New York 1, N. Y.

For the enclosed $3.50 please send me a copy of ECONOMICS IS AN EXACT SCIENCE. I may return the book for full refund within 14 days.

ame
ddress

the turn it did, and one cannot read this new book without feeling in how many ways the discomforts, the antagonisms, even the denials of Santayana's long life in this country kept his senses on the alert and his wits on the stretch: perhaps the all but literally Portuguese Jew Spinoza gained some such good from Amsterdam and The Hague. It is true that, from Santayana's point of view, America had a mainly negative and astringent value for him, and a deep-rooted American will not feel that either "The Last Puritan" or "Persons and Places" does justice to what was most creative in America even in the years they cover-to that perfection which, as Santayana says here and elsewhere, every form of life has in its own fashion. He missed rather more than he saw, or he would hardly have thought J. S. Sargent one of "the two most creditable living Americans." What he missed is perhaps, as Henry James once put it, the American's secret-"his joke, as one may say"-and during this dark night of the European soul, with the spectacle of Europe's tragic failure and ruin before us, we can be neither vainglorious nor cringing on that score. American readers of these books can make their own reservations, mainly in silence, and meanwhile there is much to be learned from them. No one but Santayana could have seen just what he saw in the New England of the Age of Howells: his memories of those decades have a fictional sharpness, a precision of imagery, a piercing psychological quality that one finds in few comparable American autobiographies. NEWTON ARVIN

Lend-Lease Saga

LEND-LEASE, WEAPON FOR VICTORY. By Edward R. Stettinius, Jr. The Macmillan Company. $3.

T END-LEASE is a misnomer. The term served well enough, perhaps, in the adolescent days when we were talking of a "defense program" in terms of "cash-and-carry neutrality" and "aid to Britain" and "measures short of war." It had its origin in the President's famous pressconference parable about lending a garden hose to a neighbor whose house was on fire. But once the conflagration reached our own house, we ceased to be lenders or leasers and became instead full partners in a great community effort to extinguish the blaze.

Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., who managed this mechanism with distinguished effectiveness, has written a compact and sometimes exciting chronicle of its accomplishments. The story of lend-lease is, in essence, the story of this country's slow response to the threat of Axis aggression, its miraculous marshaling of its strength, and its adaptation to problems of coalition warfare on a planetary scale. The book provides, perhaps, the best short history of the American war effort yet published.

In 1939 American shipyards turned out 28 ocean-going vessels; our airplane factories produced 2,100 military planes, most of them trainers; tank production was practically nonexistent. We lacked shipyard and plant facilities to do much more than this. The facilities were created in large part by French and British orders placed in 1939 and 1940-paid for by British cash on the barrelhead until that cash was virtually exhausted. Without this prodding of American production we should have been greatly retarded in meeting our own emergency when it came upon us at the end of 1941.

He recalls those feverish days when American industry was beginning to flex its muscles. Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau was delegated to channel the foreign purchasing and did so with imaginative awareness of its importance to us. Our own army and navy demands, piled on top of foreign orders, swamped the factories. The President laid down his rule of thumb for the equal division of weapons between the British and ourselves. Destroyers were swapped for island bases. France fell, and the British purchasing officials over here made the tough decision to take over all French commitments. After Dunkirk, with all its modern equipment lost, Britain stood in imminent danger of invasion. President Roosevelt rounded up World War I weapons stored away in American arsenals, most of them more or less obsolete-Enfield rifles, 75's, an assortment of machineguns-and ordered them rushed to Gravesend Bay, where they were loaded on British freighters. To do this within the fiction of neutrality, it was necessary to go through the ritual of selling the arms to the United States Steel Export Company, which, in turn, as a private enterpriser sold them at cost to the British government. "For weeks," says Mr. Stettinius, "while England's war factories worked night and day to make up the losses in Flanders, there were few guns in all of Britain that could stop a tank besides the nine hundred 75's from America. The 80,000 Lewis, Marlin, Browning, and Vickers machine-guns strengthened the defenses of every threatened beachhead and every road leading in from the coast."

Lend-lease itself, when it was finally adopted in March, 1941, started as a trickle; most of our munitions were still "on order." But it has grown to a torrent. Mr. Stettinius's later chapters detail the enormous obstacles overcome in getting food and arms across dangerous seas to Britain, China, and the Soviet Union. For the casual reader the account is perhaps overstudded with statistics. But even these are enlivened and made meaningful by a set of brilliantly original maps and pictographs designed by Irving Geis.

Lend-lease provided an essential weapon for victory. But in Mr. Stettinius's view it provided something even more important—the pattern by which victory was to be achieved, the pattern of the United Nations. It implemented coalition warfare, integrated the resources of the Allies. Mr. Stettinius went to England in the summer of 1942 and saw how our war efforts had intermingled. He saw Lancasters made in part out of lend-lease aluminum, Spitfires flown by American crews, and Flying Fortresses based on landing fields built out of reverse lend-lease funds. Sometimes the R. A. F. and the U. S. A. A. F. occupied air bases jointly. The conclusion that Mr. Stettinius reached was this: "It is all the same war. Who can say which of us has given most of what we had to give? We cannot measure their lives against our dollars, or their pounds or rubles against our lives. We cannot balance the cost of a ruined city against the cost of a thousand tanks, or the courage of the underground in Europe against the courage of American boys in New Guinea and the courage of their mothers at home. It would be impossible, indeed a sacrilege, to attempt to balance such a ledger."

This is the nub of the lesson which an American business

This book tells you the truth about YUGOSLAVIA

MY NATIVE LAND

By Louis Adamic

The first full-length report on the Partisan-Chetnik conflict in Yugoslavia. It will tell you what's behind the Tito-Mihailovich feud, who's behind Tito, who's behind Mihailovich, the difficult problem created by King Peter's government in exile.

"A distinguished writer, unimpressed by the Mihailovich legend, sees his native Yugoslavia "B" a political battleground between Anglo-American and Soviet interests. Presented with intelligence and passion."—N. Y. York Times Book Review.

"Based on sensational documents and cemented with profound knowledge."—Chicago Sun. $3.75

HARPER & BROTHERS

Now in one volume!

The great Yugoslavian travel-diary

BLACK LAMB GREY FALCON

by Rebecca West

"The best book in come out of the war."

-WILLIAM SHIRER.

"Probably the greatest book written since the war begin."

—DOROTHY THOMPSON.

THE VIKING PRESS

$5.00

To keep fully informed on the rapidly developing situation in Yugoslavia and the Balkans—which is of the greatest importance to America—read

The BULLETIN of

THE UNITED COMMITTEE OF SOUTH-SLAVIC AMERICANS

Edited by

LOUIS ADAMIC

and the pamphlets issued by this Committee.

SEND IN YOUR ADDRESS FOR THE MAILING LIST

No charge; the cost is covered by voluntary contributions of South-Slavic Americans supporting the Liberation movement in the Balkans.

LISE THE BLANK BELOW:

UNITED COMMITTEE OF SOUTH-SLAVIC AMERICANS 1010 Park Ave., New York 28, N. Y.

Please put me on the mailing list for your BULLETIN and your other publications. My address is (write it clearly):

man has learned from two and a half years at the helm of lend-lease operations. It is a lesson which still needs to be learned among his countrymen—a lesson which the President has shied away from teaching.

ALAN BARTH

Polls Versus Elections

ASSIGNMENT: U. S. A. By Selden Menefee. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

If YOU have been out of the country since Pearl Harbor you will be brought completely up to date by Selden Menefee's "liberal's-eye" view of America at war. He covered 15,000 miles for Princeton's Office of Public Opinion Research. Most of his specific observations, but not all, would cause little disagreement among liberals. Exceptions would include his blanket indorsement of the incentive-pay plan for industry, which was overwhelmingly opposed by the recent United Automobile Workers' convention, and his opinion that after the hoped-for repeal of the pol! tax the hundreds of thousands of new voters "will vote against those Congressmen who have opposed all liberal reforms." Most students of the South are much less sure that this will be the result, at least until after a long period of education.

Menefee's direct personal observations are buttressed by a summary of the findings of the professional opinion testers. Their joint conclusion is not only encouraging but often so optimistic as to seem somewhat naive to those concerned with concrete political problems. The American people, according to Menefee and the opinion testers, are ready for any sacrifice necessary to win the war. Furthermore, while they may be misinformed on some issues and at times inconsistent in their opinions, "they are basically in agreement on all major democratic aims of the war and for the peace to come. This is in a very real sense a people's war, and our citizens are determined that it shall be followed by people's peace, both at home and abroad."

If this conclusion is fully justified, the American people are, indeed, the least articulate people in the world and have the least control over their elected representatives. The emasculation of price control and other war agencies, the assassination of the National Resources Planning Board, the almost complete burial of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill for social security, the reelection of most of the Congressional obstructionists and the defeat of many liberal representatives, these and countless other recent events can hardly be passed over as minor errors in the expression of popular opinion. The polls Menefee cites prove only that most of our citizens are well-intentioned but generally unaware of the problems facing the country and consequently inconsistent in their own convictions. Overwhelmingly agreed on the necessity of America's participation in world affairs and on the need for real sacrifices to insure the peace, our people nevertheless expect payment for lend-lease materials, are unwilling to give up our military establishment even if other nations do likewise, will insist on reparations payments and on the continuation of tariff barriers. While few Americans want us to annex territory after victory, "six-sevenths of us think we should have more military bases outside the country than we had before the war." Although the polls show a deep concern regarding post-war unemployment, four-fifths of all those now employed are convinced that they will retain their present jobs, and of the remaining fifth only one in twenty expects trouble in finding another job. Seventy per cent of those who have heard of the NRPB proposals favor them, but only a third of the people want "changes" after the war and 58 per cent favor the status quo.

All of which adds up to the fact that anything can be proved—and usually is—by public-opinion polls. The widest discrepancies often exist between the results of opinion polls and elections, as Dr. Gallup found out in 1942. An extreme example is cited by Menefee: While most farmers felt in early 1943 that the Administration had given labor more of the breaks, 45 per cent of the farmers preferred a Congress dominated by labor to one controlled by big business and only 25 per cent were of the opposite opinion. Compare this with the election results of 1942 and 1943! It becomes abundantly clear that Dr. Gallup and his colleagues could get us a more liberal government than the traditional elections have brought forth. The difference is apathy. Dr. Gallup is a simplified voting machine that comes around to your front door. But widespread apathy is a danger sign in a democracy.

No one could question Mr. Menefee's findings that the American people are behind this war, as proved by their enthusiastic enlistments, their purchases of war bonds, and their participation in civilian defense activities. Undoubtedly former America Firsters, with some exceptions in the lunatic fringe, have participated as wholeheartedly as former Fighters for Freedom. But this is to be expected in any country where national pride is intact. To conclude from this patriotic enthusiasm that the American people share Mr. Menefee's liberal interpretation of the meaning of the war and will follow through on the implications of that interpretation seems unwarranted. The tendency to over-optimism detracts only slightly from an otherwise competent job of reporting and analysis.

JAMES LOEB, JR.

Fiction in Review

EVEN at the risk of personal confession, I want to men-tion, for the light it may throw on an aspect of the contemporary literary scene which has not been spoken of very frankly, the reason for my three months' delay in reviewing Christine Weston's "Indigo" (Scribner's, $2.50). Mrs. Weston's novel is outstandingly good, by all odds the most satisfactory novel I have read in the last year and a half of reviewing. It starts poorly, however, and after the first twenty or thirty pages, which I read shortly after publication, I set it aside in favor of a score of books which have since proved to be of infinitely less merit. But my indifference was not only a response to the novel's own lack of initial interest. If "Indigo" had been one of those books which has to make its way without encouragement from either publisher or critics, I'm sure I would have read it through at once, despite its poor start, in the hope of uncovering neglected talent. But "Indigo" came to me as a Literary Guild selection, slated for a large audience, and already praised by the popular reviewers in the usual amorphous, inconsequential terms; and I allowed its apparent popular appeal to confirm me in the

TO THE MILLIONS WHO READ THE STORY

as best-seller...to you we say, "The picture is all you hoped it would be!"

TO THOSE WHO DID NOT READ IT

We say, sincerely... "here is a motion picture that will endure an long and the human heart has the power to feel... to love... to triumph!"

Broadway
at 49th St,

CONTINUOUS PERFORMANCES

ADMISSION PRICES:

Opening to 6 p. m. 75¢ and $1.10 (Except Sat., Sun. & Holidays) & p. m. to closing $1.10 & $1.65. Children half-price at all perfs.

NOTE: "THE SONG OF BERNADETTE" WILL NOT BE SHOWN AT REGULAR ADMISSION PRICES BEFORE 19461

4th WAR LOAN DRIVE . . . BUY AN EXTRA BOND!

impression—later to be shown so mistaken—that it was only another of the bad books which sell well.

If this were merely a private snobbery it would scarcely be worth speaking of. But I know it reflects the common attitude among people who take literature seriously. Obviously, this section of literary opinion is not wholly, or even primarily, responsible for its aloofness from the popular: it has grown so accustomed to having books which are praised in superlatives and bought in the hundred thousands turn out to be valueless that it reacts violently from popular judgment; and after all, when the popular reviewers do hit a really good book, like "Indigo," their praise makes no distinction between it and the last book they admired. But there is implicit in our caste feelings-and this is the dangerous snobbery—the assumption that no book which is popular can possibly be either good or interesting; we see this point of view exemplified, for instance, in the ungrounded and unthoughtful way in which the reviewer for the New Republic dismissed Marquand's last novel, or in the restricted choice of books for even unfavorable comment

MOTION PICTURES

"A tremendously provocative film . . . absorbing in its revelations of character and its brilliantly pictorialized details."

—Bosley Crowther, N. Y. Times.

ALFRED HITCHCOCK'S
PRODUCTION OF THE PRODUCTION

TALLULAH BANKHEAD

with WILLIAM BENDIX

and

WALTER SLEZAK • MARY ANDERSON = JOHN HODIAK
HENRY HULL = HEATHER ANGEL = HUME GRONYN = CANADA LEE

A Twentieth Century-Fox Picture

Continuous
Performances A S

ASTOR 45th 5t.;

MERLE GEORGE
OBERON SANDERS

CREGAR

B'way at

THE LODGER

"A magnificent example of its type and a magnificent picture as well."

-Alton Cook, N. Y. World-Telegram
Plus g sensational In-person show

Chamber Music Society of Lower Basin Street

Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave al

STAGE PLAY

"A definite hit . . . gay, glib, daffy — enormously funny."
—Morehouse, Sun.

RUTH GORDON in OVER TWENTY-ONE in the serious literary quarterlies. We seem to forget that, in their day, half the very great novels were also great popular successes, and even more important, we foster, by dissociating the serious from the popular, a tragic parochialism in our serious writers.

Like all good novels, Mrs. Weston's book is addressed to many different levels of audience, welcoming the reader's own supplement of awarene's and creativity. It is full of the color of its setting, India; it is extremely well written in a relaxed, informed, commentative prose, and it is thick with modulations and insights. It has a constantly absorbing plot; it even has violence and melodrama, though its most dramatic moment is beautifully still, a matter of the quiet reading of a letter. Best of all, it has the most attractive characters I have come across in a contemporary novel.

The three main characters, whom we meet in their early boyhood and follow into maturity—the novel ends after the start of the last war-are Jacques, the son of a bigoted Frenchwoman; Hardyal, the son of an assimilated Indian lawyer; and Macbeth, son of an English army officer. In youth the three boys love each other very much. But Mrs. Weston knows that without the right political conditions for love, love can be destroyed, and her history of the three friends works out to be the tragic record of three political victims. Not that "Indigo," because it deals with the Indian problem, is a schematic study in racial and political conflicts: with the true novelist's instinct for knowing how to deal with social questions, Mrs. Weston doesn't raise issues; she sets them vibrating out of human situations, and she is far too subtle to resolve people into symbols for political groups. But just as surely as Mrs. Weston knows that youth has its peculiar generosity and that only in such rare cases as that of Mrs. Lyttleton, Jacques's eccentric old friend, or of Jacques himself, whose loyalty to Hardyal is as luminous and ineffectual as everything else in his character, is it preserved into maturity, she knows that her characters are the victims of the special Indian fate. "Indigo" is as informative about India as E. M. Forster's "A Passage to India"-a novel it may not equal in emotional force but one with which it can well stand comparison; and like Forster's novel, it is in the business of asking questions, not answering them. There is this important difference between them, however, and it is perhaps the best clue I can give, in such brief space, to the particular charm of Mrs. Weston's book: if "A Passage to India" asks whether for lack of love an empire will be lost, "Indigo" asks whether because of empire all these wonderful possibilities of love will be lost.

Mrs. Weston resembles Forster in the quality of her novelistic intelligence. Like him, she has what looks so mild and is really so courageous—the ability to modulate character, even to allow character to peter out of existence: thus, Gisèle, Jacques's sister, disappears from the story leaving behind her only a trailing scent of iniquity, and Mrs. Lyttleton, the less grand but more endearing counterpart of Forster's Mrs. Moore, loses her grip on the book long before she actually dies. But "Indigo" is full of beautifully conceived details to isolate for comment. It affirms what so much present-day fiction seems to conspire to deny—the wonderful pleasure of reading a good novel.

DIANA TRILLING

MUSIC

THE Short Symphony by Aaron Copland that Stokowski played at an N. B. C. Symphony broadcast proved to be one of the ugly works that Copland was turning out a number of years ago. His latest piece, the Sonata for violin and piano that he played with Ruth Posselt at a Boosey and Hawkes concert, began Andante semplice with melodic fragments and chord progressions reminiscent of "Billy the Kid" and "Rodeo" which led one to think for a moment that these works had established an idiom for all his writing. But once the Sonata got going Allegro there was a change to thematic substance that was astringent and arid and rhythmically spastic, and that was kept going with Copland's tremendous professional competence and efficiency and assurance.

On the afternoon that Stokowski played the Short Symphony the Budapest Quartet played a new quartet by Hindemith at the Frick Collection. This work—in sound, in what the sound conveyed—was a horror; and as I listened I kept thinking it was bad enough that anyone had to write something like that himself, but appalling that such a person was teaching young Americans with talent for composition and influencing them to write in the same way.

This may be the point at which to speak of the extremely bad transmission of the Frick Collection concerts in WNYC's broadcasts, evidently because of poor equipment. In addition it has been interesting to observe the carrying over of some of the presentation practices of American commercial broadcasting into the broadcasts of this completely non-commercial station. This is the first year, for example, that WNYC has broadcast the Frick concerts in their entirety; previously it cut them off at 4:00, as though it were WIZ cutting off the New Friends of Music concert at 6:30 because the time was sold. Moreover WNYC can no more trust its audience to listen to music without endless and useless talk than N. B. C. or C. B. S. or WQXR; and just as N. B. C.'s announcer must tell us a last time that "Arturo Toscanini now conducts the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony No. 1" even if he has to talk it right into the performance, so WNYC's announcer talked his chatter right into performances by Schnabel and Landowska,

To go on with music and performances: I got a great deal of pleasure from a rehearing of Beethoven's wonderful last Sonata for violin and piano. Opus 96, and from a rehearing of the playing-that is, the technical competence and fine musicianship—of Orrea Pernel, who performed the work with Bruce Simonds. And I got more of the same kind of pleasure from the great Chaconne of Bach's D minor Partita ... it was played by young Isaac Sternwith simplicity and yet with warmth, with temperament and yet with a sense for plastic contour and coherence that produced a beautifully integrated and superbly effective statement of the piece.

I also spent an hour at one of Eddie Condon's Saturday afternoon jazz concerts in Town Hall, where the participants included good players like Miff Mole and Billy Butterfield and some who were less good and "Pee Wee" Russell who I think is terrible, and where some of the performances were exciting and others merely pounded along.

Don't miss Winthrop Sargeant's article on Toscanini in the January 17 issue of Life. And if you want an authoritative account of the life of Tchaikovsky you will find it in Herbert Weinstock's biography (Knopf, $5). What you will find in Richard Anthony Leonard's "The Stream of Music" (Doubleday, Doran, $4.50) you may have had to listen to in Toscanini's broadcasts but you can refuse to read.

B. H. HAGGIN

FILMS

CINCE nothing is more repugnant to me than the pseudo-religious, I went to "The Song of Bernadette" gritting my teeth against my advance loathing. But since, also, many of the deepest resonances of my childhood are Catholic; and since I intensely suspect and fear the implacable pieties of those who deny the rationally inexplicable even when they are being beaten over the head with it; and since, accordingly, I feel a triumphant pride in the work or mere existence of true artists and of the truly experienced in religion, I was unexpectedly and greatly moved by great many things in the film. I owe this somewhat indecently subjective preface because I doubt that the film can be strongly recommended to anyone whose mind and emotions lack some similar shape. I can add only that the picture is unusually well made—within limits.

The limits are those of middle-class twentieth-century genteelism, . fungus which by now all but chokes the life out of any hope from Hollywood and which threatens any vivid appetite in Hollywood's audience. In proportion to the excellence any given film achieves within these limits-which can be considerable-I suppose it is the more pernicious. If that is so, "Bernadette" is a champion enemy. For within those genteel limits I have seldom seen so tender and exact an attention to mood, to over-all tone, to cutting, to the edging of an emotion, and to giving vitality, sometimes radiance, in terms of the image and the sound more than of the character, the story, the line, the music. Jennifer Jones especially, as Bernadette, whether through Henry King's direction or her own ability, impossibly combines the waxen circumspections of convent school with abrupt salients of emotion of which Dostoevski himself need not have been ashamed.

But Bernadette Soubirous and the cruel, ridiculous, and unfathomable concentrics which spread from her naive ecstasy composed one of the most appalling and instructive events of our time; to the reproduction of which only an almost unimaginably brilliant film could have been adequate. What you have here, instead, is a tamed and pretty image, highly varnished, sensitively lighted, and exhibited behind immaculate glass, the window at once of a shrine and of a box-office.

JAMES AGEB

CONTRIBUTORS

LOUIS WITOLD is the pseudonym of an influential European whose advice on political and technical questions was highly regarded in Geneva in the years after the last war.

McALISTER COLEMAN is a journalist who has long been active in the fight for lower electric rates and public control of the industry. He is head of the information bureau of the Utility Users' Protection League of New Jersey.

NEWTON ARVIN, professor of English at Smith College, is the author of "Hawthorne" and "Whitman."

ALAN BARTH is an editorial writer for the Washington Post. He was formerly on the staff of the OWI.

JAMES LOEB, JR., is executive secretary of the Union for Democratic Action.

The Plot Against Yugoslavia

[Continued from page 122]

Kosanovich was far from being a lone voice. Within a month from the day the Srbobran launched its campaign, Ivan Subasich, the Governor of Croatia, who was then on a visit to the United States, was shocked by the attitude of the paper and its adherents. Protesting against the appointment of Fotich as ambassador against the majority opinion of the Cabinet, he cabled Premier Simovich on December 10, 1941, as follows:

It is evident that the legation has identified itself with the writings of Srbobran. The government has taken no steps against the legation, and this fact is interpreted by Yugoslavs in America to mean that the government approves. Our representatives in the United States have carried matters so far at Consul V. Mirkovich openly stated at a meeting in Chicago that from now on he is a consul of Serbia only, and no longer of Yugoslavia.

And again on February 19, 1942, he cabled to Slobodan Jovanovich, who had succeeded General Simovich as Premier:

Everybody here who has m feeling for Yugoslavia considers Srbobran's activity m weapon for destroying the last ties of Yugoslavia and for establishing only a Great Serbia, with Serb hegemony over the Balkans. This activity is led by Minister Jovan Douchich and the Episcopate of the Serbian Orthodox Church in the United States. And it is openly approved by the Royal Yugoslav embassy in Washington.

Fotich took no chance of failure when he selected the Srbobran for his purposes. So great is that paper's devotion to Serbs of all kinds that as recently as May 18, 1943, it still refused to condemn the Quisling regime of General Nedich: "It has not yet been proved whether Nedich is a traitor or = 'practical man' . . . we do not defend Nedich since we do not know what his role is in occupied Serbia." In any event, the Srbobran was not slow in taking up the Fotich view, and from November 16, 1941, to the present it has been unremitting in its vituperation against all things Croatian and against the whole idea of a restored Yugoslavia. The following quotations are offered to give the reader a faint idea of the intensity with which the spokesman of the Greater Serbians in America addressed itself to the task of undermining my country and, whether he acknowledges it or not, the country of Ambassador

... only people of political ignorance or bad faith can dream of the possibility that Serbs and Croats can meet again to conclude new agreement. (November 14, 1941.)

... the unbridgeable events in our country have forever designated the Serbs as Chetniks and the Croats as Ustachi. (November 28, 1941.)

Yugoslavia is an abortive child of megalomaniacs. (April 7, 1941.)

. . . since it is impossible to establish "brotherhood" between the Serbs and the Croats after all that has happened . . no one has the right to request the restoration of the former Yugoslavia. That such a Yugoslavia will never again be restored, a guaranty is being given to those in Zagreb by the Chetniks who are fighting with Draja Mihailovich. (July 9, 1942.)

. . . the establishment of Yugoslavia proved to be a tragic failure. Because of that fatal error the Serbs have so far lost many hundreds of thousands of lives at the hands of their enemies within the common state. (March 24, 1943.)

. . . in all crimes against the Serbs the Catholic church has actively participated. (November 4, 1941.)

We know that the absolute majority of Croats, . . . have a common irrepressible hatred for Serbianism, Orthodoxy, and the Serbs in general. . . The Croats did not massacre the Serbs because of their own or Serbian nationality, since the Croats have no nationality. They killed the Serbs and are still doing so for one reason only—because of their own religious intolerance. (March 22, 1943.)

It was this journal that enjoyed the favor of the Yugoslav embassy in Washington to the extent that when King Peter visited the United States, Fotich arranged to have him photographed with a copy of the Srbobran. Posed with the King were all the leading officials of the Serb National Federation, distinguished for their untiring efforts to destroy the unity of Yugoslavia. It is worth noting in connection with the embassy's relations with the Srbobran that a number of articles of an inflammatory character which had originally appeared anonymously were reprinted after the death of Jovan Douchich, former minister to Franco Spain. On their second appearance these bitterly anti-Croat pieces carried the signature of Douchich, who at the time he wrote them was on the pay roll of the Yugoslav government.

Similarly, the embassy extended its blessing to the Serbian National Defense Council, the personnel of which is closely linked to the Srbobran. Colonel Dragutin Savich, chief of the Royal Yugoslav military mission in Canada, and Consul Voislav Mirkovich were both present at the council's congress in Chicago, at which the following declaration was adopted:

The state of Yugoslavia was a Versailles experiment built on the well-meant but erroneous belief that similarity of blood can itself create unity. . . Yugoslavia must not and never will be reestablished, since it could be of advantage only to the Croats. . . We respectfully but urgently call upon His Majesty King Peter II . . . to take his stand at the side of the loyal Serbs, to dismiss his Croat advisers, and to announce himself what his famous and democratic grandfather Peter I was proud to be—King of Serbia.

It was no wonder that Elmer Davis, director of the Office of War Information, feared the extent to which such propaganda might undermine morale by precipitating trouble among Yugoslav workers in war plants. In a special release dated June 1, 1943, Mr. Davis said:

For some time several branches of the United States government, including the OWI, the Department of Justice, and the Department of State, have watched with concern the policies of the American Steboran. Its violent attacks upon all people of Croatian extraction and their clergy, its strong anti-Catholic articles, and its veiled efforts to defend the Quisling Nedich... have the effect of aiding the Nazi campaign of race intolerance and hate, and are damaging the American war effort.

MIHAILOVICH

When word first reached us, in the fall of 1941, that a resistance movement had crystallized about the person of Draja Mihailovich, there was general rejoicing at the legation, though none of us knew exactly who the hero was, and even our military attaché wasn't sure of his correct name. It was enough for us to know that Yugoslavs were still in the field against the enemy, and from left to right the Yugoslav Americans hailed Mihailovich as the symbol of resurrection. Fotich and some of his pan-Serb aides were a little doubtful when it developed that Mihailovich was a clever young colonel who had never displayed much fondness for the generals, but they soon discovered that he meant to operate in the framework of the old Serb Chetnik tradition and they lost their uneasiness. And so, favored on all sides, Mihailovich in that winter of 1941-42 grew to legendary stature and came to rank in glamour with Mac-Arthur and Timoshenko.

The pan-Serbian clique sitting in London were not long in recognizing Mihailovich as their natural savior. In January, 1942, the government in exile underwent its first major crisis. The extremists had long hoped to unseat Simovich as Prime Minister. Public opinion at home held him and his colleagues chiefly responsible for the capitulation. The Serbian military clique sadly needed rehabilitation. What could be better than to unseat Simovich and focus attention on the young Serb officer who provided exactly the aura of heroism required to refurbish the tarnished tradition of fighting Serbia-and who incidentally was too far off to create political complications in the government. Simovich was ousted in favor of Slobodan Iovanovich, a mildly liberal historian, and Mihailovich was made Minister of War. This was the peak of the hero's career and the beginning of his downfall.

From the day he accepted Cabinet rank Mihailovich became more and more the exclusive representative of the Serbian tradition, committed, like the colleagues who had promoted him, to a Greater Serbia rather than a restored Yugoslavia. In January, 1943, Nova Hrvatska, organ of the Croat puppet regime, printed a map purporting to have been captured from Mihailovich detachment and showing a postwar Greater Serbia, with Croatia reduced to the proportions of a county. A map showing remarkably similar boundaries appeared six months later in the Srbobran as the avowed objective of the Greater Serbs. In all their speeches and propaganda the pan-Serb clique, particularly Nincich, Milan Gavrilovich, and Fotich, harped on Serbian resistance, the Serbian people, the Serbian Minister of War, and the wonderful fight he was putting up in the Serbian mountains.

All political, military, and administrative power in the liberated areas filtered down from London by way of Mihailovich, and the process was dangerous. In a country composed of three peoples this concentration of power in the hands of one man—a separatist at that—was bound to have the gravest consequences. Since the times were far from normal and the country dismembered, with communications woefully lacking, the attempt to impose one-man rule from abroad promised only civil war—and the promise was soon fulfilled.

THE INFORMATION CENTER

In the fall of 1941 a Royal Government mission arrived in the United States for the purpose of keeping this country informed of developments in stricken Yugoslavia. It was felt, correctly, that distorted news from a Pavelich-ridden Croatia and Nedichridden Serbia might cause dangerous repercussions in the large Yugoslav population here, to say nothing of confusion in American official circles. After some months of preliminary work, the mission established in New York a Royal Yugoslav Information Center, and I was transferred from Washington to take charge of the press service.

The atmosphere in the center was completely different from that of the embassy, as the legation had now become. The men who composed the mission were, to begin with, openly and sincerely pro-Yugoslavia. They wanted the country restored, they were free of the chauvinist sectional passions that prevailed at the embassy, and their watchword was unity. The problems that beset the government in London were thrashed out in a genuine effort to achieve solutions beneficial to the country as a whole, and in a completely democratic spirit. By and large the Croats were represented on the mission by Dr. I. Subasich, the Serbs by Sava Kosanovich, and the Slovenes by Franc

From the very launching of the project, the center was regarded by the embassy and the Srbobran with scorn and hostility, Kosanovich, Subasich, Boris Furlan, Nicola Mirkovich, and myself being special targets for their abuse. The Srbobran attacked us all anti-Serbian, Ustachi-fascist, or Communist, depending on the prevailing mood of its editors. It occasionally converted the contraction "Yugocenter," by which we were commonly known, to "Judocenter," revealing more of its own nature than of ours. The embassy crowd sneered at us as "gentlemen traveling through the United States, doing nothing but spending government money."

Fotich did everything possible to paralyze our efforts at promoting unity, watching us like a hawk and reporting in detail to London.

For four months we enjoyed harmony at least among ourselves at the center, although one member of the mission, Bogoljub Jevtich, lost little time in jockeying himself into a dictatorial position. Formerly Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs, Jevtich differed from Fotich in that he wanted reconstituted Yugoslavia, but he favored high degree of centralized and dictatorial rule and actively opposed the democratic inclinations of the rest of us. He once told us that "if General Mihailovich did not exist, it would have been necessary to invent him." His attitude, however, did not prevent us from doing as useful a job as the Washington diplomats allowed, and we would have continued to work with effectiveness had not a development occurred which was to affect Yugoslavs even more profoundly, and more significantly, than the Serb-Croat division.

CHETNIK-AXIS WAR ON THE PARTISANS

Until midsummer of 1942 if there was one point of agreement among all Yugoslavs in exile it was support for Mihailovich. Not having been in my native land since the war broke out, I cannot pretend to first-hand knowledge of Mihaikovich's conduct, and it is not my purpose here to repeat the extremely able accounts and analyses of the struggle between Chetniks and Partisans which have appeared elsewhere. The story has been particularly well told by Louis Adamic in his "My Native Land" and more recently by C. L. Sulzberger in the New York Times of December 22, 1943. My function is merely to show in general how that struggle was reflected in Yugoslav government circles and in particular how it prevented the government in exile from frustrating the will of its own people.

My first intimation that all was not well came with the visit of Foreign Minister Nincich in June, 1942. Taking me aside, he advised me, much to my astonishment, that I was to do all I could to defend Mihailovich among liberal and leftist groups and papers in this country. I told him there was no need for such insistence inasmuch Mihailovich already enjoyed great prestige in all circles here and had an excellent press. He emphasized the point repeatedly, however, and all but exacted pledge from me.

A month later the meaning of this strange talk became perfectly clear. Word reached us, by way of the Inter-Continent News, that a manifesto had been issued in Montenegro by seventyfive representatives of the various democratic Yugoslav parties denouncing Mihailovich for collaborating with the enemy. From that time on, evidence accumulated showing the lengths to which Mihailovich allowed himself to go in his frantic attempt to suppress anti-Axis forces more representative of the Yugoslav people than his own tradition-bound Chetniks. From reports smuggled out of the country and confirmed several times over we learned bit by bit that Mihailovich had shifted his attention from fighting the invader to conducting a terrific internal war against those independent guerrilla groups which had gradually merged their forces under the leadership of the mysterious "General Tito." I will mention here only a few evidences of this

In March, 1943, the People's Army of Liberation, as Tito's Partisans officially called themselves, captured a field post in which several documents were left behind by the retreating Chetniks. One of them was an agreement, concluded the preceding September, between one of Mihailovich's officers, Dobroslav Jevdjevich, and the Italian general Mario Roatta, who was responsible for the Fascist campaign of atrocities in the Balkans. The agreement constituted a pledge by the Italian command to supply Mihailovich's Chetniks with arms, provisions, and money to cover army wages, "which will be increased and equaled to the salary of the Italian soldiers." Belated confirmation of this report came in the form of a United Press dispatch on November 12, 1943, in which a Budapest correspondent of the Swiss Neue Zürcher Zeitung was quoted as saying that an agreement for "maintenance of order" had been reached on September 29, 1942, by General Mihailovich's commander in eastern Bosnia and the Italian commander in Yugoslavia. The Italians, it appeared, realized they would have to fight the Partisans and were delighted to have the Chetniks on their side to whatever extent was possible. When news of the understanding leaked out, the correspondent reported, many of Mihailovich's followers left the Chetnik ranks and joined Tito.

Another high Chetnik officer, Major Dangich, went even farther. Presumably with the knowledge of his superiors, he went to Belgrade and entered into discussions with General Nedich, the puppet Premier, concerning autonomy for Bosnia. Dangich had previously been cited for promotion by Mihailovich, and the government in exile was bestowing a colonelcy on him at the moment that the Nazi-controlled press of Belgrade was hailing him as the "heroic commander of the national brigades in the struggle against the Partisans." When news of his deal with Nedich became generally known in London, however, the indignation of some members of the Cabinet was so great that Dangich had to be dismissed.

No such action was taken in connection with Jevdjevich. In January, 1943, that Chetnik officer issued the following proclamation:

We declare once and forever that the Italian general is the only responsible official for Mostar [a town in Herzegovina] and for the neighboring villages, and that only his orders are valid. We have a definite agreement with the Italian Empire and there is no possibility of disloyalty. The soldiers will continue to fulfil their obligations and the citizens will be obedient and peaceloving.

In another statement, issued a month later, Jevdjevich revealed his fundamental purpose. Referring to a local defeat of the Partisans by his own men and the Italians, he proclaimed: "The criminal and communistic band has been exterminated."

At a Chetnik rally in the town of Trebinye in July, 1942, a newspaperman named Shantic told his audience:

Our collaboration with the Italians has been approved by Draja [Mihailovich]...
They helped us consolidate our forces and defeat the Partisans... The Italians also give us weapons and ammunition, to say nothing of 5,000 loaves of bread a day...
Draja has said, "Accept arms from anybody who offers them."

By the fall of 1942 the government in exile was making no effort to conceal the new use to which the Chetniks were being put by Draja Mihailovich. In a confidential report dated October 20 the Military Cabinet stated:

The Chetniks, like the whole people, are decidedly against the Partisans ever since the Partisans started claiming that they were fighting for a Yugoslav Republic which would be under the protectorate of Soviet Russia.

The underground paper Dalmatinshis Partisan in September, 1942, reprinted, as an exposé, a recruiting appeal by Italian Fascist authorities in Dalmatia for an "anti-Communist" army of volunteers to fight the Partisans. Each recruit was called on, according to the paper, to take an oath that "if need be he will sacrifice his life to the destruction of communism, fighting it with arms in hand and under the command of the Italian government, in order to give to Italian Dalmatia peace and progress under Fascist law and order." The appeal was signed by a Serbian Orthodox priest, Momcilo Djuich, a Chetnik who carried decorations conferred on him by the government in exile. At the same time the government decreed that all officers who had joined the National Army of Liberation were to be regarded as deserters.

THE LIGHT DAWNS

In the year and a half after the Partisan-Chetnik breach first came into the open, we received many such evidences of Mihailovich's collaboration with the enemy, but I will content myself here with two additional documents, both of which impressed me greatly because of the standing of their authors. The first was a letter addressed to Dr. Boris Furlan, a Slovenian liberal leader now in exile, by Josip Vidmar, chairman of the Slovenian Liberation Front. Explaining that with the collapse of Italy the Front took power "with the consent of all political groups except the traitors," Vidmar wrote of the clash between the Chetniks and the popular forces, which resulted in the capture by the Partisans of 500 men and a staff of 30 officers. "One of them," he continued, "Marija Sternisha by name, admitted that their work had been detrimental to Slovenia and Yugoslavia and had helped only the enemy. Before being shot he appealed to the youth to support the Liberation Front. Those of Mihailovich's men who escaped . . . went over to the Germans."

The other document, also a letter, was written by a Catholic priest whom I know well and for whose integrity I can youch. This is what he wrote:

They [the Yugoslav government] call on the people to join Mihailovich. Where is he? All we know is that in Abbazia there are many Chetniks under the protection of the Italians, and many more in Split and Dubrovnik. In Lika and Gorski-Kotar the Italians and Chetniks collaborate against the Partisans, among whom less than 15 per cent are Communists. The Croatian Partisans, for the most part, are peasants who escaped to the woods to save their heads. ... Some of the Chetniks in Bosnia collaborate with the Germans . . . in Bosnia the Chetniks, with the help of the Germans, have killed Partisans, Serbs, Croats, and Moslems.

Bit by bit, these reports and letters coupled with the ominous failure of the Chetniks to come to grips with the invader on the battlefield, opened the eyes of many of us at the center concerning the true state of affairs. As we pooled our information we began to get a picture something like this: The superficial difference between Mihailovich and the Partisans is a difference in strategy. He prefers to withhold his strength for the Allied landing rather than dissipate it in large-scale guerrilla warfare, whereas the Partisans, perhaps with one eye on Russia, want to pin down as many German divisions as possible through major operations, extensive sabotage, and general turmoil. But this difference is secondary and relatively unimportant. The real split is ideological.

The slogan of the Partisans is "Death to fascism, liberty to the people!" Their leaders have given them a democratic goal in a country which has never really enjoyed democracy. And, equally important, they look forward to a Yugoslav nation in which the ancient feud between Serb and Croat, Roman Catholic and Orthodox Serb, will be liquidated once and for all in a federation of culturally autonomous states administered jointly by a popular government based on equality and mutual respect.

Mihailovich, by way of contrast, symbolizes the power of Serbia alone, and represents within Serbia the small clique of wealthy families who for generations have governed in their own narrow interest. The struggle between Chetnik and Partisan is, in short, a civil war involving separatism versus federation and oligarchy versus democracy.

DIVISION AT THE CENTER

Like Yugoslavs everywhere we members of the Information Center soon found ourselves divided on the question of the Partisans. Generally speaking, officials like Subasich and Kosanovich, and staff workers like Furlan, Mirkovich, and myself sympathized with Tito, while Jevtich and Snoj headed the group which continued to side with Mihailovich. (Snoj's son, incidentally, is working with the Partisans in Yugoslavia, and so is the daughter of Foreign Minister Nincich.)

It was clear from the start that the position of those of us who favored the Partisans would soon be untenable. As early as August 21, 1942, the embassy issued a statement that "both King Peter II and the Yugoslav government in London have the most implicit confidence in the loyalty and patriotism of General Mihailovich, leader of the Chetniks, who recently has been the subject of attack by Communist elements in the homeland." This was the signal for a campaign of deception and abuse which more than matched the earlier propaganda onslaught on the Croats.

In September three majors of the Yugoslav Military Cabinet, dubbed the King Peter II

"Three Musketeers," embarked on a series of broadcasts from London in which they pretended to believe that Tito and his Partisans were confederates of the Germans, planted in strategic spots in order to make trouble for the Chetniks. The following excerpts are typical:

The Serbian people, who are loyal to the Allies, and especially friendly toward Russia, have rushed to fight with these new so-called Partisan detachments, which are in reality nothing but Gestapo camouflaged detachments. The Serbian people are convinced that the fight must be made against our only real enemy, the German invader. But these Gestapo men, sent from the communistic centers of Vienna and Budapest, have no intention of fighting against the Germans or of helping the Allies and Russia. They want only to do in Serbia what has already been done in Pavelich's gangster state, that is, to exterminate all Serbs, to kill peaceful inhabitants, industrious landowners, and honest nationalists. They are trying to provoke hate between Serbs and Russians and make them quarrel. But the Serbs have quickly grasped this devilish German design. They have risen against these men sent to Serbia by the Gestapo, disguised by Communist leadership.

This fantastically awkward bit of deception was soon discounted by the open sympathy displayed by the Soviet Union for the Partisan cause. But the pan-Serbs then found other approaches. Instead of pretending that the Partisans were Gestapo men in disguise, they decided to forget their own sudden "friendship" for Russia and attack the Partisans as a straight Communist movement. In this design they were aided by the revelation of Tito's identity as Josip Broz, a Croatian who had aided the Loyalists in the Spanish war and who is unquestionably a Communist. The Srbobran treated itself to a field day:

The people themselves then arose against the Communist Partisans and for all the evil, all the bloody injustices, and all the cruelty inflicted upon them, proclaimed the Partisans for always their first and worst enemies.

. The leader of the Partisans is convict Josip Broz (Tito), listed in the Zagreb police record under number 10434.

. Today they are increasing their forces by accepting into their ranks the worst Ustachl criminals and murderes. (October 10, 1943.)

"Criminal band" was the mildest phrase applied to the Partisans by the Royal government in the fall of 1943, and by Srbobran, though it is worth noting that another Serbian American paper, Slobodna Rech, has worked consistently for Yugoslav unity and is now supporting Tito. But all the time the Partisans grew in strength, and the British and American military authorities, recognizing their power and their future, sent officers to work with them and increasingly gave them aid and supplies. The editors of the Srbobran grew frantic and hysterical, threatening the British with "loss of the prestige and esteem they have enjoyed in the Balkans." But facts are stubborn, particularly military facts, and the New York Times reported in December that Tito's forces were estimated at 250,000, whereas Mihailovich's army is thought to number something between 6,000 and 20,000.

In this country feeling among Yugoslav Americans mounted steadily. At a meeting in California Governor Subasich of Croatia was cheered for saying:

My stand on the question of Yugoslav guerrillas is clear. All those who are fighting against Hitler have deserved well of their Fatherland and the Allies. I condemn without reservation all those who provoke internecine troubles within the ranks of Yugoslav guerrillas. . . As Croatian governor, responsible to the people and the Crown, I warn from this platform certain of our diplomats and their chiefs in London. I demand a clear and unambiguous statement of policy on the part of the Yugoslav government. The time is short.

At American congresses of Slovenes and Croatians the delegates failed to send greetings either to the King or to his government in exile. And on more than one occasion Ambassador Fotich was booed by Yugoslav audiences. From the other side, the Information Center came in for more than its share at abuse. "The poison coming from the kitchen of the Judocenter," said the Srbobran delicately, "is serving dark and low interests, which means anti-Serb, anti-national, Croat, and treacherous interests."

The climax in the long struggle was reached at the end of 1943. On December 4 the Free Yugoslav radio station announced that Dr. Ivan Ribar, a prominent Croatian lawyer and leader of the liberal Democratic Party, had formed a Yugoslav provisional government. Broz. who had been made a marshal, became president and chairman of the Committee for National Defense. Aside from him, only one other Communist was given a post in the government, which was composed of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes; Roman Catholics, Moslems, Jews, and Orthodox Serbs, including a Serb priest who was given the post of Minister of the Interior.

The exile regime, now in Cairo, of course attacked the Provisional Government, but the Allies were decidedly friendly. On December 8 Richard K. Law told the House of Commons that the British were giving more aid to the Partisans than to Mihailovich for the simple reason that the Partisans were doing more of the fighting. And on the following day Secretary of State Hull told newspapermen that it was the policy of the United States to furnish supplies to any group which was effectively fighting the Germans.

EXIT: CENTER AND AUTHOR

With the deepening of the struggle between Mihailovich and the Partisans, my own position became more and more clearly defined, and my relations with the government more and more strained. In December, 1942, I had cabled to the Information Department at London:

All well-informed circles believe Yugoslavia's situation must be cleared by an understanding between the United States, Great Britain, and Russia. . . . The split between Mihailovich and the Partisans is believed to be the result of our had policy. For months our diplomats in this country exploited Mihailovich as the symbol of Greater Serbia, thus paralyzing the Yugoslav idea and offending the Croats and Slovenes. . . . The fact that our pan-Serbian diplomats continue to champion Mihailovich serves to compromise rather than help him. Our relations with Soviet Russia are considered by all our friends to be very poor just at the moment when people are looking to Russia with great hope. Never has Yugoslavia's cause heen presented to the public so inadequately, with the result that our enemies, the Hapsburgs and others, have been greatly encouraged. All responsible people here look to the government for a complete and drastic change of policy in the near future.

The result of this open declaration was that every favorable reference to the Partisans in the American press was attributed to me or those of my associates who took the same position. Snoj began to work closely with Fotich and, joined by Jevtich, carried on an unceasing campaign against the Partisans. By May, 1943, the Srbobran was clamoring for the closing of the center. "Realistic members of the government" were called upon to do their duty and "immediately destroy the anti-Serbian Judocenter and the enemies within the government itself and put them in the Allied concentration camps where they belong."

I was fully convinced by this time that the real and vital Yugoslavia had little in common with the government in exile which, from the safety of Cairo, was daily attacking the best elements and bravest fighters in my country as "terroristic bands," "criminals," and "traitors." Communiqués of this character were released by the center under orders from Jevtich, but I refused to have any part in them. It was quite apparent that this situation could not continue long. Fotich had for some time been urging Prime Minister Jovanovich to close the center, but the deed was left to his successor, Dr. Bozidar Purich. On September 15, 1943, I was transferred by the embassy to the office of the consul general in New York, "without authority for cables or propaganda, which will be transferred to the embassy.'

I cabled at once to the Prime Minister that this move would deprive the government of any possibility of receiving reliable information concerning Yugoslav affairs in this country. To the Association of Yugoslav Journalists in London I cabled the following message:

Yugocenter will close October 1. I am transferred consulate general but denied function send cables and information to government. New propaganda service will be opened in embassy under control of diplomatic service which for three years has been carrying on open activity against democratic Yugoslavia, the National Liberation Movement, and the whole Croatian people. . . . Press service will be in hands of anti-democratic and anti-Yugoslav persons at the very moment when the first signs of liberation appear on the shores of the Adriatic Long live the democratic peoples of Yugoslavia. Long live freedom of the press.

Unable to inform Americans officially concerning developments in my country, I prepared an article on Tito and the Partisans for The Nation's issue of October 2. Immediately after its publication I received an order transferring me to Buenos Aires, where a stringent fascist regime would render any further efforts on my part utterly useless. I declined the offer and through the consulate general addressed a request to the Cairo government to put me on the retired list. The request was refused; whereupon I addressed another letter to the Prime Minister, in which I said:

My personal situation as an anti-fascist intellectual worker . . . prevents my going to Argentina. I am informed that it would be impossible for me to carry on any activity there and that my family would be endangered, as it was by Axis interests in Belgrade in 1940. . . . Your decision is political persecution as my transfer from the United States is the result of requests by the American Srbobran and the Serbian National Defense. The only Croat employee of Yugoslav convictions here, I am ordered transferred while all Serbian employees actively and openly anti-Yugoslav remain in their positions. Therefore I ask you to rescind undeserved punishment for my sincere work on behalf of Yugoslavia and enable me to continue the defense of Yugoslavia's vital post-war interests here.

My letter never reached Prime Minister Purich, for the reason that Ambassador Fotich refused to let it go through.

Thus concludes my connection with the Royal Yugoslav government, but not, I am certain, with Yugoslavia.

The old Yugoslavia disappeared on the battlefield, and a new one has arisen -a federation based on political, religious, and social equality. With this Yugoslavia the government in exile has nothing in common. That government serves only to stimulate, among the people it professes to serve, the fear that after the war it will attempt to restore the old order, with its Chetniks, gendarmes, and political tyrants, bent on avenging themselves on an entire population. If this government succeeds in returning, it will arrive, as one of its leaders told me, "with bread in one hand and tanks in the other."

Should that attempt be made, or should Mihailovich try to impose his will on the free government of the Partisans, the effort will fail after a useless and bloody civil war, because the Partisans have given the common people of Yugoslavia a vision which has already enabled them to work miracles. Against terrible odds and among the physical ruins of their country, they have rebuilt their scattered armies and astonished the world with their spirit of unity, self-discipline, and enormous courage. As one humble worker, I feel that my support belongs to them, because on their banners rest the hopes of my country.

Excellent facilities for winter sports. . Ski slopes; private 71/2 ml. lake for Skating; 28 ml. private wooded trails for Horseback Riding Hiking, Sleigh Rides and Cross-country Snowshoeins.

INVITATION TO RELAX

ide, roaring fireplace, delicious food—and fun. Inly 55 miles from New York.

MAKE RESERVATIONS EARLY

The Fieldstone

On Round Island Lake

place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.

All Sports - Open All Year MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

HATHAWAY SKI LODGE OPEN ALL YEAR

Formerly the painting Dysacre Macy cettale in the formerly the painting Dysacre Macy cettale in the many with open directors and private portions. Wind die Mountain Trails. Skit 1000.00 1000

ADVERTISING RATECARD REVISED

Higher publication costs, and increases in net paid sale which are bringing Nation circulation to the highest level of gilt-edge value in our history, have made necessary an upward revision of advertising rates.

Increases apply to all ROP classifications, while rates for display classified and classified advertising are unchanged. The previous discounts apply to all classifications.

The new rates are given in our advertising ratecard No. 13. To obtain a copy, please write or phone to the Advertising Manager, The Nation, 55 Fifth Avenue, New York 3, N. Y.

FOREST HOUSE

FOR A WINTER TUNE-UP . . . .

on Hunn's Lake . Stanfordville, N. Y. III miles from N. Y. Ideal location in the heart of DUTCHESS COUNTY. Excellent accommodations. Cordial hospitality, Recordings. Library. All seasonal sports. Via.N. Y. C. B. B. to Amenia, N. Y. Open all year. WRITE OR PHONE YOUR RESERVATION EVA BERG Director Stanfordville 4106

RIDGEFIELD, CONN.

à luxurious country estate converted into a haven for rest and recreation. Excellent Winter sports facilities, eksting, free bicycles, rid-ing, ping pong, etc. Musical recordings, danc-ing, games, etc. Open fireplaces. Famous cutsine. ONLY FIFTY MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY

Different OAKWOOD WINDSOR.

Newburgh 4477. Only 53 miles from N. Y. C. Skate on our private lake Enjoy all seasonal sports at this Charming Colonial Estate. Unexcelled food. Wood-burning freplaces Limited Accommodations.

is preferred for choicest location, homey atmosphere and excellent cuisine. Moderate Rates

59 Madison Avenue, Lakewood, N. J. Tel. Lakewood 287 or 963 ANNA EPSTEIN

Homestead Inn

NEW MILFORD CONNECTICUT Phones 985 and 28

Small. Serene and Peaceful Rest and Relax Recommended by Duncan Hines

- ADVERTISING RATES -

Classified:

62c = line (six words) Minimum, A lines

Display Classified:

$6.16 column inch ATTRACTIVE TIME DISCOUNTS

THE Nation

AR FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK S. N. Y. Algonquin 4-3311

SECRETS of SUCCESS and HAPPINESS

YOUR HANDWRITING, when scientifically anslyzed, can help answer your questions about business, love, work, career and marriage by business, love, work, career and marriage by pointing out traits and abilities which may be bidden in your personality. An analysis will like the handwriting of others opens a window through which you may ass their true personality and better understand their real moviness. CHARACTER ANALYSIS through HANDWRITING is made to be a second of the differences in people's writting. For a careful analysis in piain ourselpos must several liams of writing, the writer's say, say and any other facts or question you must be include plus $1 to feather or question you must be include plus $1 to JUNES ANALYZING SERVICE Dept. N P. O. Box 1All Altadena, Calif.

FARMS, ACREAGE

BERKSHIRE FARM AGENCY, East Chatham, N. Y., offers list winter specials and free annotated biblography farm life

LANGUAGES

PHONOGRAPH COURSES, BOOKLET N. Language Service, 18 East 41st St., New York City 17.

POSITION WANTED

Excellent typist wants manuscript work. Experienced. Call 9:30-10:30 a.m. WAdsworth 8-9660, Apt. 1-A.

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION 55 Fifth Avenue New York 3, N. Y.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine.

☐ 1 Year $5

2 Years

□ 3 Years $11

☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me

Introductory Offer to New Subscribers ONLY

☐ 10 Weeks BI

Cash with order

Canada $1 a year extra

Foreign $1 a year entra

Pan American Union requires no extra postage

Address .....

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 49

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- Flowers often trodden underfoot I am among many to get | lift
- Goes round the table and finishes with you, so to speak 9 "O, no, sir!" (anag.)
- 10 One may get a glare from such a personage
- 12 How Essex addressed his queen, per-
- chance, before he lost his head 13 Horace turned out some pretty good
- 15 Old mice are musical
- 17 A reformed rascal makes good sailor
- This sea voyage sounds the same as those who undertake it
- 19 In Lausanne, but in the New World also
- 21 There's at least one costume in this place of abode
- 23 East Indies island
- Are back in time
- Raise aloft
- Rebellious Wat's mate, perhaps
- A sun snot
- Never seen without a couple of flappers
- 35 Some nerve?
- An old saw
- One kind of relief
- 38 Superfluous advice to miser
- Land ships, as they were once called 40 It just happens

DOWN

- Animals have the use of them first You want the solution! This may solve the conundrum
- 8 They are in a class by themselves

- 4 Oh, Eric, how changed a noble epithet!
- A Shakespeare villain
- So the story goes It's the girl to blame for a change
- Outstanding human features
- A chronic drug-taker, perhaps Associated with heer in the Bible 15 Back Samuel! Its tail looks quarrel-
- 16 Cruel M. P. (anag.)
- American Indian
- 20 Name for a gum
- Have you the time? We seem to have 22 Everybody's in bad, so why make a song about it?
- Lean foreign queen about 150
- 27 Deserving persons 28 The right hammer to crack tough
- 29 Diadem
- 30 Scope for good shots here
- 33 Change your seat 34 Material that grows again after it's
- 35 It is put before war in some cases

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 48

ACROSS—I WAGON: 4 HOLED; 7 OB-SCURE; 10 GIRLS; 11 SILVET; 12 EFF-TOMB: 18 ROOT: 16 TROD; 18 FOLIO; 29 MENHIR; 21 AMBLED; 22 NERVED; 23 STANCE; 25 STIDES; 26 FILM; 28 SITE; 31 LIMPETS; 33 TODAT; 34 TASTE; 35 ALLETTE; 36 DREAM; 37 PLEAS.

DOWN:-1 WAGER; 2 GARBO; 3 NOSE; # HERE; 5 LOVER; 9 DATED; 8 SUITOR; 9 UTOPIA: 13 OSMANL; 15 TAKRRAM; 16 TALENTS; 17 ODDMENT; 18 FILES; 19 OMITS; 23 DISMA: 23 SELECT; 26 FETED; 27 LODGE; 29 ISSUE; 30 EWERS; 31 LYAM; 28 STEF.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

- Social Work at Its Frontiers. American Association of Social Workers, 60 cents.
- My Life with the Enemy. By Phyllis Argall. Macmillan, $3.
- Old Age in New York City. By Helen Hardy Brunot. Welfare Council of New York City, $1.50.
- Mathematics for Mariners. By Captain Chester E. Dimick, U. S. C. G. and Lieutenant Cuthbert C. Hurd, U. S. C. G. R. Van Nostrand. $2.75.
- The Lion Rampant: The Story of Holland's Resistance to the Nazis. By L. de Jone and Joseph W. F. Stoppelman. Querido. $3.
- The Innocents at Cedro: A Memoir of Thorstein Veblen and Some Others. By R. L. Duffus with the Advice and Consent of William M. Duffus, Macmillan, $2.
- Ordeal by Battle. By Cyril Falls. Oxford. $1.75.
- The Next Germany. By . Group of Anti-Nazi Germans. Penguin Books. 25 cents. Jazz from the Congo to the Metropolitan.
- By Robert Goffin. Doubleday, Doran. $2.50. A Pocket Dictionary (Chinese-English) and
- Pekingese Syllabary. By Chauncey Goodrich. Columbia. $2.50.
- Der Fuebrer: Hitler's Rise to Power. By Konrad Heiden. Houghton Mifflin. $3.
- What Russia Wants. By Joachim Joesten. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.50.
- International Commodity Control Agreements. International Labor Office, Mont-
- real. $2, paper; $3, cloth. Vladimir I. Lenin: A Political Biography Prepared by the Marx-Engels-Lenin Insti- tute. International Publishers. $2.50. An American Dilemma: The Negro Problem and Modern Democracy. 2 volumes. By
- Gunnar Myrdal. Harper. $7.50. Food, War and the Future. By E. Parmalee
- Prentice. Harper. $2.50.
- Elmore. By Theodore J. Ritter and Robert W. Gadbois. Dietz Press, Richmond, Virginia. $1.
- Germany Will Try It Again. By Sigrid Schultz. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.50.
- The Course. By Leon Trotsky. The Struggle for the New Course. By Max Scachtman. New International Publishing Company. $1.50, paper; $2, cloth.
- Toward a Better World. By Jan Christiaan Smuts. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.75.
- They Came to London. By Paul Tabori. Macmillan. $2.75.
- Introducing Africa. By Carveth Wells. Putman. $2.50.
- India Against the Storm. By Post Wheeler, Dutton. $3.50.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 65 Fith Aee, New York 3, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy, By subscription—Domestics to prevent St. Tree years $11. Canadian, $2. The years $11. Canadian, $3. The Price 16 Canadian, $3. The Price 16 Canadian, $3. The Nation is indexed in Resdert Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Hofomation Service, Dramatic Index, Two weeks notice and the old address as well as the new was required for change of address.

THE Vation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 158

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · FEBRUARY 5, 1944

NUMBER 6

IN THIS ISSUE
THE SHAPE OF THINGS	145
EDITORIALS
Organized Sadism
Dishonest and Dangerous	148
Spain and Argentina by Freda Kirchwey	149
ARTICLES
Anti-Labor Field Day by I. F. Stone	150
Germany at Bay by Donald W. Mitchell
10 Years Ago in The Nation	153
Co-op International by Keith Hutchison
End of an Era by Gertrude Baer	150
In the Wind	157
POLITICAL WAR
Franco, New Axis Chief by Dorothy Thompson
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus	161
BOOKS AND THE ARTS
Demobilization Day by Mordecai Ezekiel	162
Orphans of the Storm by Keith Hutchison	163
Spain According to Madariaga by Ralph Bates	164
Drama by Margaret Marshall	167
Films by James Agee	167
Music by B. H. Haggin	169
LETTERS TO THE EDITORS .	171
CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO 50 by Jack Barrett	172

Editor and Publisher FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

Washington Editor Literary Editor
1. F. STONE MARGARET MARSHALL

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor
J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHA

NORMAN ANGELL LOUIS FISCHER JONATHAN DANIELS
REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 55 Fifth Ave., New York 3, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act

The Shape of Things

THE SOVIET GOVERNMENT HAS CLOSED THE door on mediation in the Polish boundary dispute but has not bolted it. In a polite reply to the American offer it expressed appreciation but said that in the Russian view conditions had not yet ripened to the point where good offices could be utilized to advantage. The suggestion that conditions could still ripen to an extent that would make it possible to negotiate the problem is perhaps a hint to the Polish government to make some gesture of good-will before it is too late. An opportunity arose following the report of the Russian experts on the victims of the Katyn massacre. A party of American newspapermen taken to the scene were shown various proofs of the Soviet contention that this wholesale slaughter of Polish soldiers was carried out by the Germans. Unfortunately the Polish government, whose uncritical acceptance of the German version of the Katyn tragedy caused the breach of diplomatic relations with Moscow last year, has not seen fit to seize this occasion to withdraw its allegations against Russia. Nor is there any sign of a reshuffle in the Polish government which would permit the shedding of those members who are not merely unfriendly but actively hostile to the Soviets. In some quarters Mr. Eden's statement in the House of Commons last week is regarded as encouraging the Poles to maintain a stiff attitude. We doubt that this was the Foreign Secretary's intention, although his rather ambiguous phraseology lent itself to misinterpretation. The point of his remarks was that Britain was unwilling to recognize a territorial change accomplished by unilateral action. That is a principle that believers in collective security cannot afford to dispute.

THE REPUBLICAN HOWLS WHICH SHOOK THE Capitol's dome after the President sent his message to Congress on the soldier vote issue denoted pain as well as anger. For the G. O. P. leaders suddenly realized that they had been busy sawing themselves off a limb. Mr. Roosevelt, by voicing the increasingly insistent public demand that service-men should not be deprived of their rights as citizens, had merely given the branch a final tug. In their opposition to the original Lucas bill at the end of last year the Republicans had to some extent kept behind a screen of vociferous Southern Democrats. But in the new session, emboldened by their success, they took over the banner of "states' rights" and led the attack on the new Green-Lucas bill which provides a practical method of recording soldier votes while meeting the more legitimate objections to the original measure. Nevertheless they were sufficiently conscious of the dangerous ground over which they were advancing to seek a method of avoiding a record vote in the House. The President's demand that they "stand up and be counted" together with a Democratic move to upset the rule by which a voice vote could be taken makes it unlikely that the soldier ballot can now be stifled anonymously. No wonder many Democrats who previously had opposed the bill are slipping back into the fold. In their anger Republican spokesmen have blurted out their real reason for trying to limit soldier voting. Debate on the bill would cease at once, said Senator Holman of Oregon, "if the President would remove himself from his unfair and advantageous position as candidate." Republican devotion to "states' rights" is the by-product of a fear that Spangler is wrong and that most soldiers want Roosevelt.

IN GRANTING MUSTERING-OUT PAY OF $100 up to $300 to the veterans of this war Congress has taken a first step toward meeting the inevitable difficulties of the transition period from war to peace. The bill as finally passed cut the scale of pay from the $200 to $500 originally proposed by the Senate. This cut could probably be justified if mustering-out pay were part of a comprehensive government scheme for aiding service men and stimulating post-war employment. So far, however, Congress has done little to encourage belief that it will be ready with a rounded post-war program by the time hostilities cease. The President's request for an appropriation to finance a retraining and general educational program for the veterans of this war has not as vet been acted upon. Nor has anything been done to make the veterans eligible for social-security benefits. Although several Congressional committees have been considering public-works projects for many months, none of these plans has yet reached the floor in either house.

×

NO CHANGE IN THIS NEGATIVE ATTITUDE toward post-war planning is likely to result from the appointment by Speaker Sam Rayburn of an eighteenman bi-partisan committee on post-war economic policy. In the first place the new group is not asked to formulate legislation but merely to act as a clearing house for ideas. Considering its composition, we should, perhaps, be thankful for this limitation. For the majority of the members the Speaker has named are outright reactionaries. The chairman is William H. Colmer of Mississippi, a poll-taxer with a consistent anti-New Deal record, while its ranking Republican member is that epitome of obscurantism-Hamilton Fish. A handful of comparatively liberal members such as Representatives Voorhis of California and Fogarty of Rhode Island can hardly hope to make much headway against the rooted prejudices of the majority of the committee. We note, for instance, that only seven out of the eighteen voted to support the Rural Electrification program last June; only six voted to allocate funds for the roll-back of prices; only six voted against the Smith-Connally Bill. In Chicago recently Speaker Rayburn spoke eloquently of the need for a "people's planning board." But his selection of members of this committee indicates either an appalling ignorance of the problems such a board must tackle or a stupid contempt for the people's vital interest in a post-war economic system in which full employment will enjoy priority over the sacred rights of private enterprise. Speaker Rayburn has recently been touted as a vice-presidential candidate. This revealing action should insure redoubled efforts by liberals and labor to retain Henry Wallace.

×

C. NELSON SPARKS, AUTHOR OF "ONE MAN—Wendell Willkie," has been cleared by the grand jury investigating the Hopkins Letter case of any part in the forgery of that document, but its indictment of his correspondent, George N. Briggs, exposes him as America's champion sucker. In the face of the most emphatic denials of the letter's authenticity by Harry Hopkins and its alleged recipient, Dr. Umphrey Lee, Sparks persisted in trumpeting his "perfect confidence" that it was genuine. Now the grenade he aimed with malicious credulity, hoping it would cripple both Hopkins and Willkie, has exploded in his face.

×

THE DIES COMMITTEE IN ITS CUSTOMARY New Year burst of activity has announced its intention to investigate the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, the Civil Service Commission, alleged Japanese activities on the Pacific Coast, and "Peace Now," an organization urging a negotiated peace. With its customary gullibility, the House has voted an additional $75,000 to defray the "expenses" of the committee for 1944. The nature of Mr. Dies's study of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee has not been disclosed. But we doubt that he expects to uncover Nazi or Japanese spies within the organization. It is more likely that after months of "investigation" he will suddenly spring upon a startled world the disclosure that the C. I. O. is seeking the defeat of Congressmen Smith of Virginia, Rankin of Mississippi, and (sedition!) Dies of Texas. The promised inquiry into the activities of "Peace Now" and the Japanese would seem a legitimate enterprise if we did not have an efficient FBI already operating in that field and if the committee had not made similar gestures every January, only to sink into an inexplicable torpor until the moment for the next appropriation came along. There was a time when the Dies committee was a crude but rather effective private Gestapo; it has become merely a clumsy instrument for wasting of taxpayers' money.

THE REMARRIAGE OF JOHN L. LEWIS TO THE A. F. of L. has once more been postponed. The bride had forgiven the groom for running away with the C. I. O. in 1936, and she was pleasantly anticipating a cut of the substantial income he is now earning. But she could not stomach the spite-child John had acquired in his years of wandering-young District 50, the apple of its father's eye. To drop the metaphor, the A. F. of L. executive council meeting at Miami rejected for the second time Lewis's demand that the United Mine Workers should be taken back "as is." Instead, it proposed that the union return with the same jurisdiction it had in 1936, after which a committee headed by Dan Tobin would meet with the miners to "clarify" unsettled questions. In support of this stand George Meany, secretarytreasurer of the A. F. of L., had previously sent Lewis details of thirty complaints of trespass by District 50, the U. M. W.'s catch-all subsidiary, filed by member unions. Lewis is said to have replied by yielding his claims to railroad and building-construction employees but insisting on retention of the chemical workers. A believer in the coming chemical age, he wants to be in on the ground floor of this industry after the war. But the A. F. of L., with several unions chartered in the same field, feels impelled to follow its constitutional rules against poaching. Mr. Lewis, kept waiting at the church, is reported to be incensed. After all, he proposed nearly nine months ago and he is not a man to take snubs philosophically.

THE MOST CHEERFUL NEWS OF THE PAST week was the passage by the House of the bill to authorize a $1,135,000,000 United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. The vote, 338 to 54, showed the world how unrepresentative of American opinion were the ugly super-isolationist attacks made upon the UNRRA from the floor of the House during its consideration. We are also gratified that the House, by a vote of 217 to 175, rejected the Vorys amendment, which would have placed UNRRA funds in the hands of the State Department rather than the President, Constitutionally, this amendment was unprecedented and unsound. Politically, it was a slap at the President. We are also happy to note that the House adopted an amendment by Representative Karl E. Mundt, Republican, of South Dakota, extending the jurisdiction of the UNRRA to any areas that may be stricken with famine or disease.

This was intended, and we hope will serve, to permit aid to India.

*

WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE WAS AN OLD-TIME American individualist, with a great gusto for life and people, who never made a fetish of consistency and rather enjoyed admitting his mistakes. The secret of his success as The Small-Town Editor lay perhaps in the fact that he combined the often contradictory qualities that Americans like and was never so far out in front of popular opinion as to antagonize-or lose touch with -his readers. He was independent and liberal, and a Republican all his life. He was hard-headed, and he was also sentimental. He was a genial fellow, and he was a prohibitionist and a puritan. He was a practical man who fulfilled the journalist's dream of owning a smalltown newspaper, and not only made it pay but became famous to boot. The success story of William Allen White will be the subject of an article in a later issue.

Organized Sadism

EVERY American has been shocked and sickened by the army-navy report on the Japanese treatment of American and Filipino defenders of Bataan and Corregidor. We should have been prepared for the disclosure by similar atrocities at Nanking and Hongkong but no one ever quite appreciates the horror of such barbarity until his own people are involved. It is difficult to believe that even the Japanese would shoot the sick and wounded, would deprive their captives of food and water, and deny them all medical assistance. The occasional brutality of a guard or individual soldier can be understood. Excesses of this type happen in any army. But the cruelty inflicted on the American and Filipino captives was not the work of a few sadistic individuals; it was calculated cruelty ordered, or at least condoned, by high Japanese military authorities.

It is probably impossible to understand the complex workings of the Japanese mind sufficiently to explain why the military authorities should permit such license among troops supposedly highly disciplined. It cannot be set down to utter depravity, for the Japanese treatment of civilian prisoners has been on a higher level. This may be due to the fact that we hold large numbers of Japanese civilians in this country whereas we have taken less than three hundred Japanese as prisoners of war. It is doubtful whether this distinction would appear important to the Japanese. Nor can the brutality toward our men be attributed merely to Japanese resentment against slights at the hands of the white race. After the capture of Nanking the Japanese tortured and killed a hundred Chinese for every American soldier killed after the fall of Bataan and Corregidor. Moreover, the Filipinos appear to have suffered even more than the Americans. It would appear rather that the excesses are a regular part of Japanese policy. In each instance—at Nanking in 1937, at Hongkong in 1941, and in the Philippines in 1942—the worst brutality occurred in the days immediately following a military victory—a cold-blooded method of exterminating as many of the enemy possible without regard to race or color or circumstance.

We are relieved to note that the publication of the report on the latest Japanese atrocities has not provoked any general demand for reprisals in this country. Reprisals could be justified only as a means of forcing Japan to live up to the terms of the Geneva convention in its treatment of prisoners of war. But there are no reprisals available to us which could achieve this result. Any punishment meted out to Japanese civilians still in our hands would only lead to retaliation against American civilians in Japanese prison camps. There is no way of punishing the military authorities responsible for these outrages until Japan has been forced into unconditional surrender. But if there was ever any question regarding the wisdom of the harsh terms for Japan drawn up at the Cairo conference, that hesitancy has now disappeared. For it is amply evident that there can be no peace or security in the Pacific until Japanese militarism has been uprooted and destroyed.

Dishonest and Dangerous

IT IS difficult to imagine a more dishonest and dangerous report than that submitted by the Smith committee of the House of Representatives on the War Labor Board. The character of the majority report was to be expected from the character of the Congressmen dominating it. The chairman, Howard W. Smith of Virginia, has been the leading spokesman of anti-labor interests in the House. Of his colleagues, two, Representative Clare E. Hoffman of Michigan and Fred A. Hartley, Jr., of New Jersey, are outstanding rightists. The former's inflammatory attacks on labor have long disgusted decent conservatives as well as liberals, and the best that can be said of Hartley is that he is a bird-brained Republican from North Jersey, who has been a faithful member of the Dies committee.

The principal effect of the report is to make it appear that the War Labor Board exceeds its powers in ordering maintenance-of-membership agreements. The best answer to this may be found in the facts presented by Jerry Voorhis and John J. Delaney, who submitted a minority report. The Connally-Smith War Labor Disputes Act—the Smith is the same Howard W. Smith—gave the WLB power "to decide the dispute and provide by order the wages-and-hours and all other terms and conditions (customarily included in collective bargaining agreements.)" The parenthesis is part of the original. At the time the act was passed, the WLB had been in existence for a year and a half and ordered maintenance-of-membership agreements in 165 cases. When the Smith-Connally War Labor Disputes bill was before the House, the same Howard W. Smith offered an amendment from the floor specifically denying the WLB the right to include maintenance of membership in its orders. This amendment was defeated by a vote of 204 to 73. On the Senate side the Military Affairs Committee rejected a provision outlawing maintenance of membership before reporting the bill to the Senate. These facts fully warrant the designation of the Smith report as dishonest.

Maintenance-of-membership agreements seem to us a fair compromise between the wishes of employers, who wanted a war-enforced open shop, and the wishes of the unions, which felt strong enough in many cases to demand a union or closed shop. Maintenance of membership accords fully with the President's statement at the time of the "no-strike" conference between labor and management after Pearl Harbor. The President expressed the hope that neither side would seek "undue advantage" from the circumstances of the no-strike pledge. If any advantage has been taken, it has not been from the side of labor.

The Smith-committee majority seeks by a typical bit of corporation-lawyer jesuitry to prove that maintenance-of-membership agreements violate the National Labor Relations Act. But Section 8 of that act, on which the Smith committee relies, deals with anti-labor practices by employers, and the act itself specifically provides that Section 8 shall not be construed to prohibit or prevent employers and labor organizations from entering into maintenance-of-membership or even closed-shop agreements. This is another example of the committee's dishonest handling of the facts.

If reform is needed in the War Labor Board, and it is, the reform is in the direction of speeding and tightening up the settlement of grievance and wage disputes. There is ample evidence that many employers have taken advantage of the no-strike pledge to ignore grievance machinery, and the unrest created has been intensified by the board's cumbersome and dilatory procedures. It is at this point that the board needs strengthening. The recommendations of the Smith committee would add to our labor troubles by further weakening our principal agency for the peaceful adjudication of labor disputes.

To Nation Newsstand Readers-

Because of a change in the schedule of the American News Company, The Nation hereafter will be put on sale in New York City on Fridays instead of Thursdays. In other cities there will be no change.

Spain and Argentina By FREDA KIRCHWEY

IT IS best to speak plainly about Argentina's break with Hitler. Already the meaning of the act is being smeared over with the usual opaque coating of official pronouncements and inspired, simplified interpretations. The New York Times on Sunday printed what was doubtless the State Department's version in a Washington dispatch by Bertram D. Hulen. After a review of past difficulties between Argentina and the United States, and an optimistic prediction of cordial relations in these words: "In the event that Bolivia cleans house and Argentina takes sufficient measures in carrying out the spirit of her action in severing relations, the entire Western Hemisphere will be sealed to the Axis."

The Argentine government has explained the break in similarly ingenuous terms. It was the sudden, shocking discovery of a widespread network of Nazi plotting and espionage, growing out of the arrest in Trinidad of an Argentine consul, Osmar Alberto Hellmuth, on charges of German espionage, that forced the government to take immediate steps to protect the sovereignty and security of Argentina. According to another Times correspondent, Arnaldo Cortesi, cabling from Buenos Aires, the Argentine government was "sincerely indignant when investigations that followed Hellmuth's arrest revealed the extent of German illicit activities." Thereupon Argentina decided to sever diplomatic relations with Germany and Japan.

Such official and near-official "explanations" so blatantly insult public intelligence that perhaps they do little harm. Unfortunately the truth comes through slowly, and piecemeal. Behind the break is Ramirez's consistent record of collaboration with Hitler and his efforts, directly and through Nazi and Phalangist agents, to build up a fascist anti-United Nations bloc in Latin America. German penetration in Argentina and German espionage reaching out from Argentina through the hemisphere are of course an old story. The attempt to link their "discovery" with the Hellmuth arrest is not likely to deceive anyone but Mr. Cortesi. But it was the intimate collaboration of the Ramirez regime and the German embassy at Buenos Aires in engineering the Bolivian revolt that finally moved Washington to act. The recall of Ambassador Armour from Buenos Aires was decided upon, after the facts had been fully assembled, and the British and American governments were completing joint plans for applying economic sanctions against Ramirez. Before they could be carried out, Ramirez himself acted.

The struggle within the Argentine regime over this decision was severe. The GOU (Grupo Oficiales Unidos), made up of the extreme nationalist and pro-

Axis officers who had put Ramirez in power, acquiesced in the break only after a bitter fight. Some of them not only opposed the government's decision but demanded a break with the United States instead. The government held up its announcement until it had won the group over. And even then, in publishing his decision, Ramirez warned the press "not to give exaggerated importance to the act." The pro-Allied newspaper Critica was suspended for recalling the fact that Nazi espionage had existed before the Hellmuth arrest, thus raking up "old charges" against a country which until the day before had been "friendly." The Ramirez regime, while yielding to the Allies, was careful at the same time to conciliate the Axis and its friends in Argentina.

How far the Argentine government will have to go "in carrying out the spirit of her action in severing relations," as the Times put it, depends upon the pressure brought in Washington and London. The State Department will at least demand a general clean-up, and the most notorious enemy agents will undoubtedly disappear from view with the closing of the Axis embassies and consulates. But the Western Hemisphere will never be "scaled to the Axis" as long as the Argentine regime remains fascist in purpose and method—and as long as Franco's agents, there and throughout Latin America, serve as listening posts and propaganda centers for the fascist revolution.

The role prepared for Spain in the future plans of the Fascist International is well described by Dorothy Thompson on another page of this issue. Franco is Hitler's key man in Latin America. It was the clerk of the Spanish legation in La Paz who acted as paymaster for German and Argentine agents in arranging the Bolivian coup. Every Spanish embassy, legation, and consular office in the Western Hemisphere, whether in a back-country district of Paraguay or in Washington, D. C., is a Nazi headquarters. In some countries, as in Uruguay, where the Spanish legation officially represents German interests, Nazi activities can be, and are, carried on under cover of diplomatic immunity. But even where no such convenient cover exists, Spanish fascist agents do Hitler's work almost as effectively.

It would be foolish to doubt that our government knows all this. It knows, but until now it has chosen to believe that more benefit than harm has resulted from our continued friendly relations with Spain. Today things appear to be changing. The stiff note addressed to Franco last week seemed to imply that even the iron-clad patience of British-American diplomacy was wearing thin. It would be rash to assume that this protest is the forerunner of a break with Franco. He, too, has learned how to yield just enough to forestall drastic action from the Allies, and hold open Hitler's pipe-line to the Americas. But one fact is clear: while Franco holds power in Spain Hitler's work goes on in Latin America.

Anti-Labor Field Day

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 28

THE campaign for national-service legislation is beginning to take on the most serious aspect. Whatever the intentions of Secretary Stimson and Under Secretary Patterson, the drive they are leading has become a concerted attack upon labor. It is hurting the morale of workers, and it is not helping the morale of soldiers. On the contrary, recent speeches seem designed to drive a wedge between labor and the army and to build up a dangerous antagonism between them for the postwar period. The campaign is also becoming an attempt to build up an alibi for the lag in war production, and perhaps also, as General Marshall's off-the-record press conference indicated, for possible military reverses in the field.

This campaign seems to stem from two sources. One is the military bureaucracy. The other is the small group of corporation lawyers who framed the Austin-Wadsworth bill, a measure which shows little if any understanding of the problem of mobilizing man-power in a total war and would convert American industry into one vast open shop. The most important men in this group seem to be Grenville Clark, of Root, Clark, Buckner, and Ballantine, and Douglas Arant, whose firm represents the Tennessee Coal and Iron Company. Clark is an old friend and Harvard classmate of the President's. The group has access to the Secretary of War through his special assistant, Goldthwaite H. Dorr. Their contact man with the Senate Military Affairs Committee and their principal Congressional lobbyist is Colonel Lewis H. Sanders, a gentleman who repeatedly announces that "surveys" show the need for a national-service act but who rarely, if ever, turns up with any concrete figures

It is the military who are the dominant power in Washington today, and the fact was demonstrated anew in the Presidential message recommending national service as part of a five-point program. Some of the civilians closest to the President have told friends that national service was not in the final draft of the message the night before its delivery. Director of War Mobilization James F. Byrnes, who is second in command to the President, claims that he did not know national service was to be recommended until he saw the mimeographed advance copy of the message the morning of its delivery. National service is said on good authority to have gone in and out of the message several times. Some people believe a factor in the last-minute change was the President's desire to have General Marshall as a running-mate if the Republicans nominate General MacArthur for Vice-President.

From all I can learn, the advice of the War Production Board as well as of the War Manpower Commission was against national service, and there is good reason to believe that this was also the advice of Baruch. I am also told that Under Secretary Patterson, despite an impassioned appeal, met with a cool reception from the Navy Department's top civilian officials. This seems to be a War Department show, and in running it the War Department has completely dropped the rest of the President's five-point program. The War Department seems to want national service and nothing else. Secretary Stimson has gone on the air with an intemperate and unfair attack on labor. Perhaps the most effective answer to it is the admission made the very next day to the Senate Military Affairs Committee by his own Under Secretary. "It would be unfair and untrue," Judge Patterson said, "to give any impression that strikes have generally prevented the fulfilment of War Department production schedules." Yet that was exactly the impression Secretary Stimson gave. I would call attention to one other statement made by the Under Secretary. "A national-service act will not stop all strikes. . . . The no-strike pledge of labor must remain, as in the past, the cornerstone of our program." Unfair attacks upon labor, the War Department needs to be reminded, will not make it easier for labor leaders to keep that pledge.

I have the highest respect for the Under Secretary of War. We are fortunate to have so fine and honorable a man in so important a position. He has consistently opposed anti-labor legislation in the past, and he has been courageous on many occasions in dealing with big business. But anyone who spends a day at the War Production Board and the War Manpower Commission checking the Under Secretary's testimony on man-power and production lags will not come away impressed. I have not the space to go into detail, but I want to take up one instance. The Under Secretary mentioned ball bearings. This is one of the last of the so-called "critical components" which is still critical. Ball bearings are vital to the war program. Patterson told the Senate Military Affairs Committee that the lag in producing ball bearings was due to "inability to get enough workers." He said there were "plenty of people living in the vicinity" of the plants, but "some of them would rather make hats, toys, artificial flowers, or gadgets. . . . " I beg the Under Secretary of War to brush aside the brass hats and look into this situation for himself. It will open his eyes, not merely to the facts about ball bearings, but to a typical situation in war production and to the quality of the advice he has been getting.

The Under Secretary will find that the ball-bearings industry has difficulty recruiting workers because its wages are low, its working conditions bad, and its labor relations archaic. He will find that the War Labor Board has been slow in permitting wage adjustments. He will find that his own procurement officers, despite countless directives, are still putting contracts for civilian-type requirements, easily obtained elsewhere, into areas where there is a shortage of labor for ball bearings. Two hundred new war contracts, many of this type, have but recently been placed in central Connecticut, hub of the ball-bearings industry. The Under Secretary will also find that consistent production scheduling has yet to be introduced into the industry; no real attempt has been made to rearrange orders so that plants can concentrate on one style of ball bearings instead of shifting from one to another. He will also find that the ball-bearings industry has just begun to take two of the most obvious and elementary steps required to speed production. One is to share its patents and know-how, and the other is to teach smaller shops enough of its jealously guarded processes to make wider farming out possible. Ball bearings, like every one of the other specific cases discussed by the Under Secretary, is much more than a simple manpower problem.

I do not deny that man-power is a problem too, but it is only a problem as regards skilled workers in crucial areas. I think it is labor's duty to work out special programs, perhaps in the shape of mobile battalions of skilled workers, to meet this need. But all I have heard from Stimson, Patterson, and Marshall convinces me that the military bureaucracy, whose control of procurement gives it final control of man-power mobilization, lacks the competence to administer national service effectively. With sharply growing unemployment just ahead of us, to place compulsion in the hands of the military would serve only to upset production and embitter labor.

Germany at Bay

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

NENERAL EISENHOWER'S recent prediction that The European phase of World War II would end in 1944 is a frank recognition of a situation that is becoming increasingly clear. A Germany still strong and aggressive is being increasingly overmatched by three other great powers. Since November of 1942 the Reichswehr has not won a single major victory, and the Axis has met defeat on half a dozen different fronts. Today the war has reached a point where observers are speculating whether the final blow will be struck by rapidly advancing Russian armies in the east or an Anglo-American invasion force on a new western front. While there should be no tendency to underrate the difficulty and cost of the tasks ahead or the desperate resistance which the Nazis may put up, it is not too far-fetched to say that 1944 will see a friendly race between Roosevelt and Stalin.

The stubborn counter-attacks by which the Germans have tried to hold as much of the Dnieper line as possible are quite understandable. As I have pointed out in earlier articles, the Dnieper River forms one of the strongest barriers to be found in an area largely lacking in natural defenses. In addition the line was backed by a singularly good system of north-south railways. Nowhere in the area farther west was there a better place for a stand. Some of our military commentators criticized at the time the efforts made by the Germans last fall to retake Korosten and Zhitomir. Yet the German High Command probably reasoned that the Dnieper should be easier to hold than any line they could withdraw to. And only by fierce counter-attacks could they stave off a major disaster in the Dnieper bend. Those launched served their immediate purpose, restoring communications between the various parts of the front, but the inability to follow through illustrates the growing military poverty of the Germans. It is obviously becoming more and more difficult for them to counter Russian blows in one sector without stripping other parts of the front of their reserves. This was shown by the crumbling of the army which had so long besieged Leningrad after powerful Soviet feint in the Nevel region had drawn enemy reinforcements to that spot. Caught off guard, the Germans farther north suddenly found themselves the victims of a pincers movement, as the Red Army drove south from the Baltic, overrunning the German siege lines, and west by the shores of Lake Ilmen, where the major stronghold of Novgorod was taken. This twin offensive sliced through the most vital enemy communications and created a pocket similar to that in the southern Ukraine.

Despite the drama of the relief of Leningrad it is probable that the Dnieper sector, where sixty to seventy Nazi divisions are outflanked, remains the most critical front. This is not, to be sure, the first time the Axis forces in the Ukraine have been in a tough spot. On two previous occasions vigorous counter-attacks have held off military disaster. Yet counter-attacks inevitably mean hard fighting and large losses—and the Russians are far better able to bear casualties. Thus even if the Germans are successful in such attacks, their losses will be high and their strategic position still bad on a front rapidly being lengthened by Russian success in pushing out salients elsewhere. Failure would mean obliteration.

The lack of satisfactory defenses farther west is another factor which should cause the Germans to fight fiercely from now until the end of the war. The Bug River might offer a temporary sanctuary. Only one other major river, the Vistula, could be used as a natural barrier, and use of this would mean sacrificing East Prussia and defending a crooked front. Moreover, north-south railway lines, which would be needed to provide lateral communication behind an active front, are scarce in Poland. A possible line of defense well served in this respect would extend from just east of Riga, south through Dvinsk, Vilno, Lida, the Pripet Marshes, and southeastern Poland, and then along the Dniester River. It would be shorter than the present line and constitute a far safer position. If the Germans retired to it, they would of course abandon all the pre-1939 Russian territory they now hold. However, even this front has been partly demolished in eastern Poland. Farther to the west there is nothing nearly so defensible before Germany itself is reached. With East Prussia now only 300 miles away from Russian armies which have advanced, from Stalingrad, a total of 800 miles in fourteen months, the Germans on the eastern front must undergo continued weakening, if they do not meet a military disaster far worse than that of Stalingrad.

The prospects on the as yet non-existent western front are harder to gauge. For several months American troops have been pouring into the British Isles by the hundred thousand. The appointment of invasion commanders is also complete, though the names of some have not vet been made public. Incidentally, the choice of Eisenhower for commander-in-chief is as good as could have been made. Preliminary bombing of the Channel Coast defenses has been under way for several weeks. The necessity of this advanced softening up greatly lessens the chances of surprise in any attack upon fixed positions. It cannot, of course, be stated that the Allied invasion will be limited to areas bordering the English Channel, thought recent aerial operations indicate that we shall try to establish a wide bridgehead on the north coast of France. Several attacks, some of them feints to deceive the enemy as to the major objective, are certain to be launched.

The recent landings below Rome have brought a welcome speeding up to the Italian campaign. The strategy of this move was so obvious that the only surprise was over the fact that it had not been made earlier. The Germans plainly expected it last fall and for that reason kept large reserves in the Po Valley. A shortage of landing craft caused by blunders in the navy's Bureau of Ships mainly necessitated the delay, though the secondary status of the Italian campaign in the strategy of the war as a whole probably made Allied leaders even less willing to furnish the required shipping. The delay may have worked to our advantage by permitting a surprise which would have been less likely four months ago. We still have strong cards to play in the Mediterranean, and the Germans as they retreat cannot rule out other landings to the north or attacks elsewhere.

For the Germans the situation contains some elements of strength and many of weakness. Rommel, probably the best leader of land forces that the war has produced, will be directing the defense. The troops at his command are estimated at forty to forty-five divisions. Not all of them are first class, since some are punch-drunk from fighting the Russians and others are Axis satellite troops of uncertain morale; a number of divisions are well below their normal combat strength and greatly need replacements. Some additional divisions-eight to ten in all-might be obtained by abandoning Norway, no longer of much value to Germany now that it has lost both the Battle of the Atlantic and all reasonable hope of stopping supplies to Russia. The recently called sixteen- and seventeen-year-olds form a last reserve, at the very bottom of the man-power barrel.

The Germans have undoubtedly assigned some of their troops to the beach defenses and some to a mobile reserve farther inland which can be rushed to the point of attack. They are reported to have evacuated the population within eighteen miles of the coast in an effort to discourage sabotage and other fifth-column activities in aid of the invaders. Anything resembling complete shore defenses along a long coastline is out of the question. However, it is reasonable to suppose that the harbors and beaches most suitable for landing will be heavily mined. Concrete blockhouses, gun emplacements, barbed wire, and machine-gun nests will also be encountered. German practice elsewhere indicates that depth will be a feature of these defenses. An indeterminate amount of air opposition should also develop.

Landing on a heavily fortified enemy coast is one of the hardest of all military problems, and we must expect bad losses. Sea and air superiority give an enormous advantage; indeed, without them such an operation would be impossible. But as other actions have shown, they are not enough. The decisive step must be taken the hard way by individual infantrymen who, braving heavy casualties, overcome enemy defenses and hold off attack until artillery and tanks can be landed and can then spread out. This step is an especially critical one, and in our case it must be undertaken by troops who, though well trained, have had little or no previous battle experience. In the "know-how" that comes from many fights the Germans have a very important advantage.

With the invasion of Western Europe will come a change of emphasis in aerial warfare. Ever since the fall of France the R. A. F., and more recently our own Army Air Force, has been employed mostly in strategic bombing as distinguished from tactical (in support of ground forces). In fact, a strong tendency on the part of some airmen to overlook the cooperative use of air power has only recently been corrected. As an individual striking weapon the bomber has great achievements to its credit. It has certainly damaged German industry and morale and made the path of Allied armies easier. Some 284,-000 tons of bombs dropped on Europe during 1943 is a record which speaks for itself. But when the invasion starts, the main task of air power will be direct cooperation with land armies; cutting down the enemy's war potential will be distinctly secondary.

The sinking of the Scharnhorst in the Arctic and of other German surface vessels in the Bay of Biscay should very nearly end the fight for domination of the Atlantic shipping lanes. New anti-submarine weapons have robbed the once dreaded U-boat of most of its potency. Often underrated, this battle between Allied sea power and German under-sea power has been second to none in its effect on the outcome of the war. Its loss would have meant German victory, whereas experience shows that the United Nations can lose on three land fronts without being defeated as long as they control the seas.

Simultaneously with the invasion of Europe should come somewhat faster action in the Pacific, for at last our navy has a decisive and increasing edge there. The same kind of aerial advance notice as that being given in France indicates amphibious moves against various atolls in the Marshalls. If reports from the Pacific are correct, a change in tactics in these forthcoming operations may save us from such losses as those suffered at Tarawa. On New Guinea and New Britain we are gaining steadily and at small loss, though also slowly. The attention being given to Kavieng serves notice that New Ireland, too, stands high on the Allied priority list.

Unfortunately, the United Nations have had one very discreditable failure which could be but has not yet been rectified. Twenty months ago Burma fell into Japanese hands after a campaign which on the British side represented Colonel Blimp at his worst and revealed more concentrated political and military stupidity than any similar operation of which this writer has knowledge. Today an Indian army fifteen times as large as the Japanese occupation forces is available a few hundred miles to the west. The Chinese have indicated a willingness to cooperate from the north in case the morale of the Indian army is too low to risk a Burmese campaign—if the British will now permit them to operate in Burma. The steady attrition suffered by Japanese sea power and the disappearance of the Italian navy have made available to the Allies sufficient naval strength to more than match anything the Japanese are likely to be able to send into the Indian Ocean. We already have superiority in the air. China has been promised increased aid and reopened communication lines, and the United States has done a signally good job of supply. The failure under these circumstances to mount an offensive to reopen the Burma road and drive the Japanese out of Southeastern Asia is a disgrace to the entire United Nations as well as to the leader most directly responsible.

10 Years Ago in "The Nation"

TEMPERS ARE RISING AGAIN in the Far East. Undisguised preparations for war go on apace. . . . Hirota's overture to the United States suggests that the Japanese believe there is more to American recognition of Russia than appears to the naked eye and that they have at last been thoroughly frightened by our gigantic navalbuilding program. That this program has been laid down as an answer to Japan's military preparations and with an eye directly on the menacing situation in the Far East can no longer be denied.—February 7, 1934.

IT IS A PLEASURE to report . . . that literally thousands of letters are pouring into Washington from persons stating they have canceled their subscriptions to the Chicago Tribune because of its scurrilous attacks on the NRA. This was the sheet which introduced the delectable practice of employing known criminals and racketeers. By every standard of professional decency and public morals Colonel McCormick has earned the right to retire from the publishing business. I hope the people of Chicago will help him to exercise it.—PAUL Y. ANDERSON, February 7, 1934.

MUSSOLINI NOW SUGGESTS giving Hitler an army of 300,000 if he will return to the League, while Great Britain advances one of Sir John Simon's famous formulas, by which France is offered more security and Germany is offered more military strength if only they will come back to Geneva and save the [disarmament] conference!—February 14, 1934.

AS WE WRITE THESE LINES Austria's workers are fighting I life-and-death battle with fascism, which, in the guise of the Dollfuss Heimwehr, is threatening to choke—and will choke—their labor movement.—February 21, 1934.

THE LATEST INCIDENT in the Rivera-Rockefeller controversy occurred when the panel containing the head of Lenin was "removed" in a cloud of plaster dust from the wall in Rockefeller Center in New York City, where it had stood under a concealing screen since last spring. In other words, the Rockefellers, well known as patrons of art, have destroyed, for commercial reasons, an important work by the world's most famous mural painter.—February 28, 1934.

Co-op International

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

N THE winter of 1843-44 a small group of poor weavers meeting in the back street of the grimy industrial town of Rochdale, England, created together social invention—the idea of consumers' cooperation. Like most inventions it was not completely original; other men in other places had worked it out in part. Nor was this discovery exactly what its authors were seeking, for their goal was an even larger conception—ta method by which the tyranny of capitalism with its low wages and high prices could be circumvented. They booked for a way of acquiring the means of production so that they might employ themselves; the formation of a trading society through which they could buy collectively was to be only a first step in this direction.

Yet if they knew not what they wrought, their craftsmen's instincts were sound, for in drawing up the articles of their association they established a set of principles which have formed a firm foundation for the world-wide movement of consumer cooperation. They were: (1) membership open to all; (2) one person, one vote; (3) limited interest on capital; (4) distribution of savings according to patronage; (5) cash trading at market prices; (6) political and religious neutrality; (7) constant education; (8) continuous expansion. These are the Rochdale principles, masterly in their simplicity, which today, a century after they were invented, guide and inspire the humblest "co-op" as well as such powerful institutions as the English Cooperative Wholesale Society with its billion-dollar turnover.

Before the war consumers' cooperatives were to be found in almost all countries, and in many they played a major and expanding role in the national economy. In Great Britain they cover half the families and account for more than a quarter of the total food sales. In Sweden, with over 40 per cent of the population enjoying cooperative membership, the manufacturing activities of the wholesale society have done much to offset the restrictive tendencies of local trusts. The fact that with all the shortages the war has brought to Sweden there is no significant black market is often ascribed to the influence of the cooperatives.

Cooperatives have expanded on the federal principle. Local societies have joined in regional groups to carry on common enterprises, and regional groups have come together to form national associations for business and other common purposes. The movement, moreover, has long looked beyond national boundaries. Nearly fifty years ago the International Cooperative Alliance was founded for the purpose of exchanging and spreading information. Before the war it represented 171,300 societies with 71,588,000 members in 35 countries. In 1919 an International Cooperative Wholesale Society was set up with the object of promoting trade relations among its members. It did not do any business on its own account, but in 1938 an international trading agency was inaugurated to act as intermediary in overseas cooperative trade. There were also a number of other federal organizations transcending national boundaries, such as the joint wholesale society maintained by the cooperatives of the four Scandinavian countries.

In spite of such developments the amount of direct trade between cooperatives in different countries was comparatively limited before the war. But the seeds of growth had been sown, and when the freezing grip of conflict is relaxed there is hope for a bountiful crop. The second century of consumers' cooperation may well be dedicated to its international integration.

It was in this faith that the Cooperative League of the United States summoned a Conference on International Cooperative Reconstruction to meet in Washington on January 19 and 20. Representatives of twenty-two different countries discussed a series of recommendations which fell under two broad heads: (1) proposals for immediate post-war relief and rehabilitation through the medium of cooperative agencies; (2) a program for the long-term expansion of cooperative institutions throughout the world by the development of joint trading and productive enterprises.

In all European countries where immediate relief measures to save the inhabitants from starvation and disease will have to be undertaken as soon as the Germans are driven out, the existence of a network of cooperative organizations provides a ready-made system of distribution. Like other democratic bodies, the cooperatives have of course suffered under the occupation, for they represent everything to which the Nazis are opposed. In Germany itself they were long ago incorporated in the Labor Front, and every vestige of selfgovernment was taken from them. In parts of Poland and Czechoslovakia the Nazis have proceeded on somewhat similar lines, but in other occupied countries there has been less interference. Like all businesses the cooperatives have been subjected to much harassing and regulation; in some cases Quisling managers have been forced upon them. But there is reason to hope that most of them have held together. As Margaret Digby, an English cooperator, has written, "A system which depends so much more on personal than on financial elements is likely to have a quite special survival value."

In a newly published study* by the International Labor Office, maps of Holland and Denmark show each cooperative distribution point marked by a dot. The effect is that of a superlative case of freckles. Every inhabitant of these countries is within easy reach of a store, a credit society, or a farm-marketing warehouse which purchases for its members as well as taking care of their sales. The network is not so closely woven in all European countries, but according to the I. L. O., something like a quarter of the population of the Continent is included in one form or another of cooperative institution. And as their membership is mainly in the low income brackets, the cooperatives actually cover a much greater proportion of the people who will be in the most urgent need of relief.

Apart from the density of their coverage, the special characteristics of cooperative organizations make them very appropriate vehicles for the distribution of relief and the promotion of rehabilitation. Among their useful features in this respect the I. L. O. lists the following: (1) Cooperative personnel combine business training with a social-service outlook. (2) There is an identity of interest between the cooperatives and the people they serve; supplies allotted to them are less likely to be diverted to the black market than those distributed through profit-making concerns. (3) The democratic structure of cooperatives and their practice of giving full publicity to their accounts facilitates inspection and control. (4) While some European cooperatives are tied in with religious or political bodies, in general they are open to all without regard to income, profession, or belief. In view of these considerations, the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration (UNRRA) would do well to give effect to the recommendation of the Washington Cooperative Conference that it create a cooperative division to keep in close touch with and work through the movement at home and abroad.

If, as spokesmen for the UNRRA have emphasized, the first objective of relief is to help people to help themselves, the cooperative movement forms an ideal medium. For, to quote the I. L. O. report, it "is not passive mechanism but an active self-help and mutual-aid organization." The whole cooperative tradition is opposed to charity. Men and women in its ranks will accept relief to keep their families from starving, but they will look upon it merely as a method of keeping alive while they restore their devastated fields and rebuild their workshops. That is why the Cooperative League of America has suggested to the UNRRA the setting up of a central fund which will make loans to cooperatives in countries afflicted by the war, enabling them to rebuild facilities and inventories so that in turn they may assist their members to restore production as rapidly as possible. On the basis of past experience one can prophesy that few such loans will be defaulted. The International Cooperative Alliance has itself started a "Freedom Fund" of at least two million dollars, which will be raised by popular subscription in countries such as Britain and Sweden and will be used to provide gifts and loans to cooperatives in liberated lands. The American movement is undertaking to match this effort.

• "Cooperative Organization and Post-War Relief." International Labor Office, Montreal. $1.

Wherever the Nazis have marched they have not only wrought wholesale damage to property but have largely destroyed property ownership as an institution. By looting, by confiscation, by forced sales paid for with forced credits, they have obtained possession of much of the concrete wealth of the occupied lands for themselves or their Quislings. So thoroughly have they made an omelet of property rights that there is little hope of restoring the original eggs. Moreover, in many cases, the lawful owners and their families have been completely wiped out.

It is certain, therefore, that me great deal of "orphaned" property will have to be taken care of after the Nazis have been stripped of their plunder. Much of it is likely to be socialized, but the suggestion has been made, in the magazine Fortune and elsewhere, that a wise alternative might be to turn production plants into cooperatives. In the case of factories producing for more than mocal market the regional or national wholesale societies which exist in most countries would be the logical medium, and under cooperative management such enterprises could not only play a leading role in economic reconstruction but furnish a permanent check on monopolistic tendencies. Indeed, this proposal might suggest to Jesse Jones a good way of disposing of government war plants in this country.

The natural tendency of consumer cooperatives is to band together to secure the advantages of bulk buying and eventually to manufacture at least a part of their basic requirements. For in this way they are able to make greater savings for their members, secure control over quality, and maintain a yardstick by which to measure the prices charged by private enterprise. In the United States the rapid growth of cooperatives during the past ten years has been accompanied by a number of successful ventures in the field of production. The regional wholesale societies, sometimes singly, sometimes in alliance, are now producing an important range of goods—fertilizers, cattle feeds, foodstuffs, paint, farm machincry, lumber products.

Most significant of all these developments is the large cooperative investment in petroleum refining, the story of which was told to the international conference in Washington last week by Howard A. Cowden, president of the Consumers' Cooperative Association of Kansas City. Within the last six years nine refineries, nearly 300 producing oil wells, and more than 1,000 miles of pipe-line have been acquired to supply cooperative distributors of gasoline and oil. Taken together—and they are closely interlinked—the cooperative petroleum enterprises can now claim to be the largest independent refiners and distributors in the country. In 1942, it is estimated by the Farm Credit Administration, 22 per cent of the total volume of motor fuels consumed by farmers was delivered by cooperatives, and their urban business is also expanding rapidly.

This development is a real challenge to the oil trusts on their native soil, and Mr. Cowden is planning to extend it to the foreign market. Before the war his organization had done business in a small way with cooperatives in nine European countries. These customers obtained their oil on the same terms as domestic membersocieties of the association, receiving patronage dividends on their purchases. Now Mr. Cowden and his colleagues in the Cooperative League are proposing that immediately after the war an International Cooperative Trading and Manufacturing Association should be formed and financed by the various national wholesale societies. This body, to begin with, would have two divisions, food and petroleum. The former, it is suggested, should operate at first on an agency basis, but the object of the latter would be to provide a fully integrated cooperative business from oil well to tank car. The idea is, of course, only in the discussion stage, but the delegates at Washington were definitely receptive.

The heart of the American cooperative movement has always been the Middle West, and for a long time it was only regionally conscious. In recent years, however, it has acquired a national outlook and begun to tackle its problems in national terms. Now it is extending its vision to still wider horizons. To quote Mr. Cowden again:

We live in world community. Therefore we may as well begin to act like adult citizens of the world and build our economic organizations on global basis. The common citizens of all countries cannot communicate with each other through the international cartels which have been built by the few for purposes of exploiting the many. They can communicate with one another, they can learn to trust and believe in one another, through their own cooperative system of industry and exchange.

It is a hundred years since the Rochdale pioneers wove their cooperative idea. But the colors have not faded, the design still carries its message, and what was once a riny square of cloth has become a mantle to cover the earth.

End of an Era

BY GERTRUDE BAER

THE death on December 20, 1943, of Anita Augspurg marks for our generation the close of a whole epoch—that epoch of liberation, of emancipation from legal, social, political, and intellectual disabilities, of intense fight for equality of sex, creed, class, and race.

When Anita Augspurg studied law in Berlin and took her doctor's degree in Zurich in 1897, she was fitting herself for just that fight. She wanted to acquire the scholarly background necessary for taking part in formulating the amendments to the Family Law proposed by the German women's movement when, in the nineties, the new Code of Civil Law was under discussion in the Reichstag. And, indeed, she had a prominent part in the struggle for the incorporation of women's demands into the law.

Though ever since 1886 she had been active in Munich in the agitation for women's rights, she now came to realize that the prerequisite for a radical transformation of the general position of women was their full right to vote. Together with Lida Gustava Heymann she concentrated on this one goal, building up the German Union for Women's Suffrage, of which she was president. In contrast to the women's-suffrage movement of that time, which advocated votes for women on the same limited terms as for men, she boldly stood for demands that were "radical" in the Germany of that day—equal, secret, and direct votes for all men and women.

Suffrage certainly did not "fall into the lap of German women," as has frequently been asserted. The struggle was violent; and violent were the attacks and calumnies against the movement and its leaders. When finally in November, 1918, as the first act of the new Republic of Bavaria, women were enfranchised on the terms Anita Augspurg had demanded for men and women alike, the flag with the black, red, and gold colors of the German Democratic movement of 1848 was flying on the flagstaff of her estate in the hills high above the Isar Valley in Upper Bavaria.

When she was asked to stand as a candidate for the first parliament of the Bavarian Republic on the voting list headed by Prime Minister Kurt Eisner, leader of the Independent Socialist Party, she accepted on condition that she need not join the party. The German party system, with its tendency to demagogic tactics, seemed to her the root of many political evils.

Democracy was her fundamental creed. In innumerable speeches and articles, in the political monthly Die Frau im Staat, which she and Lida Gustava Heymann owned together and edited from 1918 until they had to leave the country in 1933, she called on Germans to educate themselves for the exercise of political power.

"The rights and liberties firmly established by the 1919 constitution are also fundamental duties, and with the people's consciousness of their rights must go a sense of obligation."

Born a citizen of the independent kingdom of Hanover on September 22, 1857, she watched Prussia's rise to power and supremacy as it reduced one independent German state after another to a Prussian province. All her life she warned that here was one of the mainsprings of ever-recurring wars in Europe, and advocated the breaking of Prussia's hegemony and its military and Junker castes, hoping that a federal Germany within the frame of a free and united Europe would give the German people the chance to develop a realization of decent political conduct, democracy, and a sincere will to peace.

When in 1915 women from neutral and warring countries, under the presidency of Jane Addams, succeeded in meeting at The Hague for the first international women's peace congress ever held in war time, Anita Augspurg was among those who went-assailed by the whole German women's movement. She became one of the founders, and to the end remained a leader, of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom (at that time named International Committee of Women for Permanent Peace) and of its German section. At critical moments during periods of civil war and indeed throughout the years between 1918 and 1933, she displayed her many rare qualities—her political philosophy, her gift for precise and forcible expression, and her boundless devotion to the task of educating German women to a consciousness of their political opportunities and their political dignity.

When after the last war the full extent of the destruction wrought by the German troops in the devastated areas became known in Germany, Anita Augspurg and her coworkers gave as voluntary reparation to the city of Arras in northern France young growing trees to replace the bare mained tree trunks of that region. The funds for this offering were contributed by women and men of small means who had sold what possessions war and inflation had left them.

Anita Augspurg was a unique personality. Strong of will, she was never afraid of walking untried paths in science and politics as well as in her personal life. She was far ahead of her time, always ready to profess and maintain her views, principles, and beliefs. She was unshakably convinced that free women have a contribution of their own to make to human society, that they ought not to imitate men's actions and reactions but to allow their "creative agent" to unfold and operate for the benefit of themselves and of the world. To her, freedom and equality of rights and opportunities were not a distant goal but tools for daily use, now, in the formation and development of a human society, national and international, based on justice for all its elements and on peace, the twin concept of freedom.

Only when our generation takes up for the second time the work of reconstruction will it fully realize how much it owes to the last two outstanding German women of the pre-Hitler epoch—Anita Augspurg and Lida Gustava Heymann.

In the Wind

THE CHICAGO TRIBUNE is no longer able to boast, as it did for years, that its circulation is over a million. Last November the circulation was 930,000; in December it dropped to 905,000, following a C. I. O. vote to boycott the paper.

THE CHICAGO PUBLIC LIBRARY has discontinued the sale of pamphlets on national and world affairs. Leo A. Lerner, a member of the board of trustees, whose term had expired in 1942 but who had been held over, voted to continue the sales. A few days later he was dropped from the board. Discontinuance was proposed by the chairman of the board, Joseph E. Fleming, attorney for the Chicago Tribune. Mayor Kelly, who dropped Lerner and appointed his successor, was asked by reporters if Lerner had been "fired." He replied, "I don't know. I don't know anything about it."

NEW YORKERS WHO LISTEN to the city's local radio stations have lately been hearing an advertisement by Spear's, a chain of furniture stores, offering to send a special service men's edition of the New York Daily Mirror free of charge to men in the armed forces. For those who may be worried about the effect of Hearst journalism on the men overseas, this report: The special edition is published once a week. It consists of twelve pages, nine by six and one-half inches, and contains news, pictures, and features, selected and edited by the Mirror staff. Spear's advertising manager says controversial matter is omitted. However, at least one editorial that has appeared thus far seems to overstep the limits of the non-controversial. It denounces the Washington "Communists, State Socialists, and Internationalists who would sell our birthright as an independent sovereignty for a mess of wars that do not concern us." A spokesman for the Mirror said the editorial reflected Hearst policy and was "not controversial."

FESTUNG EUROPA: The secretaries and typists of German administrative offices in Belgium have been armed with revolvers. They hold shooting practice twice a day. . . . Freshman registration at Dutch universities now is about 10 per cent of the pre-war average. A sharp drop took place last year when an oath of obedience to the Nazi regime was required.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Franco, New Axis Chief

BY DOROTHY THOMPSON

In designating Madrid as the real center of the new Nazi-fascist Axis, Miss Thompson touches upon one of the major problems of political warfare. Franco in power means the continuation of Nazi intrigue throughout the Western Hemisphere. The German and Japanese embassies in Buenos Aires will be closed, but the Spanish embassy will remain open. As in Santiago, in Lima, in Montevideo, Franco's diplomatic services will continue to work for Hitler and prepare the ground for the new Fascist International after Hitler has been overthrown. Franco in power means the continuation of the espionage, sabotage, and anti-United Nations propaganda in Europe which have been a principal subject of discussion in the British and American press during the past week, and which motivated Foreign Secretary Eden's recent protest. This journal has been protesting for a long time, but it has taken four bloody years for a high British official to realize the hypocrisy of the Franco regime, and to say, as the New York Herald Tribune reported, "We all know what degree of sincerity to read into Franco's protestations of friendship and neutrality. They are 100 ber cent insincere."

In presenting the analysis that follows we are doing something almost unprecedented; we are publishing a broadcast that was delivered over a national radio hook-up—the Blue Network of the National Broadcasting Company. But the vigor and penetration of Miss Thompson's address, and its timeliness, lead us to believe that areaders will be glad to have in print an analysis they may have missed on the air.—A. DEL V.]

URING the past weeks I have been observing something I think very important. You may not be convinced by what I am going to say, but I shall produce concrete evidence. Fascism is not just an Italian or a German idea. The chief German Nazis—Hitler, Rosenberg, Göring, Goebbels, Himmler, Hess—are not ordinary German nationalists at all. (Conrad Heiden, in his book "Der Führer," calls them "armed bohemians.") Of these six men I have just named, only two—Göring and Goebbels—were even born in Germany. All of them have always looked far beyond Germany. They organized, in National Socialism, movement which was designed to sweep the world. They built up this conspiracy methodically in all countries. Their idea was to create a new kind of state, and world union of states, based on the overthrow of popular governments and the substitution of military despotisms by means of organized mass movements—all these states to be pawns in the hands of the intellectual and political leaders of the Nazi-fascist parties.

The key point of the whole plot was Berlin, the strongest capital of the strongest state in Europe.

They know now that the Nazi-fascist war may be lost. They have to take that into their reckoning. Of course they will prolong it as long as they can. They know that there can be many a slip in war. Allies, for instance, can split; governments can change, bringing new policies. They will try, and probably succeed, in turning the path to Berlin into a path of blood. But they have to take into their calculations that in all probability, sooner or later, they will lose the war. So then what will they do?

What they are already laying plans for is to create a new Axis. They are planning to find new ground from which to continue their fight against free governments and peoples, against the passion of the peoples to cast off their chains of militarism and oppression and—as Lincoln said—find freedom in the brotherhood of life.

The Nazi international foresees that Europe may be almost wholly lost to it. Whether the Russians descend on Germany with grim, relentless fury, or whether the Anglo-American troops march triumphant from Calais to Berlin, fascism will be finished in belligerent Europe with our winning of the war. It will be finished in Norway, Holland, Belgium, France, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Rumania, and Poland. And it will be finished in Berlin and Rome.

Where then will it go? I will tell you. It is going to make this hop: Berlin-Madrid-Buenos Aires. The center of the new Nazi-fascist Axis will not be Berlin. It will be Madrid. Hitler's experience shows that you don't need a great power to start with. He didn't even start with Germany, but with one town—Munich. The rest he did by propaganda and tactics. And the rallying ground for a new attempt to overthrow political freedom and the countries based on it will not be in the Old World but in the New World—in Latin America. The signs and portents reveal themselves daily. And the old familiar pattern repeats itself, too—the pattern of appeasement.

The most dangerous man in the world the day after victory will not be Hitler, who will have managed to ally the whole world against him and lead his country to catastrophe. No, the most dangerous fascist will be Franco, who is managing to help the Axis while winning gratitude from us for his so-called neutrality.

What does that neutrality amount to? Is it a neutrality comparable, for instance, to that of Sweden and Switzerland? Is it the neutrality of a man who wants us to win, because his country is, like Switzerland and Sweden, freedom-loving and democratic? Not at all. Franco's neutrality is the neutrality of a man who would like to see the Axis win and has repeatedly said so, but who thinks it may not, and intends to preserve one place in Europe where fascism can take a new lease on life after this war. Franco is betting on Germany and Italy being defeated but on fascism surviving.

For the past weeks dispatches from Madrid to the United States have appeared under such headlines as "Franco Currying Favor with Allies," "Spain Frees Republicans for Christmas Amnesty," "Franco Seeks to Allay Hatreds—His New Liberalism Intended to Remove Threats of Revolts," "Spain Paying Debt to U. S. Exporters"—all these creating the impression that Spain is swinging over to our side in the war and even to domestic liberalism. Several news reports from Spain say that Franco is gradually dissolving the Phalangist Party—the Spanish fascist party.

But if one reads these dispatches carefully they furnish no evidence whatever that any of this wishful thinking is true. Has Franco freed political prisoners, in a movement toward "greater liberalism"? According to the Falangist newspaper, there were in January, 1940, 270,719 republican political prisoners. The Christmas amnesty freed 40,000 of these. That left more than 230,-000. Dispatches say that 34,000 cases are under review. That would still leave over 200,000 unaccounted for. And a little item explains this. "The majority of Spanish prisoners," it says, "were arrested without any charges whatsoever, and the amnesty does not apply to them." So our liberal Franco is apparently holding around 200,-000 persons without warrant, without indictment, without any reason ever given to them or to the world. These men who were imprisoned for their resistance to fascism are infinitely worse off than Nazi prisoners of war in British or American internment camps, whose treatment is under international conventions and checked by the Red Cross.

Is Franco gradually dissolving the Phalangist Party, as reported by Herbert Clark, correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune, on January 8? The only evidence Mr. Clark gives for this is that Franco is taking some non-Phalangists into his government. Hitler has had men who were not Nazi Party members in his government from the beginning to the present time. The Phalangist Party is the only legal party in Spain. It is supported right out of the state treasury. And this year's budget increased the appropriation for the Phalangist Party. A fine way to dissolve a party—to subsidize it out of the taxes of the people!

How about the Spanish Legion, fighting with the Germans on the eastern front? Franco has had to admit that 1,500 of them are still fighting. And what do you think he told British and American diplomats when asked to explain? He said they were mostly criminal elements, whose return to Spain would be bad for the country!

There are some other things happening which tell the truer story. The International Labor Office knows that Franco still has a treaty with the Germans, entitled "Concerning the Allocation of Spanish Man-Power." Under that treaty Franco has furnished labor to German factories. These workers aren't volunteers. They are conscripted by their own government and sent to Germany to make bombs with which to kill us. No such treaty exists between Germany and any other neutral country.

On January 16 news broke of a series of bomb explosions on British ships carrying oranges from Spain to England. This made the British hopping mad, and the British ambassador to Madrid took occasion, at a dinner given to the diplomatic corps, to take Franco aside and protest in no uncertain terms. What was the result? Franco got the American ambassador, Carlton Hayes—who has leaned over backward to behave correctly toward Franco—into a conversation and told him that Algiers was a hotbed of communism, and all the Free French were Communists. Hayes was so angry that it almost came to an international incident—but it's proof enough that Franco feels little necessity to appease us.

It is as clear as distilled water that Franco is playing the Axis game as a neutral while making himself the pet boy of the Allies. He apparently hopes to emerge from the war as the only "decent" fascist in the public opinion of a large part of the Allied countries. And what does that mean to us, the United States?

It means the most dangerous situation imaginable. For of all European countries, the one with the greatest influence in Latin America is Spain. Latin America is predominantly Spanish in culture. Already one fascist coup has been engineered in the Western Hemisphere, namely, in Argentina, where a fascist-military dictatorship on the Franco pattern has seized power. The Ramirez dictatorship is pro-Axis. The recent severance of diplomatic relations with the Axis is no more in conflict with this fact than is Franco's "neutrality." The best position for a fascist regime today is that of "neutrality" toward or collaboration with the winners—especially if they are able to strangle the country's economy.

The Argentine dictatorship speculates that after the war fear of the "colossus of the north" can be created in country after country south of the Rio Grande. The argument that Latin America is threatened by northern domination will be used to prove the necessity for "strong" governments, namely, military and totalitarian dictatorships. And this Argentine pattern is already spreading—to Bolivia, for instance.

Just the other day I heard from a most reliable source that the Nazi regime is preparing, when defeat is no longer avoidable, to shift machinery from German industries to neutral Spain, where it is to be stored until it can be shipped after the war to the Argentine. Their idea is to industrialize and arm the Argentine, spreading from there through all Latin America. They already-as the papers revealed last week-have a formidable spy ring operating from there. In it are even Argentine officials. When the British arrested the Argentine consul in Trinidad, exposing a whole plot, the Argentine government was forced to act. It had to pretend it had only just discovered the machinations of the Axis in its country, whereas in fact the plotting had been thoroughly exposed by an investigating committee of the Argentine Congress. A Montevideo newspaper published a letter the other day from the secretary of the "political bureau of the German embassy" in Buenos Aires promising the iron cross from the Führer to those who work well in Latin America and "help all revolutionary anti-Allied and anti-Semitic elements in Latin America." Whether or not Ramirez severs relations with the Axis, we can count on continued underground activity.

American correspondents who stayed in Berlin until Pearl Harbor claim that Nazis have bought vast estates in the Argentine under assumed names. And one fine day when we think they are licked, we may find that they are among the richest people in South America. Instead of having this dirty conspiracy across the ocean, we'll have it on our very doorstep.

What can we do about all this? There is only one thing we can do. Diplomatic notes and formal protests may change tactics but not essential sympathies. What we can do is to help our real allies, who are the people of these countries. There are strong popular underground movements in both Spain and Argentina—movements which, not for our sakes but for their own, long to overthrow these military despotisms. We should help these movements, help them by all possible means. Hitler saw long ago that the way to get on without war is to overthrow hostile governments from within. And that nuch we should have learned from him.

SPANISH SERENABER

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

Something in the nature of espionage or communication with the enemy must have been discovered in Germany which greatly excited the government. The appearance of the "shadow man" was the first sign. About January 10 all German billboards suddenly displayed an enormous poster over which spread the black shadow of a man with a question mark beside it. On the front pages of newspapers, too, the same figure was pictured. The explanation came only after some days, when suspense had reached a high pitch. Then to the figure on the posters and in the newspapers was added the legend: "The enemy is listening!" The whole thing was a warning against spies. For a campaign of such intensity to be launched with the most sensational publicity in the fifth year of war was certainly astonishing.

The conjecture that something especially alarming had happened is supported by a decree that was published at about the same time, on January 12. The decree was signed-and this was most unusual-not by a civilian official but by Field Marshal Wilhelm Keitel, chief of the German High Command. It announced that any person who wished to send a letter to a neutral country must first obtain a license card. In applying for one he must inform the police whom he wished to write to and describe his relations with that person. The police, after examining his statements, would issue or deny him the license. If he received the license card he must take it with his letter to the post office, where the clerk would enter on the card the date on which the letter was sent. No one would be allowed to send more than two letters a month to a neutral country.

Through this ruling, the Nazi regime choked off communication between Germany and the outside world more tightly than it had ever dared to do before. Previously only the contents of letters had been examined by the censor; from now on the writers also were to be investigated. And whereas only suspicious correspondence used to be held up, now hundreds of thousands of persons were to be barred from any correspondence with foreign countries. The government must have had good reasons for such a sudden act of strangulation in the fifth year of war.

Le Petit Dauphinois, a newspaper published at Grenoble in southern France, carried this notice on December 24:

Young men, a wonderful life of courage and sacrifice is offered to you. Come and serve in that élite body, the French Waffen-S. S. You can choose the infantry, the tank corps, the cavalry, or the navy. For girls, a French nurses', or Schwestern, corps, has been organized. For further information inquire at the Hotel Moderne, rue Félix Poulat, Grenoble.

Here we have one more proof of what two years ago would have been unthinkable—that the German armed forces are seeking foreign recruits. Just as German factories have long been bringing in workers from the conquered regions, so now German regiments are getting soldiers from outside the country. The S. S. seems especially eager for them—the same S. S. which once demanded that its members meet the highest standards of "racial purity" and political dependability. Countless news items, which it is not necessary or possible to specify here, when put together present the following picture.

The S. S. recruits in all countries; it recruits among the foreign workers in Germany; it recruits even among the war prisoners. It seeks volunteers—but not necessarily genuine volunteers: foreign workers and war prisoners have been forced to "volunteer" by the grossest pressure and threats. The S. S. has no national predilections. It welcomes not only Nordic-Germanic recruits like the Norwegians and Hollanders, not only West Europeans like the French and Belgians, but also the despised Poles; even Russians are not scorned. The foreign recruits may be divided according to nationality—in French, Belgian, Slovenian companies—or placed in mixed companies. All their officers, right down to the lowest non-com, are of course German.

Obviously the theory of this is that for a man in uniform, under the compulsion of discipline, there is no possible course but to obey orders and do his dutylike the Hessians in America. And this principle is thought to work most reliably in a body like the S. S., which is made up of police troops more than of combat troops. It is only necessary to take care that no nationals are used in their own country, against men speaking the same language. Some weeks ago, in the little Danish town of Skagen, feverish excitement broke out for a brief time. "The Russians have moved in," ran the rumor; witnesses confirmed it-"we have heard them speak." The strange soldiers actually were an S. S. company made up of Russians, Poles, and Latvians. Ironically enough, the foreign S. S. units can be used with the least danger in Germany itself—they have no bonds with Germans. After two of the most recent air raids against Berlin, Swiss and Swedish newspaper correspondents were surprised to find that the S. S. men who were barring certain streets to traffic did not understand German. They spoke Flemish and Danish.

According to the Budapest newspaper Uj Magyarsag. "men wearing Austrian hats with feathers are appearing in extraordinary numbers on the streets of Vienna." Say it with hats!

BOOKS and the ARTS

Demobilization Day

WHERE'S THE MONEY COMING FROM? PROBLEMS OF POSTWAR FINANCE. By Stuart Chase. Twentieth Century Fund. $1.

THIS is the third in a series of six popular books on the economic problems of "when the war ends." In his breezy yet thoughtful style Chase attacks the fears of those who believe the nation will be so impoverished by the war that we shall be doomed to dark days after it. He explores the institutional changes necessary to establish and maintain reasonably full post-war domestic employment. And he supports the need for such action passionately and dramatically. "Our economy is now geared to a national output... of around $150 billions a year. We are like # Flying Fortress which must maintain a given speed or crash."

The fifteen chapters explore a wide range of related topics, including reconversion problems and policies, social security, public works, and so on. The fundamental argument, though, is found in four chapters. Chapter I poses the basic conundrum of this generation: how could nations which were too poor and feeble to keep their people employed and properly fed and clothed in time of peace find the wherewithal to put everyone at work and enormously increase their output to wage war?

Chapter IV explains the function of money in terms of the ingenious "potato model" developed by Ralph Manuel, Minnesota banker. He likens dollars to claim checks for potatoes in a community that produces nothing else, and shows how if some of the claims are not exercised, potatoes spoil and production falls. (Chapters V to VIII broaden out and generalize this simple illustration, from the facts of the '20's and '30's, to explain our more complicated economy, where money is simply "numbers which move" and where "if savings are not promptly invested in productive work, trouble begins.")

Chapter XII, on "a compensatory economy," is the best in the book. It summarizes in broad strokes, and some careful detail, Chase's conception of the changes we need to make in our economy to maintain reasonably full employment. These are further described in Chapter XIII, which also takes up the possible use of new economic techniques, such as incentive taxes and interest-free money for government investment—methods whose effectiveness "we cannot know in advance. There is no wind tunnel for testing idlemoney tax machines. We have to fly them first to see what happens."

The final chapter outlines and answers the "seven great fears . . . the brakes that may hold back full employment when the war ends." These are the fears of inflation, of a crushing national debt, bureaucracy, paternalism, of an end to progress, of "what you gain, I lose," and fear of the masses. Its closing paragraph will summarize the book. "Where does the money come from? It comes from the work of the people and the work of their machines. The war is forcing this lesson upon us. We may have learned it by Demobilization Day."

Chase's "compensatory economy" is based on four principles: (1) business to carry the maximum possible load of production and distribution; (2) government to fill any serious gaps left in employment, largely through taxation and spending; (3) the federal government to establish minimum economic standards for individuals through social security and public services; and (4) government benefits to be extended to individuals solely as consumers (housing aids, food-stamp plans, pensions) and not at all as producers (farmers, manufacturers, etc.). The volume of public expenditures would be turned off and on semi-automatically, as indicated by current objective counts of the number of unemployed. (Contrary to Chase's statement, these are already regularly available from monthly surveys of the Census Bureau.) Taxes would be "streamlined" and made to bear more on idle money.

The book makes a convincing reply to those who worry about the size of the national debt, and provides a reasoned basis and program for optimism for the future. It has, however, two weaknesses. First, its discussion of demobilization and reconversion problems is too broad and too far from the facts. Although at one point Chase recognizes that Germany may collapse ahead of Japan, all the rest of his discussion is in terms of "D-day," of an overnight end of all war activity on the 1918 model. The actual prospect is that we may face fully half of our post-war industrial conversion problem while we are still fighting Japan. This probability of adjustment to peace by successive stages, instead of at one single sweep, would profoundly modify much of his description of the problem. Furthermore, Chase speaks of the industrial-demobilization problem as almost exclusively one of converting our factories from war goods to peace goods. Actually, war over-expands chemicals and hard goods, and builds much plant which has practically no alternative peace-time use. (This is notably true of ammunition plants, air-frame plants, and shipyards.) To keep our present labor force employed in peace-time production, we must build new and different plants-"soft-goods" plants for more shoes, clothes, amusement-yes, and schools, colleges, hospitals, and clinics. Meantime, we must scrap some of our excess metal-working plants-or put them aside as "stand-by capacity"-and retrain our surplus welders, riveters, and tool operatives into textile operatives, dressmakers, beauticians, teachers, and doctors. Chase ignores the profound organic change that lies ahead in the make-up of our production and employment-if we are, as he proposes, to keep busy everyone who wishes to work at useful peace-time tasks.

A second shortcoming is in the presentation of possibilities for the future. Chase's outline of a compensatory economy is a brilliant and constructive statement, and one which summarizes what is probably the central core of present-day progressive economic thought. He states that there is no other forward-looking theoretical alternative to a completely socialized economy. This statement ignores the possibility of broader government participation in the planning of private production, while leaving ownership in private hands. Such possibility is not purely theoretical idea, for we have already experimented with various aspects of it in the public planning of agricultural programs under the AAA and the soil-conservation program, while the war-time planning of military and civilian output by the WPB has developed facts and methods in the industrial-planning field. Such cooperative planning by business and government might aid in evening out chronic industrial cycles, like the housing cycle, the shipping cycle, and even the automobile cycle, just it has helped farmers to even out the hog cycle. Probably what we need is some system which combines Chase's "compensatory economy" with my planned "industrial expansion." While I strongly recognize the need and value of fiscal policy as control and stimulant, I believe that over the long future there will also be some need for the cooperative businesslabor-agriculture-government planning of production and price and wage policies which I presented in my writings of several years ago.

These dissents involve only extensions and modifications of Chase's basic ideas. No open-minded modern man would dissent from his major propositions. Money must be the tool of men, and not their master. Nations which in war can organize all their powers for destruction can turn equal powers to constructive use for the ends of peace. If we only choose to use them, we have within our power the means to ban forever want and chronic unemployment.

MORDECAI EZEKIEL

Orphans of the Storm

THE BALTIC RIDDLE. By Gregory Meiksins. L. B. Fischer. $3.

NE of the chief counts against the Soviets, in the indicament which some people in this country are constantly trying to present to ■ grand jury of the world, is the charge that it has kidnapped the three little Baltic states—Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia. These independent states, it is alleged, were forcibly incorporated in the U. S. S. R. in 1940, and in defiance of the Atlantic Charter the Russian government insists that it will not release them after the war.

In this book Gregory Meiksins, a young Latvian lawyer who was forced into exile during the Ulmanis dictatorship, presents a brief ostensibly as a friend of the court. It is an able but hardly objective study which would perhaps have been more impressive if it had been offered frankly as the case for the defense. For there is nothing in it likely to cause the slightest offense to Moscow. It leaves the Russian government not merely whitewashed but gilded.

Mr. Meiksins asserts that after 1917 the desire of a majority of the Baltic peoples was to rid themselves of the German feudal landlords who had so long oppressed them and to achieve autonomy within the new Russia. They were thwarted, first by German occupation, and then by the Allies, who wanted to build them into an anti-Bolshevik cordon sanitaire. Russia, weakened by civil war and external aggression and needing access to the Baltic Sea for purposes of trade, abandoned its claims in 1920 and recognized the independence of the Baltic states. But this did not make for much-improved relations, since the Western powers, and particularly Great Britain, continued to frown on any rapprochement between these little countries and their big neighbor.

The result was that the Baltic states, whose commerce and industries had been closely linked to the Russian market, were forced to reorientate their economies and become dependent for their livelihoods on exports of agricultural products to the West. There was continuous depression, and this combined with foreign intrigues, served to encourage the inauguration of dictatorships which, after the rise of Hitlerism, leaned more and more on Germany.

Toward the end of 1939, during the period of the Russo-German phony peace, the Soviets, with the sullen acquiescence of Berlin, occupied certain strategic points along the Baltic coast. At first there was no Russian interference in local politics, but in May, 1940, believing that the semifascist governments of the Baltic states were plotting with Hitler, Stalin ordered the Red Army to occupy their capitals. Thereupon, peoples' fronts in all three countries staged coups d'état, threw out the dictators, and set up democratic regimes. Within a few months completely free elections confirmed these governments and approved the incorporation of all three states in the Soviet Union. Nevertheless, Moscow made no attempt to impose communism on them. The Communists remained as minorities inside the democratic governments. Large enterprises and monopolies were nationalized, but small businesses were left alone and the farmers were allowed to keep their land. The national armies remained under their own officers after a very moderate purge of fascist elements. Until the German aggression a year later everything was wonderful.

That is Mr. Meiksins's case. Unfortunately, it is not so well documented as one could wish, particularly in regard to the dramatic events of 1939 and 1940. That was a period when the Baltic region was pretty well isolated from the West, and what little news came out was colored by passing through one or more censorships. It is therefore difficult to check many of the facts this book offers. But my own faith in the author's complete reliability is not strengthened by some of his references to Finland. Whatever may have been the justification for Russia's attack on Finland in 1939, it is not accurate to describe the war that followed as caused by unprovoked Finnish aggression.

Yet, despite skepticism about some of his arguments, I am inclined to agree with Mr. Meiksins's conclusions. For if this case were really brought to trial, it would not be enough for the court to bring in verdict of guilty or not guilty. The judges would still have to consider the future of the "victims." If they are taken again from Russia, which claims to be their lawful mother, how are these orphans of the storm to live? They have no real means of supporting themselves if deprived of their natural place in the Russian economy. Are they not all too likely to be picked up by the old Prussian madam next door and forced into a life of sin? It is certainly up to the prosecution to suggest what other alternative there is.

WHAT

- -ARE THE MOST POWERFUL FASCIST FORCES IN AMERICA?
- BIG MAGAZINES HAVE PUB-
- -ARE THE FACTS ABOUT LABOR

?

WHO CORRUPTS THE AMERICAN PRESS?

Every week IN FACT—George Seldes' newsletter devoted to exposing native fascism, the corrupt press and the enemies of American democracy—tells the facts and prints the documentary evidence.

Exclusive in IN FACT

- Oct. 4: National Geographic Magazine published pro-Nazi articles by Douglas Chandler, mnm of the E traitors.
- Oct. 18: Documentary evidence (now in the hands of Ways & Means Committee) showing National Association of Manufacturers' plan to kill tax bill.
- Oct. 25: Mrs. Roosevelt nails anti-Semitic falsehood.
- Nov 29: Three U. S. Documents reveal what we are teaching armed forces about labor, race, fascism, Britain, Russia.
- Dec. 13: Sen. Murray exposes press in service of Anaconda.
- Dec. 27: Official OWI statement nails Reader's Digest
- Jan. 171 Behind Fascist Lawrence Dennis: Senators, GOP leaders, magazines. Nazi document recommending Digest, American Mercury.
- Jan. 241 America's No. 1 Enemy: the DuPont-Hitler-Imperial Chemicals cartel monopoly which armed Nazi Germany and Japan,
- Jan. 31: War's biggest Hoax: air power theory. How the DuPonts control American Press.

COMING: Complete exposé all pro-fascist articles in the American Mercury and Reader's Digest; anti-Loyalist awd anti-Russian articles in both magazines; anti-New Bural editorials by noted writer secrety in file pay all the liquor interests; anti-CIO and anti-union articles in Mercury, etc., etc.

AND, every week, an exposé of suppression, faking, and corruption

$1.00 A YEAR-52 ISSUES

IN FACT

25 Aster Place

New York 3, N. Y.

Spain According to Madariaga

SPAIN. By Salvador de Madariaga. Creative Age Press. $4.

SPAIN" is an ivory tower falsely described by its architect as a political lighthouse. It is a cold, lifeless abstraction, from which the blood and bones of reality are missing. Señor Madariaga was neutral as between fascism and the republic during the Civil War, and this book is, on its subjective side, his defense of that attitude, written in the certain and confessed knowledge that the future of Spain lies with the republic. "Spain" aims to prove, in the course of its long, scholarly, and academic review of events and problems, that only an incredibly small group, roughly the centrist conservatives and the extreme right-wing republicans, can provide the government Spain needs.

It is a facile construction, permitting condemnation of the extreme right and left and nice discrimination in the territory between. That is merely what is permitted, however. What one gets is a total rejection of the entire working-class movement, while such an unwholesome mixture of boastful petulance and inhibited blood lust as Gil Robles, the Austrofascist leader of the Ceda (the federation of landlord, clerical, and right-wing parties), is exonerated even of those intentions that were the whole meaning of his politics. And the explanation of this bias is: "It is from the left rather than from the right that we expect our future . . . it is the left, therefore, which stands in need of criticism."

Passing over the whole first section of this book as orthodox history, we need apply only one test to Madariaga's thesis, his treatment of the war, and his estimates of the future. It is to compare his account of the 1934-36 period with the reality that the world has witnessed.

Fundamentally here is what Madariaga professes to do. He tries to prove that it was the wildcat revolutionism of the Socialists which cast down the republic. He states categorically that "what made the Spanish Civil War inevitable was the civil war within the Socialist Party." What he means is later clarified. The insurrectionary "stampede," as he calls it, of the left Socialists under Largo Caballero was in violent opposition to both the tactical wisdom of the moderate Socialists and the will of all honest Republicans from Gil Robles (!) to Prieto. According to him the whole disaster occurred because Largo Caballero was determined to defeat the right wing of his own party! And his heavily loaded narrative is reinforced by an appendix in which the author discloses that he accepts the fascist story that the Communists and Socialists were actually preparing a revolution in 1936. The result of this extremism of the left was to drive the whole of the center into the arms of the rebellious army,

Naturally this thesis demands a careful regulation of the accounts. Señor Madariaga has to show that from 1934 to 1936 Gil Robles and the Ceda were a perfectly loyal republican force which merely planned a parliamentary reform of the constitution. And if one accepts Gil Robles's press releases as gospel truth, why, then, the trick is done. But the trick will not fall out so, for the plain truth is that neither the man's supporters nor his enemies believed any such thing. To unite with him in the hope of heading off Franco was impossible. It would have utterly split the republican

THE BRITISH WHITE PAPER ON PALESTINE

A statement by the American Council for Judaism

Cutting across the broad issues relating to the future of Jews all over the world is the widespread, immediate concern in regard to the British White Paper of 1939. This official document, having taken cognizance of the tense situation created by two conflicting nationalist aspirations, attempts a re-solution of the problem by proposals that include the stoppage of immigration of Jews into Palestine after a fixed quota of immigrants has been exhausted and restrictions on their further acquisition of land in that country.

We of the American Council for Judaism record our unqualified opposition to those provisions. In behalf of the substantial section of American Jews whose views on Jewish problems coincide with ours, we petition our Government to use its best offices to prevail upon the British Government not to proceed with so prejudicial and unjust a policy.

We base our attitude on this fundamental fact: that proposals which exclude Jews, as Jews, from right of entry and restrict Jews, as Jews, from the acquisition of land, do violence to the fundamental concept of democratic equality and thus to the very purposes and ideals to which the United Nations are pledged.

The American Council for Judaism is dedicated to the view that Jews, a religious community, shall have, as of right and not on sufferance, full equality all over the world. As stated in our Declaration of Principles "For our fellow Jew we ask only this: equality of rights and obligations with their fellow nationals." This means equality in the countries in which we live and choose to remain; equality to return to those lands from which Jews have been forcibly driven; equality to migrate wherever there is an opportunity for migration.

We ask for no special privileges for Jews anywhere in the world. We will resist to the utmost the imposition of any disabilities on Jews anywhere in the world. There is no compromise on this basic demand.

The tragic plight of Jews in various parts of the world is the consequence of the break-down or inadequate implementation of the democratic concept which accords equality of rights and expects equality of obligations. Hope for postwar Jews and, indeed, for all mankind is that inequalities which have obtained in the past shall be permanently removed; and that national and international provisions and sanctions will make impossible a continuation or revival of differential treatment. Yet this very objective, for which in part this war is being fought, is violated in the White Paper.

There is yet time to correct this injustice and to reaffirm in ringing terms the principle of equality of opportunity. Sympathy for the victims of Nazi terror calls for the cancellation of so grievous # discrimination. Fidelity to the traditions of democracy and equality which animate the British people, the American people and freedom loving peoples everywhere, calls for the abrogation of # document that projects into the future the very evils and inequities against which the whole civilized world has risen in arms.

We are not unmindful of the nationalist conflict that led to the issuance of the White Paper. Our Statement of Principles declared, "We believe that the intrusion of Jewish national statehood has been a deterrent in Palestine's ability to play an even greater role in offering a haven for the oppressed, and that without the insistence upon such statehood, Palestine would today be harboring more refugees from Nazi terror."

The part played by Jewish nationalism, by the Zionist contention for political power, is made clear in the very White Paper that we oppose. Those who read the White Paper in its entirety will find the record of a long history of controversy deriving from nationalist claims, although the British Government time and again, made it clear that ""national home" was not synonymous with Jewish National State. In the face of such declarations, Zionists extended rather than modified their demands that the rights of Jews in Palestine be based upon acceptance of a so-called "Jewish State." This was done in the Biltmore Platform and again in the Palestine Resolution of the American Jewish Conference. Such demands have only exacerbated an already serious situation.

We stand at mcross-roads of decision, at a time of indescribable tragedy for our co-religionists in Axis Europe. Are we to be occupied with the creation of a Jewish National State? Or are we to be concerned with human lives, the lives of harassed and driven lews?

We believe it a crucial wrong to confuse the two. One is a contention for a political ideology. The other is me battle for the elementary rights of men.

At the same time that we appeal that the unjust provisions of the White Paper be annulled, we call upon American Jews to organize in strength, out of deep concern for oppressed Jews everywhere, behind non-nationalistic program to deal with the total Jewish problem. Beyond the abrogation of the White Paper lies the need for a basic solution. That solution, we believe, can come only when there is world wide recognition of the rights of Jews to full equality. It can come in Palestine only when the pretentions to Jewish Statehood are abandoned and we seek instead freedom of migration opportunity based on incontestable rights and not on special privilege. The declaration of our Statement of Principles is beyond challenge from any quarter, "We look forward to the ultimate establishment of democratic autonomous government in Palestine, wherein Jews, Moslems and Christians shall be justly represented; every man enjoying equal rights and sharing equal responsibilities; a democratic government in which our fellow Jews shall be free Palestineans whose religion is Judaism even an we are Americans whose religion is (Published in the Information Bulletin of the Council of January 15, 1944)

We invite readers of The Nation to send us their opinions and to communicate with us on our program.

THE AMERICAN COUNCIL FOR JUDAISM. INC.

1001 KEYSTONE STATE BUILDING . 1321 ARCH STREET . PHILADELPHIA 7, PA.

PRESIDENT: Lessing J. Rosenwald, Tel. RITtenhouse 8357; VICE-PRESIDENTS: Fred F. Florence, Rabbi Louis Binstock, Ralph W. Mack, Rabbi Louis Wolsey, Rabbi Irving F. Reichert; TREASURER: D. Hays Solis-Cohen; EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR: Rabbi Elmer Berger.

MOTION PICTURES

"Both a profound testament to faith and an intensely moving drama . . . a stirring and beautiful motion picture for spectators of all creeds."

-HOWARD BARNES, N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE

Broadway at 49th St, Rivoli

THEATRE

CONTINUOUS PERFORMANCES

ADMISSION PRICES:

Opening to 6 p. m. 75c and $1.10 (Except Sat., Sun. & Holidays) & p. m. to closing $1.10 & $1.65. Children half-price at all perfs.

4th WAR LOAN DRIVE . . . BUY AN EXTRA BOND!

"A tremendously provocative film . . . absorbing in its revelations of character and its brilliantly pictorialized details."

—Bosley Crowther, N. Y. Times.

—Bosley Crowther, N. Y. Times.

ALFRED HITCHCOCK'S PRODUCTION

By JOHN STEINBECK STARRING

TALLULAM BANKHEAD

with WILLIAM BENDIX

A Twentieth Century-Fox Picture

Continuous ASTOR B'WAY AT

Performances ASTOR B'WAY AT

forces and placed the Ceda in power with the army at its back.

Again and again this sheer wrong-headedness involves Madariaga in consecutive contradictions. Trying to absolve the Ceda of the charge of brutal repression he says of the Cabinet of 1934, "The fact remains that this government of conservatives and clericals did not take one single life of the leaders of the revolt [of October, 1934]." Yet on the next page he writes that in January, 1935, there was a Cabinet crisis over the Ceda's demand for execution of those sentenced to death. The simple historical fact, of which Madariaga is perfectly aware, is that because Lerroux would not consent to the executions Gil Robles resigned and brought down the government. As a consequence, in the next coalition Cabinet the Ceda was far stronger, and a "reform" of the constitution became its main consideration.

One of the changes proposed by the Ceda was intended to render the agrarian reform impossible. That the author knows this is apparent. Yet he writes that the Ceda's intention was merely an "attenuation of the drastic powers of expropriation of private property." (Article 44 of the constitution permits the taking over of large estates upon payment of compensation by the state.)

But it would be tiresome to attempt to unravel all the curious knots and tangles which Señor Madariaga in his cold passion for neutrality has tied. His capacity to judge the Ceda correctly provides the test of his solution. Land reform is vital to Spain. He is aware of it. The landowners and their parties are utterly intransigent in their refusal to yield. Señor Madariaga knows this also, If this is so, how is a cold and minimal republicanism of the kind he advocates to deal with this situation? He must know that in December, 1935, the Ceda, at the command of the landlords, again brought down a government in which it had a part rather than increase death duties from 1 to 3½ per cent. Yet the meaning of his advice is that the republicans should commit their country's fortunes to that same sector of opinion.

There can be only one final opinion. The vast learning, the illumination in unessential matters, the very evident anguish with which Señor Madariaga writes of Spain's misfortunes have all been deprived of their effect by this shrinking from reality. "Spain" is a book that should be on every specialist's shelf, but it will be useful as a guide only to that strange wraith who writes editorials on Spain for the New York Times.

STAGE PLAY

"A definite hit . . . gay, glib, daffy — enormously funny."

-Morehouse, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents

OVER TWENTY-ONE

DRAMA

'HEKHOV'S plays are wrought with great skill and care. So complete and profound was his knowledge of the people and society he wrote about that the end product is distillation rather than document. But the live power of the plays, like that of lyric poetry, comes from a charge of emotion which sets up an infrangible arc of tensionand fills the simplest lines, the most casual remarks, the most quiet situations with light and meaning. The wonder is that he can sustain a dozen characters through two hours of at least seemingly ordinary, often colloquial, talk, and by means of it summon up a world which takes on for us so much reality and vested emotional interest.

At the moment the further wonder is that the iridescent, fragile web of "The Cherry Orchard" is so closely and firmly woven, so tough, that it even withstands the pulling and hauling it gets at the hands of its latest producers.

Most of the characters in "The Cherry Orchard" are eccentric. But their eccentricity, it seems hardly necessary to say, is all of a piece with the world they spring from. What is even more important, they are all encompassed in Chekhov's feeling about that world. He loved it, but his writing gets edge not only from the fact that he knew it was dying but that he could not, despite his love, wish it to survive. The fun he makes of his characters is made within this context. With the Epihodovs, the Pistchiks, the Leonids, the Charlottas he is very gentle. With the Yashas and the Lopahins he is more ruthless. They are pathetic because they are caught between two worlds, and they have the worst traits of both, but they are firmly established in the new world and reconciled to it. With Trofimov he is again gentle because Trofimov is the perpetual student, the idealist who must commit himself to the future as idea yet will never be at home among "the villa residents" of any Cherry Orchard develop-

This may seem too elementary to set down. But in the present production Yasha, Epihodov, Leonid, and Charlotta are made merely funny, sometimes grotesque—and therefore extraneous and really irrelevant. Yasha resembles a character that James Cagney might play—it would have been even more sensational of course if Cagney could have been persuaded. You might run across Epihodov in any musical show, Leonid is simply made m fool of by Joseph Schildkraut—or is it vice versa? Charlotta is m clown. All are wrenched out of their proper place and proportion. Chekhov's wit is blown up into burlesque, the play pulled out of shape, its texture and tone violated again and again. In the worst scene of all the flirtation between Yasha and the eager Dunyasha is "modernized" into a cheap encounter that might take place in any park on any maid's day off.

Fortunately Madame Ranevsky (Miss LeGallienne), Anya (Lois Hall), Varya (Katherine Emery), and in lesser degree Trofimov (Eduard Franz) have been allowed to cleave to Chekhov. Among them they manage to preserve the spirit of "The Cherry Orchard" despite the chopping, with up-to-date axes, that goes on about them.

Joseph Wood Krutch has described Chekhov's mood as elegiac. I should underline that comment by adding that it is not nostalgic. Between these two moods lies the difference that makes Chekhov's plays endure. His particular world in decay takes on a generic dimension, and for all its local color "The Cherry Orchard" continues to be relevant a well as beautiful.

MARGARET MARSHALL

N. B.: Again I overheard the old remark that nothing happens in "The Cherry Orchard." Nothing happens except that a world comes to an end. M. M.

FILMS

THE MIRACLE OF MORGAN'S Creek," the new Preston Sturges film, seems to me funnier, more adventurous, more abundant, more intelligent, and more encouraging than anything that has been made in Hollywood for years. Yet the more I think of it, the less I esteem it. I have, then, both to praise and defend it, and to attack it.

The essential story is hardly what you would expect to see on an American screen: a volcanically burgeoning small-town girl (Betty Hutton) gets drunk and is impregnated by one of several soldiers, she can't remember which; her father (William Demarest), her younger sister (Diana Lynn), and her devoted 4-F lover (Eddie Bracken) do all they can to help her out; the result is a shambles, from which they are delivered by a "miracle" which entails its own cynical comments on the sanctity of law, order, parenthood, and the American home-to sav nothing of a number of cherished pseudo-folk beliefs about bright-lipped youth, childhood sweethearts, Mister Right, and the glamour of war. Sturges tells this story according to a sound principle which has been neglected in Hollywood-except by him-for a long time: in proportion to the inanity and repressiveness of the age you live in, play the age as comedy if you want to get away with murder. The girl's name, Trudy Kockenlocker, of itself relegates her to a comic-strip world in which nothing need be regarded as real; the characters themselves are extremely stylized-a skipping little heifer, a choleric father, an updated Florence Atwater, a classical all-American dope; and the wildly factitious story makes comic virtues of every censor-dodging necessity. Thanks to these devices the Hays office has been either hypnotized into a liberality for which it should be thanked, or has been raped in its sleep.

Having set up these formalized characters, each in a different comic key, and this thin-ice version of the story he is really telling, Sturges has just begun. He also doubles the characters on their own trails, into sharp pathos, into slapstick (some of which falls flat), into farce as daftly unsettling as being licked to death by a lioness, to the edge of tragi-comedy, and into moments of comedy which could emerge only from their full quality as human beings. He plays every twist of his story for sharp

40% OFF

In place of its regular yearly subscription rate of $5, The Nation offers a special 40 per cent reduced rate of $3 a year to all men now in the armed forces who have a service address in the United States or United States possessions.

TO THE MEN in the Armed Forces

realism as well as laughs; his small-town doctor, banker, lawyer, and, most notably, Porter Hall as a justice of the peace are bits of comic realism finely graded against the chameleon-like principals. Above all, Sturges carries farther than he has ever done before his bold blends and clashes of comic and realistic angles of attack. In a typically fine scene on Christmas Eve, when Trudy's pregnancy has developed the comicemotional portentousness of a delayedaction bomb, he manages to sustain an atmosphere of really tender pathos and, at the same time, (1) to cue in "Silent Night," (2) to show irate Constable Kockenlocker hammering the hell out of a recalcitrant Christmas star, (3) to let him comfort his restive daughter with the noble reminder (deleted the second time I saw the film) "You may be waiting for the President of the United States," and (4) to cap that, for Bethlemayhem, by having young Emily inquire, gently, what that cow is doing in the kitchen.

Besides resonating many traditions of comedy against a firm basic realism, the film rests on an apparently complex emotional and philosophic base which seems to me not really complex but simply mature, being-on its smaller scale-at once as nihilistic as Céline, at least as deeply humane as Dickens, and at all times inviolably, genuinely, and intelligently gay. Excepting a few moments when Sturges forces everything too far, the film is also beautifully played, especially by William Demarest, whose performance stands with Paul Lukas's in "The Watch on the Rhine" among the finest I have seen.

But you may, I have to realize, disagree with me. I have incredulously heard some people dismiss the show as "comedy"; they should stick to something really vital and serious like "Zola." Others feel it is too frantic and too rough; it has enough mental, creative, and merely brutal energy for hundred average pictures. Others object to various errors of taste, mainly connected with making laughs out of pregnancy. Here again I partly agree; but I would rather see pregnancy remain a subject for questionable laughter than see it become taboo against any laughter at all. Still others dislike the film for its multiple attack, its shiftiness of style; but if you accept that principle in Joyce or in Picasso, you will examine with interest how brilliantly it can be applied in moving pictures and how equally promising, as against the lovely euphonies René Clair achieved according to the same principle, astute cacaphony can be. For barring Chaplin's this seems to me the largest American attempt, on the level of full consciousness, to stir up from the bottom the whole history and possibility of moving pictures into one broth; to draw, like Clair, on the blackloam, instinctive genius of the Mack Sennett comedies: and to amuse and excite the simplest at once with the most complex customers. In fact, in the degree that this film is disliked by those who see it, whether consciously or passively, I see a measure less of its inadequacies than of the progress of that terrible softening, solemnity, and idealization which, increasing over several years, has all but put an end to the output and intake of good moving pictures in this country.

Yet the more I think about the film. the less I like it. There are too many things that Sturges, once he had won all the victories and set all the things moving which he managed to here. should have achieved unhindered. purely as a good artist; and he has not even attempted them. He is a great broken-field runner; once the field is clear he sits down and laughs. The whole tone of the dialogue, funny and bright as it often is, rests too safely within the pseudo-cute, pseudo-authentic, patronizing diction perfected by Booth Tarkington. And in the stylization of action as well as language it seems to me clear that Sturges holds his characters, and the people they comically represent, and their predicament, and his audience, and the best potentialities of his own work, essentially in contempt. His emotions, his intelligence, his aesthetic ability never fully commit themselves; all the playfulness becomes rather an avoidance of commitment than an extension of means for it. Cynicism, which gives the film much of its virtue, also has it by the throat; the nihilism, the humaneness, even the gaiety become, in that light, mere postures and tones of voices; and whereas nearly all the mischief is successful, nearly every central and final responsibility is shirked. Of course there is always the danger, in trying to meet those ultimate human and aesthetic responsibilities, of losing your gaiety; but that never happened to Mozart -or to René Clair at his best.

I mention Clair again because Sturges has so many similar abilities so richly -and because there is such a difference between the two. Whether or not he ever

Among the 75 Courses

The Soviet Union Today The Negro in American Life Principles of Scientific Socialism

The Science of Society

Political Economy What Is Philosophy Russian Language Religion and Society

World Trade Unions Workshop in Creative Writing

History of American Labor Movement

For complete catalog write or phone

ANNOUNCING

The

Jefferson School

OF SOCIAL SCIENCE

Registration Now Open Classes Begin February 14

A new school for economic, social, and political democracy

Evening classes taught by noted scholars, writers, lecturers

At low fees

The Jefferson School of Social Science Dr. Howard Selsam, Director 575 Sixth Ave. = New York 11, N. Y. =

makes another film under favorable circumstances, and up to his best, Clair is one of the few great artists of this century. Sturges, in his middle forties, is still just the most gifted American working in films, vividly successful in the kind of artful-dodging which frustates Clair; hollow and evasive at those centers in which Clair is so firm. I suspect that Sturges feels that conscience and comedy are incompatible. It would be hard for a man of talent to make a more self-destructive mistake.

JAMES AGEB

MUSIC

HE last Toscanini recording of work of major stature was the one of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony about year and a half ago; then came recording of a piece by Samuel Barber; and now, after a year or more, comes one of the Overture to Thomas's "Mignon" (11-8545; $1). The opera is a minor work of great charm; and its overture gives us a few of its tunes, including the famous Connais-tu le pays? and le suis Titania. Toscanini played it with the N. B. C. Symphony at the first United States Treasury broadcast after the installation of the shell that changed the acoustic conditions of Studio 8H from dead to reverberantly and harshly live; and of course broadcasting practice could not allow the piece to go out to the people of America without the way being prepared by a commentator; so there sat-of all people-Deems Taylor, who chit-chatted away while Toscanini stood waiting with obvious and increasing and justified impatience and distaste. At last Taylor finished and Toscanini could begin; and the phrases of the quiet first part emerged from the orchestra with exquisite inflections and contours that made them "as fresh and glistening as creation itself." leading eventually to the fast section, which also was freshly revealed in its sharply contoured brilliance and verve and grace. The recording, presumably made shortly afterward, reproduces the performance with superb fidelity-even to the hardness and reverberance of Studio 8H; present-day materials make the surfaces of my copy noisy.

Hargail Records has issued a recording of a Sonata for clarinet and piano by the young conductor Leonard Bernstein, performed by the composer with the clarinettist David Oppenheim (Set MW-501; $2.50). It is facile and arid writing in a contemporary contrapuntal style that is incoherent and dissonant; but a friend who plays the recorder remarked that the work must be fun to play. The big bold sounds that Oppenheim produces with his clarinet are appropriate to the music, and Bernstein gets good sounds out of the piano; both instruments are reproduced with lifelike fidelity and clarity; and surfaces are surprisingly quiet. On the fourth side Bernstein plays three of his "Seven Anniversaries" for piano, of which "In Memoriam: Natalie Koussevitzky" is moving in its strange way, and "For William Schuman" is an effective comment on the Schuman method. Perhaps the nervous rushing about in "For My Sister Shirley" also has point for those who know sister Shirley. The surface of this side, surprisingly, is noisy.

Of the few records of jazz that have come in recently only one is worth mentioning—that of the Benny Goodman Quartet performance of "The World Is Waiting for the Sunrise" (Columbia 36684), and this one not for Goodman's own twittering but for the exciting brilliance of the unnamed pianist who I would guess is Mel Powell.

For "Rigoletto" the Metropolitan seated me in row Z where only fragments of the orchestra's sound reached me from time to time. For Bellini's "Norma," on the other hand, I was placed in the second row right behind the bass-drum, cymbals, and brass, where my ears were battered to deafness whenever things got majestic and emphatic, and where I got a close look at things that were better seen from distance and better still not seen at all: the pieces of forest stuck against faded blue-gray cloth sky, and the rest of the Metropolitan's Druid temples and sacred woods (bringing to mind Shaw's description of a Prologue to Boito's "Mefistofele" with "the empty stage and the two ragged holes in a cloth which realize Mr. Harris's modest conception of hell and heaven"); the arms of invisible prompters and stage managers gesticulating to the "Druids, Bards, Priestesses, and Warriors" as they crowded on and off the stage; the absurd posturings and gestures and facial expressions of the principals.

But amid all this there were moments of impressive, affecting illusion, when the tedious stretches of recitative gave way to one of Bellini's great melodies sung by Zinka Milanov. This singer has an extraordinarily beautiful voice, but apparently an insecure method of

AN EXPERT ANALYSIS OF VATICAN POWER POLITICS of the AIMS AND ACTIVITIES OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH Subscribe to: THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC MAGAZINE" Edited and Published by a Group of Former Roman Catholic Priests STRICTLY FACTUAL - CAREFULLY DOCUMENTED SUBSCRIPTION ONLY $1.00 a Year (10 Issues) Order Form:___ THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC MAGAZINE. 229 West 48th Street, New York 19, N. Y. Enclosed is $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC MAGAZINE. Check here if you wish to start with the January issue. NAME .... ADDRESS..... ..... STATE.....

IMPITATION TO BELAK

Enjoy the serenity of Plum Point. Gorgeous country side, roaring fireplace, delicious food—and fun. Chlys miles from New York. MAKE RESERVATIONS

Vacation Resort" Tel: Newburgh 4270

Homestead NEW MILFORD CONNECTICUT

Phones 985 and 28 Small, Serene and Peaceful

Rest and Relax Recommended by Duncan Hines

The Fieldstone On Round Island Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.

All Sports - Open All Year MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

WANTED TO PURCHASE PHONOGRAPH LANGUAGE SETS. Language, Room 1203, 18 East 41st St., N. Y. C. 17.

FARMS, ACREAGE

BERKSHIRE FARM AGENCY, East Chatham, N. Y., offers list winter specials and free annotated bibliography farm life books.

LANGUAGE

RUSSIAN TAUGHT; experienced Russian pedagogue. Pronunciation corrected. Special rates for groups. Moderate rates. Evenings, GR 5-2765, Mrs. Freedolina.

WANTED

ORGANIZER popular liberal movement needs experienced field man to expand or-ganization of New York groups. Box 1450, c/o The Nation.

APARTMENT TO SHARE

CONGENIAL, intelligent female wanted to share Village apartment with young mother and child. Write Box 1451, c/o The Nation.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 65 Fifth Ave., New York 8, N. Y. Price 15 cents # copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5. Two years $1. Three years $1. Constant of the year $1. Constant

RESORTS

ALL WINTER SPORTS

AND HIS BLUE-NETWORK ORCHESTRA

ONLY 51 MILES FROM NEW YORK

ETIE & WINTER TUNE-UP . . . . .

ecr

an Hunn's Lake • Stanfordville, N. Y.

80 miles from N. Y. Ideal location in the heart of DUTCHESS COUNTY. Excellent accommodations.
Cordial hospitality. Recordings. Library. All seasonal sports. Vian. Y. C. R. R. to Amenia, N. Y.

WRITE OR PHONE YOUR RESERVATION EVA BERG. Director Stanfordville 4108

MAMANASCO LAKE LODGE RIDGEFIELD, CONN.

A luxurious country estate converted into a haven for rest and recreation. Excellent Winter sports facilities, skating, free bicycles, rid-ing, ping pong, etc. Musical recordings, dancing, games, etc. Open fireplaces. Famous cuising.

ONLY FIFTY MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY

HATHAWAY SKI LODGE OPEN ALL YEAR

Formerly the publical 50-2-sec. Many estate in the heautiful "Hills of the Sity." Large, luxurious rooms to the state of the Sity." Large, luxurious rooms to the Monitari Paths, SMI Tow, 700-foot SMI Slopes, Dickletous fool. Easy transportation.

For reacregizing the structure Winter Rates srice or cell. HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y. HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.

- ADVERTISING RATES -

Classified:

62c a line (six words) Minimum, 3 lines

Display Classified:

$6.16 a column inch

ATTRACTIVE TIME DISCOUNTS

55 FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK 3, N. Y. ALgonquin 4-3311

production which will cause her to go through most of a performance of "Don Giovanni" with a tremolo so strong as to obscure pitch, and then suddenly to begin to produce tones that are steady and opulent; and only a few days before the "Norma" performance I had heard her sing in the broadcast of "Un Ballo in Maschera" with tremolo-ridden stridency which had seemed to indicate that the method had damaged the voice. But on the night of this particular performance of "Norma" she had control and security which enabled her to meet every superhuman demand of Bellini's writing with singing that was phenomenal not only in the purity and beauty of the individual tones but in their phraseological continuity and style. Tremolo and stridency appeared momentarily only when dramatic emphasis in the recitatives caused her to force (a former opera-singer remarked that the Metropolitan's singers acquire tremolos from forcing to make themselves heard over the orchestra: to which I answered that they force rather to make themselves heard in the huge and acoustically bad auditorium).

There was also good singing by Bruna Castagna, though her voice has lost its sumptuousness of several years ago, and by Norman Cordon; there was Frederick Jagel's brassy tenor; there was the beautiful voice of Thelma Votipka, which left me wondering again at the Metropolitan rule that bars her from any role requiring her to be heard for more than a total of five minutes. And there was excellent conducting by Cesare Sodero. B. H. HAGGIN

CONTRIBUTORS

GERTRUDE BAER is international joint chairman of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom and editor of its journal.

DOROTHY THOMPSON, writer and speaker on foreign affairs, is columnist for the New York Post.

MORDECAI EZEKIEL, one of President Roosevelt's original "brain trusters," is an economist in the Department of Agriculture. In the early days of the New Deal he assisted in formulating plans for farm relief and in drafting the Agricultural Adjustment Act. He has been a visiting professor at Cornell and the University of Minnesota and has written three books: "Methods of Correlation Analysis," "2,500 & Year from Scarcity to Abundance," and "Jobs for All."

Letters to the Editors

A Letter from Litchfield

Dear Sirs: O Little Polemic . . . (Picayune). You must have been badly off for material for your issue of December 25. I wonder what you hoped to accomplish by publishing the article O Little Town . . . (Restricted). Or was it just your manner of wishing Litchfield a Merry Christmas?

It is easy enough to see why the author might write the article. We could hardly expect her, a Southerner, to love the author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." I understand that the South has never quite forgiven the writer of that very effective, if not quite fair, piece of propaganda. So it is not hard to imagine that your Miss Whitman may have derived some sort of sadistic satisfaction from smearing the birthplace of Harriet Beecher Stowe. Why The Nation should cooperate, I would not know.

My part as an unwitting collaborator consisted of a casual conversation with strange lady caller who seemed only to have a legitimate and proper interest In this historical community. There was no suggestion that material was being sought for the purpose of publication until the aforesaid lady was about to leave, when she said something to the effect that, if an article appeared, I would not be quoted.

As a matter of fact she kept her promise not to quote me pretty well. The alleged quotations are so distorted, embellished, and colored to produce the kind of story she obviously wanted to write about Litchfield that they in effect become misquotations. I am as sure as one can well be so long after the event that I did not say some of the things in the way they are reported; and that several things were said that are not reported at all.

Altogether it does not add up to any adequate or serious view which I now hold, or have ever held, on the questions discussed.

Since my visitor took no notes while we talked, she could hardly be expected to report our conversation accurately, even if she wanted to do so, unless she has a really remarkable memocy. That her capacity for remembering is not so remarkable is apparent. She sates that the service flag in the Congregational church has forty stars. The correct number is twenty-three, and it was less than that last summer. She also says that the present church building is older than the Beecher church. That also is not true. These are small things, but enough to show that your reporter does not have a good memory either for what she sees or what she hears.

No one here would deny that there is anti-Jewish prejudice in our community. But I am sure that The Nation's article lacks much of being a correct appraisal of the situation. I very much doubt whether the Jews—there is more than one—who participate in our community life will appreciate your solicitude, or thank you for your sympathy. And to say that men like Bernard Baruch and Herbert Lehman could not live here sounds pretty silly to this writer.

If The Nation, or its reporter from the Sunny South, knows of some quick and easy solution for this problem, you ought to tell the world at once, beginning with your own home town, where, according to the newspapers, this matter, as well as the colored question, is long way from settlement. I cannot feel that your Christmas article will prove helpful in correcting any of the faults of your neighbor to the north and east. At least one citizen will be inclined to be less friendly and hospitable to strangers until he finds out what they are after. And if all this free advertising you have given our community should encourage people with anti-Semitic views to settle here-already matter of speculation-our last state will be worse than our first.

I take the liberty to suggest that the editor of The Nation and its reporter on our little town take the time to dust off a volume of ancient Jewish writings—more ancient than Lyman Beecher, and reputed to be wise, exceedingly wise; and wherein it is written, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor."

Litchfield, Conn., January 10

Miss Whitman Answers Back

Dear Sirs: It is only fair to T. B. A. to say at once that I do have I remarkable memory, well tested in interviews—usually with Southern politicians or mile owners who might be expected to repudiate any revealing utterance.

T. B. A. is at a disadvantage because he regarded our conversation about Litchfield as "casual"; I did not. Indeed. I was shocked by his careless, not to say frivolous-seeming, attitude toward the very serious subject I called to discuss. As he was not impressed by my questions, I am not surprised to find his memory now at fault. It was of course at the start, not the end, of our conversation that I told him-rather boringly. I feared-about my own writing. giving the name of the publishing house where I work and mentioning my own books and magazine articles (to which I must again refer him if he is really interested in my views on religion and Negro rights. As I was not on assignment from The Nation, I do not recall mentioning this magazine by name).

May I suggest that had I failed to explain my own status before the end of a longish talk, the conversation with a stranger would have been even less discret?

I did, of my own accord, assure T. B. A. that I would not quote directly his answers to my questions, or use his name in print; and that promise I kept "pretty well." That I did not keep it in spirit as well as in letter is due entirely to the fact that his viewpoint, na well as the information given me, came to seem a matter for public concern.

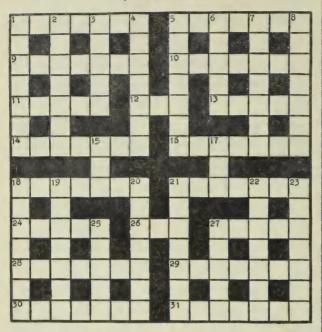

As we talked I discovered that the clergyman to whom I had come in good faith to inquire about the Litchfield attitude actually shared, rather than actively deplored, that attitude. Even now, since references to innocent persons are involved, I do not feel free to quote in full those answers to my questions which made this clear; T. B. A. is right in saying that "several things were said that are not reported at all." I realized that the answers were given by mususpicious man who had, he told me, just returned from a four months' vacation.

But the substance of those answers

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 50

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- This sails without sails
- 5 May throw some light on one sort of lace
- 9 Irreverent, and with the forces of darkness well in the van
- 10 "There ain't no such animal"!
  11 You may feel fed up when it's empty
- 12 Father—and short as usual 13 One from Ben Bolt made Alice weep
- with delight 14 Get out of hand (two words, 8
- and 4) 16 Rare cry (anag.)
- 18 Crazy about an island. This doesn't
- this you, surely!
- 21 Theirs is grave work 24 To follow your parent closely is something to lay down tenaciously
  26 The old god with the goa's feet
  27 Character in The Tempest
- Southey wrote of this school in The Vision of Judgment I parted from her (The Winter's
- "He saw; but blasted with excess of light, Closed his eyes in -----night" (Gray)
- 31 A light-headed individual

DOWN

- 1 He commands 1 Across, so skip the first part
- 2 Pope wrote of -----ing a thing till all men doubt it
- 3 It sounds more of a cow than a kind of deer

- 4 A desired change
- 5 Heaven's artillery 6 Liars in confusion
- 7 A man from Indiana 8 Where Hamlet told Ophelia to go
- 15 Hard water
- 17 One over the eight
- 18 She makes dresses after a fashion
- 19 Those who are near this suffer from
- faulty vision
  20 There's a whole epic in pictures
  21 A freckle (two words, 3 and 4) Something like mouth (or if ice is
- needed, you can easily get that!) I am here with assistance (hyphen,
- 4 and 3)
- Diminutive of Hannah With this missile an English artist turns his back on a disturbance

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 43

ACROSS:-1 FLAGS; | HOIST; 7 MENU; 0 ORISON; 10 REGAL; 12 BESS; 13 ODES; 15 MELODIC; 17 LASCAR; 18 CRUISE; 19 USA; 21 HABITAT; 23 SUMATRA 24 ERA; 26 UPLIFT; 28 SLATER; 31 FRECKLE; 32 SEAL; 35 PAIN; 36 ADAGE; 37 INDOOR; 38 SAVE; 39 TANKS; 40 EVENT.

DOWN:-1 FURS; 2 ANSWER; 3 SENIORS; 4 HEROIC; I IAGO; I TALE; 7 MABEL; 8 NOSES; 11 ADDICT; 14 SHEBA; 15 MASTIFF; 16 CRUMPLE; 19 UTE; 20 ASA; 21 HOURS; 22 BALLAD; 25 RECLINE; 27 TRIERS; 28 SLEDGE; 29 TIARA; 30 RANGE; 33 EAST; 34 LAWN; 35 POST.

was too important to be suppressed. And after the formal interview ended, when T. B. A. as a polite host accompanied me to his front steps, he volunteered the remark which I considered myself not only free but obligated to quote: "Shall we say, next time you come we hope you won't find North Street full of Jews?"

Real reporters do not flourish notebooks, but I did, I admit, write that down carefully as soon as I turned the North Street corner. I quoted it exactly as I would have quoted a Nazi authority who might have received me with equal politeness: because there is a war on, war of ideas about religion and "race," in which no revelation of enemy viewpoint can be picayune.

As for inaccuracies in local color, I must confess that I took the word of a Litchfield Episcopalian about the number of stars in the Congregational service flag, and of a guidebook about the age of the church. Litchfield citizens and · check of the telephone book supplied information about Jewish residents, and until more specific facts are forthcoming I stand by the statement that Jews, plural, do not "participate" in the "community life" of Litchfield.

Indeed, is not the most interesting thing about T. B. A.'s letter the fact that he does not deny, specifically, strongly, or indignantly, any of my statements about Litchfield's prejudices-or his

As for his fear lest "all this free advertising you have given our community should encourage people with anti-Semitic views to settle here," if it is true that this is "already a matter of speculation" surely Litchfield propertyholders know what to do. Does T. B. A. mean to say that those who will not sell to Jews will welcome anti-Semitic settlers to North Street?

WILLSON WHITMAN

New York, January 15

It's There Now

Dear Sirs: I wrote Mr. Haggin recently that the Chicago Public Library did not carry such books as Tovey's "Essays in Musical Analysis" to combat the influence of Ewen and the like. I protested this directly to the library last summer, but received no acknowledgment; today, consulting the card file, I was pleased to discover that Tovey's "Essays" had been acquired on September CARL F. SCHMID

Chicago, Ill., January 18

THE Vation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 158

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · FEBRUARY 12, 1944

173

NUMBER 7

IN	TH	IS	ISSU.	E
THE	SHAPE	OF	THINGS

EDITORIALS
The Attack on HOLC	17
Soviet League of Nations	17
Pacific Strategy	17
ARTICLES
The Cartel Cancer by I. F. Stone	17

RICLES
The Cartel Cancer by I. F. Stone	17
75 Years Ago in The Nation	17
The American Myth and the Peace by Harold J. Laski	18
Propaganda Wins Battles by Selden C. Menefee	18
In the Wind	18

POLITICAL WAR
Germany, Economic Heart of Europe
by Fritz Sternberg	18
Dobin J the Engent Vine by Augus	10

BOOKS AND THE ARTS
The Facts About Public Housing by Charles Abrams	191
An Oxford Book of Symbolism
by Eric Russell Bentley	191
The Power to Make Treaties by Volta Torrey	193
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling	194
Art by Clement Greenberg	195
Drama by Margaret Marshall	197
Films by James Agee	197
Music by B. H. Haggin	198

LETTERS	ETTERS TO THE EDITORS			199
CROSS-W	ORD	PUZ	ZLE	NO.	51	by Tack	Barrett	200

Editor and Publisher FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor Literary Editor
1. F. STONE MARGARET MARSHALL

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor
J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic
B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL LOUIS FISCHBR JONATHAN DANIELS
REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD BLLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 55 Fifth Ave., New York 3, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

MR. WILLKIE'S SPEECH AT THE NEW YORK Times Hall is being disparaged by enemies in his own party as "purely political" on the one hand and "politically crazy" on the other. He was, however, demonstrating his belief that the American people are adult enough to take their medicine unsweetened. This doctrine is of course scorned on Capitol Hill, but Mr. Willkie may prove to be as right in his assumption that the electorate is looking for candid leadership as he certainly is in advocating much heavier taxes during the war. Unfortunately, he weakened the effect of his proposals by lapsing into vagueness on the all-important question of how the additional load is to be distributed. And he can also be legitimately criticized for not speaking up for higher taxes months ago. At the time Congress started work on the current tax bill his speech would have been much more valuable than it is now just as the finishing touches are being given to a lamentably inadequate measure. However, Mr. Willkie's speech was certainly a more substantial contribution to the problems of our time than anything his current rivals have to offer. We welcome particularly his emphasis on the indivisibility of domestic and foreign policies, and in this connection we should like to call his attention to the article by Harold Laski on page 180 of this issue. While we do not expect him to agree wholeheartedly with Mr. Laski's thesis that the American mythology of "free enterprise" is one of the greatest menaces to world peace and prosperity, we believe he has grasped some of the limitations of private capitalism. Mr. Willkie has a chance to talk candidly on this subject during his visit to the Northwest, where public power is a burning issue. We hope he will not muff it even though it means another "politically crazy" speech.

×

WHETHER OR NOT SOLDIERS WILL HAVE A full opportunity to vote next November remains uncertain as we write. In the House, the Eastland-Rankin "states' rights" bill, which leaves service men at the mercy of forty-eight different systems of absentee balloting, many of them completely unsatisfactory, was passed by a fairly large majority. The Republican strategists, deciding that they had more to lose, after the President's challenge, by ducking the issue than by standing up to be counted, whipped their men into line so vigorously that only 11 voted against the bill while 180, joined by 52 Democrats, mostly Southerners, supported it. In the Senate, however, a motion to take up the Eastland-Rankin bill was lost by a tie, so that the Green-Lucas measure, which provides for a federal ballot, still holds the field. What will finally emerge from the heated halls of the Capitol is anybody's guess, but no matter what the outcome, Mr. Roosevelt seems to have been presented with a magnificent issue for 1944. There is every evidence that an overwhelming majority of the American people, regardless of political affiliations, believes that everything possible should be done to permit the men who are risking their lives for their country to have something to say about its future. Despite their constitutional double-talk, the Republicans have been unable to conceal their almost hysterical fear that, given a chance, a majority of service men will vote for a fourth term for Mr. Roosevelt. Perhaps this fear is well founded, but we should not like to be in the shoes of the Republican candidate when he tries to explain his party's actions on this question to the American public.

*

OUR EXPEDIENCY POLICY IN ITALY HAS become so manifestly inexpedient that there may be some truth in the persistent reports that it is about to be revised. According to some of the stories, the State Department is ready to write off King Emmanuel and Marshal Badoglio is a dead loss although the Allied military authorities in the Mediterranean still believe that there is something to be gained by keeping them. Asked to comment on these rumors, the President told his press conference once again that this country could not decide for the Italians what the future form of their government should be-that they must do for themselves. The fact is that but for our decision the royal government would have been ousted long ago. The King and Badoglio are our puppets, and, manipulate them as we will, they cannot even give an imitation of governing. Thus our continued support of the King's regime only reduces Allied prestige in Italy, while his undignified clutching at the skirts of the AMG increases both his unpopularity and that of his House. According to John MacCormac, writing in the New York Times. Washington is now ready to abandon both Emmanuel and Prince Humbert and attempt the regency solution. It seems too late for this compromise. A few months ago the democratic forces in Italy might have accepted it. But at the recent Congress of Political Parties at Bari both Count Sforza and Croce, while denouncing the King with increased fervor, pointedly omitted any reference to a regency.

WE CANNOT SHARE THE INDIGNATION OF the Catholic press, duly echoed by the neophytes of the New York Times, at Izvestid's attack on the Vatican. Considering the unmeasured terms in which the Soviet government has been denounced, year in and year out, by Catholic spokesmen, a retort discourteous was hardly surprising. And while Izvestid's condemnation of the Vatican's foreign policy as consistently pro-fascist is. perhaps, somewhat exaggerated, the truth is that the church, despite a good many veiled scoldings of Nazis and Fascists, has at moments of crisis leaned in their direction. It is not, perhaps, that the Pope dislikes Nazism less but that he fears communism more. Hitler and Mussolini, for all their paganism, have at times been ready to pay lip-service to the faith and have been willing to sign agreements with the Vatican which left it some of its spiritual authority, not to mention control of its property. The Soviets, until very recently, have been antireligious in both word and deed. Moreover, since there are practically no Roman Catholics in Russia, where the Greek orthodox church has a monopoly, there was no Papal stake at issue which would have made worth while the kind of compromises that Rome reached with the fascist dictators. Towards the end of last year there were many rumors of a pending agreement between the Vatican and Moscow, but if serious negotiations were ever attempted they have obviously broken down. One difficult hurdle to surmount was the Polish question, since Poland has always been a faithful province of the Catholic Church. Another obstacle, paradoxically enough, may have been the reconciliation between the Soviet government and the Greek Orthodox Church, for this rival creed is almost as heretical in Catholic eyes as Bolshevism ALLIED RELATIONS WITH SPAIN, STRAINED by a series of overt and outrageous acts in support of Hitler, are again simmering down to normal. The protests of the British and American governments, backed up by oil sanctions, which for a few days seemed to indicate a new and stiffer attitude toward the Spanish dictator, are now apparently being disposed of by more promises. Franco offers "strict neutrality." Sir Samuel Hoare reports that all differences are being satisfactorily settled. Behind these empty words lies the fact that Britain and the United States are still clinging to their relations with Spain. They emphasize solemnly that they never expected Franco to break with Germany; all they ask is an end to Nazi sabotage and spying in Spain and to Franco's open aid to Germany in the form of goods and credits. They want, too, the release of the Italian ships tied up in Spanish ports. We can assume that Franco will grant these modest requests, with perhaps some compromise regarding the ships. But we can be certain that his aid to Hitler will go on. Promises are all the Allies will get, but if these promises satisfy the Foreign Office and the State Department they do not satisfy the Russian government. A new rift between the western Allies and the Soviet Union will soon develop if Britain and the United States continue their relations with this avowed enemy of Russia.

×

THE LAG IN OUTPUT OF AVIATION GAS IS being blamed on labor shortages in the hearings on the Austin-Wadsworth national-service bill. This is a gross distortion of the record. Standard Oil, while helping to build an aviation-gas plant for the Nazis and permitting a subsidiary to license a similar project for the Japanese, was reluctant to enter into commercial production in this country. So was the rest of the oil industry with the exception of Houdry. Secretary Ickes told the Truman committee in April of last year that when he urged expansion of high-octane-gas production in June of 1941 he found in army-navy circles "a really baffling lack of understanding of the vital essentiality of 100-octane." He was unable to obtain semi-official requirements figures until May, 1942, and these were out of date when he got them. Steel plate for the aviation gas plants was delivered by WPB in "a harum-scarum manner." There was no mandatory scheduling of critical components for the plants until December, 1942. Lack of a consistent occupational-deferment policy caused "a frightening drain ... upon the technical talent of the industry." The need today is for construction workers. It is hard to understand why this cannot be met, since construction employment has declined from a peak of 2,000,000 to 700,000, and the A. F. of L. declares it has filled every request for construction workers made to it by the armed services.

×

THE AVIATION-GAS PROGRAM MIGHT BE much farther along if Standard Oil hadn't tried to hog the synthetic-rubber program. "The largest allocation in the petroleum field," our Washington editor reported on September 19, 1942, "goes to Standard, which has a new and still-to-be-tested process for making butadiene from butylene. Unlike butane, butylene can only be obtained by cracking processes, and it is needed for aviation gas." That article, a critical analysis of the Baruch report, argued the superiority of the alcohol process for making synthetic rubber. Events have confirmed that view. Vast amounts of steel, critical components, and butylene, which might better have gone into aviation-gas production, were diverted to rubber-from-petroleum plants, which have proved a disappointment. The syntheticrubber program depends more and more on alcohol. In the last quarter of last year only a fourth of our synthetic rubber came from petroleum. This year the WPB plans to use 328,000,000 gallons of alcohol for rubber manufacture as compared with 127,000,000 gallons last year. Under other circumstances the synthetic-rubber program might well have been the equivalent of a major military disaster. We should like to see the Truman or Gillette committee tell the country just what happened.

The Attack on HOLC

S HYPOCRITICAL and greedy a campaign as any being waged in Washington is that led by Representative Dirksen against the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. Although the slogans used are to "reduce non-war expenditures" and "safeguard private enterprise," the purpose is to permit a few lending institutions to grab the HOLC's profitable mortgages and leave the government holding the bag with the rest. A powerful lobby headed by H. Morton Bodfish, $20,000-a-year president of the United States Savings and Loan League, was behind Dirksen's bill to force hurried liquidation of the HOLC last year. This bogged down in the Senate after the HOLC testified that such a move would cost the government about $373,000,000 in mortgage losses. Another legislative measure of this kind is expected to be introduced within a few weeks in the wake of the report just made to Congress by John H. Fahey, the Federal Home Loan Bank Commissioner.

Mr. Fahey cannot be accused of speaking as a New Dealer without practical business experience. He is . former president of the United States Chamber of Commerce. He reports that the HOLC is already 58 per cent liquidated and pleads that liquidation can be completed without loss to the government if it is permitted to continue on the orderly lines laid down in the original Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act in 1933. It is not irrelevant to recall that the HOLC not only saved thousands of home-owners from foreclosure in the early days of the New Deal but also rescued the banks and other lending institutions which had been holding wobbly mortgages. Some of these lenders, says the Fahey report, "seem to believe that the only purpose of the HOLC was to bail them out of their poor mortgages, enabling them to put the cash received into good loans and then to take back their relinquished mortgages after the government had spent millions in making them safe. They seek easy profits regardless of the public interest."

However framed, each of the proposals for quick liquidation of the HOLC would, in effect, hand over the sound HOLC mortgages to private institutions and leave the government with the bad ones. This is hardly a way to "reduce non-war expenditures." Until now, the HOLC has been able to use earnings on its good mortgages as an offset against losses on the bad. As a result its net realized loss today is little more than $65,000,000, as compared with the eventual losses of a half-billion to a billion dollars which were predicted when the HOLC was established. A loss of $65,000,000 on a "rescue" investment of $3,484,000,000 is less than 2 per cent, and Fahey indicates that even this can be wiped out if the HOLC is allowed to liquidate the holdings in slow and orderly fashion.

The case for the HOLC is not merely the case for businesslike procedure in handling a government investment. There are thousands of home-owners, most of them good risks, whose homes would be endangered by sudden liquidation of the HOLC. "A great number of HOLC mortgages," Fahey points out, "are not attractive to lending institutions because of their small balances, extended terms, and scattered location in remote communities, which increases the cost of servicing." These mortgagors would suffer if forced to find commercial lenders to replace their HOLC loans. As it is, some thousands of HOLC borrowers have already been misled into arranging new loans by false reports that the HOLC was soon to be liquidated.

In most of these cases, refinancing has been harmful. The interest rate has been higher, the terms less favorable. Study of a large number of HOLC loans transferred to private lending institutions showed that the debts had been increased by an average of $1,500, or 78 per cent more than the balance the borrowers had owed the HOLC at the time of transfer. The houses on which these loans were made averaged over twenty-two years in age. Transfers under such conditions load borrowers with additional debt and add to war-time inflationary pressure. We hope Congress this year will not only resoit the mortgage hogs again but slap them down so resoundingly as to discourage any further campaign against the HOLC and leave its officers and its borrowers free to continue in the path of orderly liquidation.

Soviet League of Nations

NOT even Mr. Molotov, we imagine, expects his historic speech to be taken at face value. The Soviet Foreign Minister might even be irritated if the world were to believe that the decentralization of a mighty nation was being undertaken overnight merely in order to oil its administrative machinery for the future or to pay a political reward to a fighting people.

Both these purposes may well be present, but they hardly rate a measure which by its scope, potentialities, and timing was bound to rock the political world and inspire endless speculation on the eve of the Allied invasion. In the first place, the proposed decentralization would surely not increase Soviet efficiency in the midst of gigantic military operations, and there is probably no intention of effecting the change immediately. In other words, if administrative reform were all that was involved, the announcement would have been held up and not allowed to strain a diplomatic situation already tense. As for the "reward" theory, there are ways in which the Soviet leaders could expand the freedom of their people short of setting up sixteen separate armies and sixteen foreign ministries, complete with diplomats. The average Azerbaijanian or Uzbek might, for example, prefer some of the more personal freedoms mentioned in the Soviet constitution but held in trust pending his coming of age.

Molotov himself emphasized the "international significance" of the move, which he described as being "of great importance from the viewpoint of all progressive humanity." Its great importance can hardly be denied, but we find it difficult to accept Molotov's assurance that it "will constitute a new moral and political blow at fascism." On the contrary, like other recent Soviet diplomatic maneuvers, it is more likely to raise questions concerning Russian intentions than to bridge the ancient gaps between the Soviets and their Western allies.

We do not take seriously the theory that the move is designed to give the Soviet Union sixteen votes at the peace table or in some future association of nations. Power politics rests on power more than on politics, and this kind of arithmetical juggling would be both unnecessary and childish. There are several ways, however, in which the new formula might well enhance the Soviet's international position and profoundly affect the nature of the peace.

Most obvious and not least important, the establishment of sixteen separate foreign offices will give the Soviets a flexibility which may prove highly convenient, enabling the Armenian Soviet Socialist Republic, for example, to make a treaty with Turkey for which the Russian Soviet Socialist Republic might take no responsibility. More fundamentally-and perhaps this is the real inspiration of the arrangement—the formula would seem designed to remove from the realm of international discussion the issue of the Baltic states, Karelia, and Moldavia, an issue between Russia and the Anglo-American powers which is almost as thorny as the Polish question. Should the Washington and London governments choose to discuss the independence of, say Estonia, Mr. Molotov can politely refer them to the Foreign Minister of the autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic of Estonia, who will doubtless inform the Western governments that his state is already independent and sovereign, that it has its own army, and that it is even willing to exchange diplomats; that, in short, the Western powers need have no further concern about Estonian independence.

There is a good possibility that the Western powers may even welcome this trick solution of a problem which they are powerless to solve any other way. The dangerous aspect of the development is that what a Russian-controlled Estonian government can do, a Communist-dominated Yugoslavia of the future might also do, or a Communist-dominated Bulgaria, Hungary, Greece, or Rumania. In short, the way has been opened for a Soviet League of Nations which would require no strong-arm methods of acquisition on the part of the Russians. In this way a powerful Russian sphere of influence could be established in Eastern Europe at the expense of a broader international organization in which spheres of influence would disappear.

It is entirely possible that no such development will occur. But as long as it may occur, the Russians will hold one more trump card in a hand already rich with trumps. We do not believe that the Soviets are committed to such a course, but rather that they are preparing themselves, and magnificently, for any and every exigency. This approach is characteristic of Soviet diplomacy in the past three years. The German Committee in Moscow was another such trump held in reserve. When it became apparent that the Allies meant business about a second front, the card was not played. Unfortunately, each time one of the great powers seeks security reinsurance against a failure of the United Nations Mutual Protection Association, the others feel obliged to take out new policies also. Thus the Soviet Sixteen may be regarded as a reply to moves for an extension of the British sphere of influence forecast in the recent speech of General Smuts. These in turn find inspiration in the new nationalism prevalent in this country and in expansionist tendencies in Moscow. It is clear that the approach to an international organization by way of a "nuclear alliance" of the great powers cannot hope to make headway as long as it is accompanied by simultaneous drives toward the acquisition of spheres of influence. No wonder the small states are bewildered, when at one and the same time they are being invited to adhere to a universal security plan and to enter one or another planetary power group.

Pacific Strategy

THE powerful and successful attack which has been delivered against the Marshall Islands is a further indication that Allied strategy at this stage of the war envisions a major offensive directly across the Pacific by American sea power, supplemented by minor drives from the South Pacific, Burma, and possibly the Aleutians. This conception of Pacific strategy is so different from that commonly expected six or eight months ago, when a major drive from Burma was widely discussed, that its advantages and disadvantages are well worth examining. The chief advantage at this stage of a direct drive across the Pacific-striking successively at the Gilberts, Marshalls, Carolines, and the Philippines-is that of supply. It was possible to assemble the tremendous striking force used in the attack on Kwajalein Atoll only because the battle fleet was operating directly from its main supply base at Pearl Harbor. Seizure of the Marshalls, with their moderately good harbors, will strengthen our supply lines for subsequent advances and will also help us in the South Pacific. This strategy promises quick results; if successful it will cut Japan's lifeline to Singapore and the East Indies. Another advantage of the directly-across-the-Pacific strategy is that it constantly places the Japanese in a position where they must either give up important tactical positions or risk a naval showdown under conditions favorable to the American fleet. This risk is a grave one for the Japanese, for if their navy is smashed they will have lost the war.

Prior to the attack on the Marshalls the chief drawback to a program of direct assault across the Pacific was thought to be its cost in lives. The heavy price paid for Tarawa had a sobering effect on the advocates of this strategy, but the apparent ease with which Kwajalein was seized has shown that where preparations are adequate the cost can be minimized. It must be recognized, however, that as the offensive approaches Formosa and the main Japanese islands the across-the-Pacific strategy will face serious difficulties. Our supply lines will be greatly extended while those of the enemy will be extremely short. And even when we succeed in winning back the Philippines, we shall still be too far from Japan for effective bombing of its main islands.

It was doubtless with this limitation in mind that Admiral Nimitz recently declared that in his opinion "Japan will be defeated from China." From the beginning it has been apparent that China is the logical site for bases from which to launch regular day-afterday air attacks on the Japenese mainland. It was because of this fact that many experts assumed some months ago that the main offensive this winter would be directed against Burma with a view to opening up supply lines to China. Actually, the operations in Burma have been of an extremely minor character-the chief effort, apparently, being centered in North Burma, where a new road to China is being hacked through the jungle. But since no one would pretend that this road, even in conjunction with stepped-up air transport, would be sufficient to supply major American air forces in China, it may be assumed that we are not contemplating any extensive use of Chinese bases in 1944.

One reason for this delay may be political. So far all American air operations in China have been confined to the south. While our South China bases are within range of Formosa and the main ship lanes to the South Pacific, they are useless for attacks on Japan itself. For such attacks bases in North China are essential, but it happens that areas of Free China most suitable for the purpose are in "communist" territory, and so far Chungking has not permitted its allies to establish military posts in the regions under the control of the Eighth Route Army. Until this political obstacle is cleared away, it will be impossible to make full use of China's potentialities.

The Cartel Cancer

BY I. F. STONE

Washington February 4

HERE cartels exist, "competition is not eliminated, but regulated. Competition in quality, efficiency, and service takes the place of the crude method of price-cutting." This nonsense comes from the lips of Sir Felix J. C. Pole. Sir Felix is chairman of Associated Electric Industries, Ltd., and his oleaginous description is being echoed, in a thousand variations, in the subterranean conversations going on here to the shape of the post-war world. "There are indications," says Senator Harley M. Kilgore, chairman of the subcommittee on war mobilization of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, "that even though cartel and monopoly restrictions have been partly removed during the period of active fighting, cartel and monoply thinking and planning have continued to thrive." This is putting it mildly.

The senior Senator from West Virginia and his colleagues on the subcommittee, in a series of historic hearings, have been looking into the role that cartel and monopoly restrictions play in preventing the full mobilization of our resources in war and peace. The subcommittee's special interest has been in our scientific and technological resources, that is, in brains shackled by monopoly. Today it released its first monograph, "Economic and Political Aspects of International Cartels." This deserves the widest attention.

Your government, ladies and gentlemen, has the most whimsical capacity for inconsistency. Within a few blocks of each other, administrative cheek by bureaucratic jowl, one may find a Wall Street nabob busily engaged in laying the foundations for a greater monopoly than ever in his favorite industry-as a means of furthering the war effort, of course-and a $4,500-a-year employee marshaling the evidence necessary to indict him for it. The battered citadel of the idealists is the Anti-Trust Division of the Department of Justice, a collection of poor, deluded, but tireless and exuberant warriors, slaphappy in defeat, ever hopeful that a really stiff sentence under the Sherman Act will rejuvenate a senescent "free" capitalism. Under pressure of the War and Navy departments, the WPB, and the White House, most anti-trust prosecutions have been suspended for the duration, and the Anti-Trust Division's safety valve—the boys are bursting with solid fact and honest indignation-has been to prosecute in the court of public opinion by presenting testimony to Congressional committees. The Kilgore committee is one of them, and this monograph was written for it by Corwin D. Edwards, chairman of the Anti-Trust Division's policy board.

The great value of Edwards's able monograph is that it not only presents much new material that should long ago have been offered in the courts but classifies and analyzes the mass of facts on cartels which has been presented during the past two years before the Truman, Gillette, Bone, and Kilgore committees. Here one will find the definite and exhaustive answer to Sir Felix Pole's bland apologetics. "The central purpose of cartels," Edwards says, hitting it on the nose, "is to maintain prices at levels higher than would otherwise obtain." "A price war," as I. G. Farben expressed it in a 1934 letter to Winthrop Chemical, "is of benefit only to the consumer." Those inclined to believe that cartels substitute "competition in quality, efficiency, and service" for "the crude method of price-cutting" should read the evidence presented by Edwards on the light-bulb cartel. Its principal anxiety seems to have been to produce light bulbs that would wear out sooner and to keep consumers from finding out about the economies of fluorescent lighting. This is a typical, not an exceptional, case. Cartels either stifle technological development or hog its benefits. A striking instance is that of aluminum. At the beginning of 1939 the price of ingot aluminum was almost a cent higher than it had been in 1911. Subsidized competition and an anti-trust suit brought the price down 25 per cent during the war, but profits remained so high that in 1943 the government recovered $76,000,000 from Alcoa by renegotiation on less than $500,000,000 in contracts.

After two generations of American experience with trusts, it would seem unnecessary to repeat these obvious observations. But the town is full of mellifluous phonies assiduously selling the idea that after this war let's have "good" cartels. One of these fellows is a Dutch executive of the N. V. Philips combine, a worldwide network of concerns manufacturing light bulbs and electrical equipment. His dulcet explanations of the need to substitute "the interests of the community" for competition are hardly distinguishable from those of the suaver Nazi theoreticians. The tip-off on his proposals is his statement that "in democratic countries, where freedom is the guiding principle, the primary parties to the [cartel] agreements should be the producers." This is "self-regulation" of business combinations on a larger scale than ever and hardly even in a new guise.

The politically epicene source of this advice—advice which can be duplicated from British and American sources-is indicated by Edwards's revelations on what has happened to the Philips combine since the war began. This amazing story, never publicly told before, reveals that the United Nations and Axis branches of this cartel have continued to cooperate and communicate straight through the war. The American trustees, on instructions from the Nazi-controlled main office in Holland, helped a German cartel partner fight a patent suit in the Swedish courts in 1942, turned over certain patents to the Spanish branch, and swapped information with their Axis opposite numbers through a curiously overstaffed Argentine branch. Yet so ingenious are the legal devices of this cartel and so extensive is its political influence that its subsidiaries in neutral countries have not been blacklisted and its properties in countries belonging to the United Nations have not been taken over as enemy-controlled. These are the kind of lice that helped sell out Europe to Hitler and that will destroy free government elsewhere if given half a chance.

It is a mistake to believe that the cartel system was a German plot to curb American production of many vital war materials. Many of the agreements restricting output and raising prices in this country were invited by the American partner rather than initiated by the Germans. Krupp's was selling tungsten carbide here at $50 a pound before General Electric made the cartel deal that jacked it up to $453. The democracies get the worst of these deals because their great monopoly capitalists are hostile to the state and interested only in profit. To Alfred Sloan of General Motors, answering a protest from a stockholder in April, 1939, on its Nazi dealings, it seemed that "an international business . . . should conduct its business in strictly business terms . . . without regard to political beliefs." But business men feel differently in those countries where they regard the state as their instrument rather than as an unreliable servant susceptible to democratic twinges. "An international cartel," said the chairman of the board of Philips's German partner, "has no right of existence . . . if this cartel is acting against the common interests of Germany." This should be clear enough warning as to what will happen if we restore the cartel system and a capitalist Reich.

Unfortunately, this is exactly the direction in which we are headed. The cartel at home means the limitation of production to those levels the big producers consider profitable. Limitation of production means limitation of jobs, and without full employment there will be rich soil here for fascism after the war. No doubt these same big producers will cultivate it. The cartel abroad means the subordination once more of our legitimate national interests to the illegitimate objectives of a Germany bent on revenge. I hope next week to tackle the task of naming the men and influences in Washington which already make it seem an almost hopeless task to achieve full employment after the war and to prevent revival of the cartel system. The two are fatefully linked together.

75 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THE ONE THING done by the House, after a liberal amount of speech-making and the voting down of everybody's pet phraseology intended to effect the same object, was the passage of the suffrage amendment to the Constitution, by 150 yeas to 42 nays. As this, if concurred in by the Senate, will share the wandering fate of most amendments and be debated long after its wording and almost its substance are forgotten, it may be as well to record it verbatim: "Art. —, Sec. 1. The right of any citizen of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or any state, by reason of race or color or previous condition of slavery, of any citizen or class of citizens of the United States. Sec. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article."—February 4, 1869.

TO THE EDITOR of The Nation. Sir: As I do not believe in the efficacy of repealing God's laws by statute, either as affecting the value of money, the hours of labor, or the phases of the moon, I suppose I cannot be called, in popular parlance, an admirer or friend of the laboring man. [Unsigned.] Boston.—February 4, 1869.

THE GREAT BULK of the railroad stocks of the country have been, by waste, mismanagement, and fraud, materially reduced in value during the last two years; comparatively few of them pay regular cash dividends; many of them have been doubled and trebled in quantity without representing a single additional dollar in property; yet they are selling today from 25 to 75 per cent higher than a year ago.—February 11, 1869.

1,000 MILES of the Union Pacific Railroad are now completed. As 500 miles of the western portion of the line, beginning at Sacramento, are also done, but 267 miles remain to be finished to open the Grand Through Line to the Pacific. The opening will certainly take place early this season. First mortgage bonds at par. . . . Subscriptions will be received in New York at the company's office. (ADVT.)—February 11, 1869.

"THE RING AND THE BOOK." By Robert Browning, A.M. Boston: Fields, Osgood & Co. . . . When the art is not to perfect a jewel but to cut facets, the artist may work at any length. It is a sort of art that fascinates those who have once formed a taste for it; but it is likely to call forth exaggerated admiration, and to make the simplicity of really great works seem tame, and, after the first neglect and contempt are weathered, to be estimated at far too high a rate. It is also, when practiced by a master, admirable and profitable. As for this particular specimen of it, we feel it will be as well to speak of it when it is completed, and menutime to commend it to all lovers of poetry.—February 18, 1869.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

The NATION

The American Myth and the Peace

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

T

TN NO other country has the achievement of the business man given him the status and prestige which are his in the United States. His power to secure American civilization against the evils from which the Old World has suffered is a primary article of the American religion. The profundity of that faith was exhibited in the dramatic bewilderment with which the American people awakened to the grim reality of the Great Depression. It was exhibited, once more, in the natural acceptance by the masses of a hostility to the New Deal expressed in the reiteration-as if they were the eternal laws of nature-of the very principles out of which the Great Depression had emerged. That the decade after 1929, in which only vast-scale intervention secured perhaps a quarter to a fifth of the American people against the consequences of unemployment, should still have left the theory of business enterprise as it was framed by the economists in the thirty years before 1914 the habitual framework of ordinary American thought, is testimony to the completeness of the business man's intellectual victory in that social revolution we call the Civil War.

Every religious faith requires an appropriate mythology by which it can maintain itself. So far as possible, it must not be open to critical examination, and men must take its axioms and postulates as so self-evident that they grow angry when these are called into question. No one, I suggest, can investigate the mythology of American business without seeing how fully it has created these conditions. Its exponents speak of it as though it represented enterprise as personal as any practiced in the days of Jeffersonian democracy, with opportunities for the newcomer as great as those in what Mark Twain called the Gilded Age. They assume that no men work as well or as efficiently for the state as they do for themselves; and they insist that the worker in a vast corporation like that of Ford or General Motors is in truth working for himself. They have no doubt that bodies like the National Association of Manufacturers or the American Chamber of Commerce are means of promoting the historical American way of life; and they are equally without doubt that this way of life is persistently jeopardized by the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations. They believe that the "principles of individual freedom" are the secret of national well-being; and when they protect those principles from the poison of state action they believe themselves to be trustees of the American heritage. They insist that the interests of capital and labor are one and indivisible; yet they praise the famous Mohawk Valley Formula as a "real contribution to civic dignity," even though the National Labor Relations Board criticized the Remington-Rand Corporation for its application of the formula—its "use of spies, missionaries, and armed guards, . . attempts to turn civil authorities and business and other interests in the various cities against the union . . . by intensive publicity and propaganda . . . based upon deliberate falsehoods."

The exponents of business preach all this in a world increasingly controlled by the practices of monopoly, increasingly haunted by the specter of mass unemployment, increasingly perplexed by the disappearance of the opportunity for investment, increasingly dependent upon the action of the state, whether in the realm of tariffs or subsidies, of currency policies or the assurance of a proper balance between production and consumption. Few of them realize how completely economic science has abandoned the equilibrium theory upon which their mythology was based. Still fewer seem capable of grasping the degree to which the social function of the entrepreneur has become obsolete. And the number of those who understand that, in its evolution, American business philosophy has destroyed the system of values upon which its security depended is smallest of all. Freedom of contract is in large part a historical category which old men are just able to remember as a living principle of action. Emotional faith in the values of capitalism can be felt by the masses in brief periods of high employment, but the close of capitalism's expanding phase means that these are approximately attained only in times of war.

For reasons which, with the insight of genius, Marx glimpsed almost a century ago, the death knell of the capitalist system, so far at least as the system is geared to democratic methods, has sounded. A faith which requires an atmosphere of rationality and security has lost the secret of both. American democracy may transform its economic basis by adjustments massive enough to enable it to satisfy the demands of the common man. It will certainly not repeat in the future such achievements for the common man as it was capable of in the past without a radical change in its economic ways of life. Like the Roman Catholic church in the time of Luther and Calvin, it is confronting a challenge which goes to the root of every dogma its business men believe.

What they have now to decide is whether it is a Reformation or a Counter-Reformation that they will attempt.

T

What makes the decision of the American business man so important is the fact that it will, for at least a considerable period, have vital consequences for the rest of the world. A wrong decision may seal the fate of Europe. A wrong decision may postpone for perhaps two generations the development of the potential economic power of China and India. Most serious of all, given the contrasting economic motivations of the United States and the Soviet Union, a wrong decision may lead to relationships which will make difficult the avoidance of the third world war. It is not too much to say that upon the decision of the American business man in the next half-dozen years will depend the future of civilization and the fate of all men and women now alive.

It is not hard to see why this must be the case. American productive capacity will emerge from this war not only unimpaired but immensely greater than in 1939. Assuming the present distribution of wealth in the United States, this would probably mean something like fifteen million unemployed, a condition which would affect about one-third of the American people. It becomes evident that unless the American economy is profoundly altered, the only way to avoid such unemployment is by the capture of foreign markets. This raises the difficulty not only of the American tariff and its relation to international trade but of the effect upon the living standards of other peoples of any largescale loss of their foreign trade through American competition. It is clear that a considerable part of the world must look to the United States not only for food and medicinal drugs but also for the reequipment in the capital-goods industries, especially for the machine tools, which will make possible a rapid recovery of their economic life.

It is not to be expected that either the American government or the American people would be willing, for any considerable period of time, to become a kind of Santa Claus to the rest of the world; and any such dependence for other nations, after recovery has begun, would be undesirable. What, then, becomes urgent is to create conditions which permit the fullest resumption of international trade; in particular, to raise economic standards in backward countries-in India, for example, or China-by a long-term policy of capital investment and development at low rates of interest. The obvious advantage of this policy is the simple and unmistakable one that it encourages that increase in the consuming power of backward countries which alone, in any final way, solves the problems of international trade without encouraging a drift to economic imperialism, the source of so many of the world's agonies. Unequal development in economic life, with dependence, as in Africa, upon a major state superior in wealth and power, means a struggle between the richer states for the opportunity to exploit the poorer. If we tread that road, no protestations of friendship or love of peace will suffice to prevent the third world war.

The part of wisdom in these matters is to accept the need for frankness. The economic pattern in the mind of the average American business man is hardly of the sort which a constructive economic internationalism will require. The slow progress of Mr. Hull's attempt to lower American tariff walls; the indignation which has been heaped upon the sound principles laid down by Henry Wallace; the latent antagonism, still very profound, to the Soviet experiment among American business men; the continued resistance of the trade unions to resumption of immigration on a reasonable scale; the hostility, which is not confined to the "economic royalists," to anything which savors of the New Deal, and the use of the war to compel the liquidation of many of its most admirable features; the conviction, in part conscious though in greater proportion hardly conscious at all, that the next age is to be the "American century," in which the principles of American economic life, applied in world terms, will enable the United States to realize its "manifest destiny"-all of these are hints, impulses, perspectives from which the European observer finds it hard to draw much comfort. Where to him the outstanding lesson of this war is the futility of sovereignty in the economic realm, the need for large functional experiments like the proposed T. V. A. for the Danubian Valley in the international field, the danger of a system in which great international cartels can deal with states as though they too were equal international powers, the evil of any industrial self-government which permits the owners of property to dictate the habits and conditions of production in the field they control, this is in no sense the predominant American business attitude.

The great organizations which represent commerce and industry in the United States still think in terms far more appropriate to the age of Harding and Coolidge than to our own. They cling to a fantasy called the "American way of life" even though it is abundantly clear that its procedures were responsible for the Great Depression, and that, were they again given an opportunity, their effect would be no different in nature, if more tragic in intensity, than they were in 1929. American business men adopt criteria of action which assume, first, that the well-being of the United States can be achieved whatever may happen to the rest of the world, and, second, that whatever is done by the state power in behalf of its citizens is not only bound to be badly done but certain, in some mysterious fashion, to injure the that ;

to pe

(00050 from impl

prod

gatio

ins t bline

divio

citizen's energy and initiative. There is no general understanding in the business community of the paradox of "poverty in the midst of potential plenty" or of its relation to the problems of international peace. Business men do not see that internal expansion, with an increasingly diffused well-being, is the main safeguard against those aggressive economic policies which breed bad international relations. Few of them pause to understand that the misery of the share-cropper in the South and of the four million American-born refugees who are politely put in the category of "migratory labor," the reduction of hundreds of thousands of farmers from the status of owner to that of tenant, the existence-for example, in the mill towns of the South-of millions of underpaid and underprivileged workers, all have grave repercussions on the international problem. It was not an evil-minded British Socialist but so conservative and respectable a figure as Sumner Welles who declared (October 7, 1941) that America's "high tariff policy reached out to virtually every corner of the earth, and brought poverty and despair to innumerable communities." Mr. Welles in that utterance was speaking the language of sober common sense. But he will have a hard row to hoe if he is going to persuade the American Chamber of Commerce or the National Association of Manufacturers to accept its implications when the war is won.

The problem would not be solved even if American business men were to accept the kind of foreign policy which Walter Lippmann has recommended with a persuasiveness that is not less characteristic than his oversimplification. For the theory of the "nuclear alliance" that he advocates is based on two wholly unexamined assumptions. The first is that the state power is, generally speaking, a neutral factor between contending interests in society; and the second is, as an inference, that foreign policy is the outcome of the operation of forces which express in a permanent way the national interest. Having made but not examined these assumptions, Mr. Lippmann pleads eloquently for the establishment of an "order in which the other peoples find that their liberties are recognized by laws that the great powers respect and that all peoples are compelled to observe."

But Mr. Lippmann forgets that respect for the law depends upon what it does. If men feel with any intensity that what it does goes against some vital interest they feel entitled to promote, their concern will be not to respect the law but to change it. The purpose of Hitler and Mussolini and Tojo was precisely to effect this change. That has been the purpose of Franco in Spain. It has been the purpose of the satellite Axis powers like Hungary and Rumania and Italy. Mr. Lippmann would not dream of asserting that the state power, say in Hungary, was neutral as between the landowner and the peasant; and I think he would in all probability agree that Hungarian foreign policy was concerned less with the general well-being of Hungary than with preserving the special privilege of a small class. The "order" we need to build, the only order that is likely to maintain the peace, is one from which the participants are persuaded they derive greater benefit than they would from its dissolution. And each participant views his position not in general or in objective terms but in terms of its consequences and the judgment he makes of those consequences. British rule in India seems one thing to Mr. Churchill and another thing to Pandit Nehru, because the platform on which each of them stands when he makes his judgment is so different. I hazard the guess that Mr. Stimson, in a similar way, held a view of American intervention in Nicaragua which General Sandino did not find himself able to share.

From this I conclude two things: first, that as Marx said, the ruling ideas of an age are the ideas of its ruling class; and, second, that the ideas of any ruling class, beneath the rhetoric by which they are justified, are determined by the situation it desires to maintain or promote. The ideas of America's ruling class-its business men-are set by their conviction that the less government intervenes in the field of economic enterprise the better off everybody is going to be. They are amazed, to quote William Benton, that Englishmen, even those of a conservative temper, "do not understand that our faith in the individualistic system springs not only from our belief that such a system promises the greatest economic progress; we would still prefer individualism, even on non-economic grounds, to what seems the only practical alternative, a government-controlled economy." This conviction is unshaken by the breakdown in the United States itself of the historical experience to which, during the opening of the continent, it could look for support. Business is undisturbed by the magic failure of its faith, under Coolidge, that the problem of poverty had been solved. After having been saved from shipwreck by Mr. Roosevelt, especially in the first period of the New Deal, it has been encouraged by the full employment achieved in a war economy -which it somehow does not recognize as a "government-controlled economy"-to reaffirm all its fly-blown platitudes as if they were the latest findings of economic science, although in the last fifteen years the foremost exponents of economic science have spent much of their energy exploding the illusions which American business men still think of as laws of nature.

The problem which this philosophy presents to the world is therefore as simple as it is profound. The world can no longer afford to depend upon the results of an individualist economy in a country so vital to the future of the world as the United States; but American business men believe that an individualist economy is the key to progress. The world is increasingly convinced that grave economic disparities within and between nations, above all in their standards of life, are a threat to peace and security; American business men still think that action taken by the state power, whether on the national or the international plane, to correct these disparities is somewhat like interfering with the decrees of a Providence which in the light of their immemediate power and prospects they are tempted to regard as divine. The nations of the world are increasingly conscious of their interdependence, and draw therefrom the inference that national sovereignty is fatal to the cosmopolitan lawmaking which interdependence implies; American business men look at the remarkable productive capacity of the United States, the immense authority derived from it, and conclude that the abrogation of national sovereignty is a threat to the benefits that authority confers. Though they speak of the need for peace with sincerity and enthusiasm, they are blind to the fundamental causes of war. Though as individuals they are capable of remarkable generosity, as leaders of commerce and industry they have not yet learned the secret of social justice. All of them would regard with contempt and derision an attempt to establish in the United States the outworn principle of the divine right of kings; but few of them see any reason why society should refuse to accept an economic system of which the essence is an affirmation of the divine right of business men.

TIL

It becomes difficult, when the philosophy of American business is closely examined, to reconcile its implications with the conditions, national and international, which peace exacts. This philosophy lacks imaginative insight; it does not see clearly that the interests it expresses are narrow and mean and crude. It mistakes bigness for grandeur, and the power of salesmanship for the art of creation. It is the creed of a plutocracy, of men who aspire to membership in the plutocracy; and it is so passionately devoted to the struggle for economic power that it is altogether lacking in those political instincts which, in the past, an aristocracy has shown itself to possess. The philosophy of the American

EGREGIOUS IMPOSTOR

gan

DEW

Wal

from

700

de

can business man breeds resentment only among those to whom it cannot bring success. Its exponents are driven by its inner logic to search for power in ways that enslave the masses whom they employ. That is why they insist that even such elementary social legislation as the prohibition of child labor is a threat to freedom, and why they have never been able to understand the meaning of Justice Holmes's famous aphorism that freedom of contract begins where equality of bargaining powers begins. Yet, rightly enough, they have a confused intuition that in a society where equality of bargaining power exists, democracy will of necessity have transcended the philosophy of American business.

The truth is that this philosophy, in all its essentials, is no more than a new edition, varying in sophistication with the man who expounds it, of the doctrines of Machiavelli and Hobbes. It is power politics, now clothed, as by former Congressman Bruce Barton, with the blasphemous fig leaves of a theology which makes Jesus Christ the permanent president of an advertising convention, now appearing in the simpler form that captivated Calvin Coolidge—the rich are the natural guardians of the national well-being. It has reached the stage where, to maintain the present conformation of power, it must make war upon all who challenge its authority from within; and it is therefore bound presently to discover that the best way to forestall that challenge is to extend, by war if need be, the frontiers within which it can operate. American business men are, in short, enmeshed in the snares of a contradiction which threatens tragedy to the whole world in the next generation. In their hearts they want peace as ardently as the youth whom war snatches from farm or factory or college and casts upon an atoll in the South Pacific. But in their minds they cannot conceive peace to be just if it means that they are the servants, not the masters, of civilization. Republican or Democrat, Northerner or Southerner or Westerner, the democratic faith they profess is at final variance with the economic institutions by which they live. Not unless, in the next half-dozen years, they learn the supreme lesson that an enduring society cannot be built with the cash nexus is there any great hope of avoiding catastrophe. Nor will the conflict they are preparing be less disastrous because when the time comes they will attempt, like all their predecessors, to set it in the rhetoric of justice.

[This is the second of several articles by Mr. Laski which will appear during the winter and spring.]

Propaganda Wins Battles

BY SELDEN C. MENEFEE

HATEVER criticism may be leveled against our long-range political strategy in this war, operations in that narrower field of tactics usually termed psychological warfare have been conducted with dispatch and efficiency. In North Africa, Sicily, and southern Italy the psychological offensive saved many thousands of American lives. Some of its methods are described here for the first time.

When Italy capitulated, it was doubtful at first whether the fleet would also surrender. There was only one way to reach it by radio—through the international distress-signal band. Robert Morris Pierce, chief radio officer of the Office of War Information in the Mediterranean area, worked all night to transform the Algiers transmitters to this band before the Nazis could learn that Italy had yielded and capture or immobilize the Italian ships. As soon as the change in wave length was accomplished, an appeal was sent out every fifteen minutes, urging the fleet to proceed to Malta. The message got through, the commanders complied, and the lives of many Italian and Allied sailors were spared.

American propaganda warfare as an adjunct to military action had its first real test in the Med terranean theater. OWI men traveled with the army right up to the front lines. They were the only civilian government employees who were permitted to go into Italy and Sicily with the first wave of the invasion. Their work both at the base and in forward combat areas will serve as a rough model for news, radio, leaflet, and other operations when United Nations troops move against the Western coast of Europe. General Marshall recognized its success when he said, "The effect of psychological warfare and propaganda on enemy soldiers and enemy civilians seems too well known . . . to need proof of its necessity."

The psychological high command in the Mediterranean area is the Psychological Warfare Branch (PWB), which coordinates the activities of the OWI Overseas Branch, part of the Office of Strategic Services, the British Political Warfare Executive, and the British Ministry of Information. General policy is controlled by Allied Headquarters. The PWB's main weapon is propaganda, of which it employs three major kinds. Long-range, sometimes called strategic, propaganda is used to soften up the enemy on his home front. Leaflets, flown by longrange bombers, and radio do the job. This type of propaganda might be called the artillery of psychological warfare. After the artillery barrage has weakened the enemy's position, the combat troops move in. They use what is known as tactical propaganda, and its effectiveness against the enemy has been demonstrated. Eighty per cent of the prisoners taken in the North African and Italian campaigns admitted that they were influenced to surrender by propaganda leaflets which were carried through the lines by patrols, dropped from planes, or shot over the lines in pamphlet-bearing shells. The third kind of propaganda is started when our troops have occupied enemy territory. Newspapers, movies, posters, and news photographs are utilized for this so-called "mopping-up."

In the first phase of our psychological campaign in the Mediterranean the OWI's short-wave radio in the United States broadcast to Italy the facts of its hopeless position —the long record of its defeats on land and sea, the loss of its African empire. Mussolini was exposed as a wrong guesser, a lackey of Hitler, a leader who went into the war when he thought it was won; Germany, as an ally which held Italy in contempt, which sacrificed both the Italian economy and Italian troops for the German cause. The Italian people were told how the fleeing Germans had abandoned Italian troops in the field, robbing them of their own vehicles; the words of Italian generals themselves were used to drive these points home. The domestic front was also reminded of Germany's plundering of Italian food stocks. Italy, it was reiterated, was fighting not its own but Germany's war, and Mussolini and the Fascist Party were to blame.

This story was repeated over the medium-wave radio from Algiers by means of live broadcasts and recordings. It was rebroadcast from London to Italy over British Broadcasting Corporation transmitters. It was cabled from New York to Switzerland and Turkey, whence it seeped over the border into Italy and into the ranks of Italian garrisons in the Balkans. The voices and words of hundreds of Americans—of the President, members of Congress, labor leaders, churchmen, workers, people from every walk of American life—were used to show that all America knew this to be the truth and wanted the Italians to know it.

Millions of leaflets bearing the same message were showered upon the enemy's cities, towns, and army camps. Between February, 1943, and the fall of Mussolini on July 25 approximately 45,000,000 leaflets were prepared by the PWB. "These," according to Colonel C. B. Hazeltine, commanding officer of the PWB, "were directed chiefly against Mussolini's war and Fascism." "A PWB officer," Hazeltine says, "flew over Trapani dropping leaflets addressed to the people of the town, calling on them to put out white flags to save the city.

By the time he flew back after his leaflets had been dropped, the town looked as though all the washing in the world were hung out there. Every habitable quarter showed white."

The propaganda addressed to enemy troops, the second phase of the campaign, was even more effective. Italian soldiers were asked if they wanted to die for Hitler or live for Italy. Italian sailors were urged not to sacrifice Italian ships for German soldiers. "The effectiveness of the psychological warfare," Colonel Hazeltine reports, "can be judged by what one captured Italian general said-that he could do nothing to maintain the morale of his men when they were plastered with hundreds of these leaflets every day, when there was no question but that these leaflets told the truth. . . . Every enemy soldier who came over with a safe-conduct stopped shooting a clip or two earlier than he would have done oherwise. Multiply a few rounds [of ammunition] by the number of prisoners taken, and you begin to get an idea of just how many extra cartridges were not fired into our lines."

At one point in the battle for Tunisia General Sir Harold Alexander, the British commander, ordered a five-day leaflet campaign to soften up the enemy. Admiral Cunningham, the Allied naval chief, requested that leaflets be dropped on the island of Lampedusa after the surrender of Pantelleria. Leaflets gave the Italian commander of Pantelleria his first knowledge of General Spaatz's demand that the island surrender.

Reporting on the third phase of psychological warfare, Colonel Hazeltine says: "After troops have occupied an area, a PWB team comes up from the rear to take over the work begun by the combat team, which usually enters the area with the first troops. The job of this second team is to help Allied occupation authorities restore the area to normal life." Using all means of communication, the PWB tries to convince the population "that the Allied armies have come as liberators, and that the principles for which those armies fight are pretty much what average people everywhere believe in when they are not being pushed around by dictators of one kind or another."

Sicily and southern Italy are now receiving a steady stream of cabled news and pictures designed to show the victims of Nazi-Fascist oppression what the world has been doing, saying, and thinking: Allied news reels for people who have seen nothing but shots of Stuka divebombers, of Nazi armies advancing through defenseless areas in 1940 and 1941, and of Mussolini shouting from the Palazzo Venezia; publications to take the place of those ruled by Goebbels and Gayda; and radio photographs revealing the industrial and military might of the United Nations from the Southwest Pacific to the Russian steppes. The Cable-Wireless Division of the OWI in New York transmits more than 900,000 words a week to outposts in Europe and North Africa to furnish the text for this propaganda.

An OWI outpost in Algiers reported on September 15: "The first post-invasion anti-Fascist newspaper, Sicilia Liberata, was organized and edited by PWB-OWI newsmen. . . . Starting out as a one-page tabloid sheet of 2,000 copies, it has since been stepped up to four pages with a weekly run of 50,000 copies. It is staffed by Sicilians. Photos are supplied by PWB-OWI photographers, and plastic plates [light-weight and non-critical material] are flown from Algiers. The paper has one column in English and carries anti-Fascist political news and general news on local subjects."

Radio Palermo on the north shore of Sicily was captured by a PWB detachment which entered the city with the first half-dozen American troops. The Fascist manager was caught with written instructions to destroy the station; he had had no chance to carry them out. In three hours Radio Palermo was on the air, telling Sicily and Italy the United Nations' story of the war.

For twenty-three years the Sicilians had been subjected to the most intense propaganda by the Fascists through the medium of motion pictures. The PWB found many of the theaters on the island bombed out, but six were soon opened in Palermo to show films of America at war, Allied newsreels, and American shorts. The lobbies were used to display posters and pamphlets relayed from Algiers.

During the battles for Sicily and southern Italy propaganda was the main work of the Cairo outpost of the OWI, working with the British. One of Cairo's important jobs in recent months has been the building of a stockpile of propaganda material for eventual use in the Balkans. Lessons learned in North Africa, Sicily, and Italy will probably be put to good use when the Allies translate their plans for that region into military action. Already thousands of leaflets based on intelligence received from Greece, Yugoslavia, and other Balkan countries are being prepared in Cairo and dropped over southeastern Europe.

In the Mediterranean area all OWI outposts are monitoring stations, and the results of their listening to the enemy radio are made available to the PWB in North Africa, to the military command, and to OWI offices in the United States. Forward combat teams also monitor the enemy radio for the benefit of the army field commanders.

Psychological warfare as a branch of military warfare has proved its usefulness. As Colonel Hazeltine told his men, "Its job is to attack the enemy's morale—his will to fight—to soften him up and make him easier to beat in the field. . . . It will be for you to decide whether or not this new science of war helps bring the successful end a little sooner for us—and a little less expensively in Allied lives and material."

In the Wind

AN AMERICAN OFFICER who didn't wait for Pearl Harbor but joined the Canadian army immediately after Dunkirk and has since fought the Nazis with the British and American armies in every theater of war in North Africa and the Middle East, wrote a letter to Representative Taber of New York taking exception to his demacome in out of the rain," he wrote, "ought to know that intelligently directed propaganda can weaken the enemy in advance of our troops and thus save the lives of our American lads fighting overseas." Taber, who voted against lifting the arms embargo, against lend-lease, against arming merchant ships, etc., etc., etc., replied: "I have your letter of the fourth. I can think of nobody but a pro-German who would write the letter."

UNDERTAKERS HAVE BEEN ASKED by the OPA to return any ration books found on the deceased.

INTERCHANGE BETWEEN TWO GIRLS overheard in New York (but it might have been overheard anywhere): "Do you know of any unattached men?" "Yes, but I'm not passing them around."

STATION WJBK, DETROIT, has canceled the contract of the Polish Unionists' Radio Hour on the ground that the program "tended to promote discord among the local Polish-speaking people." The program consisted of music and a commentary by State Senator Stanley Nowak. It expressed opposition to the activities of the Polish government in exile and to the Nazis.

ADVERTISEMENTS WILL SOON start appearing for the Kant-Tangle Rosary.

A NEW ORGANIZATION, the Gentile League, has been chartered in Wisconsin. One of its incorporators, asked if it was anti-Semitic, replied that it was pro-Gentile and pro-American.

THE RUBICON, an Italian American news letter of extremely conservative views, offers this post-mortem on Willkie's 1940 campaign: "Willkie made some mistakes about foreign policy. Had he stuck to the sort of speeches he made for the Commonwealth and Southern, however, he would have won."

FESTUNG EUROPA: German farmers have become so accustomed to exploiting foreign workers that the government recently reminded them that native Germans evacuated from bombed cities should not be treated like "cheap labor." . . . A special prison camp has been established in Holland for factory women who, in the opinion of the Nazis, do not work hard enough.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Germany, Economic Heart of Europe

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

[With this issue the Political War Section begins publication of a group of articles dealing with the problems which the United Nations and Germany will face when the National Socialist regime has been destroyed. By presenting a number of widely divergent views on the political, economic, and social outlook for Germany, we hope to contribute to a better understanding of the complexities which must be resolved before Germany can take its place once more in a peaceful community of nations.]

THE wishes of the German people will hardly be the most important factor in determining the immediate future of Germany after Hitler's defeat. Rather, the German people will be the object of an understanding between Russia on one side and the Anglo-Saxon powers on the other as to the future of Germany—and of Europe. Any analysis of Germany's future, therefore, must begin with two questions: What are the aims of Russia and the Anglo-Saxon powers? And what are the resources they can apply to the achievement of those aims?

Russia's position can already be discerned pretty clearly. The Soviet Union has defeated the Nazi armies at the cost of terrible, almost superhuman, sacrifices. Of all the warring countries it has sustained the largest loss of life and the worst destruction of industry and agriculture. Its first war aim is that it shall' never have to fight such a war again. At any price, Germany must be made powerless to build another army to fight Russia.

To this end, the Russians' minimum demand will be a hand in the political control of Germany, in order to eliminate the possibility that at any time, under any circumstances, Germany might again become a military power and take part in an anti-Russian coalition. (A maximum demand would be the inclusion of Germany in a Russian coalition.) The Soviet Union will not retreat from this minimum demand. Has it the strength to enforce it? Everything indicates that it has. After the defeat of Nazi Germany Russia will be, without any doubt, the one overtowering military land power on the continent of Europe. However strong the secondfront armies of the Anglo-Saxon powers may be, the Red Army will be stronger. And in addition, its bases will be right next door to Germany. Recent battles have shown clearly that the military strength of Soviet Russia is so great that no other power will be able to oppose it. In the present war of factories and production Russia's all-powerful land army is an expression of its economic strength. After World War I Russia's industrial production was only a fraction of that of France. In the course of the five-year plans, however, Russia grew so strong that long before the outbreak of World War II it was producing more than France or even England.

In 1913, before World War I, England was more highly industrialized than France and tremendously more so than czarist Russia. England's coal production was 292,000,000 tons, against Russia's 29,094 tons—a ratio of ten to one. England's pig-iron production was more than twice that of Russia, 10,425,000 tons against 4,216,000. Iron-ore production was almost twice as great, 16,248,000 tons against 9,214,000. The industrial superiority of England was still overwhelming ten years after the end of World War I. In 1928 England produced 8,656,000 tons of steel, Russia 4,253,000; England 6,716,000 tons of pig iron, Russia 3,375,000; England 241,300,000 tons of coal, Russia 35,808,000; England 11,443,000 tons of iron ore, Russia 6,024,000.

But during the next decade, from 1928 to 1938, the situation was reversed. In 1938, one year before the beginning of the Second World War, Russia's production of steel surpassed the combined output of England and France and its production of pig iron nearly equaled theirs, as the following table shows:

PRODUCTION IN 1938 (TONS) England France Russia Steel . . . . 10,394,000 . . 6,077,000 . . 18,156,000 Pig Iron . . 10,763,000 . . 5,954,000 . . 14,756,000

In the same year England produced 12,049,531 tons of iron ore, Russia 26,529,700. Russia's coal production still lagged far behind England's, but in 1942 the Third Five-Year Plan called for 230,000,000 tons, approximately the same as England's production for 1938.

In order to understand Russia's present position in relation to Europe it must be remembered that in 1939 the Soviets, in all important fields of heavy industry, produced as much as the whole of continental Europe excluding Germany. It is true that Russian industry has suffered the most severe losses in the war; but it is also true that plants in the Moscow area, as well as those in the Urals and Soviet Asia, have been expanded at top speed. The latest military events indicate how strong the Soviet Union is industrially despite the great losses it has sustained.

Russia's second demand after the defeat of Germany will be for aid in rebuilding its own devastated areas. If necessary it could do the job alone, as it did after the First World War; but it could do it better and more quickly with the help of the Anglo-Saxon powers, particularly of the United States. And here is one of the important bases for agreement between Russia and the Anglo-Saxon powers on the question of the future of Germany and Europe. The two things that Britain and the United States are able to offer Russia today are, first, second front, to hasten the defeat of Germany and relieve Russia of making most of the sacrifices in the final phase of the war, and, second, economic help after the war in the form of industrial machinery and also of raw materials, to speed up the process of reconstruction. These two contributions by the Anglo-Saxon powers were the basis of negotiations at Moscow and Teheran, as they will be in later phases of the war and in the period immediately after the war. But it must be understood that nothing will induce Russia to yield on its minimum demands as to Germany.

What do the Anglo-Saxon powers plan for the future of Germany after the defeat of Hitler? We don't know. No document exists that throws any light on the subject. None could exist, for the Anglo-Saxon powers have no positive political program in Europe; the destruction of the Nazi state is their only clear aim. The question naturally arises, What then? To this question the ruling groups in the Anglo-Saxon world have thus far given no answer-at best they have replied with the negative statement that there must be no social revolution in Germany or anywhere else. It is likely that some understanding on this point was reached at Moscow and Teheran. If the Russians can (1) establish their boundaries with Poland, Finland, Rumania, and other neighbors to their own satisfaction, (2) set up in the countries between Russia and Germany governments friendly to Russia-like that of Czechoslovakia under Benes, (3) participate sufficiently in the control of Germany to guarantee that its military potential will not be turned against them, and (4) get substantial help from America in reconstructing their liberated territory, then they will have reason to refrain from encouraging revolutionary movements in Germany immediately after Hitler's collapse. In this connection it is worth recalling that all the propaganda Russia has directed at the Germans thus far during the war has avoided any really strong socialist appeal.

Very well. Suppose Russia agrees not to support a revolutionary socialist movement. What, then, do the Anglo-Saxon powers propose to do about the political future of Germany? In the United States and England during the past year shelves of books and hundreds of articles have been produced recommending the dismemberment of Germany proper. To prove that this is the only possible course it is explained that the Germans are by nature aggressive and that therefore the only guaranty that they will not start another war is the political destruction of their country. I shall not enter upon a discussion of the German character in this article: I would merely remind the Vansittarts high and low that the Russians, who have suffered most of all from German aggression, do not demand that Germany be dismembered; rather, they demand that the groups which promoted aggression-the Junkers and the big industrialists—be destroyed. The Russians are opposed to dismemberment for very simple reasons: they know that it would not last; and they know that Russia, unlike the United States, must live and work on the same continent with Germans.

All makers of plans for Germany's future would do well to bear in mind that this "Germany" does not exist in a vacuum but in the center of Europe; that it is the principal industrial country of Europe; and that any move designed to destroy it would have an important influence on the European, and hence on the world, parallelogram of force.

I have already indicated that Russia, in return for certain concessions, may undertake not to further a revolutionary socialist movement in Germany. However, its influence on the country will be great in any case. Let us suppose that the Anglo-Saxon powers seek to dismember Germany after the war. What would be the result? Britain and the United States will certainly have the strength to dictate dismemberment, but they will not have the strength to win the assent of the German people. All signs indicate that the vast majority would be against it-not only the former Nazis, who of course will not all be wiped out, but also the former German Nationalists, who were the backbone of the conservative right, all degrees of liberals, who had worked for more than a hundred years for a united Germany, and practically the whole working class-the Social Democrats, the Communists, and the former trade unions, which always opposed separatist tendencies.

If the Anglo-Saxon powers, against the will and sentiment of 90 per cent of the population, decide to dismember the country, hatred for them will mount. At the same time good-will toward Russia will spread far beyond the circle of the German Communists, far beyond certain military circles, until it includes a majority of the people. In their eyes Soviet Russia will be the only great power not committed to the dismemberment of their country—and of course the only great power not encouraging fascist tendencies in Europe.

It would be a prodigy of historical irony if the Anglo-

Saxon powers, after having obtained through concessions and compromises a share with Russia in the control of Germany, should pursue policies that would directly and indirectly strengthen the hand of the Soviet Union.

So it is to be hoped that Germany will be allowed to remain undivided in its 1919 boundaries. Only on that condition will the progressive left forces which are capable of setting up a socialist democracy be able gradually to win the upper hand. Nothing would so injure their growth or so limit their accomplishment as the rise of a new German nationalism, a development which would be greatly accelerated by any dismemberment of Germany.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

In MYTHOLOGICAL times there was a hydra—a monster with one body and several heads. In our times there is a hydra of the opposite kind, with one head and two bodies. This hydra is the administrative machinery of the Nazi state. For Germany is governed by two sets of administrative officials, those of the state and of the party, with one head over both. The bodies controlled by the common head are entirely separate. In fact, they are rivals; a jealous enmity seethes between the professional civil servants of the state government and the hundreds of thousands of parasites of the party machine, who have come up from nothing. Only their common head keeps the two bodies from attacking each other. This peculiar relationship was illustrated recently by strange occurrences in the province of Kurhesse.

For some reason which no one understands, Kurhesse is the only province in which the highest government office has not been merged with the highest party office. The party Gauleiter and the Oberpräsident of the state government are two different persons. Now, after Cassel, the capital of the province, was heavily bombed in November, the Gauleiter was suddenly removed from office—"his request for a long sick leave has been granted"—and a new Gauleiter by the name of Karl Gerland was appointed. Exactly what had happened is not clear, but to seems certain that there was a violent row between the bureaucrats of the state government and of the party. The fall of the Gauleiter indicates that the Oberpräsident, a Prince Richard von Hessen, won the day.

All the more astounding therefore was the speech made by the new Gauleiter on taking office on December 5. It was one long explosion of anger and threats against the rival administration. The new Nazi chief declared that he would finally make the party machine "predominant" and obtain for it "complete freedom of action" in the province. "Anti-social elements," he said, had been too much in control in Kurhesse. "I shall exterminate these bad examples in public positions in such a manner that the fate of those who are not capable of being good examples will serve at least as a deterrent. I shall eliminate from office anyone who transgresses the lofty laws given us by the Führet." And in what was plainly a baiting allusion to the Oberpräsident, the Prince von Hessen, he continued, "I cannot educate into a good party comrade a man who by virtue of his racial antecedents does not belong to our people. We have not got rid of the Jews in order to make place for a degenerate variation on them. We National Socialists have not fought for years to see another mongrel race of exploiters take the place of the exterminated Jews."

It is probable that the Prince von Hessen has foreign, though not Jewish, "racial antecedents." In this local war between the party and the state machinery that fact seems to provide the party with its chief weapon. One wonders why the supreme head of both state and party allows this public struggle, and why he does not settle it. More significant is its revelation of the burning latent enmity between the two bodies. Apparently they need only to be under separate chiefs for the antagonism to break out into the open. If some day the supreme head which now unites the two bodies becomes weak, we shall see them fall upon each other fiercely.

The present German Stimmung finds a vent in countless slogans and jokes which are often very cynical. One of the latest is: "Enjoy the war—the peace will be terrible." It is no wonder that the Nazi command, which never had any sense of humor, is extremely irritated by this epidemic of witticisms. In the middle of January a furious article about the jokers appeared in several Baden newspapers.

There are jokes [it said] which work like poisoned arrows and are really dangerous. One often sees two people meet, exchange knowing glances, and ask the familiar question: Have you heard the latest joke? Then, after some mysterious whispering—nobody else must hear—they laugh and go home, eager for an opportunity to repeat the story. Of course they know whom they can trust with such witticisms—those fine people who understand how to present all serious matters in a false light. . . This joking about victory and defeat is the most despicable treason in such a period as the present.

The article concluded with malevolent but somewhat hollow threats:

From now on we are going to watch more carefully those fellow-citizens of ours who—in the strictest privacy of course—are always ready with the latest demoralizing, corroding, poisonous joke. We shall know how to point those poisoned arrows in the direction they should go—that is, at the hearts of the story-tellers themselves.

441 WAS A JEWISH PRISONER OF WAR IN GERMANY 27 PRIVATE KRAUS

"... I remember ... when the British prisoners were being driven to the prison camps; they passed on the way two crucified naked bodies; one had been an old Jew with a long beard, the other a young Jewish girl. Two British officers stopped and saluted these monuments of the German new world. For this they were shot. We cannot forget these things. Perhaps the crucified Jews and the two British officers were buried together in one brotherly grave, a symbol of unity between our two great peoples..."

Read the Amazing Experiences of the Palestinian Jewish Soldiers in German Prison Camps, Told in

THE ANSWER

Semi-monthly Illustrated Magazine

Only in the ANSWER will you find these stories of Jewish sufferings and heroism. Only in this militant magazine will you get the whole truth about the Jewish contributions in the war against Hitler—not only about Jewish military and guerrilla heroism in the African and European theatres of the war but the whole story of the dreadful holocaust that has cost these trapped people millions of lives.

Other Features in This Issue-

- 1. The dramatic story of the Gillette-Taft-Baldwin-Rogers Resolution—it preceded the President's War Refugee Board.
- 2. The never-before printed testimony before Congress by FIO-RELLO H. LAGUARDIA . . . DEAN ALFANGE . . . WILLIAM B. ZIFF.
- 8. A great son of a great father . . . WILL ROGERS, JR.
- 4. "THE HORRORS AT KHARKOV" . . . Told by one of the greatest Russian authors, Alexai Tolstoy.
- "MY TWO YEARS IN WARSAW'S GHETTO" ... Told by a man who escaped the Ghetto, Edward Warshawski.
- 6. "PARTITION"... a poem by Robert Nathan. Plus... Editorial Comments; Press Reviews, Book Reviews.

Here is an offer without parallel in the literary world. You pay only three dollars, REGULAR PRICE for one year's subscription to the ANSWER. . . . Plus complete library on Jewish affairs, FREE. . . . The books and pamphlets come to you FREE (except 25 cents for postage and handling) . . . BUT YOU MUST ACT AT ONCE.

A LITERARY GALAXY

In every issue of the ANSWER you will find a veritable feast of articles by leading writers of today. Here are a few who have appeared in its pages within the past few months: Sigrid Undset, Ben Hecht, Emil Ludwig, Dorothy Parker, Max Lerner, Konrad Bercovici, Taylor Caldwell, Prof. Johan J. Smettenko, Mrs. John Gunther, William Ziff and Emil Lengyel.

The ANSWER is no journal of selfpity. The ANSWER talks straight. The technique of the ANSWER is not the plea—its conscience is that of a champion for a people's right.

Keep informed about the progress of the campaign to save the Jewish people of Europe.

-FREE-

THIS UP-TO-DATE LIBRARY OF THE JEWISH PROBLEMS

We offer to the public an opportunity to become acquainted now with the vital aspects of the Jewish situation in the world and the possible solution of the Jewish problems in Europe and Palestine.

We make this offer FREE.

1. "WE WILL NEVER DIE"

(Including the chapter of the Battle of the Warsaw Ghetto)—by Ben Hecht,

The momentous memorial pageant which aroused America

2. "THE RAPE OF PALES-TINE"
(Digest, 227 pages)—by William

B. Ziff.
3. "ONLY THE LIVING"

-by Babette Deutsch

MUDA"
5. "THE TEST CASE FOR DEMOCRACY"

(The American Press and the lewish Army)

6. "DELIVER US FROM EVIL"

7. "THE AMERICAN PRESS AND THE RESCUE RESOLUTION"

The Answer Publishing Co., Inc., 1 East 44th Street, New York 17, N. Y.:

Please send me one year's subscription to The ANSWER (24 issues). Also send me, without charge (except 25 cents for postage and handling), complete Jewish library listed above, for which I enclose my check for $3.25.

Name......Address.....

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Facts About Public Housing

THE SEVEN MYTHS OF HOUSING. By Nathan Straus.

Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

HEN the President drafted Nathan Straus for the job of clearing city slums, Straus ran foul of the building-loan and real-estate lobbies. Their shadows loom large in Congressional cloakrooms, and his five years as housing administrator were hard and troubled. A House committee finally refused to appropriate any more housing money for his agency. Straus resigned, but not before nearly a billion dollars' worth of public housing had been built and one of the most inspiring of New Deal programs successfully launched.

In "The Seven Myths of Housing" Straus takes the field again against the foes of public housing. He lists the charges that are most often hurled against the program: namely, there really aren't any slums; people make slums; public housing doesn't clear slums; public housing costs too much anyway and threatens private enterprise; the government would fare better by bailing out the slum owners. He labels each of these "myths" and explodes them one by one.

The role of the "mythoclast" for Straus is not a new one. With earlier pioneers in housing, like Langdon Post, Catherine Bauer, and Edith Elmer Wood, Straus once roamed the country answering arguments against public housing and persuading cities to set up housing authorities. In time local opposition was overcome, and cities obtained the necessary enabling laws, successfully defended them against constitutional attack, tore down slums, gave tax-exemption to the new projects, built and managed them.

But the opposition then concentrated its force on Washington. The building-and-loan lobby united with the home builders and real-estate brokers for a frontal attack on the program. The myths Straus breaks down are again being broadcast, and important Washington circles are accepting them as fact. Straus's book, therefore, is a timely and necessary addition to the fragmentary literature on public housing.

The book is not a philippic against Straus's enemies in Washington, as some expected it to be, though several Congressmen who fought Straus do receive special dishonorable mention. It is, in the main, statement of facts and figures, put plainly and convincingly. Public housing costs less to build than private housing, says Straus, and he proceeds to prove it with schedule and tally. It costs less to operate than private housing, and he shows how utilities and insurance costs have been cut to one-third of private costs. It rehouses families from the slums, and he demonstrates that about three-quarters of the tenants in the new housing have incomes under $1,000. He shows how the tenants in the new projects have become sounder citizens, pay rent promptly, rebel against regimentation, take pride in their homes, and even do the painting and repairing themselves. Straus strikes out against the substitute formula now being offered by the real-estate interests under which monthly rent checks would be given to slum dwellers to enable them to rent better quarters. He properly says this would only be a subsidy to the slum-owner, that the slums would be perpetuated, the tenant be made a recipient of public charity.

An interesting chart compares costs and operational expenses of a private with a publicly operated dwelling. With a federal subsidy of only $104 annually, public housing can be rented to a family earning $800 a year, and for a third of the rent charged by private enterprise. A tabulation shows why this is so—the vacancy and collection losses are lower in public housing, the life of the building is longer, the profit is eliminated, the interest rate reduced.

In the post-war years Straus wants 900,000 homes built every year for five years, a third of which are to be subsidized. He wants cities to buy land for future use as was done so successfully in Sweden. All substandard housing is to be outlawed beginning six years hence, though with Straus's program calling for only 300,000 subsidized houses annually it is hard to see where the greater part of ten million families occupying substandard houses will live when their present houses are declared illegal. Straus also suggests that all federal agencies dealing with public works, work relief, and public and private housing be merged with the National Resources Planning Board into a new super-agency with Cabinet representation. It is curious that one of the signal reasons for the success of Straus's administration was that public housing was finally unshackled from public works, that on the two occasions when public works and housing were in one agency, housing bogged down. The decentralized operation seems always to be unfavorably affected by the centripetal tendencies of more centralized operations. The unique characteristic of the public-housing program is that the federal government is enjoined from itself buying land or erecting buildings; the program must be carried out through local communities, which themselves do the selecting of sites, the planning, construction, and managing of projects.

With few exceptions Straus's proposals for the post-war period are simple and attainable. He has written a useful handbook for those in the field as well as for the inquiring layman. For Congressmen who are now being deluged with housing misinformation by the real-estate pressure groups the book is mandatory.

CHARLES ABRAMS

An Oxford Book of Symbolism

THE HERITAGE OF SYMBOLISM. By C. M. Bowra. The Macmillan Company. $3.75.

THIS book, by Pindar's most recent editor, consists of seven essays. Two of them contain a general discussion of symbolism and post-symbolism; the other five are devoted to Valéry, Rilke, Stefan George, Alexander Blok, and W. B. Yeats. George and Rilke were omitted from Edmund Wilson's account of the subject, and Mr. Bowra's essays are probably the best introductions available. His book is written in an accomplished, urbane, slightly donnish manner. It is obviously the work of a connoisseur and has the merit of work done for pleasure rather than as a contribution to research. Mr. Bowra's remarks always carry some weight, for one feels behind them considerable experience, taste, and epicurean enjoyment. He savors poetry, tests it on his palate as if it were a rare wine. This is very heartening at a time when most professors of Greek are philistines and when criticism is too nearly the monopoly of professionals. Unhappily the attitude of the connoisseur also has its limitations.

Symbolism remains the greatest topic in the whole range of modern poetry, for all the new non-symbolist beginnings have proved to be false starts, like the social poetry of the thirties or such spectacular gestures of self-immolation as surrealism. No group of modern writers, from the naturalists to the expressionists, has managed, as the symbolists have done, not only to maintain but to enhance their reputation. Moreover, symbolism remains the greatest problem of modern literature. Not merely do critics differ on the interpretation of the phenomenon, as they differ on the interpretation of romanticism or any other system; they differ also on the question: What is the phenomenon being interpreted? Consequently they differ as to who the symbolists are. The net may be cast wide to include Gérard de Nerval, Jules Laforgue, Alexander Blok, or Paul Valéry. Or everyone can be excluded except the immediate circle of Mallarmé. Everything depends on interpretation and definition.

What does Mr. Bowra propose? His introductory discussion deals with Baudelaire, Verlaine, and Mallarmé; the main # politics

A NEW MONTHLY
Edited by DWIGHT MACDONALD

In the first (February) Issue:
TOWARD A PERMANENT WAR ECONOMY?

by Walter J. Oakes
A realistic forecast of the next two decades of U. S. economic development

A THEORY OF POPULAR CULTURE

by Dwight Macdonald The effect on American art and society of movies, radio, commercialized art and letters

USA, ex rel. WINFRED LYNN v. COL. J. W. DOWNER

The original brief in the only court test of the Army's

Jimcrow treatment of colored soldiers

STALIN'S POLICY IN EUROPE by Louis Clair
THE MONTREAL POLICE STRIKE by William Mead

INTRODUCTORY OFFER: 5 Issues for $1

POLITICS, 45 Astor Place, New York 3, N. Y.
Enclosed is $
Please send me { 5 monthly issues for $1 (Single copy, 25c; add to subscriptions, 30c for Canada, 50c for other foreign countries.)
NAME
ADDRESS
CITY UNIT STATE

part of his book deals with Valéry, Rilke, George, Blok, and Yeats. There is something wrong here. If the definition be a narrow one, the later work of the latter five poets—especially that of Valéry and Blok—cannot be termed symbolist. If it be broad, the omission in the general discussions of Rimbaud, Corbière, and Laforgue cannot be justified; nor, in the English tradition, should Yeats receive attention to the total exclusion of T. S. Eliot, who introduced symbolism to a generation. Everything depends on interpretation and definition: for lack of any definitions whatsoever Mr. Bowra's interpretation is throughout blurred and unsatisfactory.

Yet one can piece it together from one part of the book and another. Romantic poetry, says Mr. Bowra, prefers creating to stating, producing an effect to giving information. Symbolism is the extreme of romanticism. Distaste for statement and information is erected into the dogma of pure poetry, poetry as music, which oddly but significantly enough is equated with poetry as silence. Fleeing the external world or believing that it was real only as mirrored in the individual consciousness, the symbolist narrows down his interest not only to states of mind but to the only states of mind which can really be known-his own. Hence a religion of the self, the symbolist substitute for a social philosophy, and a religion of the sensations, the symbolist substitute for a philosophy of aesthetics. From these two sources flow the secondary symptoms of symbolism-its parade of anti-rational, so-called mystical attitudes, its aloofness, its respect for music, its theory of sensory correspondences. Beauty became a religion, poetry a panacea, the poet a shaman. "I think the world will be saved," said Mallarmé, "by a better literature." The postsymbolists departed gradually from the two most dubious doctrines of Mallarmé—the severance of poetry from common life and the belief that musical abstractness is the end of poetry-and we find Blok, George, and Yeats turning sometimes to political subjects, Valéry to a non-transcendental theory of art. The great achievements of the symbolists and post-symbolists, Mr. Bowra concludes, have been in "shedding light on themes which might seem stale or exhausted" and in exploring the unconscious with symbol and suggestion far beyond the reach of the scientific intellect. They represent the highest development of the peculiarly psychological awareness of the past epoch; their work is the most refined product of the self-regarding impulse.

All this is tenable enough, though there is nothing here that was not in "Axel's Castle"; and there was much in "Axel's Castle" that is not to be found here. Furthermore, Mr. Bowra seems only confused by the central paradox of symbolism, the paradox that symbolism is both traditional and revolutionary, decadent and seminal, negative and positive. In his introduction he writes of the symbolists: "... because they neglected their own times, their claim on posterity too is less; for they often lack that vitality which comes from contact with life and survives the centuries because of its lasting human qualities." But in his summing up we read: "[They] all found an intense excitement in living. . . . Their desire for transcendental orders of experience is no denial of the here and now." The contradiction between these statements arises from Mr. Bowra's failure to push his criticism beyond the point of liking the symbolists and feeling that they are nevertheless decadent. When, therefore, I recommend some of Mr. Bowra's essays as "introductions," I use the word advisedly. The corollary is that no one already acquainted with the material would need Mr. Bowra's help.

Another remark of Mr. Bowra's illustrates my theme: "The post-symbolists have had the confidence to assert human values in the face of meaningless circumstance and to rise to a tragic grandeur." Now if there is one quality which the symbolists and their followers lack, and even make apoint of lacking, it is tragic grandeur: consider their treatment of the Hamlet theme from Mallarmé's "Igitur" to Eliot's "Prufrock." But even more revealing is the phrase "meaningless circumstance," for if Mr. Bowra intended to take the view that modern history is meaningless—an idea congenial to the symbolists—he certainly ought to have mentioned the fact before the last page of his book, since it would dictate an interpretation of the whole subject which is at no point elaborated or explained.

Since Théophile Gautier wrote his essay on Baudelaire every notable critic has given his attention to the phenomenon which we now call symbolism. And, indeed, every critic in the field—Bourget, Symons, Quennell, Wilson—has followed Gautier's lead in interpreting Baudelaire as a decadent in a historical if not in a pejorative sense. Wilson, indeed, carries the analysis of decadence as far as it can usefully be taken; one waits now only for more critical analyses of symbolist poems as poems; one waits for a more definitive and objective account of the whole subject. Mr. Bowra only adds to the number of pleasant and in every sense "polite" essays.

The Power to Make Treaties

THE AMERICAN SENATE AND WORLD PEACE. By Kenneth Colegrove. The Vanguard Press. $2.

PORTY-THREE years ago The Nation pointed out that our Constitution makes it so difficult to ratify a treaty that we seemed "to have stripped ourselves of a leading attribute of sovereignty—the power to make freaties." The rejection of the League of Nations by a minority of the Senate in 1920 dramatized the helplessness of a majority in America. In 1930 Dr. Denna F. Fleming reviewed the history of the requirements that "two-thirds of the Senators present" assent to treaties negotiated by the President and recommended its removal in a volume called "The Treaty Veto of the American Senate." Now Professor Kenneth Colegrove of Northwestern University has brought the sorry story up to date and hammered home the same conclusion.

Professor Colegrove names twenty-six Republicans, eighteen Democrats, and one Progressive (La Follette) who, judged by their records and recent remarks, would be likely to oppose a treaty embodying the ideas of the Ball-Hatch resolution if it were submitted to the Senate by a Democratic President. If a bare quorum were present, seventeen "nays" would suffice to defeat such a treaty. The men casting those votes might represent only one-twelfth of the American people.

Such isolationists as Senators Burton K. Wheeler, Robert A. Taft, Hiram Johnson, and Gerald P. Nye, says Pro-

Midwinter Book Issue

Samuel Johnson's "Life of the Poets" An Essay by Joseph Wood Krutch

Reviews:

Louis Kronenberger: Elmer Edgar Stoll's "From Shakespeare to Joyce"

G. A. Borgese: Recent books by Monsignor Sheen and Archbishop Spellman

Edgar Snow: Leland Stowe's "They Shall Not Sleep"

Douglas Haskell: Talbot Hamlin's "Greek Revival Architecture in America"

F. W. Dupee: Jean Malaquais's "War Diary"

Marcus Duffield: Charles J. Rolo's "Wingate's Raiders"

Keith Hutchison: Current books on Germany after the war

Next Week in Nation

"What are the facts about the Russo-Polish frontier dispute?"

"Is Stalin dreaming of a Russian super-empire?"

The Russian riddle is of our own making—this book helps to undo it.

WHAT RUSSIA WANTS

By Joachim Joesten

Assistant Editor of Newsweek

"H IS book has a great timeliness. It serves as an eye opener for those who believe that every Russian move has a mysterious meaning."—Ernest von Hartz, Chicago Sun. $2.50

DUELL, SLOAN AND PEARCE

DUELL, SLOAN & PEARCE, Inc. 270 Madison Avenue, New York 16, N. Y.
Please send me copies of WHAT RUSSIA WANTS at $2.50 m copy.
☐ Enclosed ☐ Send C. O. D.
Name
Address
City State
N 2-12

fessor Colegrove, have never abandoned hope of preventing us from cooperating with other nations. They foresee an "inevitable reaction" against international collaboration when the war ends. And the Constitution, by intrusting treaties to only one house of Congress, and permitting a minority of that house to prevent action, gives those irreconcilables a most formidable weapon.

Hence, both prudence and a decent respect for democracy require that we either use means other than treaties to come to agreements with other nations or amend the Constitution. Executive agreements can be substituted for treaties. They may be authorized or approved by a majority vote in both houses of Congress. More than 1,200 such agreements but only about 900 treaties have been made by our government. The Department of State and a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations agreed last summer to base United Nations relief and rehabilitation arrangements on such an agreement rather than a treaty.

But Professor Colegrove would rather see the Constitution amended. He considers executive agreements evasive, even though they have been held to be constitutional; he emphasizes the greater "symbolic significance" of treaties; and he contends that treaties are needed to place the final peace settlement "on a sound and permanent basis."

The best answer to this argument is that it is hard to amend the Constitution. The customary method requires a two-thirds' vote of both houses of Congress. The Senate isolationists can prevent that. Professor Colegrove proposes, therefore, that the legislatures of two-thirds of the states request Congress to call a national convention. Congress then would have to act. And an amendment proposed by such a convention would be effective if approved by the legislatures or conventions in three-fourths of the states. This is a cumbersome method that never has been used. It is interesting to note, however, that a young Republican writer, Alexander Hehmeyer, proposed recently in "Time for Change" that we have a constitutional convention sitting throughout this war to reexamine the whole Constitution.

What provisions should be made for approving treaties is another question. Professor Colegrove scorns Senator Guy M. Gillette's proposal that a mere majority of the Senate be empowered to approve treaties. He would require the Senate to share authority with the House, where there is less danger of distortion in reflections of the people's will. He does not discuss Representative Michael A. Feighan's proposal that there should be a direct vote by the people, in a special election, on a treaty favored by the President but rejected in the Senate.

However dreamy it may seem to talk of amending the Constitution now, Professor Colegrove's book is a worth-while contribution to American thinking because it shows plainly how the Constitution can be used by democracy's foes as well as its friends. There has been too much blind worship and too little critical thought about our Constitution. The people's failure to realize its weaknesses as well as its grandeur has enabled obstructionists to hide behind it.

The Republicans' Mackinac charter, which emphasized adherence to "constitutionalism" in determining policies and making international commitments, was approved even by Clare Hoffman. Professor Colegrove ascribes that joker in the Mackinac declaration to Senator Vandenberg and charges that the Michigan Senator was really saying: "The President must be compelled to frame the peace settlement in the form of a treaty, which must be submitted to the Senate, where a one-third minority of isolationists will be able to destroy it as effectively as Senator Lodge and his collaborators annihilated American participation in the peace system at the end of the First World War."

Some critics have called this book repetitious. It is. But a man shouting a warning against minority rule and international anarchy should not be expected to content himself with a single yip. My complaint is that the author has not shouted loudly enough.

Fiction in Review

TOHN HERSEY is a Life-Time correspondent with our Jinvasion forces; his novel, "A Bell for Adano" (Knopf, $2.50), is our first fiction of the American government of Italy-occupational history written while it was still little more than a gleam in Amgot's eye. But the very speed of composition of Mr. Hersey's book gives it what interest it has, because, writing quickly, Mr. Hersey wrote out of a deep reservoir of folk-idealisms and popular assumptions. This is not to say that "A Bell for Adano" is an unconscious book any more than most movies, also created out of popular assumptions are unconscious. It is as impossible for me to believe that a person who has had the education and experience necessary to get a correspondent's job on Life naturally thinks of Americans or Italians in the simple way that Mr. Hersey appears to in his novel as it is for me to believe that the Hollywood scenario writer who wrote "Joe Smith, American" naturally thinks of Americans as Joe Smiths. The contrivance of simplicity is one of the things that may set my spine tingling in a movie, especially in a lesson-indemocracy movie, but it also leaves a bad taste in my mouth, because I feel that I have been done, played upon, taken in. I feel the more taken in, indeed, in the degree that the popular assumptions which are paraded have a basis in truth.

And there seems to me to be a great deal of truth in Mr. Hersey's picture of an American. In fact, "A Bell for Adano" might accurately be described as the Platonic ideal of Americanism, of which the American reality is an active approximation. Its hero, Major Joppolo, is a kind of compendium of quickly recognizable national characteristics. Joppolo is the American occupation officer of the little town of Adano. He thinks for himself, works fourteen hours a day, is realistic about taking help where he can find it, is gentle from instinct and ruthless on principle, respects authority where it earns respect and where it is unworthy countermands it at whatever risk, knows how to play with the church, has sex but knows how to keep it down, loathes protocol and red tape, and first and always is a man of heart who understands that a town full of Italian peasants has more need for a bell than for American sanitation; when his M. P.'s get into a drunken orgy and smash up the house in which they are billeted, instead of sending them to the guardhouse he invokes the memory of their mothers. So convincing is Mr. Hersey's portrait of the American as an administrator that we even comes to think it a national characteristic that Joppolo should be of Italian parentage and came from the Bronx.

Obviously, folk idealism of this kind is its own good clean fun. What offends me is its being put forward as all of his truth by someone in a position to boast a more complicated view of things. When Mr. Hersey says in his Foreword that only men can guarantee the future, men like Major Joppolo, I tend to agree with him; for all its limitations the Joppolo incarnation of American democracy at work isn't a bad star to be shooting at in these practical days. But when, also in his Foreword, he uses Hollywood-naive prose like this, "Major Victor Joppolo, U. S. A., was a good man. You will see that. It is the whole reason why I want you to know his story. . . . Major Joppolo was Amgot officer of Adano, and he was good," I know that Mr. Hersey's ideas, like his prose, have undergone a process of conscious, falsifying, and purposeful simplification.

There is very little writing talent in "A Bell for Adano," just by the way. Two other novels I read this week-Charles Jackson's "The Lost Week-End" (Farrar and Rinehart, $2.50) and A. Fleming MacLiesh's "Cone of Silence" (Houghton, Mifflin, $2.75)-show very much more talent, though they are less interesting. Unfortunately, Mr. Jackson's quick, sinewy, precise prose is at the service of a sensational but essentially unfruitful novelistic subject. "The Last Week-End," which is the stream-of-consciousness record of five days in the life of a dipsomaniac, inevitably suffers from the lack of scope of its central character, whose view of the world is bounded by the drinker's narcissism and self-pity. In Mr. MacLiesh's book, too, self-pity is the dominant note, in this case the self-pity induced by the artist's exacerbated sense of his special susceptibility to life. "Cone of Silence" is one of those novels in which depth of character is assumed to increase in direct proportion as the hero discloses his literacy and artistic sensibility.

DIANA TRILLING

ART

THE Federation of Modern Painters and Sculptors is an organization that includes a good many of the most advanced and important artists in this country. Early in January the federation released to the press a letter attacking the Museum of Modern Art and pointing out the "increasingly reactionary policies of that institution toward the work of American artists." The letter specifically criticized the museum for its exhibition of "works rightly considered academic and outmoded even in the Victorian era (for example, "Romanticism in America" and "American Realists and Magic Realists"); for its displays of material "interesting only on scientific and ethnographical grounds"; for adopting "one set of standards for . . . European art . . . and a thoroughly different one for its American selections"; for its policy of sacrificing "seriousness of purpose for publicity" (the "Contemporary Portraits" exhibition); and for its interest in "such ephemeral fads as the output of certain refugee-surrealists and types of American scene-illustration, [which] have been exaggerated out of all proportion to their qualities as art." The letter went on to call for an exhibition of the museum's entire permanent collection, "which presumably represents the considered judgment of the staff," and to ask that "the museum indicate more openly the individuals or groups who are most directly responsible for its recent policies."

On January 20 the Museum of Modern Art's Department of Painting and Sculpture sent a letter, with a self-addressed postcard inclosed, to a selected group of the seventy members of the federation, asking that the recipient indicate on the card whether or not he or she had seen the federation's letter before it was mailed. The card did not seem to require a signature, and the assurance was given that "this information . . . will be used only for a report to a museum committee."

That the museum's first reaction to the federation's letter was to make it an issue of personalities is saddening—aside from the questionable taste of its procedure, which seems to derive from the Stalinist telephone-pressure campaigns of a few years ago. It is possible, but quite irrelevant, that some members of the federation call the museum's grapes sour mainly because the museum has not shown their work. But charges similar to those in the letter have been leveled against that institution by persons whose motives cannot be similarly impugned. Nor would the charges be invalidated could it be proved that a majority of the federation's membership had not seen the letter before it was released. The museum should have felt it imperative to answer the criticism on the same plane as that on which it was formulated. If

FOR NOTICE OF YOUR CHANGE OF ADDRESS CONVENIENCE Nation subscrib-mum should give us at least two weeks' notice of a change of ad-dress, indicating the old as well as the nuw address. THE NATION 55 Fifth Avenue New York 3, N. Y. Please enter my subscription to your magazine. ☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8 ☐ 3 Years $11 Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me Introductory Offer to New Subscribers ONLY: Weeks Cash with order Canada $1 a year extra Foreign $1 a year extra Pan American Union requires no extra postage NAME. ADDRESS.

CONTINUOUS PERFORMANCES Rivoli

Broadway at 49th St.

B'WAY AT

45th Street

"A tremendously provocative film . . . absorbing in its revelations of character and its brilliantly pictorialized details."

—Bosloy Crowther, N. Y. Times.

ALFRED HITCHCOCK'S

By JOHN STEINBECK STARRING PRODUCTION

TALLULAH BANKHEAD

with WILLIAM BENDIX

A Twentieth Century-Fox Picture

Continuous ASTOR

----

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD presents BOBBY CLARK IN

MEXICAN HAYRIDE

by HERBERT & DOROTHI FIELDS Staged by HASSARD SHORT SONGS BY COLE PORTER WINTER GARDEN, 8'way & 50th St. Mats. Wed. & Sat

"A definite hit . . . gay, glib, daffy — enormously funny."

—Morehouse, Sun.

RUTH GORDON

UVER IWEN IY-UNE
MUSIC BOX 45th St. W. of B'way, Cl 6-4636—Evos, 8:40, Mats. Thurs & Soc. 2:40

Limited Engagement NOW THRU FEBRUARY 19

CHERYL CRAWFORD presents

PORGY and BESS GERSHWIN'S

by George Gershwin and DuBose Heyward

N. Y. CITY CENTER. Mayer LaGunedla, Press. 131 W. 53th St. "Best Bargain
In Town." Evs., 55, 51.10, 51.65, 52.20; Mats. Wed., 5at., 5un., 55e, 51.10, 31.65 the federation is wrong, a point-by-point rebuttal would reinforce the museum's position and, even more important, promote a discussion that might help clarify very important issues at stake in contemporary American art. Alas, the federation is not wrong, even though it failed to make some necessary distinctions.

The function of a museum of modern art is to discriminate and support those tendencies in art which are specifically and validly modern, regardless of general appeal or vogue. Both the golden and the silver ages of modern art are over, seemingly-at least in Paris-and those forced in the past by the vitality of modern art to censor their dissatisfaction with it have begun to come out into the open again. The presumably enlightened rich, who support art in this country as in every other, have relapsed into self-indulgence; their aesthetically ascetic period is past. With no young Picassos in sight, they have found the courage to ask once more for the kind of art they really like: "Give us the romantic, the realistic, the descriptive, the immediately erotic, and the chic. It fits us better, mirrors us better, and moves us quicker. Since we pay for art, we have a right to the kind we want." The recent policies of the museum reflect not so much the increasing strength of this element as an enormous gain in its self-confidence-it has always been strong, and its contributions have kept the museum alive from the beginning. If its influence is unchecked, it will finish by making the Museum of Modern Art an educational annex to the Stork Club. CLEMENT GREENBERG the picture that has everything for everybody . . .

MOTION PICTURE

20th CENTURY-FOX PRESENTS

SULLIVANS

with

ANNE BAXTER THOMAS MITCHELL SELENA ROYLE

The thrilling true-life drama of America's stalwart family of naval heroes.

Plus a town-topping stage show

MARTHA RAYE ROSARIO & ANTONIO THE BEN YOST SINGERS

Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave at 50th Street

DRAMA

ICHAEL TODD has spared no expense in "Mexican Hayride" (Winter Garden). The girls are gorgeous, the costumes elaborate and beautiful, the settings gay. The music is passable Porter. The book by Herbert and Dorothy Fields is none too good, but it does well enough as a vehicle for Bobby Clark, who of course jumps off and lopes ahead of it and around it and over it when it threatens to develop engine trouble—and even when it doesn't. I need hardly add that he is the main attraction of the show.

He is set off, as if he needed to be, by such assorted talents as June Havoc, his bull-fighting sister-in-law; George Givot, his tall, dark, and handsome dupe; and Luba Malina, his sultry stooge. Wilbur Evans looks and acts refreshingly unlike a matinee idol, and he sings nicely, though like most musical-comedy stars, especially male, he feels it necessary always to take the first position in singing the minute he hears his cue. Can't they ever be casual—or appear to be?

appear to be.

June Havoc, who does the "specialty" songs very well, is as supple—and as sexless, strange to say—as a branch of new willow. She's a good little trouper and obviously enjoys her work.

The dancing, when it isn't acrobatic, is nothing to speak of—and I doubt that Paul Haakon ever saw a toreador perform.

"Mexican Hayride" is a bit stiff and slow at the start; the second act is much better than the first largely because it contains two of Bobby Clark's wilder impersonations. In one of them he kids the flute out of countenance and tops off by swallowing half of it. In the other he is an Indian woman with long black braids and a papoose duly equipped with permanent spectacles and a cigar. His routine of the soundless howling coyote is constant. I wish I knew why it's so funny.

MARGARET MARSHALL

FILMS

I HAVE never read "Jane Eyre," but I think there may be some use in comparing the screen version with a not very good version which Luther Adler and Sylvia Sidney brought to the Boston stage several months ago. Judging by the play, the novel must have a good deal of inter-class, feminist, ethical, and erotic tension, and Rochester, besides having a good deal of disintegrating romantic splendor, must in some degree symbolize the predicament and decay of the best of England in his time. Judging by the film, the novel must also have the kind of darkly transparent, hypnotic tone and pace which seem never, any more, to be achieved or even attempted in writing. There is almost no symbolic resonance and almost no really taking or revealing tension in the film; there is very little, in fact, after the first twenty minutes or so that makes it at all seriously worth seeing. Those first twenty minutes, however, which are devoted to Jane's schooling and her first meeting with Rochester, are a lush, beetlebrowed, unusually compelling piece of highly romantic screen rhetoric. I suspect Orson Welles had a hand in this stretch-for good and for bad; it has a good deal of his black-chenilleand-rhinestones manner. After that, all you get is a careful and tame production, a sadly vanilla-flavored Joan Fontaine, and Welles treating himself to road-operatic sculpturings of body, cloak, and diction, his eyes glinting in the Rembrandt gloom, at every chance, like side-orders of jelly. It is possible to enjoy his performance us dead-pan period parody; I imagine he did. I might have more if I hadn't wanted, instead, to see a good performance.

It is also possible, I gather from many people, to be as excited and scared by "The Lodger," the adaptation of Mrs. Belloc Lowndes's story about Jack the Ripper, as the adaptors intended. I wish I could have been, for it is years since a horror picture has given me my money's worth, and I feel that today only Val Lewton, who makes such B pictures as "The Seventh Victim," has occasional promising ideas how to go about it. For me the main troubles with "The Lodger" were that everyone was trying for gentlemanly, intelligent horror, sustained only by tricks of secondary suspense (you know from the start who the Ripper is), in too gentlemanly and too little incisively intelligent manner. As a result the beautiful interiors, the sometimes beautiful streets, and the too beautiful lighting and photography drew too much attention to their own sumptuous but very passive vitality, and the good performances of Laird Cregar, Sir Cedric Hardwicke, Sara Allgood, and Merle Oberon also remained a purely visual pleasure. Doris Lloyd, however, does project a moment of solid, old-fashioned fright.

JAMES AGER

FIRST AID

TO

WRITERS •
STUDENTS • TEACHERS • EXECUTIVES

SPEAKERS LAWYERS LIBRARIANS

To keep you well-informed and up-to-date, you need

FACTS-ON-FILE

World News Digest

Would you like to condense 100 hours of weekly reading into 30 minutes, without missing wingle important fact or event? Do you wish to have every major subject and news event at your finger-tips—condensed, sorted, filed and indexed for ready reference? FACTS ON FILE does it for you by means of a weekly 8-page digest that covers world news in capsule form, stripped of verbiage, opinion, and comment.

FACTS ON FILE Saves you Hours of Reading Time, Improves Your Fund of Knowledge, Gives you all the News of the World including World War II, National and Foreign Affairs, Latin America, Finance, Business, Arts, Science, Education, Religion, Sports, Obituaries, etc., in handy reference form. Authoritative, concise, easy to read.

With FACTS ON FILE you can discard your clippings, notes, and stacks of magazines. Acclaimed a "MIRACLE OF CONDENSATION" FACTS ON FILE is endorsed by prominent leaders in all walks of life as invaluable for quickly locating facts, checking dates, figures, speeches, and names. Busy executives, speeches, and names. Busy executives, speakers, governments, schools, libraries, schools, libraries, speakers, governments, schools, libraries, schools, libraries, schools, libraries, schools, libraries,

SPECIAL OFFER

TRY FACTS ON FILE for 5 weeks for only $1.00 Ivalue $2.501. Regular subscribers at $25.00 a year receive a handsome loose-leaf DE LUNE BUCKRAM BINDER FREE OF CHARGE (Size 9½x11½ inches). Holds a year's supply of Digests and Indexes.

Send the coupon below with only $1.00 for special 5-weeks' trial, which includes latest Quarterly Index FREE OF CHARGE

FACTS-ON-FILE

"THE NEWS OF THE WORLD IN CAPSULE FORM"
516 5TH Ave., New York 18, N. Y.

☐ I enclose $1.00 for Special 5-weeks' trial service to FACTS ON FILE, which entitles me to latest 22-page Quarterly Index FREE

Address....

MUSIC

THE Metropolitan's first "Marriage of Figaro" was one of the most brilliant performances the company has given in recent years. Having considered whether I should listen to the broadcast in the quiet of my home or should accept the poor acoustic conditions and the audience disturbances of the actual performance to which a friend had invited me, I finally decided on the actual performance. My seat, in the second row of the Orchestra Circle on the extreme right very near the orchestra pit and the stage, was one from which I could barely hear many of the marvelous things that happen in the orchestra (whereas the absentminded rolling and unrolling of a program directly behind my left ear was only too distinct); but I could hear and see the singers very well; and it was their work that made the performance extraordinary.

It is a long time since I have heard an opera sung so well throughouteven minor roles like Marcellina and Barberina by Irra Petina and Marita Farell; major ones by older singers like Pinza, Brownlee, Novotna, and Baccaloni, who were in particularly good voice; and above all Susanna and the Countess by Bidu Sayao and Eleanor Steber. Sayao sang as beautifully this time as she had done many times before; but Steber's previous achievements had left me unprepared for singing that was the sensation of the afternoon. That is, she had used a fresh, agreeable voice with good musical taste; but she had begun every performance with a strong tremolo which sometimes had cleared up and sometimes had not. This time, however, the very first tones of Porgi amor were clear and lovely; and her technical security continued to produce such tones, which her musical taste moulded into long, continuous, and exquisite phrases. Moreover, arriving at the reprise of Dove sono she paused, lay back in her chair, and sang it pianissimo as though recalling a dream of past happiness-a stroke of dramatic imagination which brings me to the fact that her Countess was also the outstanding impersonation of the afternoon and one of the finest I have ever seen on the operatic stage. Nobody I have seen in the role has conveyed as Steber did the Countess's youth and beauty, her spirit, her wounded pride, her humiliation at having to call on her servants for help and involve herself with them in stratagems against her wayward husband.

The cavorting about of the other characters is easier to do, but it takes actors as good as Pinza, Baccaloni, Sayao, Novotna, and the others to do it as well as they did. At moments in this performance, however, they did too much; and one piece of new business -Savao's extravagant posturings in the Countess's cloak and hat, in the finale-Dr. Graf should eliminate. On the other hand there is one point—the Venite, inginocchiatevi scene-at which they do too little; and here Dr. Graf should make the sense of the words clear to the audience by having Susanna, who has measured herself against Cherubino, try one of her dresses on him.

The performance was excellently conducted by Bruno Walter.

Martial Singher, whose recital I attended the evening before, has a fine baritone voice which he uses with breath-taking ease and mastery in the service of a beautifully finished musical style and a sharp dramatic sense. These made his singing of the French music on his program-like Mephistopheles's Serenade from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," or the three humorous songs of Chabrier about turkeys, pigs, and ducks -delightful. But one sensed a limitation of emotion and personality which caused his singing of one of Mussorgsky's "Songs and Dances of Death" to lack force and impact; and in the two songs of Schubert and Brahms he achieved a Frenchman's German emotion and style.

Which brings me to Lotte Lehmann's series of three recitals devoted to the songs of Schubert, Brahms, and Schumann. I have commented, in recent years, on the increasing refinement and subtilization of her style in Liedersinging that has accompanied her increasing care, restraint, and skill in the use of an aging but still extraordinarily beautiful voice; at this year's recitals I had the impression that the process had continued, making her art of singing these songs more wonderful than ever. It is in fact unique; and what makes it so is the deep and rich poetic insight and emotion and the power of dramatic characterization and projection that used to tear the phrase apart but now operate through the subtly inflected, phraselogically continuous line of beautiful vocal sound, to produce such great and overwhelming performances as her "Wirtshaus" and "Doppelgänger" of Schubert, or the enchanting comedy of her "Kartenlegerin" of Schumann.

B. H. HAGGIN

Don't Miss The February Issue of CONTEMPORARY Jewish Record

. WALDO FRANK'S

"PREFACE TO A PROGRAM"
—a fundamental statement of the Jewish problem, with which you may not agree, but which every American,
not alone the Jews, must know about.

AMERICA'S YOUNGER WRITERS SPEAK OUT

"Under Forty": A Symposium on American Literature and the Younger Generation of American Jews—the attitude of American writers of Jewish descent toward Jewish problems. Participants: David Daiches, Howard Fast, Ben Field, Clement Greenberg, Albert Halper, Alfred Kazin, Louis Kronenberger, Isaac Rosenfeld, Muriel Rukeyser, Delmore Schwartz, Lionel Trilling.

. HAROLD J. LASKI

"ON A JEWISH SOLDIER'S LETTER." Response to a stirring letter from a soldier stationed at Suez and a lively criticism of British policies in Palestine.

The CONTEMPORARY JEWISH RECORD (published bimonthly by The American Jewish Committee) offers Fact — Opinion — Interpretation — through Articles by outstanding writers, Chronicle of Events, Magazine Digest, Book Reviews, The Cedars of Lebanon series of Classic essays.

MAIL THIS COUPON TODAY
CONTEMPORARY JEWISH RECORD
886 Fourth Ave., New York 16, N. Y.
For the enclosed $2 enter my subscrip tion for one year (six issues).
Name
Address

Letters to the Editors

Cooperation in the Kitchen

Dear Sirs: Edith M. Stern's own answer to her sixty-four-dollar question in her article. Brains in the Kitchen, disconcertingly poses a series of other questions. Can domestic work be "dignified and professionalized"? And is it worth the bother? Are homes, other people's homes, pleasanter places in which to work than factories? Is it efficient, and socially healthful, for tens of thousands of women to make careers of looking after the physical comfort of small units of two, or three, or four individuals? Wouldn't anyone rather apply her skill and intelligence to a wider service?

If I were a skilled dietitian, I'd want to use my knowledge for a large group. If I enjoyed working with children, the care of just one or two children would be merely a stop-gap-if the children weren't mine. And if I were especially good at, say, washing dishes, I might get sick and tired of looking at the same set of Delfft or Wedgwood.

The fact of the matter is that housework would long ago have become an intolerable bore and nuisance, and perhaps would have been done away with altogether, if we were not working for the comfort of people we love and for our own comfort. Have we a right to expect anyone else to find fulfilment and a life work in personal service to us, no matter how valuable we are to the outside world and to our children, no matter how adorable they are?

That this is too much to expect is proved by the long and dolorous "Help Wanted" columns appealing for houseworkers. Money inducements appear secondary; glowing descriptions of "in-"lovable baby," teresting couple," "charming and considerate home" are temptingly displayed in fat paragraphs. But the really smart girls, the ones we are after, don't want to bother with us and our husbands.

What then? "Let no woman ever go beyond elementary school"? Of course that wasn't intended as an answer; it was simply a cry of bitterness and anguish from the depths of a harried soul.

May not a beginning of a solution lie in the recognition that the problem is not an individual one but rather widespread social phenomenon deserving of systematic and objective study? We can't change ourselves-we've gone outside the house and won't return if we can help it-not for full-time cooking and dusting, anyway. The women presumably better suited for such work choose not to do it-or at least, not to do it passably well or for any length of time in one place. The only solution, therefore, lies in some modification of the household organization.

One that I should like to see tried would be the organization of a homeservice unit in an apartment house catering to working-mother families. The unit might be headed by a trained executive, a dietician and manager, who would work with the organized mothers. She would employ cooks and cooks' helpers, nursemaids, and others required for her staff, charging each family unit · fixed fee for routine services. Meals could be planned a week ahead, by each mother, on the basis of menus prepared and submitted by the manager. Meals could be sent to each apartment in special containers, either in complete form or subject to such additions as the mother might care to make from her own kitchen. Special table service could be secured by additional fees. And arrangements could be made for someone to come and do the dishes! Whenever the working mother felt like getting meal herself, she would simply notify the main kitchen to that effect.

When one contemplates the savings incident to mass marketing, skilled planning, and large-scale preparation, coupled with more efficient use of labor, it becomes evident that such a service should cost far less than the average expenditures in individual homes for food and service. Here would be a wide and diversified field for highly professionalized houseworkers; qualified home-economics managers could provide the type of training required, and the permanent staff of such a unit would be assured good living conditions, good pay, ample job protection, and standardized hours.

The initiative for such an experiment might come from some ingenious houseowner, from a group of professional women organized especially for this purpose, or from an enterprising home economist. It might open the way to other efforts to meet this new and growing problem in a socially effective man-JESSE SHOHAN

Rhinebeck, N. Y., January 21

The National Service Act

Dear Sirs: I am surprised at your editorial support of the proposed nationalservice act in the face of Mr. Stone's acute analysis of it. I oppose the passage of any national-service act at this time for practical reasons and on principle,

From the practical point of view the proposed national-service act is an uncandid attempt to produce anti-strike legislation that works. If it is unaccompanied by acts equally stringent controlling management, salaries, and profitsacts which the present Congress obviously will not pass-the national-service act would be class legislation pure and simple. By forcing more married women into factory work, the national-service act would serve to magnify the problems of home-keeping and juvenile delinquency. Such an act would also seriously jeopardize the continuation of many valuable public services such as libraries. publishing, and social work, and undoubtedly would have a deleterious effect on all humane and intellectual activities. The preservation of these activities up to now has been one of the encouraging facts of the past two years.

I disapprove of the national-service act on principle because its passage would put us at once in the ranks of the totalitarian nations. It would remove another large sphere of choice from individuals; it would in essence be a surrender on a vast scale to the theory of militarism. We are fighting the war to preserve democracy and to eliminate militarism. Every acceptance of military dictation beyond what is absolutely necessary is therefore a denial of the very ideals we are supposed to be preserving. In the light of the problems which are going to face this country after the war, this surrender at the present time seems to me dangerous in the highest degree.

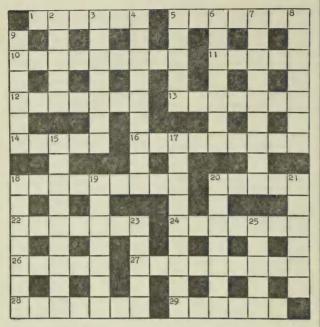

We are past the worst man-power crisis. American production on a voluntary basis has been almost miraculous. To pass a national-service act now would be an insult to the devotion and the hard work of those who have made that production possible; it would be a dangerous surrender to the principle of military direction; it would be unnecessary yielding to the ideals of the totalitarian states.

TALBOT F. HAMLIN

New York, January 25

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 51

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 An opening word
- 5 They are frequently spent in Russia
- 10 Not the main business (two words, 4 and 5)
- 11 A substitute for silk, perhaps
- 12 One idol, to put it differently
- 13 Do well
- 14 A word out of Shakespeare
- 16 Of such as are unable to regain their old form after strain
- 18 What the politician who tells nothing but the truth is likely to become
- 20 Parisian dressmaker whose name stands for value
- 22 Name of several American fishes
- 24 Men used to swear by this in Spenser's day
- 26 "Abou Ben Adhem (may his ----increase!) Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace"
- 27 Birth, sire, provides an American name for one of our allies
- 28 Not dead (anag.)
- 29 The Heavenly Twins

DOWN

- 2 One is far from pleased if off it 3 His book was required reading in
- Germany (two words, 1 and 6)
  4 A Ruhr town with a twisted tail!

- 5 Travelling "sailsmen" (!)
- 6 The answer to all complaints
- 7 His business is picking up
- 8 Here a legislative body I see
- 9 Attendants who come in rushes 15 Pole No. 6 might give something like
- a report! 17 Mr. Barnstaple's role in Wells' "Men
- Like Gods"
- 18 And so, for change, untamed
- 19 Many are busy in the ----- making a past for the future
- 20 Bill declares himself
- 21 "Round trips" to the baseball fan
- 23 Bury
- 25 A churchman receives a letter and turns to a lady novelist

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 50

ACROSS:—1 STEAMER; 5 TORCHON; 9 IMPIOUS; 10 UNICORN; 11 PLATE; 12 DAD; 13 SMILD; 14 RUN WILD; 16 RE-CARRY; 18 MISLEAD; 21 SEXTONS; 24 DOGMA; 20 PAN; 27 ARIEL; 28 SATANIC; 29 PERDITA; 30 ENDLESS; 31 TOWHEAD.

DOWN:-1 SKIPPER: 2 EXPLAIN: 3 MOOSE: 4 RESIDED: 5 THUNDER: 6 RALLS: 7 HOOSIER: 8 NUNNERY: 15 ICE: 17 COX: 18 MODISTE: 19 SIGHTED; 20 DEPICTS: 21 SUN SPOT: 22 ORIFICE; 23 SELF-AID: 3 ANNIE: 27 ARROY

Nelson Not Wellington

Dear Sirs: In my article, Liberated Italy, in The Nation of December 27, I wrote that the Duke of Wellington, high official of the AMG in Sicily, is owner of a large estate at Bronte.

The fact is that the Duke of Wellington was killed last October fighting in Italy and was succeeded in the dukedom by his uncle, Lord Wellesley. It is Lord Wellesley who is now a high official of the AMG in Sicily.

He is not the owner of a large estate at Bronte. This large estate was donated during the Napoleonic wars by the Bourbon king to Lord Nelson, not to the Duke of Wellington. It belongs to Nelson's and not to Wellington's heirs. Thus Lord Wellesley has no personal interest there.

I feel duty-bound to apologize for attributing to the Wellington family an estate which belongs to the Nelson family and for the wrong inference I drew from my error.

G. SALVEMINI
Cambridge, Mass., January 20

CONTRIBUTORS

HAROLD J. LASKI, professor of political science at the London School of Economics, is a leading member of the left wing of the British Labor Party. His books include "Democracy in Crisis," "The Foundation of Sovereignty," "The State in Theory," and, his latest, "Reflections on the Revolution of Our Time."

SELDEN C. MENEFEE is the author of "Assignment: U. S. A."

FRITZ STERNBERG is a German economist now living in New York. He is the author of "Fivefold Aid to Britain" and "From Nazi Sources: Germany's War Chances,"

CHARLES ABRAMS is counsel to the American Federation of Housing Authorities and author of "Revolution in Land."

ERIC RUSSELL BENTLEY teaches cultural history at Black Mountain College, North Carolina. He is the author of "Hero-Worship," a study of Carlyle and Nietzsche, to be published soon.

VOLTA TORREY, until recently, wrote on the technique of practical politics for PM. He is now on the staff of Popular Science.

THE Vation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUMB 158

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · FEBRUARY 19, 1944

NUMBER .

IN THIS ISSUE
THE SHAPE OF THINGS	201
EDITORIALS
Arabian Oil	203
Hell Bent for Inflation	204
The Political Strategy of Invasion
by J. Alvarez del Vayo	205
ARTICLES
Soldiers' Votes and 1944 by Alter Brody	207
50 Years Ago in The Nation	209
The Cartels' Washington Friends by I. F. Stone	210
Legitimism—New Style by Rustem Vambery	211
In the Wind	213
POLITICAL WAR
Second-Front Strategy	214
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus	216
BOOKS AND THE ARTS
Samuel Johnson as Critic by Joseph Wood Krutch	218
Take It from Stowe by Edgar Snow	224
Sir Thomas Beecham by B. H. Haggin	225
The Future of Germany by Keith Hutchison	226
Smaller Than Art by Louis Kronenberger	229
Architects of Young America by Douglas Haskell	231
Grim Diary by F. W. Dupee	232
Wingate in Burma by Marcus Duffield .	233
Drama by Margaret Marshall	235
Records by B. H. Haggin	235
CROSS-WORD PUZZLE No. 52 by Jack Barrett	236

Editor and Publisher FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

HUGO VAN ARX

Washington Editor Literary Editor
L F. STONE MARGARET MARSHALL
Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO
Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL

Assistant Editor M.
J. MITCHELL MORSE B. 1

Music Critic Drama Critic

B. H. HAGGIN JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
LOUIS FISCHER REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Business Manager Advertising Manager

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates. Inc., 65 Fifth Ave., New York 3, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of Sarch 8, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau; 38 Kellogs Building.

The Shape of Things

NO ONE CAN PROVE THAT THE CRISIS AT the Anzio beachhead was responsible for the sudden suspension of Turkey's negotiations with Britain. A dozen factors may have combined to end the hope that Turkey would soon be in the war on the Allied side. But factors that loom large in an hour of adversity diminish when things are going well. No one knows this better than the German strategists. Their reasons for throwing some of their best troops into the fighting around Anzio were political even more than military. And the effect of the German attack will not be lost even if the Allied forces eventually crash through. For the setback suffered by the British and Americans was enough to remind the whole world that the fight for Fortress Europe, scarcely begun, will be bitter and hazardous. As the Germans pushed toward the beachhead, Turkey inevitably weighed with greater caution the benefits and dangers involved in active belligerency. Franco very likely came to the gratifying conclusion that he need not go quite so far in placating the Allies. Hitler's battered satellites in Eastern Europe doubtless realized more clearly that they could not hope for a quick and easy sell-out—à la Badoglio—to a victorious enemy. Thus the secondary political-military effects of the Anzio battle have greatly outweighed its immediate military importance. Hitler is fighting in Italy not for Italy but for Europe.

NOW THAT GENERAL DE GAULLE AND HIS Committee of National Liberation are about to come into their own, we refuse to let even the New York Times spoil the occasion. It is a bit of a jolt all the same to read in its pious editorial columns that the impending recognition of the committee as the provisional government of France is precisely what the Times editors always had in mind, and that "the time has come" for this "next step in the logical evolution of our policy toward France." The Vichy policy and the whole campaign of expediency, it now appears, were tactics designed to achieve this noble purpose, and they have been "brilliantly justified by the results." We hailed Pétain as the George Washington of France and damned De Gaulle's followers only because we could not bring ourselves to the "abandonment of France in the first shock of her fall." The years in which we shored up the petty tyrant Robert in Martinique and blasted the Free French seizure of St. Pierre; in which we sent the traitor Peyrouton to administer Morocco and arrested De Gaullist sailors in the streets of New York-these were years of "watchful waiting." When month after month we and the British forbade De Gaulle to set foot in North Africa, we were merely marking time "until the dissident elements worked out a modus vivendi." Our invitation to Giraud to visit Washington at a time when Churchill and our State Department vied with each other in heaping abuse on De Gaulle through the medium of favored journalists was just one of the ways in which "the strength of General de Gaulle's leadership was being tested." Now that he has passed the Times test, the General is entitled at least to ask his new champions the classic question: "Perhaps it was right to dissemble your love, but why did you kick me downstairs?"

A PRESIDENTIAL VETO OF THE TAX BILL IS not generally expected, but if Mr. Roosevelt signs the measure it will doubtless be because he feels that the government dare not run the risk of losing even the small amount of revenue it provides. The amount at stake, however, is even less than is commonly realized. While the bill provides for an increase in revenues of $2,315,200,000 a year, as against the $16,000,000,000 originally requested, this gain is offset by a loss of $1,400,000,000 through a cancelation of the automatic increase in the social-security tax rate. Moreover, several hundreds of millions will be lost through loopholes provided for corporations in the technical provisions of the bill. And still further millions will in all probability be lost through changes in the provisions governing the renegotiation of war contracts. While the most objectionable of the proposed changes were eliminated from the measure before its final passage, the bill now before the President will hamper the government in its efforts to minimize war profiteering. In contrast, its provisions will place an additional burden on the low-income groups through an elimination of the earned-income credit and a heavy concentration on excise taxes. The indefensible victory tax is retained, with all its shortcomings, even though little additional revenue is produced by reason of its lower exemptions. Since the bill violates all the principles of sound taxation, the President would be justified in risking the loss of a few hundred million dollars of revenue in order to place the issue squarely before the American people by a stinging veto message.

FINLAND HAS ONCE AGAIN BEEN WARNED by Secretary Hull that if it continues in the war it must take the consequences. Authoritative voices in London have declared that it can expect no terms better than unconditional surrender. And from Russia has come the most emphatic reminder of the country's disastrous situation in the shape of bombs falling on Helsinki. Mr. Hull's note, when published after several days' delay, inspired a number of editorials in the Finnish press urging an exploration of the possibilities of peace. Reports from Stockholm, however, suggest that the outlook is regarded by the Finns with extreme pessimism, since the acceptance of any terms from Russia would involve them in conflict with Germany. The Nazis have a vital interest in Finnish nickel, in addition to a military interest in maintaining the 1,000-mile northern front. They still have a number of divisions in the country, and they can also enforce their wishes by their control of food supplies. Thus Finland finds itself in a hopeless impasse; victory has long been out of the question and now even peace is impossible. The only way for the Finns to save something from the wreck would be to come to terms with Moscow and join hands with the Red Army in expelling the Germans. Since this move would be worth a number of divisions to Russia, it might secure greater leniency. But such a policy could only be effected if the Mannerheim-Ryti-Tanner combination which has led Finland into its appalling situation were repudiated. The one encouraging sign is that opposition to the government controlled by these men is growing. On January 22, it avoided defeat in the Riksdag by only two votes. A new government might be headed by Dr. Juho Paasikivi, known to be persona grata in Moscow, whose visit to Stockholm has started a flood of peace rumors.

TIME HAS NOT SERVED TO QUIET THE hornets' nest stirred up by Sidney Hillman's plan to rejuvenate the American Labor Party. On the contrary, the resentment aroused by his proposal to convert the party into a strictly trade-union machine, with Communistic representation, has spread from right-wing A. L. P. circles and created divisions within the C. I. O. itself. The president of one C. I. O. union has openly condemned the Hillman plan, an official of another union has resigned rather than have a hand in the business, and thirty other officers have drafted a statement pledging to support the C. I. O. Political Action Committee nationally but to "fight every attempt of the Communists to capture the A. L. P. in our state." Among those C. I. O. leaders who are nominally backing Mr. Hillman, moreover, several have privately expressed views on his strategy which range from the disgruntled to the bitter. The Political Action Committee has too important a task to perform in the 1944 campaign, and is altogether too worth-while an undertaking, to be burdened with the factional consequences of further mishandling of the New York situation. Mr. Hillman admittedly had a delicate organizational problem on his hands in this state, as Robert Bendiner pointed out in The Nation of January 1, but he has not displayed his customary shrewdness in solving it. The six weeks that remain before the primaries promise to be weeks of bitter disunity for the labor and liberal forces of New York.

X

THE ABUSES IN RAILROAD MANAGEMENT disclosed by Assistant Attorney General Wendell Berge in his testimony before the Kilgore committee will continue to exist so long as the roads continue to be operated by combinations of bankers. Berge dealt principally with the secret agreement by which the roads west of the Mississippi blocked rate reductions, slowed up the introduction of better equipment, and squelched the more progressive minority in their own ranks. The agreement was entered into in 1932 and was "reputedly canceled" after the Department of Justice found out about it in 1943. That an agreement of this kind could be enforced for a decade without the knowledge of the Interstate Commerce Commission indicates how nearly moribund the federal regulatory body has become. Other testimony, dealing with recent railroad accidents, indicates that the ICC's failure to enforce its safety orders and recommendations played a part in recent train wrecks. Four of these wrecks occurred at points where the ICC had previously recommended improved communication and signaling systems. One may also ask whether the Department of Justice will be content merely to discuss these matters before a Senate investigating committee or will take vigorous measures to enforce the anti-trust laws against the railroads. Thurman Arnold tried to do so-and was "kicked upstairs" to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for his pains.

×

ONE WAY TO EASE MAN-POWER PROBLEMS would be to eliminate the general use of 'cost-plus contracts. We are glad to note that a Senate Military Affairs subcommittee under Senator Murray of Montana has begun a special inquiry into these contracts. The investigation has the indorsement of both Donald M. Nelson, chairman of the WPB, and Paul McNutt, chairman of the WMC. In his report on the West Coast man-power situation, Bernard Baruch declared that a shift from costplus contracts "ought to give us the equivalent of an additional labor force running into the tens of thousands, perhaps the hundreds of thousands." Since the government foots the bill under cost-plus there is no incentive to economize on materials, facilities, or labor, and "more workers are hired than are needed." There are undoubtedly many special cases in which cost-plus contracts are necessary: particularly in farming out work to smaller businesses—where they are rarely used. But we feel that the time has passed when cost-plus contracts were generally necessary, and that Congress should enact Senator Ferguson's bill to end this sort of arrangement.

THE ACTION OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE United Service Organizations, Chester I. Barnard, forbidding the YMCA to distribute in USO centers "The Races of Mankind," a pamphlet which presents science's answer to Hitler's dogma of racial superiority, has had encouraging repercussions. First, the army itself bought a substantial number of the pamphlets for use in its educational courses. And now the National C. I. O. War Relief Committee, one of the largest contributors to the USO through the National War Fund, has announced that it will mail copies of the pamphlet to all service men on its mailing list who are stationed in this country. This action was taken after a conference with Mr. Barnard in which the latter reaffirmed his belief that a study of the scientific facts with respect to alleged racial differences was "controversial." No such objection was raised, however, to the distribution by the USO of articles by the eminent social scientist Eddie Rickenbacker.

Arabian Oil

R. ICKES'S plan for government assistance to American oil companies enabling them to exploit their Arabian concessions more extensively is headed for trouble. Some people object to a scheme which promises bonanza profits to the oil companies while the government takes all the risks; many others fear the political implications of a large public investment in a notoriously explosive region; oil interests not cut in on the deal proests it as the opening wedge of socialization. With pressure thus developing from three different directions, a full Congressional investigation appears inevitable.

Such an investigation is in our opinion highly desirable, for whatever the merits of the Arabian development plan, it represents a new departure in American foreign economic policy which ought to be subject to public debate. Nor can any conclusive judgment be formed on the matter until all the facts are spread on the record. At present we know only that the United States government has entered into an agreement in principle with the Arabian American Oil Corporation (jointly owned by Standard Oil of California and the Texas Corporation) and the Gulf Exploration Company to build a pipe-line from their oilfields on the western shores of the Persian Gulf to a Mediterranean port. This pipe-line is to be constructed, owned, and maintained by the Petroleum Reserves Corporation, of which Mr. Ickes is chairman. Charges for its use are to include, in addition to operation and maintenance costs, an amount sufficient to amortize the entire investment in twenty-five years, together with interest charges and a net return to the government to be fixed later. The companies agree to maintain a billion-barrel reserve to be available over a fifty-year period to the United States government for military or naval use at a price 25 per cent below the market.

Obviously, an agreement of this kind can only become operative subject to a number of other agreements or treaties. In the first place, there must be an agreement with Saudi Arabia, across whose broad deserts the pipeline will be laid for most of its length. If its terminus is Haifa, it will also cross Transjordania and Palestine, and agreements will be necessary with the governments of these two British Mandates. An alternative possibility is that it will reach tidewater at Alexandria, in which case the approval of the Egyptian government must be obtained. Again Gulf Oil shares its concession in Kuwait with Anglo-Iranian Oil, in which the British government holds the majority of the stock. Past experience indicates that this concern will look for a marketing agreement before it signs up.

All these agreements are dependent on the blessing of the British government, which dominates the Near East politically and economically. No doubt that blessing can be obtained; but on what terms? Presumably the British will want to guard their own extensive oil interests in the region from uneconomic competition. Still more, they are likely to look for support in their task of "policing" this area, According to the New York Times oil specialist, J. H. Carmical, these problems were under discussion at the Cairo and Teheran conferences, and progress was made toward a general understanding which would include Russia, with its own large stake in oil. Between them the three great powers control some 95 per cent of the world's petroleum supplies, and it is suggested that this control could be used as an instrument to curb aggression. Such a plan fits in, of course, with the idea of an American-Russian-British political cartel, but one wonders how it is supposed to jibe with the broader conception of international organization indorsed by the Moscow conference.

The reason given for American government intervention in the Arabian oil situation is, however, the danger that our domestic supplies will be exhausted within a comparatively few years. Output at the present time is in excess of additions to proved reserves, and some oil men believe that in ten years this country will be a net importer of petroleum products instead of the leading exporter. This may be so, but last time we had an oil scare, in 1922, proved reserves stood at five billion barrels; today they are twenty billion. Moreover, if we do need to import oil we can get it from Latin America, where United States interests are strongly intrenched.

The real difficulty which might arise would be in supplying the huge American distributive system in Europe, and this is why Mr. Ickes's pipe-line will be so valuable to the major companies it will service. But is this a good enough reason for the United States to underwrite the financial and political risks involved? Mr.

Ickes's original idea was for the government to acquire a large minority interest in the companies and a voice in their management. The oil men, however, resisted this proposal stubbornly and successfully. For our part, we think that if national interest demands an American stake in Arabian oil, then the government should emulate that well-known socialist Winston Churchill, who in 1914 secured control of the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company for the British Treasury.

Hell Bent for Inflation

THE long-drawn-out struggle to prevent an inflationary upset in this war comparable to that suffered in World War I has reached its climax as a result of the Senate's passage of the bill banning further use of food subsidies to hold down the cost of living. Without question the President will veto the bill, as he did a similar measure last summer. But this time there is grave danger that a coalition of irresponsible and economically illiterate and Southern Democrats will succeed in passing the bill over the President's veto.

Incredible though it may seem to anyone with even a high-school knowledge of economics, the opponents of subsidies keep referring to them as "inflationary" and keep insisting that the only way for a farmer to get a fair return for his work is through an increase in price that is passed on to the consumer. It is perfectly true that the payment of subsidies to assure a fair return to some producers or distributors is more "inflationary" than squeezing them by a rigid effort to hold-the-line on prices without any adjustment whatsoever. But this latter alternative is not what the opponents of subsidies want. They would pay the producers and middlemen as much as or more than would be paid in subsidies but would pass the entire cost on to the consumer in the form of higher prices. They close their eyes to the fact that this would bring an immediate and irresistible demand for increased wages, giving the sharpest twist yet to the inflationary spiral. In contrast, subsidies must be paid out of taxes, which, because they can be levied on the basis of capacity to pay, are deflationary in effect.

Unfortunately, organized labor, which represents more of the country's consumers than any other group, has been so hypnotized by the inflationary mirage as to be practically useless at the crucial stage of the subsidy fight. Although both the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. have repeatedly gone on record as favoring subsidies, doubt has been cast on the sincerity of their pleas for a maintenance of the stabilization program by their simultaneous campaign for an upward revision of the Little Steel formula. And their case has been further injured by the ill-timed release of a highly partisan report purporting to show that the cost of living has risen 43½ per cent since January, 1941, instead of the 23½ per cent indicated by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Although a certain amount of concealed inflation has undoubtedly taken place, chiefly through deterioration in quality, the report of the labor representatives on the President's Committee on the Cost of Living contains glaring discrepancies which make it useless as a scientific document.

Labor's drive for a revision of the Little Steel formula is untimely, not only because it serves to reinforce the attack on the Administration's anti-inflation program, but because it comes at a moment when, for the first time during the war, prices have been effectively stabilized for a protracted period. The cost of living is actually lower today than it was last May, and there is every reason to believe that the present price-wage line can continue to be held by the Administration if it is not upset by political pressures such as those now being brought to bear. The importance of this achievement is not generally understood throughout the country. Yet one only has to compare the behavior of prices in this war with that in World War I to grasp its significance. By December, 1918, after four and a quarter years of war, the cost-of-living index had advanced more than 60 per cent; in the corresponding period of this war the advance was approximately 25 per cent. And in contrast to the decline in the cost-of-living index in the past eight months, the inflationary spiral of World War I continued unchecked throughout the war and for many months after its close.

Although both farmers and war workers gained temporarily in the early stages of the inflation of World War I, both groups suffered acutely in its latter stages and in the readjustment period that followed. If memories were not so short, these groups would be in the forefront of the struggle to hold the line and prevent a repetition of the disaster of 1919-20.

The Political Strategy of Invasion

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

THE dominant impression among high army officers in Washington is that the war would advance more rapidly toward a victorious conclusion if the military offensive were accompanied by a more aggressive political plan," reported the Associated Press the other day. Three years of warfare and the crisis at the bridgehead of Anzio were necessary before such a statement from such a source could appear in the American press.

Never has a war been more essentially political than this one. Never has a war been waged with greater poverty of political imagination and insight. Political propaganda has been deliberately eliminated from the army, and the efficiency of agencies in charge of propaganda and psychological warfare has been impaired from the beginning by the absence of a clear democratic line. An entirely erroneous conception of the problem of building morale made it possible on February 9 for the evening papers to print enormous headlines about the assault on a hill near Cassino, implying that all was well in Italy, on the very day when Allied troops were pressed back on the Rome front.

The confusion which this lack of a coherent political policy has created is so great that it has victimized some of the most intelligent people. Only a year ago many liberals reproached The Nation for its attitude on the French issue—the same attitude now obviously about to be adopted as the official policy of the government. For this lack of a political conception of the war and for lack of the courage to wage it as a war against fascism, we are now paying. Two years of 50 per cent expediency and 50 per cent reaction are bearing fruit. (For the gigantic blunder of Munich we paid with the Second World War.)

The effects are clear on every hand. Responsible Americans who have recently visited many parts of the country report growing dissatisfaction and anxiety. With half the road behind them, people are asking themselves to what destination they are marching, and whether the sacrifices demanded of them will be justified. Two years ago it seemed scandalous to speak of World War III. I remember the shocked reaction which greeted an article I wrote under that title in The Nation. Today World War III has become a commonplace topic of discussion.

As regards relations among the United Nations, the outlook is no less dismal. The very phrase "United Nations" has begun to sound like a mockery. General distrust darkens the horizon. Anti-British propaganda and anti-Russian propaganda find an increasingly receptive atmosphere.

Actually it was utopian to hope for unity among the Allies in view of the methods applied to the direction of the war. The first requisites for real unity were approximate equality in sacrifice and at least minimum agreement as to aims. The beginning of 1943 was the propitious moment for the creation of that council of the United Nations of which Sumner Welles spoke in an article in the New York Herald Tribune on February 9. "An Executive Council of the United Nations," he said, "was never more necessary than it is today."

At the beginning of 1943 there was comparative equilibrium among the forces of the Allied coalition. The Russians had proved their capacity at Stalingrad. No one with a sense of realism could long think that the war on the eastern front would result in a reciprocal weakening of Germany and Russia—a hope on which the little Metternichs had based their plans for an automatic balance of power. Then was the time for British and American diplomacy to lay down a grand United Nations strategy. That would, of course, have necessitated the sacrifice of expediency, the renunciation of the old "legitimacies" in Europe, and an end of the practice of supporting the most reactionary elements in the various political emigrations and free movements. It would have been necessary, in other words, to consider the war in relation to tomorrow, and not as a magic expedient for saving the wretched system of 1939.

When the conference of Teheran finally took place, the disequilibrium within the Allied coalition was too far advanced to be overlooked. For the first time the Wehrmacht had been beaten. The Soviet army had accomplished that in the summer of 1943. The second front, which the Soviet government had been impatiently demanding for a year and which was in itself one of the weights on the Allied scales, had lost part of its meaning for the Russians. They no longer needed a second front as a protection against defeat. Their hour of anxiety was over. Alone they had successfully dealt with the danger of defeat by a ceaseless offensive, by fighting day and night, in good weather and in bad, mud or no mud, without counting casualties, knowing well that that was the only way to beat an enemy like the Nazis.

Of course, they continued to be interested in the second front, but rather as a means to hasten the end of the war and to safeguard themselves against the unjust possibility that at the armistice Russia would be the only one among the Allied nations to count its dead by the millions. The balance had tipped decisively in favor of the Russians. One fact is enough to prove it: the meetings with the British and American leaders had to take place at Moscow and at Teheran.

But like other problems of this war, the problem of the second front is not a purely military one. Particularly in the present stage of the conflict it is a political problem as well. Let us assume that the American and British armies succeed in establishing a solid front in the west, with no danger of being thrown back into the sea. Two possibilities will then be open to the enemy. He may do what the Russians have always hoped the second front would oblige him to do: withdraw a substantial part of his army from the east and launch it against the Americans and British. The major weight of the struggle, in that case, would be transferred to the west. The Anglo-American armies would fight along the periphery of Fortress Europe while the Russians, relieved of the presence of fifty or sixty Nazi divisions, could forcibly push their way across the German frontier. This would mean two things: heavy casualties for the British and Americans, and the arrival of the Russians in Germany ahead of their allies. Knowing the dread which both possibilities inspire in certain circles in London and Washington, the German General Staff might well decide that such tactics offer the best hope of frightening the Western powers into a negotiated peace.

But that same knowledge might also lead the German command to a different conclusion; it might decide to offer the Allies the benefits of a bloodless invasion. Instead of concentrating on smashing the Allied armies in the west, the Germans might leave the bulk of their forces on the Russian front. Under such circumstances, the American and British armies could advance with comparatively small losses and reach Germany while the German troops were still engaging the Russians beyond the eastern frontier.

In a word, Hitler, sure of defeat, might well consider negotiating that defeat, selling it to the party which would pay the better price. Such a possibility would, of course, not even be worth discussing if unity among the United Nations were a reality, if a council of the United Nations existed, based, not upon formal declarations, but upon a clear, democratic agreement for the conduct of the war and the organization of the peace. As long as the Germans see Allied disunity increasing, the incentive for such maneuvers must increase correspondingly.

But the second front is full of political implications for the Allies too. As the article from the London Tribune, printed on page 214, points out, the second front implies collaboration with the underground. Unfortunately the importance of the underground, although acknowledged in public addresses, has never been recognized in action. The movement of resistance has never been looked upon as the basis upon which the Europe of tomorrow must rise. Many factors have contributed to the lack of a positive policy in dealing with the underground, but the chief one has been the fear that if the peoples were armed, dreams of reestablishing the prewar Europe would be shattered. Every European leader in this country who has to deal with the problems of the underground has come to the same conclusion: In spite of goodwill and intelligent understanding among individual members of the various agencies of political warfare, the lack of a policy on the part of the governments has prevented any effective use of the anti-fascist forces of the Continent. Even the overpowering desire to save American and British lives has failed to convince the highest Allied authorities that the only alternative to heavy casualties-unless the Germans deliberately withdraw—is the arming of the underground.

The result is what we see today—division among the United Nations and bitterness in the ranks of the democratic fighters of Europe. Even as we write these lines comes the scandalous news of the delivery to Badoglio of the liberated areas of Italy. We ask ourselves whether this is the "more aggressive political plan" demanded by those high army officers whose views are reported at the beginning of this article.

Soldiers' Votes and 1944

BY ALTER BRODY

THE bitter, cunning, and hitherto successful campaign of the Republican Party to disfranchise in the name of "constitutionalism" the men who are giving their lives to defend our Constitution has overreached itself. The Senate, frightened by public indignation at the brazen performance of the House in passing the Eastland-Rankin "states' rights" bill, has reversed itself and turned out an amended version of the Green-Lucas federal-ballot plan. This will now go into committee with the House "states' rights" bill, and perhaps a compromise will emerge which will make it possible for 50 per cent of the soldiers to vote instead of the less than 1 per cent that voted in the "states' rights" election of 1942 or the possible 95 per cent which could have voted under the original Green-Lucas bill. The President would probably sign a half-a-loaf measure, but he could still take the issue to the families of 11,000,000 service men. However, the soldier-vote battle, regardless of its outcome, has already accomplished one useful thing. It has torn off the pretense of non-partisanship from one of the most partisan fights in American political history.

The soldier-vote issue is a partisan issue, and the attempt to deny it is hypocrisy on the part of the Republicans as it is stupidity on the part of the Democrats. The right of the soldiers to vote should never have become a partisan question. But the denial of that right has been the skeleton at the victory feasts which the Republicans have been celebrating since 1940 and at the political wakes which the Democrats have held during the same period. The Republican National Committee, with the efficient research departments of big business at its disposal, has been well aware of the effect of the draft on its political fortunes, though it has shrewdly concealed its knowledge. Only the Democratic National Committee, under the Farley-Walker dynasty of graduate wardheelers, has appeared unaware of what was happening. As a result, from the day conscription was put into effect the Republicans have been going from victory to victory, pretending that their success has been due to a revolt against the Administration. And since the Democratic machine was in large part similarly hostile to its national leaders, it ended by accepting the Republican propaganda. If they had taken the trouble to analyze recent registration and election figures in New York, the Farleys and Walkers could long ago have discovered the secret of Republican success.

It is well known that a Democratic victory in New York State depends upon the vote in New York City.

The city, overwhelmingly Democratic, must pile up a big enough majority to overcome the Republican upstate majority. That is why New York State was normally Republican before the twenties: New York City had not yet achieved a majority of the state's population. This point was reached in 1910, but for some time the large number of foreign-born in the city delayed the translation of the population majority into a voting majority. With the passage of the restrictive immigration laws of 1921 and the gradual naturalization of the non-citizens, the mounting registration figures of New York City began to be translated into a succession of Democratic state victories which was not interrupted till Dewey's election in 1942.

An analysis of recent election figures shows how rapidly New York City's percentage of the state's registration was mounting before 1941. In 1932 the city registration was 2,338,000 out of a state total of 5,350,000, or 43 per cent. By 1940 city registration rose to 3,388,000 out of a state total of 6,968,000, or 49 per cent. Since a higher percentage of registered voters turn out in the city on Election Day, New York City finally achieved a clear majority of 51 per cent in the 1940 elections. Under normal circumstances this majority would not only have been permanent but have steadily increased until the city's registration percentage corresponded to its population percentage, namely, about 55 per cent.

The war radically altered this trend in two related ways. First, since the city had relatively few war industries, many workers and their families migrated to other parts of the country to take war jobs. Second, though the figures have never been released by the War Department, it is well known that a higher percentage of men has been drafted from the city, which has a greater proportion of non-essential, non-deferable jobs in its industries. In consequence, the city's population has dropped from about 7,500,000, as reported in the 1940 census, to about 6,600,000, according to applications for Ration Book 4, a fairly reliable index. No such drop has taken place upstate, where war-essential agriculture and war-essential industries have combined to keep down both the number of men lost by migration and the number taken by the army. According to statements by Governor Dewey and Mayor LaGuardia, only 300,000 men from upstate have been drafted as compared with 700,000 from New York City. These facts were unmistakably manifest in the 1943 city and state registration figures.

Registration always drops in off-year elections, but the ratio of city to state remains substantially the same. Last fall upstate registration dropped from the 3,580,000 of 1940 to 2,915,000, city registration from 3,388,000 to 1,750,000. In other words, the city vote decreased from 49 per cent to 37 per cent of the total, whereas the upstate share rose from the narrow margin of 51 per cent to 63 per cent—a huge differential. Thus registration week revealed that a Democratic defeat was inevitable. Contrary to the general impression, the election marked no decline in the pro-New Deal percentage of the city's vote, but only a decline in the city's percentage of the state total. This meant that though Republican William, polling 39 per cent, for the New York City vote, lost the state in 1940, Republican Hanley, polling 39 per cent, could win in 1943.

Republican victories in other parts of the country in the elections of 1942 and 1943 can be explained in much the same way as Republican success in New York State. We have seen that in New York the distribution of essential industries combined with the draft sent a disproportionately high percentage of Democrats to training camps and war-boom towns far from their voting precincts and at the same time kept a disproportionately high percentage of Republicans at home, within easy reach of their ballot boxes. More or less the same conditions have prevailed throughout the nation.

The high percentage of Democrats in our hitherto disfranchised army is accounted for by two factors, neither of which has anything to do with the Democratic Commander-in-Chief, as Republicans pretend. The first is the average age of service men. According to Dr. Gallup, "all Institute studies of recent years found that voters who are under thirty are predominantly Democratic in their political sentiments." The second is more complex, but it stems largely from the fact that the machinery of draft deferment heavily favors agriculture as opposed to industry. According to a recent statement by General Hershey, there have been 3,400,000 deferments on occupational grounds. Of these, 1,800,000 have been in agriculture and 1,600,000 in industry. In addition, of 5,000,000 pre-Pearl Harbor fathers to be called in 1944, 1,000,000 are to be deferred in agriculture and 1,000,000 in industry. When we consider that there are 45,000,000 people engaged in industry and 12,000,000 in agriculture in the United States, the effect of these deferment figures becomes apparent. A farmer has about four times as much chance of deferment as a city worker.

This fact has had a strategic influence on recent elections. In the Solid South, where both the rural and the urban population are Democratic, agricultural deferment has had no influence on the vote. But north of the Mason and Dixon Line, where national elections are decided, the rural vote is predominantly Republican and the urban vote predominantly Democratic. According to Gallup Institute studies, from 1932 to 1940 the Republicans failed to carry a single Northern city of over 500,000 inhabitants and carried only two cities between 250,000 and 500,000. The deferment of 25 per cent of the farmers and of only 6 per cent of the industrial workers will therefore markedly affect the political balance of power.

If the vast majority of service men by reason of age and occupation were Democrats before they were drafted, their political attitude has undergone no change since they donned the uniform, according to the findings of a recent Gallup poll. Unfortunately this poll deliberately excluded the 25 per cent of service men who are from the South, on the ground that their voting preference would have no influence on the election results. Excluding these traditional Democrats, the poll shows that 61 per cent of the service men from the rest of the country are Democratic in their political preferences. If we assume that 80 per cent of Southern service men are Democrats, the national average is brought to about 66 per cent.

Taken in conjunction with another Gallup poll of civilian political alignments, this analysis of the political preferences of the soldiers throws considerable light both on Republican victories in 1942 and 1943 and on Republican chances in 1944. According to the Gallup figures, 52 per cent of the probable 40,000,000 civilian voters are Democratic and 48 per cent Republican. Because of the concentration of Democratic strength in the South, 52 per cent does not constitute a safe national electoral majority for the Democratic Party, though it would for the Republicans. But combine the 66 per cent of Democratic service men—out of a possible soldier vote of 10,000,000—with the civilian Democrats and you get a remarkable statistical phenomenon. The soldier and civilian vote today, taken together, shows about the same numerical and percentage division between parties as was represented in the Roosevelt victory of 1940. The respective figures are 27,400,000 and 22,600,000-a Democratic majority of some 5,000,000, as in 1940.

The soldier Democrats are not the only Democrats whose disfranchisement contributed to the Republican victories in 1942 and 1943. The Gallup Institute mentions also "a group estimated at five to ten millions who have shifted their place of work because of war-time conditions and who for the most part failed to vote either because of ineligibility or because they did not take advantage of absentee balloting. In this group . . . Democrats overwhelmingly predominate."

After the second series of Democratic defeats in 1943, James A. Farley, former chairman of the Democratic National Committee, echoed the Republican propaganda that "the voters were tired of being pushed around," and Frank C. Walker, who was chairman at the time, expressed the pious hope that perhaps the voters would change their minds by 1944. But the Republicans were well aware of the real reasons for their "victory," and when the Lucas-Green soldier-vote bill came up in the Senate they decided that it had to be defeated.

Throughout last November amendment after amendment was offered by the Republican foes of the bill in an effort to split its Democratic support. All these amendments, including one offered by its arch-foe, Senator Taft, were accepted and incorporated in the bill. But in the cloakrooms the Republicans were conniving with Southern poll-tax reactionaries for a flank attack that would defeat it. A minority of the Democratic Senators, mainly from the poll-tax states, joined a majority of the Republican Senators to pass the fraudulent Eastland-Rankin states' rights bill, which nullifies the purposes of the Green-Lucas bill. A majority of the Democratic Senators and a minority of the Republicans opposed it.

On February 3, by the use of similar methods, the Eastland-Rankin bill was passed in the House. Despite the attempt of the Republican Party to hide behind its Southern poll-tax allies, the New York Times, which has been consistently sniping at the Administration, commented editorially on the partisan character of the fight:

The federal plan was defeated not because of the Southern votes, a majority of which would have approved it, but because of Republican votes. . . The record shows that 69 Southern votes were cast in favor of the federal plan and 62 in favor of the states' rights plan. . . . Of a total of 193 Republicans, only 18 supported the federal plan as opposed to 175 supporting the states' rights plan.

Clearly, for the Republicans, the decisive factor in the whole affair was their fear that a majority of the soldier vote would go to the President.

In the heat of the soldier-vote battle Walter Lippmann exposed the secret recipe for Republican victory in 1944:

The Republicans have allied themselves with the farm organizations. . . Their calculation is that they can take for granted the bulk of employers, that labor may be divided by the factionalism of men like Lewis or be in part disfranchised by change of residence or by being in the armed forces (italics mine).

The effort to disfranchise the soldiers is an attempt to prevent Democrats from voting. It is an attempt by one party to win political power by disfranchising its political opponents.

Discussion of Democratic strategy in other fields is beyond the scope of this article, but the soldier-vote issue, which Republican greed has thrown into the hands of the Democrats, can be converted into an immense political asset. The twelve million veterans of this war will be a far greater political force than the four million veterans of the last war, not only because of their greater number but because of the more dynamic character of the period. These men are at present predominantly progressive in their political outlook. But there is always the danger that, like the veterans of other periods and other countries, they will be exploited after the war by reactionary demagogues for purposes of their own. Fortunately, the reactionary elements in Congress now stand exposed as the very ones who, largely in the Republican camp, are bitterly opposing the soldier-vote bill.

The present cleavage of interest between the reactionary forces of America and our soldiers can be dramatized by the soldier-vote issue. Whatever the outcome of the present fight in Congress, the Republican record on the bill should be made a major issue of the Presidential election

50 Years Ago in "The Nation"

A LTHOUGH we cannot predict what will be the results of King Milan's sudden and theatrical return to Servia, it is safe to say that they are not likely to be for the good of the country or the peace of Europe.—February 1, 1894.

TO THE EDITOR of The Nation: . . . It seems to me that the time is already quite ripe to begin to take action in our several states concerning a form of advertisement from which America suffers as no other country ever has been or ever will be cursed. I refer to the medical advertisements in our newspapers. . . . We find every alternate column beginning with a "scare-head" that suggests momentous news, and we presently discover, coordinated with perhaps change of ministry in England, the annexation of Hawaii, or the passage of a tariff bill, accounts of Mr. Mingo's kidneys, Mr. Hawkshaw's bronchi, or Mrs. Hecla's skin-on which the grotesque pictures of the sufferers set the seal. Like Ulysses, these worthies have become a part of all that we have met; and all experience is an arch wherethrough their entrails gleam as it were iridescently upon us, until the world looms to our imagination in a sort of catarrhal vapor, or as if bathed in a cancerous and haemorrhoidal mist. . . . I returned home last September . . . and I remember that the first sight I got of the Boston Herald on the steamer wharf made me involuntarily jerk back my head and catch my breath, as if a bucket of slops had suddenly been thrown into my face. - WILLIAM JAMES, February 1, 1894.

BESIDES THE USUAL QUOTA of dialectical fiction, the Century contains . . . the vigorously sketched tale of "Pudd'nhead Wilson," genuinely and solidly American in subject and treatment.—February 8, 1894.

MR. GLADSTONE HAS AGAIN disposed of the report that he was about to retire from office immediately. He has returned to London in improved health.—February 15, 1894.

THE QUESTION WHETHER the game of football ought to be encouraged was discussed in Philadelphia last week by two college professors—Woodrow Wilson of Princeton, who took the affirmative, and Burt G. Wilder of Cornell, in the negative.—February 22, 1894.

210 The NATION

The Cartels' Washington Friends

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, February 11

AST week I said I would tackle the task of naming some of the men and influences in Washington "which already make it seem an almost hopeless task to achieve full employment after the war and to prevent revival of the cartel system." Here goes:

Jesse Jones. One of the best ways to maintain free enterprise after the war and to prevent further hardening of our economic arteries would be to use government-owned war plants as publicly operated yardsticks, TVA style, in basic industries. This is the only good weapon we have against cartelization; anti-trust prosecution is a Sisyphean task resulting at best in flea-bite penalties.

On paper, we are in an excellent position to carry out such a policy. We have built some 2,600 plants for war purposes; the investment in them is variously estimated at from $16 billion to $20 billion. These governmentfinanced facilities include nearly all our synthetic-rubber and high-octane-gas plants, 92 per cent of our magnesium, 90 per cent of our aircraft plants, more than 50 per cent of our aluminum capacity, 50 per cent of our machine-tool capacity, and about 10 per cent of our steel. The RFC through the Defense Plant Corporation holds title to the bulk of these-1,753 in all. As Jesse Jones indicated in his speech before the New York Board of Trade last October, these include 534 aircraft plants, 164 iron-and-steel plants, 116 plants for the manufacture of machine tools, 98 plants for radio and similar equipment, 84 aluminum plants, 65 plants for ships and ship engines, 60 mining and smelter plants, 60 plants for synthetic rubber and its components, 35 plants for aviation gas, 6 pipe-lines for petroleum. This is far from a complete list.

A mere enumeration of products by no means indicates the full possibilities. The butadiene plants in the synthetic-rubber program provide the basis for infinite developments in plastics; the government's machine-tool capacity is a sleeping, and probably will soon be a chloroformed, giant, capable of spawning huge and multifarious industries. In socialist America what wealth, comfort, and happiness for all could be drawn from these resources!

Here I plead only for a "mixed" system, for the operation of enough of this capacity on a "yardstick" basis to prevent renewed restriction of production and the fixing of uneconomic prices. Such a policy was advocated by the National Resources Planning Board; the NRPB has been abolished. The war plants are largely in the hands of Jesse Jones, and Jones is unlikely to permit their use for any such purpose—and would be back in Houston in a twinkling if he tried.

The trend of policy is to get rid of these plants as rapidly as possible, and there is little chance of an antimonopolistic policy in disposing of them. Jones's policy in the RFC has been inimical to independent enterprise, helpful to monopoly. He will sell most war plants to their present operators; the majority of these are monopolistic and will emerge well fattened from the war. Standard Oil, Alcoa, and du Pont, our leading carteleers, and their allies will be in a stronger position than ever to dominate domestic and world markets. A huge portion of our war-plant facilities will go directly or indirectly to these three concerns.

Leo T. Crowley. Another small-town banker taken into the big time. As Alien Property Custodian, Crowley has his hands on a second great instrument for the preservation of free enterprise—in a real sense—and the prevention of a cartel system after the war. The alien patents and properties under his control were the heart of monopolies in chemicals, pharmaceuticals, dyestuffs, photographic materials, magnesium, and a long list of highly important industrial components and products. The policies he is pursuing will help keep these monopolies intact or make them stronger than ever.

Crowley boasts that he is making alien patents freely available to American business. But he makes two kinds of exceptions, and these are broad enough to permit maintenance and revival of the cartel system. He makes an exception when an American concern already has an exclusive license under an alien patent; such patents will not be available except under very special circumstances. But exclusive licenses of this kind are one of the basic cartel devices, and it is no secret that many American companies deliberately took out licenses under worthless German patents to give them a legal weapon against competitors at home and abroad. The second exception is in the case of patents used in the operations of a business taken over by the Alien Property Custodian. This means that a concern like General Aniline and Film, the principal German property in the United States and the foundation of Germany's imperial power in North and South American pharmaceuticals, chemicals, and other materials, continues in possession of these basic monopolistic devices.

Crowley is still drawing $75,000 a year as chairman and president of Standard Gas and Electric. He obtained that job from Victor Emanuel, president of Standard Power and Light, which controls Standard Gas. Emanuel himself came to power in Standard Gas and in Aviation Corporation, our most important holding company in aircraft and shipbuilding, with the financial backing of the Anglo-German banking house of J. Henry Schroder. The Schroder firms of London and New York are linked by family ties with the Schröder Brothers bank of Hamburg and by business ties with the Stein bank of Cologne. A leading partner in the latter is the Baron Kurt von Schröder who was the go-between in Hitler's negotiations with the Rhineland industrialists.

The Schroder bank in London was a member of the notoriously pro-Nazi Anglo-German Fellowship. In March, 1938, the London bank formed a company to finance the export of basic materials to the Reich. A year previously the Schroder bank in New York subscribed $300,000 to set up a corporation to facilitate barter of German products for American cotton.

Next to the Schroders, the most important banking interest in Standard Gas before the war was Chase National. No two banks in New York had more dealings with Nazi concerns and cartels than Chase National and the J. Henry Schroder Banking Corporation. I think it inexcusable that the Alien Property Custodian should be receiving $75,000 a year from Standard Gas, in view of the conflicting interests in which this double position might possibly involve him. Add the fact that Crowley is now head of the Foreign Economic Administration, and has actively furthered General Aniline interests in Latin America, and you have a situation that hardly promises to weaken the great cartels after the war.

Nelson, Byrnes, Baruch. I only have a line left for these dominant figures in the reconversion of industry. Their policies, whatever their intentions, move in the direction of giving big business the inside track on reconversion. I hope to return to this subject again soon, but I think I have indicated how powerfully intrenched are the forces which make for great monopolies after the war and for the revival of cartels.

Legitimism—New Style

BY RUSTEM VAMBERY

T THE risk of writing what is commonly called "philosophy" instead of an analysis of political "facts," I venture to quote an aphorism coined by a Hungarian professor of jurisprudence. Professor Plósz said: "A theory which cannot be put into practice is a bad theory, and a practice which has no foundation in theory is a bad practice." This method of appraisal can be applied to political institutions as well, notwithstanding Pope's familiar dictum: "For forms of government let fools contest." However, it is not contesting the relative merits of various forms of government to attempt to clarify what they really mean both in theory and in practice.

A current mistake which blurs the political vision is the assumption that republic is the correlative of democracy, while monarchy means an authoritarian or at least an aristocratic form of government. Coins of Napoleon bore the inscription "République Française, Napoléon Empereur," as, indeed, since the sixteenth century the English equivalent of the Latin respublica had been used in its signification of a commonwealth or state even if the state was ruled by an absolute monarch. Since Francis Lieber baptized England a "Royal Republic," or rather since the English "Glorious Revolution," monarchy has lost the right to be contrasted with republicanism; still more so since the First World War, as a result of which no one any longer denies that the popular will is the legal base of all politics and not even monarchists seek to justify monarchy with transcendental arguments. To some persons it has seemed that republican sentiment has thereby lost both its opponents and its significance. Professor Rohden, for example, wrote in the "Encyclopedia of Social Sciences" that the struggle between the divine right of kings and popular sovereignty having come to an end, the choice between the monarchical and the republican form of government resolves itself into the question which is more opportune.

Recent events scarcely confirm this optimism. On the contrary, the unwelcome results in some countries of postwar revolutions which created republics without republicans have disproved Rohden's thesis and revived the old controversy. Persons who are anxious to shun "revolution and chaos" seem to pin their hopes on legitimism just as their predecessors did at the time of the Holy Alliance, which, however, in spite of Metternich's genius was unable to prevent the European uprisings in 1830 and 1848. It is of course unreasonable to attribute intrinsic value to one or another form of government. Only blindfold praisers of times past believe monarchy to be the penicillin of politics, the miracle drug which can instantly heal both the wounds in the body politic inflicted by the war and the internal ailments that preceded and resulted in the war. No unbiased observer of history needs to be told that neither monarchy nor republic is a panacea, or that checking the outburst of an overdue revolution does not remove its causes.

A priori, the maintenance or the restoration of a monarchy, in particular of a legitimist monarchy with venerable historical tradition, is supposed to have a stabilizing effect on the social structure when its balance is threatened by the aftermath of war. But the steadying influence of a monarchy largely depends on the kind of tradition it continues and the moral power it exercises. Lord Bryce classified states as "flexible" or "rigid," and the value of their tradition varies accordingly. It was its flexibility which allowed Great Britain to develop from an oligarchy, first into a middle-class regime, then gradually, by extension of the franchise and limitation of the veto power of the House of Lords, into a democracy. These constitutional changes became traditional, and the dynasty reigning theoretically by the grace of God, in fact by a parliamentary title, conformed to this tradition. Combining the dignity of the crown with a strong sense of duty, the King of England personifies both national consciousness and sympathetic human feelings. British legitimism rests on a pliable tradition. It is perhaps an overstatement to call the case of the British monarchy unique, as the "Encyclopedia Britannica" does, but it certainly presents a shining contrast to monarchies based upon a right superior to the people's will.

Legitimate authority is no doubt a safeguard of law and peace, provided it lives up to the tradition which both law and legitimism express. There is, however, another proviso: the tradition must not collide with the development of public opinion in the community or with social progress. Whether our age will be in fact the Century of the Common Man may be doubtful, but it is unlikely to become the century of a privileged class, a clique, or a court camarilla, one or the other of which was the foundation of legitimism in bygone times. Even dictatorships have to be more democratic today than were the Oriental despotisms of the past. It is true, they have set back the clock of history, but only blind worshipers of authority can expect that the clock will be put right by replacing the dictators by those monarchs whose cracked divine authority the dictators impersonated. No one can foresee what social structure or what public opinion will emerge in the post-war period, but it is improbable that the enslaved nations will exchange their predicament for a self-imposed slavery or substitute the Weltanschauung of an out-of-date aristocracy for the ever-widening sphere of public opinion.

If we examine, for example, the tradition of the claimants to the Austrian, the Hungarian, and the Spanish throne, it appears that the Hapsburg and Bourbon dynasties were always, to put it mildly, intensely conservative. For seven centuries, as A. J. P. Taylor has said, "the Hapsburg lands were a collection of entailed estates," based since Maria Theresa on a centralized bureaucratic system and an authority in which "the obstinate, unenlightened Hapsburg nature reasserted itself" after the interlude of Joseph II, the "people's emperor." Medieval Spanish etiquette was as traditional to the Hapsburg court as the use of the Austrian aristocracy and the Hungarian squirearchy in support of this tradition. No one can accuse Sir Charles Petrie of bias against the Hapsburgs, whom he considers far superior to the British dynasty, but it was their misfortune, he wrote, "that circumstances made them the object of attack when the French Revolution spread the virus of nationalism and democracy throughout Europe" ["Monarchy," London, 1933]. Conservative, feudal, and Catholic elements being their historical support, the Hapsburgs had to protect themselves against the "virus" of nationalism and democracy; a national, democratic dynasty would have had no raison d'être in a multilingual, semi-feudal empire.

Renouncing the tradition of his ancestors, the pretender to their throne, Archduke Otto, spoke recently of his aim to transform Hungary into a democratic state of peasants and workers. A century ago one of the Archduke's distant relatives, the son of Philippe Egalité, performed a similar volte-face when he became the roi bourgeois of France. It is possible of course that the Archduke, in spite of this not very encouraging example, is not simply paying lip service to American democracy but hopes by advocating a "peasant and worker state" to win the benevolence of Marshal Stalin. If this should prove true, Hapsburg legitimism would become a real revolutionary movement, since the threat of a thorough agrarian reform would be sure to meet resistance from the landowning aristocracy and clergy. While it is obvious that by discarding the family tradition the pretender would lose the support of the conservative stabilizing elements, he could not, on the other hand, win over for this illegitimate legitimism those who stand for thorough agrarian reform. After the experience of 1848 the Hungarian people have little confidence in democratic promises offered by the Hapsburgs.

However, the supporters of the Hapsburg pretender are not found among the radicals whose gospel he is preaching but among Hungarian aristocrats, Catholic priests, propagandists of the Horthy regime, wealthy financiers and industrialists. Conscious of their own interests, these groups would scarcely back his efforts if they were not convinced that all this talk about democracy is but window-dressing for the benefit of those leaders of the United Nations whose support he is soliciting. Still less compatible with legitimism is the pretender's promise to be on friendly terms with the neighbors of Hungary. Hapsburg legitimist tradition is closely linked with the Austro-Hungarian Empire which it is supposed to restore. That the promise of a loan to Hungary would restore the pretender to his throne, as Sir Charles Petrie believes, may be wishful thinking, but a logical implication of this hope is that "once there, it will assuredly not be long before their [the Hapsburgs'] former subjects voluntarily return to the rule of the double-headed eagle." Whether the resuscitation of this ambiguous bird would have this unlikely result is of less consequence than the effect which the hope of its revival would have in the successor states of the Hapsburg realm. Peoples which for a quarter of a century enjoyed national independence would feel that expectations aroused by the Atlantic Charter had been betrayed, and the result would probably be the civil war and chaos which legitimism is supposed to prevent. Without their tradition the Hapsburgs are of no use; with it they are a threat to European peace.

Apparently each of the legitimist aspirations must be dealt with separately. A century ago, when Don Carlos V, under British protection, had embarked in the Donegal for Spain, a pamphlet appeared in London (1835) entitled "Legitimism, the Only Salvation for Spain." It was this salvation which eventually produced Primo de Rivera and Francisco Franco. In Italy the House of Savoy used its legitimism to work in "closest and most whole-hearted cooperation' with Mussolini, who after having called the king "simbolo della Patria, simbolo della perpetuità della Patria," proclaimed the Fascist republic which is now fighting against "the perpetuity of the Fatherland." Of still more doubtful value is the short-lived "legitimism" of the Balkan kings in exile, who as a protection against "chaos and revolution" have set up military dictatorships and hope to revive their dynasties with the help of the Allied armies.

In his last book, "The Principles of Power," Guglielmo Ferrero concludes that "legitimacies grow old for two reasons: either because they abuse the prestige they possess or because men's ideas undergo a new orientation, and they can no longer suffer the absurdity and injustice that every principle of legitimacy contains within it." In 1944, it seems, the second reason is operating. If the system does become outworn, it can be replaced, according to Ferrero, only by "democratic legitimacy as formulated by the last two centuries." But democratic legitimacy if it is not to be a contradictio in adjecto can be created only by the people, not by exiled monarchs who are no more capable of restoring their legitimacy than a maiden her lost virginity. Legitimacy based on a new democratic tradition reminds one, indeed, of the story about the president of a Midwestern university who visited Oxford and was told that, in accordance with a tradition handed down through more than four hundred years, dons were allowed to cross the campus while undergraduates had to walk around. On his return he had a signboard set up on his own campus with the inscription: "From tomorrow on the four-hundred-year-old tradition begins that only dons may cross the campus."

In the Wind

THE COMMITTEE FOR Constitutional Government proposes an amendment to the Constitution, to provide that the maximum aggregate rate of "all taxes, duties, and excises which the Congress may lay or collect on, with respect to, or measured by, income . . . shall not exceed 25 per centum."

ON PAGE 296 of Apperson's "English Proverbs and Proverbial Phrases" appear these lines:

"From Hell, Hull, and Halifax Good Lord deliver us."

The first date given for the quotation is 1594. This little paragraph is in honor of its 350th anniversary.

HOW TO GET A CANDIDATE: The following item appeared under "Help Wanted, Male," in the Augusta, Georgia, Herald: "Honest, intelligent, conscientious citizen as independent candidate for judge of City Court of Richmond County. Would have backing of Augusta Citizens' Union if desired. Must be lawyer. Light work. Short hours. Good salary. Excellent opening for right party. References. Write for appointment Augusta Citizens' Union."

THE CZECHOSLOVAK NATIONAL COUNCIL of America has protested to the National Geographic Society "against repeated, wilful omission of the Republic of Czechoslovakia" from the society's new map of the world, published in December, 1943. The society replied that Czechoslovakia is a "part of Germany."

THE WHITE PLAINS, NEW YORK, Reporter-Dispatch refused to accept a paid advertisement announcing the moving of a cooperative store to larger quarters. The only reason given for the refusal was, "It is against the policy of the Macy chain to publish cooperative advertisements." The Macy chain, which publishes newspapers in Yonkers, Mount Vernon, New Rochelle, Tarrytown, Peekskill, Ossining, and Port Chester, as well as White Plains, is the dominant purveyor of local news in Westchester County.

STARS AND STRIPES, the army newspaper, publishes a poem by a soldier who signs himself E. M. L. on the soldier-vote mess in Congress. It predicts victory over the Nazis and the Japanese, and ends thus:

All liberties we will defend At home, abroad, until the end. Then we will beat the rats who say, "You cannot vote Election Day."

FESTUNG EUROPA: From a speech by one Karmasin, leader of the "German Ethnical Group" in Spis, Slovakia: "No one should believe that he might be spared by the enemy because he did not take part in the last monthly meetings or did not pay his party dues and contributions."

[The $5 prize for the best item received in January goes to Howard Poss of Cambridge, Mass., for the story of Representative Edith Nourse Rogers's remarks on subsidies, which was published in the issue of January 22.]

Second-Front Strategy

[This article is by the military critic of the London Tribune and is taken from a recent issue of that paper. A commentary by J. Alvarez del Vayo appears on page 205.]

E HAVE come a long way since Lord Simon denounced the second front as a catchpenny phrase. Twelve months have passed since the Casablanca conference announced the unconditional-surrender terms and the coming engagement of the largest possible number of Germans on land, on sea, and in the air within nine months. Six months have passed since the Quebec conference turned the Allies to the invasion of Europe via what Mr. Churchill, in a moment of geographical extravagance, called its soft under-belly. On that occasion Mr. Churchill also announced to the United States Congress that Britain and America had decided to use their air power to beat Germany to its knees. At least, said the Premier, the policy will be given a trial and its efficacy judged by the results.

Before considering these two propositions, a word has to be said about a third decision which was taken at Casablanca-the war against the U-boat. Throughout the winter of 1942-43-until March-serious toll was taken by enemy submarine attacks. The actual loss of ships had become less seriously felt and was increasingly being replaced by the extraordinary speed-up in shipbuilding in the United States. But each ship sunk carried cargo destined for this or that war purpose, and its non-arrival seriously interfered with more than one planned operation. The hazards of winter weather bore heavily on both naval and merchant-marine personnel. . . . Yet by March the tide had turned; convoys reached the Mediterranean and crossed the Atlantic with little loss-and from then onward the supply across the sea was secured. It was possible to plan large operations without this serious hazard.

PRIORITY FOR AIR ATTACKS

The U-boat was the priority of the Casablanca conference in January; and when the Quebec conference met in August the situation at sea was so satisfactory that there was no longer need to maintain the order of precedence. The statesmen and soldiers who met in Canada had to make their second choice; it is clear from Mr. Churchill's statement to Congress and from the subsequent course of the war, and of Allied production, that priority at Quebec was given to the air attack on Germany, the occupied countries, and German satellites.

British and American aircraft output was increased to 11,000 combat planes a month. Of these about 1,400 were said to be heavy bombers. In other words, in the half-year after Quebec, Britain and America produced 66,000 combat planes, of which about 8,000 were heavy bombers. Anglo-American production alone was about four times that of Germany, and Allied air strength, according to press reports, has also reached a four-to-one superiority over the Luftwaffe.

Even so, this great production increase did not come up to the Quebec schedule; the development of the United States' day-bombing program was slower than had been anticipated. A strong propaganda campaign emanating from Bomber Command was at the same time hinting at dire consequences if greater allocations of heavy bombers were not made. This succeeded, and the weight of the Anglo-American air attack has been increasing; . . . neither bad weather nor more German defenses have held off the assault from the air. Great damage has been done to Germany. Hamburg, Düsseldorf, Cologne, Essen, and smaller towns in the Ruhr and elsewhere have been partially destroyed and thoroughly disorganized. Now the attack is on Berlin, and the German capital is likely to share the ghastly fate of the other industrial cities.

THE NET EFFECT

... What is the military effect of this major Anglo-American effort in 1943? ... Twenty-four of Germany's fifty major towns have been heavily hit, and production and civil life have been severely disorganized. About 20,000,000 of Greater Germany's 97,000,000 people have been directly affected. Production has suffered heavily, but reliable accounts show that rebuilding proceeds rapidly, and the over-all effect on production is less great than the usual figures quoted in the press. Polish Silesia, Czechoslovakia, Austria, and the Balkan countries are producing an ever-increasing share of Germany's needs. ... The smashing of many Ruhr factories was not as catastrophic for German production as it would have been four years ago.

Reports on the way the German civilians are taking the raids show that the general consequences on morale are similar to what they were here. Bombing leads either to despondent apathy or to a hardening of the spirit; it also makes the Nazi regime more unpopular and makes people want to end the war. But except for the unconditional-surrender invitation there has been no way opened which would canalize the political consequences of bombing into action against the Nazis.

How far, then, has all this so-called "softening" eased the way of the Allied troops into the Continent? . . . Bombing, it has been claimed by Harris, Trenchard, and many others, will so daze the Germans, so soften the invasion road, and so disorganize defense installations that all the Allied land forces will have to do is to move in and occupy the ground so prepared. The great air battle which is to precede the invasion, according to Montgomery and many other air-minded spokesmen, will be a battle against the Luftwaffe and a bombing attack upon selected targets. But how is the effectiveness of this form of attack to be squared with the statement made in Washington that the Americans alone count on suffering 500,000 casualties in the attack? Add the British, and the estimate rises to something like 700,000 casualties.

The indirect form of weakening the enemy by attacking his industrial cities offered some hope of return if the process of destruction was to go on week by week with increasing force until ultimately the enemy's very will to fight would be broken. But this reckoning left the Russian front out of account. The urge of the Russians to finish the war is very real; they are demonstrating just now how much they are in earnest.

The great issue now facing the Anglo-American statesmen and soldiers is to adjust the heavy-bombing policy initiated in Quebec to the decisions taken in Teheran. There can be no doubt that the biggest military advantage which the Allies have at present over the Germans in the coastal-defense belt is the great numerical superiority of the Anglo-American air forces over the Luftwaffe. But can this superiority be turned to account in the critical phase of the attack on the Continent?

France is obviously a key position in the unrolling of Allied plans for the invasion. Since last August the R. A. F. and the United States Air Force have dropped about 30,000 tons of bombs on selected military targets in France. It has been estimated that about 30 per cent of this total causes military damage of more or less serious character. But against the background of the massive German defenses this is hardly noticeable. What happened in Ortona shows how well modern defenses can withstand shell and blast. This little town on the coast of the Adriatic was shelled continuously for over two weeks and received about 6,000 tons of directed fire before the enemy evacuated it.

A DANGEROUS FALLACY

The massive air force which the R. A. F. and the Americans have built up is unsuited for tactical bombing, which has to fit into the to-and-fro of battle. Nor can it be used for precision bombing of small targets such as gun positions, blockhouses, and the like. It has been argued that when the time comes the strategic bombing force now under the command of Air Marshal Harris and General Doolittle will swing into action in full harmony with the sea and land forces of the Allies. But this is a dangerous fallacy. At present the briefing and assembly of heavy aircraft and their crews, the take-off, and the final departure in formation take some hours to complete. This is all right when static targets such as cities are to be attacked. But once the invasion battle is joined, while the target for air attack may still be a city, it may have to be hit quickly, when troops are passing through it or just before they are passing. Or the target may be an area where troops are assembling, or a defense zone where Allied forces are held up; but in every case the period between the call for attack and the need for its execution will be brief. Sometimes it will be a matter of a few hours; sometimes only of minutes. This sort of thing cannot be improvised, and to suggest that one can simply take the existing organization of the strategic bomber forces and integrate it into armies on the move is illusionary. The whole experience of the African, the Sicilian, and the Italian campaign goes to show that the full weight of Allied air power has not yet been deployed in battle because it is dispersed on what has been described as a long-term blueprint which will ultimately destroy German industry.

But the whole pace of the war has now been increased, and there are danger signals going up on the Continent in many places which point to an even greater speeding up. Again the crisis will center in France. The evidence reaching this country of what is happening inside France leaves no doubt that armed groups are fighting the Germans and their collaborators in the mountains and already also in many of the towns, . . . Sabotage groups are increasing, the secret army is extending its activity, and collaborators are abandoning the German side in large numbers. Swiss newspapers estimate that the total number of Frenchmen collaborating with the Germans does not exceed 5,000. . . . Added to this comes the fact that the Germans have had to call on all the occupied countries to furnish man-power for the defense of France. Their forty-three divisions at present manning the defenses include almost every nationality in Europe.

With such a heterogeneous force the Germans face great difficulties in resisting a landing accompanied by large-scale guerrilla and partisan activity in France. There is every sign that this will happen, but there is a definite danger that some of these most fruitful activities will be stultified by heavy air assaults on French towns and districts, which in their total effect will disperse our French allies rather than damage the German enemy. This happened in northern Italy in the crucial period of last August.

CHOICE BEFORE THE ALLIES

There is still lacking close integration of Allied air attack with French sabotage and partisan activity. For air attack and partisan warfare against communications are the only means by which the reinforcement of the enemy can be obstructed. In view of the nature of the Anglo-American air forces it is clear that they will have to rely far more heavily on the disruptive activity of allied partisans than is usually realized.

The admission of the second front into the respectable circle of grand strategy has not come about as the normal development of Anglo-American policy. . . . Outside circumstances of compelling character have resulted in the acceptance of a revised time-table. And the operation against the enemy has to be carried out with large numbers of troops who have never been in battle and with an air force trained and fashioned for strategic bombing and not for close cooperation with the land army.

There are therefore as powerful military reasons in Western Europe as in the Balkans calling for collaboration between invading armies and local partisans. At one time this was an escapist cliché, Now it has become urgent necessity. To omit this is to make our own task very much more hazardous. The choice before the Allied leaders of the second front is between a Badoglio and a Tito policy. The attack on the Continent will have to be accompanied by great changes both in method of warfare and in the spirit behind it. Otherwise the walls around Europe will not fall without a heavy price in blood being paid.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

THE war is everywhere having a bad effect on the conduct of young people. But lawlessness and a decline of morals began in Germany soon after the establishment of the Nazi regime. And without any doubt the regime itself—particularly the spirit and practice of the Hitler Youth formations—was responsible. The trend has now been accelerated by the war.

The degree to which people have been aroused by the situation is illustrated by a recent occurrence in Rostock. On January 23 the district leader called a meeting of "parents' representatives" in the municipal theater to discuss the subject "Errors in the Treatment of Youth." The district leader himself made the principal speech. According to reports in the local newspapers, he began by denying that there had been any substantial deterioration in the morals of young people. He admitted only "a few isolated cases of delinquency." And for these, he insisted, the party was not responsible. "He protested emphatically against attributing these cases—as was sometimes done, quite wrongly-to conditions in the Hitler Youth." On the contrary, he said, the families were at fault. "The sporadic instances of juvenile delinquency in Rostock could be traced back exclusively to the deficient education of racially inferior families." At the end he became threatening, and then the real reason for the meeting came out. Evidently a considerable proportion of Rostock parents had instituted a kind of sabotage of the Hitler Youth. These parents, the district leader disclosed, had invented methods of keeping their children out of the organization. "They invoke innumerable stock excuses," he said, and he threatened them with fearful consequences. "The obstinacy and ill-will of incorrigible individuals who fail to cooperate with the Hitler Youth will be dealt with as they deserve."

It should be mentioned that the next speaker, the local leader of the Hitler Youth, adopted a much more conciliatory and apologetic tone. He begged people to consider that the organization suffered from "a great shortage of leaders," and that the substitute leaders were frequently "very young themselves." He promised that "justified complaints would be scrupulously attended to and all defects remedied immediately." One can assume that the sabotage of the Rostock parents was checked.

This opposition in a specific matter should not lead one to impute a general anti-Nazi attitude to the older generation. The feelings of the average German today are an indistinguishable mixture of all possible ingredients. The strong Nazi fixation of a great majority of parents in the year 1943 is testified to by some curious evidence that has come to hand. The Swiss, whose communications with Germany are intact, occasionally use original methods to explore the German psychology. It occurred to the editors of the Basler Nachrichten that the names with which new-born children were christened should be an index to the views of their parents. They therefore examined the announcements of births in a number of German newspapers over a period of weeks, publishing the results on January 20. This odd bit of research revealed that by far the greater number of children had been given extravagantly Germanic-Teutonic-Nordic names—names which before Hitler would have occurred only to fanatical Teuto-maniacs. It is true that the boys' name most frequently chosen was still the familiar Hans, but right after it came, in this order, Volker, Hartmut, Rüdiger, Reinhart, Bernd, Ekkehard, Rainer, Dirk, Jürg, Horst, Uwe-all dug up out of the Teutonic folk epics. The most frequent girls' names had the same extreme Teutonic flavor. The order of preference was Uta, Ute, Elke, Ingeborg, Heidrum, Heide, Karin, Helga, Barbara, Heidemarie, Ingrid, Gudrun, and Heike.

So far as is known, the officials exercise no pressure when the names of infants are registered. The parents have free choice. That the overwhelming majority of them passed over the previously popular classical, international, and Christian names and decided on pretentious anachronisms from the race's romantic sagas is a frankly alarming symptom. Cultural Nazism, which is not less dangerous than political Nazism, must have penetrated pretty deeply beneath the skin.

America Declares War Against Massacre

GREAT BRITAIN, TOO, HAS A PART TO PLAY!

When the President created the War Refugee Board he established a bridge-head in the battle against massacre. His definition of the board is forthright and clear:

"It was urgent that action be taken at once to forestall the plan of the Nazis to exterminate all the Jews and other minorities of Europe.'

Thus, the two pre-requisites of rescuing the Jewish people of Europe have been attained:

- 1. The need for bringing to a halt the slaughter of the European Jews was established as a primary and imme-diate objective in the war.
- 2. A powerful instrument was created to assure success in the program of

The President's board is the powerful and effective machine, established, at last for saving, among others, Hitler's No. 1 victim, the stricken Jews of Eu-

WITH the appointment of Mr. John W. Pehle as Executive Director of the War Refugee Board, the road is surely paved for immediate and effective ac-tion. The choice of Mr. Pehle is singu-larly fortunate and Mr. Pehle himself is to be congratulated on his appoint-ment to so important, so humanitarian and history-making position-for the War Refugee Board is America's high command in the opening battle against

IT must be understood, however, that a bridgehead is not the battle itself— it is only the foot-hold that precedes the battle. The President's great move must be interpreted, not as an excuse for relaxation, not merely as an event to celebrate. On the contrary, it must be recognized as a rallying cry—as a stern warning that there is now no time to be lost.

RELIEVED as we are that America has taken up Hitler's challenge on the question of Jewish survival—this alone is not enough. In our time of global war one government alone cannot solve problems of international character.
The problem of saving the Jews requires the cooperation of other governments in the whole inter-Allied rela-tionship and the cooperation of a few neutrals as well.

RESCUE is mainly a problem of geography. Even were the United States wide open to all escaping Jews, it would be of little immediate help, because of the barriers of national boundaries, and an ocean to be crossed. The rescue, therefore, has to proceed along shorter and safer roads. These lead to Cypress, to North Africa, to Turkey, to Spain. One road, however, is short-est and surest. It leads to Palestine.

PALESTINE is the closest and most practical haven for the escaping Jews. From Bulgaria to Palestine is nearer than from New York to Miami. It is only a few days removed from the Axis countries by short, quick water-routes, by train, or even by bus! Palestine is the only country where population of Jews (600,000 in number) are ready and waiting to receive an equal number their escaping brethren, to share with them their bread and their homes.

THERE is room in Palestine, a country that wants the European Jews. There never was, there is not now, any justification whatsoever for keeping the doors of this country closed to the es-caping Jews. There is no justification for the anti-Jewish discrimination laws which exclude Jews alone from entering into Palestine. These discriminatory laws are the remnants of the shameful period of Munich and of appeasement politics.

THE heroic armies of the United Nations are today sweeping back the military hordes of the Nazi Attilla. It is time that the diplomatic and spiritual leaders of the United Nations sweep away the remnants of those gruesome and monstrous compromises and genuflections before Hitler and his power. A united public opinion in this country must demand that these discriminatory laws against Jewish immigration to Palestine be abolished immediately so that they no longer bar the way of escape to untold thousands.

BRITAIN-THE KEY

THIS too is not an insurmountable obstacle. The only practical key to the salvation of the Jews to Palestine is England, which gave the world the Magna Charta, the blueprint of liberty and humanity. It is only necessary for this great and gallant ally to realize that the Jews stand in Eastern Europe as they themselves did four short years ago at Dunkirk.

It is not in the tradition of Parliament, which rang to the speeches of Edward Burke, Disraeli and Churchill, that they do not rise in this great moment to take their part in halting one of history's most cruel massacres.

The people of England abhor these discriminations. They have been condemned in public by the Archbishop of Canterbury, who so eloquently said, calling for action, at this very point: "We all stand before the bar of history, of humanity and of God."

The Emergency Committee believes that the time has come when we must impress upon a great and heroic ally Britain, that the people of Israel as well britain, that the people or Israel as well as Coventry and Warsaw are innocent children of God. The Emergency Committee believes that a united public opinion must appeal to a democratic government and the oldest Parliament, which hold the key to the salvation of the Jewish people, to open wide the doors of sanctuary—Palestine.

In urging this, as in urging our own citizens to back the President and the War Refugee Board and Mr. Pelile, the Emergency Committee explicitly avoids political considerations. It is not the business of the Emergency Committee to urge or to work for any post-war definite political settlement. It is not the task of this Committee to effect changes in the political status of Palestine. The demand to open the doors of Palestine today is humanitarian, not politics. To keep the doors of Pulestine shut is—politics, as Lord Cranbourne, former Secretary of State for Colonies, admitted so candidly in a debate in the House of Lords: "It is not an economic but political problem."

We speak to the government of Great Britain, not in the name of politics, but in the cause of humanity and compas-

Declare the doors of Palestine open to the Jews about to be rescued from neighboring countries. Let the Union Jack now wave proudly beside the Stars and Stripes in the common battle against massacre.

Emergency Committee to Save the Jewish People of Eurone

ONE EAST FORTY-FOURTH STREET, NEW YORK 17, N. Y. MUrray Hill 2-7237

EXECUTIVE BOARD

CO-CHAIRMAN: Dean Alfange, Peter H. Bergson, Louis Bromfield, Ben Hecht, Will Rogers Jr., Rep. Andrew L. Somers, Mme, Sigrid Undset, Li Yu Ying.

VICE-CHAIRMEN: William S. Bennet, Konrad Bercevici, Jo Davidson, Oscar W. Ehrborn, William Helis, Prof. Francis E. McMahon, Dean George W. Matheson, Herbert S. Mosro, A. Hadani Rafaeli, Johan J. Smertenko, Lisa Sergio, Dr. Maurice William, Fletcher Pratt.

MEMBERS: Stella Adler, J. J. Amiel, Al Bauer, Y. Ben-Ami, A. Ben-Eliezer, Theodor Bensahum, Rabbi Philip D. Bookstaber, Bishop James A. Cannon, Jr., Lester Cohea, Bubette Deutsch, Rep. Samuel Dickstein, Nathan George Horwitt, E. Jabotinsky, Fritz Kaufman, Rose Kenoe, Emil Lengyel, I. Lipschniz, Lawrence Lipton, Emil Ludwig, Gov. Edward Martin, Gov. J. Howard McGrath, Michael Potter, Victor M. Eliezer, Salven, Sanuel Rosen, Arthur Rosenberg, K. Shridharani, Rabbi Eliezer Silver, Jrthur Syzk, Irving Tattel, Thomas J. Watson, Alex Will.

TREASURER: Mrs. John Gunther.

SECRETARY: Gabriel Wechsler

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR . 8 Merlin

WON'T YOU HELP?

We operate solely through voluntary contri-We operate solely through voluntary contributions. By your support will be determined the speed, scope and effectiveness of our fight to save the Jewish people of Europe.

[By a ruling of the Treasury Department, contributions to this Committee are tax exempt] Please make checks payable to Mrs. JOHN GUNTHER, Treasurer

EMERGENCY COMMITTEE TO SAVE THE JEWISH PEOPLE OF EUROPE 1 East 44th Street, New York 17, N. Y.

I enclose my contribution to enable you to carry out your tremendous task in the sum

All accounts of this Committee are audited by the firm of Louis J. Yampolsky, C. P. A.

BOOKS and the ARTS

SAMUEL JOHNSON AS CRITIC

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

J OHNSON'S "Lives of the Poets" was issued in two instalments in 1779 and 1781. Few works of criticism in English had ever achieved a more immediate popularity, but the romantic revolution was so close at hand that the editor of the second collected edition of the author's works could say: "With respect to Johnson's powers as a critic, we confess that he had but little natural taste for poetry, as such; for that poetry of the emotions which produces in its cultivators and admirers an intensity of excitement to which language can scarcely afford utterance, to which art can give no body, and which spreads a dream of glory around us."

This is a violent, one might almost say a perverse, overstatement of the case. Pope's famous comparison between the progress of the student and the progress of the Alpine traveler, which ends with the line "Hills peep o'er hills, and Alps on Alps arise," Johnson calls "perhaps the best that English poetry can show." But the passage in which that comparison occurs is certainly one in which the appeal is at least as much emotional as it is intellectual, and the truth is not, as his critic went on to assert, that Johnson "wanted that deep feeling which is the only sure and unerring test of poetic excellence," or that he sought in poetry only the didactic and "wished for reasoning in numbers," but merely that the emotions to which, in his case, poetry could make a successful appeal were not the romantic ones. A man who could never, until forced by necessity, bring himself to reread the concluding scene of "King Lear" was certainly not one whose emotions were untouched by poetry. Had Johnson lived to discover how powerfully certain romantic readers were moved by emotions which they could not name, and how frequently they wept for they knew not what sorrow, he would, in all probability, have said of their poetry reading what he said to Boswell when the latter described the violent and conflicting emotions produced in his soul by the sound of music: "I should never hear it if it made me such a fool." To admit that may be to admit that he was insensitive to even the genuine beauties of romanticism. But it is not to grant that he was incapable of poetic

It is a pity that present-day readers, who have outgrown many of the romantic prejudices, should nevertheless tend to accept the romantic estimate of Johnson as a critic without taking the trouble to read him or at least without discarding preconceived notions before doing so. Much that stood between him and the nineteenth century has vanished, and both the Preface to his edition of Shakespeare and the "Lives of the Poets" clearly reveal an attitude which we ought to find challenging even when we think we have good reasons for refusing to accept it in all its eighteenth-century downrightness and clarity.

Johnson could become a popular critic partly because his premises and his methods were so well adapted to the understanding of the intelligent layman; because, that is to say, literary interpretation and judgment seemed, as Johnson presented them, to be no more than the application to literary questions of that generally applicable common sense in which the eighteenth century placed its faith. His appeal, as he had so explicitly stated in the Shakespeare Preface, was from authority and pedantic rules to nature, and nature was something which his contemporaries, lay as well as literary, were ready to assume that they clearly understood. But it is important to remember that such criticism is no more clearly distinguished from the pedantic criticism which preceded it than it is from both the romantic criticism which was so shortly to follow and the sort most frequently practiced by the "serious" critics of today.

"Common sense" as applied to literature meant, to begin with, the assumption that neither the aims nor the methods of the literary art were peculiar to it. Literature, the assumption is, seeks to give pleasure and to impart Instruction; but neither the pleasure which it gives nor the instruction it provides constitutes any world apart or requires for its proper appreciation any unique faculties. Johnson, of course, would have been indignantly astonished at anything suggesting the doctrine of art for art's sake. He would have been equally astonished to hear of "significant form" or an "aesthetic experience." One of his conscious aims was certainly that of taking literature out of the hands of the pedants. Had he been gifted with the power of foreseeing the future, he would undoubtedly have added another—that of keeping it out of the clutches of the romantics and the aesthetes.

Pedantic criticism and romantic criticism are alike in one important respect. Each addresses itself to some sort of specialist. To understand the first, one must be learned. To understand the second, one needs, it is assumed, a special sensibility which is the exclusive possession of a limited class. Both are therefore to some extent esoteric; both assume, at the very least, that the reader has either a special equipment or a special endowment without which his judgment is worthless. Johnson, on the other hand, takes it for granted that neither the enjoyment nor the understanding of literature requires any capacities or any knowledge not possessed by every intelligent man. There are no unique literary values. No special conceptions, no special sensitiers, no special terms, even, are necessary. Anyone who has the equipment to judge men and manners and morals

The story of Hitler and the people who nourished him

KONRAD HEIDEN

"Incomparably the most brilliant and comprehensive treatise yet written about the master of the Third Reich." - George N. Shuster, N. Y. Times

"A masterpiece of clarity and simplicity." — Curt Riess, Chicago Daily News

"Beyond reportage . . . truly history." — Wallace R. Deuel, N. Y. Herald Tribune

"Not only the most notable book to be written about National Socialism, but one of the most remarkable books ever to be written by a contemporary about his own times . . . A unique and overwhelming contribution to permanent literature." — Dorothy Thompson, Saturday Review of Literature

4 Book-of-the-Month Club selection HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY · Publishers has the equipment to judge literature, for literature is merely reflection of men and manners and morals.

Price $3.00

To say this is, of course, to say that for Johnson there is no realm of the exclusively aesthetic. A thing may be valid in poetry though in accordance with fact only in so far as it can suggest analogy with fact, and if such analogy is not suggested, it is poetically false, as well as false in every other way. For him there is no world of imagination except the world of memory, and the world of evoked memories is a relatively pale one. He pooh-poohed the idea that Garried or any other actor was carried away by his role. He was equally contemptuous of the idea that any spectator or any reader lost the distinction between fiction and fact, and he would certainly have been even more contemptuous of anyone who professed to find the world of "dreams" or the world of art either more real or as a whole more satisfactory than the world of reality.

What Johnson has to say in the "Lives of the Poets" is precisely the sort of thing that he had to say in his conversation, and he obviously regarded criticism as neither more nor less than good talk about books—which is, in turn, very much like good talk about anything else. He was no less aware than Swinburne or Oscar Wilde that some sort of splendor may surround things wicked or destructive, but he saw no reason why literature should isolate and then acclaim splendor which experience itself never encounters thus isolated; and the concluding sentence of the following brief passage on Waller's marriage to a lady who was not his "Sacharissa" is in its own quiet way an anticipation of Max Beerbohm's reductio ad absurdum in his satiric essay on the vulgarity of fire departments. Wrote Johnson of Waller:

He, doubtless, praised some whom he would have been afraid to marry, and, perhaps, married one whom he would have been aslaamed to praise. Many qualities contribute to domestic happiness upon which poetry has no colors to bestow; and many airs and sallies may delight imagination which he who flatters them never can approve. There are charms made only for distant admiration. No spectacle is nobler than a blaze.

It is obvious that the reader who seeks in Johnson for certain things which he finds or thinks he finds in some later critics will come away disappointed. He will not, to begin with, find Johnson discovering neglected genius or habitually reversing accepted judgments. Johnson happened. it is true, to run counter to the general opinion in the case of Milton, but on the whole his effort, even there, was to minimize rather than to emphasize the extent of his dissent. and Milton is the only important poet except perhaps Gray upon whom Johnson puts a value conspicuously different from that generally accorded him by conservative opinion. In the Life of Addison he observed that "about things on which the public thinks long, it commonly attains to think right." It had thought long on Dryden and Pope and the other poets. Its decision is therefore final, for as he had remarked in connection with some pettishness exhibited by Dryden, "what is good only because it pleases, cannot be pronounced good till it has been found to please."

More important perhaps is the fact that disappointment awaits also the reader who expects from a critic those flashes of half-mystical illumination which were to seem so important in the work of somewhat later exponents of criticism. Johnson would certainly have regarded the claims of "intuition" as skeptically as he did those of the transcendental imagination. He would never have aspired to supply the lightning by which Shakespeare or anybody else could be read, and he would have doubted the value of reading done by the aid of any light so dazzling or so fitful. The romantic critic was usually dominated by a sense that the literature upon which he proposed to comment had never been properly understood before. He felt himself surrounded by the mysteries of an undiscovered country and hence perpetually upon the threshold of dazzling discoveries. Johnson never supposed that he or any other critic could be "creative," and he did not even suppose that unsuspected beauties of major importance remained to be discovered. Pope and Dryden had, like Shakespeare, been appreciated too long and too enthusiastically to permit the supposition that any of their principal excellences had been unobserved or inadequately valued. Had he lived to see the first two dismissed, and Shakespeare treated as a poet whom ten generations had admired but never understood, he would certainly have risen to the defense of a public which had thought long and therefore correctly. Discrimination and judgment, not paradox and revelation, were the chief business of the critic.

This critic has every right to pass judgment on the poet. No claims to inspiration or membership in a sacred fraternity put the latter above the reach of censure. What is too silly to be said in prose remains no less unacceptable when put into verse. But the critic derives his right from the rights of the general public of which he is a part—not from the fact that he is a critic. He will generally agree with the public's considered judgment because literature is to be judged not in the light of learning—which most readers do not have—or by its effect upon sensibilities undreamed of except by the few, but in accordance with the same common sense which guides us as we go about the business of life.

Those who read the "Lives of the Poets" not with disappointment but with delight get from it something more than merely Johnson's sensible estimate of the merits and the defects of those whom he is discussing. But this something is simply the same thing which they get from the records of his conversation on literary and other topics-namely, the play of a vigorous and entertaining mind over a wide range of subjects. His criticism is not personal in the sense of proposing an account of the adventures of a soul among masterpieces. Its manner is objective, and its aim is to make statements which the reader will accept as true for himself and for all normal men. This criticism is, however, intensely personal in the sense that the manner and the matter alike are so highly characteristic of Johnson that the reader who knew him through his conversation and his other work would have little difficulty in identifying the author even if the "Lives" were unsigned. Johnson believed in the all-butexclusive importance of what has come in our time to be called "public" truths and methods of expression as opposed to "private" ones, but he makes no attempt at "scientific" detachment. In one sense no criticism was ever less "pure." What one gets is, among other things, Johnson on Pope. But one gets the whole Johnson in a sense that one does not get the whole of the personal critic who self-consciously

"A book about sound thinking at a moment when sound thinking is not merely desirable but a matter of life and death."—N. Y. TIMES BOOK REVIEW

MARK VAN DOREN'S iberal Education

+THE EXCITING BOOK

hailed as "a new classic in its field."

*THE QUOTABLE BOOK

whose first three printings sold out in three weeks.

*THE REVOLUTIONARY BOOK

that points the way to a richer American democracy through humane education for all.

THIS book was written for anyone who has ever gone to school—and has since felt that the wrong things were done to his mind. Mr. Van Doren believes—as have the world's great teachers from Socrates on—that education is worthless unless it brings to every person a full measure of the knowledge that sets men free. He opens our eyes to what a true liberal education should be; defines, it at a time when it cries for definition—and fulfillment. Both for what it says and the way it says it, LIBERAL EDUCATION is an exciting book—exciting because it wakes up your mind, it believes in the future and makes you want to do something about that future.

"Dozens of crisp sentences call for quotation . . . He is excitedly concerned for the democratic future." — Lewis Gannett, N. Y. Herald Tribune

"Clear, sharp medicine, good for what ails us."—GERALD JOHNSON, N. Y. Times Book Review

"He leads a revolution against chaotic, misty and wholly wasteful 'modern education.' His book should be read by everyone who has ever gone to school."—Phil. Forum

"Rich in ideas, of such beauty of form and so concise that the reader is tempted to hoard sentences."—Christ, Sci, Mon,

"A new classic in its field."—GEORGE WHICHER

"Full of light for a dark hour."-Los Angeles Times

"A thoughtful, wise book. Its immediate occasion was the war, with its dislocaton of the curriculum."—N. Y. Sun

"Somebody is always asking, Where can I get a list of the 100 books used by St. John's College?' so I'll give you a tip. The list is in Van Doren's Liberal Education."—Chi. Trib.

HENRY HOLT AND COMPANY-HENRY HOLT AND COMPANY- INSTANTOCO

Work Van Doren

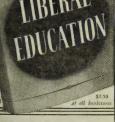

that have startled stimulated, and delighted its readers

• "No society can succeed henceforth unless its last citizen is free to become a prince and a philosopher as his powers permit."

 "Knowledge is not knowledge until it operates."

 "No antipathy appears between technical and liberal education if we remember that both are concerned with art."

 "It is impossible to discover a man who believes that the right things were done to his mind."

BACK IN STOCK 4TH PRINTING

HENRY HOLT & COMPANY 257 Fourth Avenue, New York 10

BARGAINS in BOOKS

UP TO 75% OFF FORMER PRICES

Offered by America's Oldest Mail-Order Book House

ORIGINAL EDITIONS—NOT REPRINTS

- 1. WHY WAS LINCOLN MURDERED? By O. Eisenschiml. Illustrated throughout. Index. 508 pages. "Now, at long last." noted Lincoln authority tells the truth—startling, damning but undeniable." Special
- 2. THE WRITINGS OF THOMAS PAINE. Common Sense: Rights of Man; Age of Reason. 3 vols, complete in 1. Large, clear type. 669 pages. Although George Washington had not long before expressed himself as immovably set against Independence, these writings of Paine made him change his mind. In Colontal America Paine's writings of "dynamite."
- 3. THE SANTA FE TRAIL. B. R. L. Duffus. Fully illustrated with contemporary prints and maps. Bibliography; Index. The thrilling story of the first great trail to the West. Lewis and Clarke. Capitain Pike of Pike's Peak fame, Kit Carson and other famous early frontiersmen followed this historic trail. (Formerly published at $5.00).
- 4. THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A CAT. By Eliza Orne White. Profusely illustrated by Clarke Hutton. The unusual, delightful adventures of a silver-gray Matiese cat. Beautifully illustrated. Catlovers, young and old, will enjoy this charming story.

  Pub. at $2.00.
- 5. THESAURUS OF AMECDOTES. Edited by Edmund Fuller. Attractively bound in buckman Indoces of names and subjects. 477 nages. A collection of the best ancodotes from ancient times to the present day. Indispensable to writers, public speakers, lawyers, teachers, ministers and all who want to use the right story $1.298 at the right time.
- 6. THE CHINESE DECAMERON. By Chin P'Ing Mei. The adventurous History of Hsi Men and his Six Wives. In 2 handsome volumes. 863 pages. Boxed. China's Forbidden Classic has been called the "Chinese Decameron" and for centurics it was on China's list of Forbidden Books. The set
- 7. RABELAIS. With the Doré Illustrations. The complete and authentic Works of Rabelais. Profusely Illustrated by Gustave Doré. 640 pages. "Not to have read Rabelais—is not to have lived." Never has there been, nor is, nor ever shall be, another book like it—for it stands unique and alone." Only
- 8. I WENT NATIVE IN TAHITI. By Al Kassel. Duotone illustrations by W. Wolff. A delightful account of idyllic days and exciting nights in the magic South See Islands. A book of unusual travel and adventure. Fub. at $5.00.
- 9. AMERICAN GLASS. AMERICAN GLASS. By George S. and Helen McKearin.
   8000 illustrations. The limited autographed edition, with extra color plates. The most complete book on the subject, covering all types. $000 illustrations. Detailed identification tables and charts, Chronological list of Glass Houses. Pub. at $10.00.

10. FUNK AND WAGNALLS NEW STANDARD ENCYCLO-PEDIA. In 25 volumes. Edited by Frank H. Vizetelly and an editorial staff of experts. This famous complete up-to-date refremote complete up-to-date reperence work is recognized as m top-ranking American authority. Over 12,000 clear type pages, 7,000,000 words, 2,000 illustrations, over 60,000 subjects. Good looking, handy and convenient. 4" x 6". Funk, 1937. Pub. at $20.00. The 25 volume set,

$6.88

11. WITH 3 SUPERB RACKHAM COLOR PLATES. THE Ring of the Niblung. Containing The Rhinegold. The Vallight of the Golds. By Richgries, Sigrified, and The Twilight of the Golds. By Richlight of the Golds. By Richillustrated with 48 supercolor plates by Arthur Rackham. Buckram binding. Size 75%" X10%". The complete texts of Wagner's immortal works. Formerly in two volplete 1 vol. edition, only.

12. FOREIGN LANGUAGE WORD CARDS. Stephens Word Cards. The famous simplified self-teaching system of foreign language study, containing 512 cards, and illustrations. By language study, containing 512 cards, and illustrations. By means of these cards anyone can acquire a basic vocabulary and a general familiarity with Spanish, French, German, Italian and even Esperanto. Put up in an envelope.

Special

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION N-48 Established 1884

121-123 East 24th Street, New York 10, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $ ..... ... for which please send me the items I have encircled below, delivery charges prepaid. 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9

(Mark circle around items desired) Please send me FREE Catalog No. 334-N. containing hundreds of equally unusual Book Bargains - just off the press!

Name ... State

proclaims his determination to talk about himself in connection with Pope or with Shakespeare. What one gets is, in other words, a personality revealing itself rather than a personality determined to reveal itself. Perhaps, one might add, a personality revealing itself rather than one showing

Whatever the admirers of this or that special sort of criticism may feel that Johnson fails to give them, there is rarely a page in which he does not give something shrewd or penetrating or ingenious or amusing. Speaking of the metaphysical poets, he first dismisses Pope's famous definition of "true wit" as too tame and then proceeds:

If by a more noble and more adequate conception that be considered as wit which is at once natural and new, that which, though not obvious, is upon its first production acknowledged to be just; if it be that which he that never found it wonders how he missed; to wit of this kind the metaphysical poets have seldom risen. Their thoughts are often new, but they are seldom natural; they are not obvious, but neither are they just; and the reader, far from wondering that he missed them, wonders more frequently by what perverseness of industry they were ever found.

And if the present-day reader will almost certainly find this unjust when applied to the best of Donne, can this same modern reader find better words in which to comment upon Mr. Eliot's "dead geranium" or Mr. Cummings's "angry candy"? Or can he, on the other hand, find a partial apology for over-ingenuity more valid than that which Johnson goes on to grant:

To write on their plan it was, at least, necessary to read and think. No man could be born a metaphysical poet; nor assume the dignity of a writer by descriptions copied from descriptions, by imitations borrowed from imitations, by traditional imagery and hereditary similes, by readiness of rhyme and volubility of syllables.

Johnson seldom fails to be memorable even when he is wrong, and his criticism is seldom other than interesting even when it is not, by strict definition, criticism at all. The pleasure which we get from reading him is often, at least, as much the pleasure of learning about Johnson as it is that of learning about Dryden, Pope, Milton, and the rest; and if to say that is, in the opinion of the austere, to say that he is not really a critic, one can only reply that he is at least something which it would be a pity to miss. He himself would have considered it the reverse of dispraise had he been accused of mingling moral, social, or even merely prudential considerations with aesthetic ones, for he would have maintained that the last are nonsense when isolated from the context, which must always be present for anyone who is not some sort of literary hermit or monster. He did not think of his literary criticism as something which ought to be essentially different from the general criticism of life, which he had made it his business to offer since he first began to write. No praise would have seemed to him higher than that implied in a statement which some would make with derogatory intention: "The 'Lives of the Poets' are not written by, a scholar or by an aesthetician. They are, on the contrary, the work of a man whose wide knowledge of men and manners included, in due proportion, a knowledge of what men had written and of what they had found, by the test of time, worth reading."

AFTER THE WAR—

Shall we be able to solve the problems of the peace? Can we avoid inflation? How can we find jobs for demobilized soldiers? How about taxes? What manner of life will prevail in the United States? Is communism or fascism the next step?

You are searching for the answers to such questions. We all are. Opinions are useless. We need knowledge. We need an understanding of the laws of Political Economy which give meaning to social trends.

Progress and Poverty by Henry George

Millions have read this GREAT volume on economics. An American classic, the handbook of economic democracy, it has been translated into nearly every language. It makes economics understandable, vitalizes what was known as the "dismal science." It provides the answer for the age-old problem of poverty amidst plenty; it shows how democracy alone can provide the abundant life! It is the refutation of all forms of collectivism.

JUDGE SAMUEL SEABURY says—

I have no hesitation in saying that if the world of tomorrow is to be a civilized world, and not a world which has relapsed into barbarism it can be so only by applying the principles of freedom which Henry George taught.

ALBERT EINSTEIN—

Men like Henry George are rare, unfortunately. One cannot imagine a more beautiful combination of intellectual keenness, artistic form and fervent love of justice. Every line is written as if for our generation. The spreading of these works is a really deserving cause.

JOHN DEWEY-

No man has a right to regard him self as an educated man in social thought unless he has some first-hand acquaintance with the theoretical contribution of this great American thinker.

(Henry George)

LEO TOLSTOI—

People do not argue with the teaching of Henry George. They simply do not know it.

JUSTICE BRANDEIS—

I cannot disagree with Henry George.

Free Correspondence Course in Fundamental Economics

The subject is vital to an understanding of the world today and tomorrow. The reading requires concentration. To assist you, and to highlight its important concepts, we offer a free correspondence course to every purchaser of "Progress and Poverty." One Dollar, prepaid. Ten interesting lessons, each covering a chapter of the book. Your answers are corrected and commented on by members of the faculty of the Henry George School of Social Science.

There is no charge for this course. Friends, students and graduates of the Henry George School make it possible because they believe that the wide dissemination of economic knowledge will make for a happier people.

City & State...

A college professor writes:

"It has been two years since I took the Progress and Poverty correspondence course and I still think it was one of the most worthwhile studies of my career."

THIS COUPON STARTS YOU ON THE ROAD TO ECONOMIC KNOWLEDGE

HENRY GEORGE SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
(Chartered by the New York State Board of Regents)
30 East 29th Street, New York 16, N. Y.
Enclosed find One Dollar for which send me copy of "Progress and Poverty" and enroll me in your FREE correspondence course, an advertised in The Nation.
Name
Address

Take It from Stowe

THEY SHALL NOT SLEEP. By Leland Stowe. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

NE of the appalling discoveries of anyone returning from abroad nowadays is how much time people here spend reading newspapers and how little they understand. No nation is more abundantly supplied with information, nowhere does the level of accurate reporting approach our own, and only in the most benighted lands is there more widespread confusion about meanings. The explanation perhaps lies in a slight rewording of an epigram of Henry Adams's —''Nothing in journalism is so astonishing as the amount of ignorance it collects in inert facts.''

Leland Stowe has written a book which puts legs and even wings on facts. Not all of them are new facts, but his book is far more than a mere recooking of his foreign dispatches. It is an interpretation of the war and its meaning in many countries, from China to America; and it is based on exceptionally wide travel and varied experience. Such a book necessarily repeats things already known to us, but the additional information presented—which censorship suppressed overseas—the personal impressions and the analysis of a skilled observer, the human contacts revealed, all together make "They Shall Not Sleep" itself a piece of news of major importance.

Mr. Stowe was abroad seventeen months and covered some critical events in Burma, China, India, and Russia. He tells how Burma fell and what led to the débâcle, describes Kuo-

What dangers of disunity lie ahead?

Tomorrow Always Comes

by Vernon Bartlett

A provocative and original inquiry into the conflicts that will threaten Allied understanding after Germany has surrendered. The book contains an introductory discussion of the internal conditions and external policies of the United Nations, followed by an imaginary diary of the events occurring during the five months following Germany's defeat.

"Fascinating, shrewd and terribly realistic, Bartlett's diary of the immediate future warns what can happen if dissension separates the Allies when Germany collapses and victory comes."

—William L. Shirer

At all bookshops = $2.00

ALFRED A. KNOPF • 501 Madison Ave. • NEW YORK 22

Invest in Victory with War Bonds

mintang China as he found it in contrast to the "romantic" view prevalent in this country, reports on India during the abortive Cripps negotiations and explains why they failed, and gives a good-picture of life in Russia during the summer and autumn of 1942. He ends up with about 30,000 words of comment—a useful little book in itself, and one that the War Department would be well advised to reprint for our men in uniform—which analyzes our relations with Russia, examines our State Department policy, warns Americans to wake up to the political realities, one of which he thinks is inevitably a socialist Europe, and emphasizes the danger of losing the peace—which he believes would mean a third world war.

Admittedly that's a big assignment for one reporter and one book, but it must be remembered that correspondents cover the earth in airplanes these days and Americans must adjust their political thinking to the facts which make that possible.

In China, where Stowe arrived "without any faint conception of the oppressive poverty and squalor which eats the flesh of one-fifth of humanity" and with illusions of a happy democracy fighting an all-out anti-fascist war, he was amazed to discover a one-party dictatorship in many ways resembling totalitarian Germany. Freedom of the press, speech, organization, and assembly did not exist. He found squeeze and corruption among high army officers and officials, a monopoly of transport on the Burma road and elsewhere. He found some of them preoccupied with plans to suppress the Communist armies, blockaded from all outside help, rather than with fighting Japan.

In Burma the British "disintegrated because they were products of a system—an exploitative and standstill, anti-progressive system." In India, where as in Burma "the vast natural wealth has been drawn out of the country for the enrichment of a small band of foreign capitalists who have no other interest in the people who are the sources of their fortunes," the awakening was "too little and too late." Only the absence of an invasion, he reports, saved the system from collapse.

In Russia, where this reviewer's path happened to cross Stowe's, he got one of the few genuine scoops of the war, where scoops are hard to come by. He went off for a week to the front, all by himself, and came back with a story which he here retells. Summarizing his experience, he concludes that we can "live with Russia," peacefully and profitably, by recognizing that its primary needs are peace and security in which to rebuild the devastated areas, and foreign cooperation for that aim, if it can get it.

Stowe reminds us of Russia's terrible blood sacrifices for victory and makes a good point in asking Americans, when judging Russian policy, to imagine themselves Russians and picture their feelings. It is necessary for us to use this method not only about Russia but about every country in the world, and although this may seem a simple thing to demand it is astounding how seldom people do it, even when actually living in a foreign country.

In the broad canvas Stowe covers there are only a few minor errors of reporting. One of them, for example, is his interpretation of the background of Demaree Bess's articles about North Africa, in the Saturday Evening Post. On the whole his book is remarkably accurate, considering its scope, and one in which this writer, having himself lately visited every country Stowe describes, finds no major contention not borne out by facts.

EDGAR SNOW

Sir Thomas Beecham

A MINGLED CHIME: AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY. By Sir Thomas Beecham. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

BEECHAM writes (p. 60) that in the summer of 1899, in which he attended disappointing performances of Wagner at Bayreuth, he devoted his spare time to study of "a large bundle" of Brahms's scores, and "formed then the opinion which I have since been unable to vary, that Brahms was essentially a romantic composer, as far removed as is conceivable from the true classical spirit, and generally at his best in smaller forms." Shortly afterward (p. 82) a performance of a Grétry opera in Paris caused him to assemble all the scores he could find of this composer and his contemporaries and to make copies of those that were out of print; and he writes that in the music of Grétry "there is a lightness, a grace, and a melodic invention surpassed only by Mozart, while in that of Méhul there is a vein of simple and chivalric romance to be found in no other composer of the day except Weber." He observes (p. 192) that "in 'Petrouchka' the charm and poetry that peer out of nearly every page of his earlier tour de force 'L'Oiseau de feu' rarely make their appearance, the chief characteristics being rhythm of extraordinary variety and vigor, a bizarrerie which although entirely different from that of Strauss is equally individual, and a fleeting hint of pathos that we find nowhere else in Stravinsky's work. It is in fact one of the musical landmarks of the past thirty years, and however interesting the later works of its composer may appear to that section of his followers which expects a fresh development of style from him every other year, I do not think that he has yet given birth to a second piece in which the best elements of his art are so perfectly blended." He came to realize (p. 295) that a first-rate operatic organization could be maintained only with government assistance: "Individual seasons might now and then be run at a trifling loss, and third- or fourth-rate companies could even make a little profit . . , on the condition of adhering relentlessly to a standard of performance liable at any moment to cause the outraged spirit of some dead master to walk the earth again like that of Hamlet's father." And (p. 169) in deference to the letters of protest from every corner of England "we arranged for an early conference at which 'Salome' would be trimmed so as to make it palatable to the taste of that large army of objectors who would never see it."

I give these statements not only for themselves but in order to convey the material of the book and the qualities of its author which make it that rare thing—a book concerned with musical matters that is worth reading and highly readable. What contributes to making it readable is the fact that it is written by a man whose strong interest in music is only one of the interests of an educated Englishman,

Lend-Lease: Weapon for Victory

By E. R. STETTINIUS, JR.

Already hailed as one of the great books of our time, this complete and authentic story of lend-lease is a thrilling picture of the war on every front. "This book is a chronicle, for Congress and the nation . . . the plain, factual and tremendous story of what lend-lease aid, and reverse lend-lease, mean."—The New Republic. $3.00

Winning the Peace in the Pacific

By S. R. CHOW

Dr. Chow, Professor of International Law at National Wuhan University, presents for the consideration of the Western public the first definitive program for Far-Eastern postwar planning, and suggests the basic requirements for security in that area. $1.50

The Innocents at Cedro

By R. L. DUFFUS

The New York Times critic recalls, with wit and subtlety, a year he once spent in the eccentric household of Thorstein Veblen at Cedro Cottage near Stanford University. "An exquisitely turned idyll of a strange and exciting year in a young man's life."—Sterling North. $2.00

Red Roses for Me

By SEAN O'CASEY
Author of "The Plough and the Stars"

A strike in Dublin is the basic incident of this new play by the distinguished Irish dramatist. "A wondrously beautiful play . . . he is Ireland's one authentic living poet."—Benjamin DeCasseres. "Full of astonishingly beautiful poetry."—Philadelphia Inquirer. $2.00 and whose writing about music is therefore enriched constantly by his reading of literature and sharpened by his keen eye for human absurdity. On the other hand it includes confident obiter dicta on world economics and politics which make one grit one's teeth and rush ahead to the next of the observations on music that are so sound, perceptive, brilliant.

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY
60 Fifth Avenue New York 11, N. Y.

These observations tell us a great deal about Beechamthe intensity and unusual range of his musical interest, the excellence of his understanding and taste. And they are made in the course of an account of his activities up to 1924 which tells us more about him that is interesting to know. Journalism-first in England, then in America-has built up the idea of him as a rich amateur who, lacking professional training, used his money to create for himself the opportunities to do the things in music for which he was not prepared and equipped, and who by blundering along in this way long enough acquired competence in doing them—but even then only the competence of a rich dilettante. Actually he began as a youngster endowed with musical talent of professional caliber who happened to be the son of a rich man; and being untroubled by the guilt which has led some American sons of millionaires into neurotic contortions and expiation in the form of support of the Communists' termite activities, he used his father's money to buy himself scores of all the music he was interested in, instruction in all the instruments he wanted to familiarize himself with, and in harmony, counterpoint, orchestration, composition, and in this way to give himself a musical training as thorough and professional as a young German with the same talent would have obtained at one of the state conservatories. And at the point where the German would have begun to obtain practical experience and skill in conducting by beginning to conduct in a small state opera house, Beecham began to obtain the same practical experience and skill by knocking about with a touring opera company; where the German would have moved on to larger state opera houses, Beecham helped to finance the orchestras, choruses, and opera companies with which he enriched the musical life of his country at the same time as he developed himself into one of the world's great musicians. If money has ever been better used I haven't heard about it. B. H. HAGGIN

The Future of Germany

GERMANY AFTER HITLER. By Paul Hagen. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

GERMANY WILL TRY IT AGAIN. By Sigrid Schultz. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.50.

WHAT TO DO WITH GERMANY. By Louis Nizer. Ziff-Davis Publishing Company. $2.50.

HAT shall we do about Germany after we have obtained its unconditional surrender? Our leaders, mindful perhaps of the old adage about first catching your rabbit, are reticent on this subject. But their silence has done nothing to discourage unofficial cooks from publishing a wide variety of plain and fancy recipes.

Here we have the proposals of three of them with three very different backgrounds and approaches to the subject. Paul Hagen is a young man but a veteran in the war against Hitler. He was one of the Socialists who attempted to instill new life into the German Social Democratic Party in the lark days when the Weimar Republic was breaking up. He was a leader in the underground movement after Hitler took over. Now he looks hopefully to a United Nations victory and a new opportunity for a democratic Germany.

Sigrid Schultz can also write with authority on Germany. American born, of Norwegian descent, she received part of her education there and later spent over twenty years in Berlin as a correspondent for the Chicago Tribune (a fact which should not be held against her). Her main purpose in this book is not to present any program for the future of Germany but to warn us that the pan-German movement, with its belief in Germany's right to dominate, preceded Hitler, and will try to survive him.

Louis Nizer, a successful American attorney, has, so far is one can tell from his book, no first-hand knowledge of Germany or indeed of Europe. He has read widely but not too wisely, as is shown by his citation of Caesar and Tacitus too prove the ingrained aggressiveness of the Germans. If my memory serves, J. Caesar had some fairly unpleasant remarks to make about British barbarians also; and did not the Teutons of whom Tacitus wrote include some of the tribes which later invaded England? However, when writing about the problems presented by the prosecution of war criminals Mr. Nizer is interesting if not especially profound.

Both Miss Schultz and Mr. Nizer write in a don't-let-usbe-fooled-again vein, and it is easy to agree with them about the stupidity of being tough on paper and weak in practice. But we should beware the tendency to believe that if we squelch German aggression once and for all, the problem of European peace will be solved. Aggression is not a German patent, even if the Germans have been outstanding in adding new wrinkles to it, and the task of the peacemakers will be to attempt a settlement which will inhibit aggression anywhere by anyone.

It is at least possible, in view of the Nazis' Götterdämmerung strategy, that Germany will be so weakened morally and physically before it surrenders that it will not recover for generations, if ever. It may suffer a catastrophe comparable to that it experienced in the Thirty Years' War—a prime factor, as Hagen rightly points out, in its political and social retardation. It might sink into an apathetic state of permanent invalidism. This would not be a healthy development for its neighbors. We need to remember how sinister an influence Turkey exercised on the morals of its would-be heirs in the days when it was the Sick Man of Europe.

For similar reasons, it would be fatal either to divide Germany into separate states or to carve it up and distribute the pieces. This would start a game of grab, and the winning countries would find themselves cursed with irredentist sores which would inevitably infect their political systems. Both our American authors agree with Hagen that any attempt to dismember Germany should be ruled out. So too, they reject, as any civilized person must, proposals to expunge Germany either by extermination of its inhabitants or by mass sterilization. Let those who disagree volunteer to man the firing squads and the surgical wards.

Places beloved in English Literature

IN PICTURES, PROSE AND POETRY

Literary England

Photographs by DAVID E. SCHERMAN Descriptive text by RICHARD WILCOX Preface by CHRISTOPHER MORLEY

Firty large and beautiful photographs of famous English scenes... with the treasured passages which make them forever memorable. Canterbury Cathedral... Fleet Street... Daffodils, at Ullswater... The Thirty-Nine Steps... and many more... as seen by two staff members of LIFE magazine. A handsome volume, beautifully printed and bound. A Book-of-the-Month Club dividend.

"A book to serve as reminder of travel or as war-time substitute... assurance that English literature is rooted firmly in English ground."

$3.95 A RANDOM HOUSE BOOK

DATED WAR MAP

20 x 26 inches

Price

20 cents Postpaid

A new world map in colors covering the progress of the war and indicating the Moscow, Tehran, and Cairo Conferences. Opposite each place which has been prominent in the war is marked the date of the event associated with it.

The map is a dramatic compression of the war period. It is a reminder of the

STULL-HATCH GEOGRAPHIES

with their global and polar projection maps and recent war news and war supplements.

Journeys Through Our World Today $2.00 postpaid

Our World Today

$2.40 postpaid

Also obtainable in 4 volume edition

- 1. Journeys Through Many Lands, 1943. $1,20.
- 2. Journeys Through North America, 1943. $1.68.
- 3. Europe and Europe Overseas, 1943. $1.72.
- 4. Asia, Latin America, United States, 1943. $1.72.

Allyn and Bacon

Boston Atlanta New York San Francisco Chicago Dallas Assuming, then, that Germany retains its identity more or less within its 1919 boundaries, what is its future to be, and how is it to be led to the paths of peace and democracy? All three of these books agree on one thing—that the economic roots of pan-Germanism must be utterly destroyed. This means that the Junker landowners, who have held a hereditary position of privilege, must be expropriated and that the great industrialists, who made their businesses political instruments, must be liquidated. It was these forces, operating behind the Weimar façade, that prepared the ground for Hitler. As long as they retain their economic basis of power, no development of democracy in Germany is possible.

I confess that my study of Lord Vansittart's ideas has been cursory, but I am under the impression that he missed this vital point. And, indeed, we must expect strong opposition by British and American conservatives alike to the destruction of property rights. After the occupation there is all too much reason to fear that Allied administrators will tend to listen to offers of cooperation from German counts and bank directors. Displaying charming manners and speaking perfect English, these men will explain that they were always opposed to the Nazis and express their eagerness to help the Allies preserve the country from anarchy. To fall for this confidence trick would be the first fatally easy step toward a pan-German revival. The alternative policy is outlined quietly but convincingly by Paul Hagen. He knows that the Germans must create their own democracy, and he does not shirk the obstacles they will have to overcome. He realizes that Germany cannot disclaim responsibility for Hitler, that it must serve humbly to recover its honor and work hard to make reparation. But he asks that the democratic revolution shall not be impeded and that the burdens imposed shall not be such as to leave Germany without any glimmering of hope.

Hagen points out that revolutionary situations usually arise from the military defeat of despotic powers, but I question his assumption that such a situation must be favorable for a democratic revolution. Liberties cannot be won for a people, only by a people. Historically they have been achieved when men have fought for them, taking the risk of challenging a strongly intrenched despotism. That is how the United States, England, and France won their revolutions. The German workers lost theirs because in 1918, presented with a revolution by the Allied nations, they failed to grasp the substance of power, contenting themselves with its shadow. And at the moment when they might have challenged and overcome the rising power of Nazism, when von Papen's high-handed dismissal of the Socialist Prussian government gave them a fighting issue, they hung back, too respectable, too afraid of the consequences, to seize the opportunity.

Because I agree with Hagen that Germany can only save its soul through revolution and because I question the worth of a revolution brought about primarily by outside force, I would like to see some consideration given to a proposal reported by Miss Schultz as coming from underground leaders. It is, briefly, that in the moment of victory, when the German army is thoroughly defeated and retreats within its own borders, the Allies should establish an iron ring around the German frontiers and let the German people fight it out.

The suggestion is that the army leaders would fall out with the Nazis, and that while a bloody struggle between the two was in progress, mutinous soldiers would supply the population with arms and give them a chance to cleanse their country and establish a democratic regime. It is most unlikely that any such plan will be adopted, but one way or another any lasting reform of Germany must come from within.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Smaller than Art

FROM SHAKESPEARE TO JOYCE. By Elmer Edgar Stoll. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.50.

PROFESSOR STOLL is, of course, one of the best-known living students of Shakespeare, but I must confess that beyond a stray essay or two I had read nothing of his before I took up "From Shakespeare to Joyce." In view of the imposing list of his books, my skimpy acquaintance with him made me hesitate about reviewing this one. Having read it, however, I am encouraged to believe that I know the nature and range of Professor Stoll's ideas fairly well. Nor is this a matter of ex pede Herculem. It is not only that, with almost excessive obligingness, Professor Stoll has correlated his present comments with more than a hundred footnotes involving his previous books. It is even more that his cardinal contentions are few and that they are stated with notable emphasis and restated with immoderate frequency.

Professor Stoll's title suggests a rather comprehensive study of most of English literature; the book itself, however, is largely confined to the period between Shakespeare and Congreve and, even so, seeks much less to assess or analyze writers than to use them as a tiltyard for certain attitudes about art. Professor Stoll's two main attitudes can perhaps, without too great unfairness, be whittled down to this: that a work of art must be taken at its face value, and that art and life are two very different things. The two attitudes partly coalesce in that they both deny, for art any larger frame of reference. The face-value theory forbids us to bring to bear any historical, social, or psychological data that might provide work of art with interior illumination or additional meaning-"In all art," says Professor Stoll, "what is not expressed does not exist." The art-differs-fromlife theory goes well beyond the obvious recognition that art is neither photographic nor formless; it is that great art is "exaggeration." Professor Stoll quotes many times Corneille's "Les grands sujets de la tragédie . . . doivent toujours aller au delà du vraisemblable."

Up to a certain point, of course, Professor Stoll's first contention has a corrective value and his second contention a palpable validity. Doubtless the trend of literary criticism, influenced by Taine, Marx, and Freud, has become a little oppressively historical, sociological, and psychoanalytic. Aesthetic criticism, with the eye square on the object rather than around and behind it, has accordingly suffered—and, along with it, our responsiveness to art has suffered too. But Professor Stoll's attitude forfeits most of its usefulness by reason of its extremism. It puts a work of art in a vacuum; it condemns as extraneous and injurious all those factors—social, historical, psychological—that make up the sensibility

AN ENGLISH TRANSLATION FROM THE PORTUGUESE OF

THE GREAT EPIC OF BRAZIL

Rebellion Backlands

神社

(OS SERTÕES)

By EUCLIDES DA CUNHA

Admirably translated with an introduction and notes by

SAMUEL PUTNAM

The one of the strangest stories ever recorded as historical fact; a personal war waged between a ragged, fanatic preacher and the government of Brazil. It raged for ten months, and ended only when 5,200 houses and every man, woman and child in them had been destroyed. Sixteen editions of Os Seriões have appeared in Brazil, and it has also been published in a Spanish edition. It now takes its destined place among the greatest books of mankind.

CARLETON BEALS: "Among the great powerful books of universal literature. Fully the peer of Tolstoy's War and Peace."

558 PAGES, ILLUSTRATED, $5.00

OF CHICAGO

A slum sits for its portrait.

Street Corner Society

BY WILLIAM FOOTE WHYTE

THE AUTHOR spent three and a half years eating, drinking, working, playing—actually living with "Street Corner Society" (in this case an Italian-American slum district). The result is an absorbing report on the homes and families, as well as corner gangs, racketeers, ward politicians and the environment that produces them.

HARRY HANSEN: "Whyte offers fresh material on the ever important subject of American community life and citizenship, presenting it eloquently from the human angle."—New York World-Telegram. $3.00

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

5750 Ellis Avenue Chicago 37, Illinois

110 8

1000

17 []

Max 1

SÉ COL

net c

2: 50

ie re

FOR Spring

WALTER CLARK

FIGHTING JUDGE

By Aubrey Lee Brooks. The story of a great

My Aubrey Lee Brooks. The story of a great "dissenter"—for thirty-five years Chief Justice of North Carolina's Supreme Court — who fifty years ago advocated the eight-hour day, property rights for women, rule by legislatures and not by judges, and lashed our against the monopolies and child labor interests. February 26, $3.00

JUSTICE AND WORLD SOCIETY

By Laurence Stapleton. How can Nazism be criticized and condemned if nn universally valid idea of justice exists? How did this concept disappear from the social sciences? Why is its revival essential to the maintenance and further development of civili-zation? These important questions are asked and answered in this volume. April 4, $2.00

THE LEAGUE TO ENFORCE PEACE

By Ruhl J. Burtlett. The story of a powerful peace movement at the close of the first World War, of the organization that backed Wilson's plans, of how these plans were wrecked, and who did the wrecking. April 15, $2.50

THE ROAD TO SALEM

By Adelaide L. Fries. The story of a Moravian community on the Carolina frontier is here told by an eye-witness, Catherina Ernst, in her "autobiog-raphy," which the author has supplemented from other Moravian records. $4.00

RECENTLY PUBLISHED
FREEDOM FORGOTTEN
AND REMEMBERED	2.50
CARTEL By Ervin Hexitet	$6.00
THE TENNESSEE VALLET
AUTHORITY By C. Herman Pritchett	$3.50
THIS IS LORENCE By Lodwick Hartley	$3.00
I CAN GO HOME AGAIN	$3.00
RACE AND RUMORS OF RACE By Howard W. Odum	$2.00
THE HAWTHORN TREE	ON ON
By Paul Green $2.00	napet :
The state of the s	AROLINA

of an age; it assumes that a work of art only states and does not suggest; it denies to criticism the right to be suggesting and exploratory in turn. "Hamlet," God knows, has been twisted into a hundred shapes, some of them remarkably queer; but on the other hand if the full truth emerged unmistakably from what was "expressed," could a hundred theories have ever been formed about it?

Professor Stoll's separation of art and life seems to me equally excessive. To be sure, Professor Stoll is principally concerned with Greek and Elizabethan tragedy, where a bigger-than-life effect is paramount and where Aristotle's pregnant contention that plot counts above character is richly vindicated. But Mr. Stoll condemns later literature for turning realistic, for choosing "an action derived from the character." But since Shakespeare's time the distance between art and life has grown less: however vulnerable "realism" itself has proved, the realistic impulse—if only as something to rebel against-has pervaded literature. For one thing, our heroes, unlike the kings and great men of action of classical art, have become much more like ourselves. Art has had to abandon the old intensities for modern complexities, and these complexities involve the "psychology" that Professor Stoll presumably considers the arch-foe of "drama." Hence for him to insist dogmatically that "the essential and vital material of art is not actual experience but . . . an imaginative one" is to generalize unwarrantably. Any kind of experience-actual, observational, oneiric, or imaginative-can provide the essential material; what counts is the transforming and plastic power of the artist. Professor Stoll cannot lock up literature with the great but rusty key of classical tragedy; it is not, after all, a master-key. Imaginative experience may have created "Othello," but personal experience and direct observation were largely the "material" of works of art from "Tom Jones" to "A la recherche du temps perdu." Improbability and exaggeration may help make "King Lear" something bigger than life; but it is scope and multiplicity that make "War and Peace" something bigger than life.

But what further damages Professor Stoll's main contentions is the critical intelligence behind them. Strait-jacketed by his theories, Professor Stoll brings to literature such a rigid mind and conditioned sensibility that, while strongly insisting that we must judge works of art on their own terms, he happily proceeds to judge them on his. Moreover, one cannot avoid the suspicion that Professor Stoll's separation of art and life rests no less on a temperamental need than on an aesthetic theory. There are indications of an academic nature that can cope with art only when it is put behind glass, when its soundness or faultiness can be gauged by having recourse to the rules rather than to experience.

There are natures—in some respects, the most valuable sort of natures-that react to art as a purely aesthetic experience; natures that possess extraordinary taste, sensibility, and discernment. But Professor Stoll's is not one of them. He is, indeed, so uncertain in taste, wobbly in judgment, and stodgy in outlook that, for all his erudition and cerebration, he must be considered rather a controversialist than a critic. We can hardly put much trust in a man who includes Wilde in a list of "the greatest English poets and critics since Milton's day," or who considers Browning greater than Dickens or Balzac. We can hardly keep patient with a man ho, while presumably operating at the most enlightened evel of criticism, reports that our current "high-class" novels cannot . . . be read in the family circle aloud." We can ardly keep a straight face with a man who, feeling that minness's needs defining to begin with, defines it as "the libernian intemperance beverage." We can hardly credit a an with the psychological awareness of an undergraduate tho, as proof of the folly of interpreting a writer through is work, cites the fact that Kipling glorified the practical an and Scott and Stevenson the adventurous! And when rofessor Stoll moves in on contemporary literature, the realts are striking indeed; his squeamishness is unimportant hen set beside his misapprehensions. The strangest people te linked together in the strangest pursuits; and anyone, would almost seem, who is more advanced than the Vicorians is disposed of as part of "the Vanguard." There isn't oom to enumerate Professor Stoll's vagaries; suffice it that fax Lerner bobs up u "coterie-writer." Psychoanalysis is, f course, the primal curse and Joyce the leading miscreant. rofessor Stoll has-I should think; I've read only a small art of it-a pretty good case with "Finnegans Wake," in ne sense that the labor involved is out of all proportion to ne rewards. But he plumb ruins his case by making it the oint of his attack that there virtually are no rewards.

Finally—and not just captiously—we have reason to woner whether Professor Stoll can even be a judge of good riting when, time and again, he passes for the press such triting as this:

As the King breaks with both daughters, cries out upon them, anticipates madness, and rushes out upon the heath into the tempest, the action, as we have noticed, reaches the climax; and the part of the scene that is in question—that is, the latter part, but still before the absolute rupture, when he turns, repulsed, from one daughter to the other,—is stylized in the sense that, not a trait of character, but the emotional motif of his forlornness and abandonment is presented, and is developed to the limit—even at the character's expense—as he falls back upon Goneril, whom he had cursed and at the sight of whom on her entrance, a few minutes before, he has appealed to the heavens.

Make mine "Finnegans Wake."

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

Architects of Young America

REEK REVIVAL ARCHITECTURE IN AMERICA: Being an Account of Important Trends in American Architecture and American Life Prior to the War Between the States. By Talbot Hamlin. Oxford University Press. $7.50.

N AMERICAN architectural writing the position of Talbot Hamlin is unique. No one else with any such gift of incidity and such breadth of scholarly knowledge is writing, in these exacerbating times, with such serenity and such ciendliness to the whole range of creative architectural efort. Hamlin is as warm to the aims of the youngest designters of our time as he is to the architecture of a hundred ears ago which is his special hobby. In his approach he hodels for the architect as the antithesis of the soldier; wherever harmony and good-will are lost, the architect is "A ringing answer to Vansittartism" - N. Y. TIMES

GERMANY After HITLER

By PAUL HAGEN

THIS book answers the questions that only a man who has himself been part of the German revolutionary movement could answer; questions that must be faced by everyone who considers the various plans for "dealing with" Germany after victory. MAX LERNER says this book is "indispensable for anyone who wants to talk about the central problem of our decade."

2nd Large Printing. $2.50

One of the strangest, most remarkable narratives ever written.

THE LOST WEEKEND

A novel by CHARLES JACKSON

THE straightest fastest-reading prose you could want to read; has come as close to laying bare the mind of an abnormal man as have James Joyce and Krafft-Ebing."

—Chicago Sun 3rd Large Printing. $2.50

Out of the Haiti travellers never see

CANAPÉ

VERT

By PIERRE MARCELIN and PHILIPPE THOBY-MARCELIN Translated by Edward Larocque Tinker

ASTRONG, beautiful and weird novel of Haiti—the Haiti of Vodun-rites and zombies, primitive sex life and wild dancing. The authors, both Haitian born, have captured the true subtlety of native mentality with all its naive reasoning and the tang and savor of its humor. $2.50

FARRAR & RINEHART, N.Y.

very I defeated. Today any such writing must carry a certain monastic flavor; you withdraw to it when you want to regain touch with that large spirit that must rebuild the world.

The term "Greek Revival" is, as Dean Arnaud says in his introduction, something of a misnomer. Not only were the architects and their patrons "American first, Greek second," but in some ways architecture was for the first time fully American. The Greek part of it was essentially a system of decoration-or an organizing device that served to put thought in order. This was the mask under which America started to grow a face. In the process the mask itself gradually dissolved. A familiar story appears again and again in the early part of the book, of condescension from foreigners at just those points where the canons were giving way to new needs and a new spirit; so creation had begun. The significance of the time was at least threefold: it marked the beginning of cultural independence from colonialism; it saw the first professional group of American architects; it witnessed, above all, the development of all sorts of new American building plans marking new ways of living as the country underwent a vast expansion.

In general histories of architecture plans are reproduced all too rarely. Even in this book, with its unusual number, we don't get half enough; but these-many of them from the splendid Historical American Buildings Survey-suffice to dispose of the widespread myth that the architect of the Greek Revival period, when he built a house, merely reproduced a Greek temple in wooden miniature and then filled it full of holes. The diversity was remarkable, as was the skill. Good plans have a way of cutting across styles, and such a plan as that of the Sears house-now modified as the Somerset Club-in Boston, by Alexander Parris, would be contemporary, with only unimportant changes, tomorrow. Again, this was the period of Western settlement; and a proliferation of plans, especially house plans, would have taken place under any stylistic mantle. So this story of a "middle period" in American building embraces, despite the limiting title, the establishment of important types such as the Midwestern farmhouse, with its L- and T-shaped arrangement-and recessed porch in one or more side wings-and one-story plans like the Kentucky one on page 243, which with minor changes would again be strikingly "modern." The scope, range, and explicit scholarship of Professor Hamlin's study make it the finest source, on a country-wide scale, of information on this basic building development for those of us who hitherto have known only the types of the Eastern cities, or the Southern plantations, with perhaps the usual smattering about the Vieux Carré in New Orleans.

Architects will find special interest in the detailed account of their first professional brethren. A turning-point was marked. Thus the competition for the national Capitol was won by Thornton, an amateur; but "all of his chief assistants and followers were architects in the modern sense of the word." Before that, most designs had been in the hands of foreign architects or, mainly, carpenter-builders. Familiar cries are heard, such as Latrobe's complaint against the Philadelphia Carpenters' Company: "My very follies and faults and whims have been mimicked, and yet there is not a single instance in which I have been consulted." But again there is the counter-criticism from Michigan: "I suppose

[the governor went out of the state for his plans] because the Mechanics of Michigan do not assume that dignified and name Architect! or any of those lofty titles as Esq'rs, &c the elevation approved is of the Gothic style of architecture, painted up to the eyes, splendid in appearance, but will be paltry in execution, on account of the limited means."

The volume is divided on a regional basis, and inhabitants of the major regions will use it as a veritable handbook in which to look up the local edifices, whether houses, public buildings, or institutions.

Such a wealth of talent was at work that execution and expression, of course, varied greatly. The use of Greek details was, as Professor Hamlin reiterates, far from slavish; indeed, many of the problems had no Greek precedents and were solved by new extensions, as for example the domed vault of the Subtreasury Building in New York.

In any event it would aid understanding to think of the Greek forms as a convention, one which was fortunately simple, pliant, and incisive. The exalted level-headedness and elevated clarity which the convention nurtured in the best work were qualities that could continue even after the Greek matrix was dropped, and do continue in one strain of contemporary work in which there is no visible trace of an anthemion.

In the last revealing chapter, Why the Greek Revival Flourished and Why It Failed, there is a penetrating summary of that free, tolerant, and libertarian early American culture which had "discovered that it is better to see and hear beautiful things than ugly ones; had, in a word, waked up from a nightmare."

DOUGLAS HASKELL

Grim Diary

WAR DIARY. By Jean Malaquais. Translated from the French by Peter Grant. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.75.

DON'T imagine that many readers will greatly cherish Jean Malaquais's war diary just now, even though it has been warmly commended by André Gide and admirably translated by Peter Grant. The diary pictures modern warboth the politics of it and the business of soldiering—in a starkly unheroic light reminiscent of Cummings's "The Enormous Room"; and as everyone knows, the time to publish an "Enormous Room" is after a war. Furthermore Malaquais writes, at times, a pretty self-conscious prose; even under heavy shell fire he can produce such glib rhetoric as the following: "I knew clearly, in that instant, that all those on our side and all those on the other, and all those who under the impassive gaze of the sky vomit out their life-I knew that what brought them close to me was the incommensurable grandeur of their loneliness." This is the kind of strained eloquence that one expects, not of a real French intellectual, but of an intellectual as imagined by some French novelist -say, a Jerphanion created by a Jules Romains. And the truth may well be that Malaquais, an uncompromising leftist, has suffered a kind of emotional deterioration as a result of his political isolation. Because he holds beliefs which have had less and less to do with immediate political realities and choices, he has been forced into a position where even the most sincere convictions and the most deeply felt anguish sound at times like exhibitionism. The sense of unrealitythough not necessarily the histrionics—is no doubt a familiar phenomenon today, and many radicals experience it in proportion as they retain their earlier beliefs. Malaquais's is a new and more desperate "lost generation."

But Malaquais, the author of "Men from Nowhere," is in general a very promising writer, and his war diary, despite its faults, is a serious account of a man's conflict with a militarized world. The conflict is first of all a simple one between an uncommonly sensitive individual and the rude promiscuities of army life. Many writers have evidently been glad enough to surrender their equivocal artist's status-to escape its responsibilities, if you like-in exchange for a soldier's wider social recognition and more regulated life. Malaquais, called up into the French army in September, 1939, frankly resented the process and despised his fellow-soldiers. To him they seemed to accept militarization "not so much on account of the compulsion which obliges them to, as because of the license which they find in it"; and a large part of his diary is taken up with recording his disgust at the obscenity, drunkenness, belching, and wind-letting with which he was surrounded. We can't fail to sympathize with him; quartered with his squad in a miserable shed, he doubtless had an unusually cruel exposure to these familiar forms of animal crudity. But Malaquais generalizes too much; he is not content until he has converted his emotion into a kind of allenveloping misanthropy—a misanthropy which is all righteous indignation and little wit and which interferes with his attempts to describe his fellow-soldiers. Later on, it is true, he finds more acceptable companions; and after Hitler invades France he is too busy escaping from the Nazis to write very reflectively of mankind. Yet even amid the great rout of the French population in June, 1940, he pauses to observe with horror some odd eruptions of unregenerate human nature: a curé who suddenly and for no reason throws a strange girl from her bicycle and tramples her, screaming, "She's a whore! She's a spy!" and two fleeing women who perform an impromptu bacchanale in the road until some soldiers, noticing, break ranks and rush upon them. Certainly Malaquais-who is in fact Pole by birth-has no part in the indulgent naturalism of the French tradition.

But his quarrel with mankind has more behind it than simply the outraged fastidiousness implied by his physical disgusts. His feeling that man is a beast seems to be connected with his belief that man has proved himself a hopeless political coward in refusing to put an end to "this accursed system of human relations which exhausts its genius preparing one massacre on top of another." It is true that he shares the old Marxist conviction that we are what we are because of what he calls "social coercion." But this belief, formerly an optimistic one which expected man's nature to improve in proportion as he was freed from economic exploitation, is now for Malaquais a doctrine of despair. And from his experience it would be easy to decide that Marxism has come full circle, beginning with an unlimited faith in human possibilities and ending with unlimited pessimism; and a philosophical reactionary might try to draw appropriate conclusions. But even assuming that such conclusions could be safely based on one individual's experience, it is true that Malaquais himself tries to warn us against any such procedure. His diary, he tells us, is purely emotional; the jottings in it "express sensations, only rarely thoughts."

The diary ends in July, 1940, after describing with great reportorial brilliance how Malaguais escaped from a column of French war prisoners as they were about to be herded across the Rhine. F. W. DUPER

Wingate in Burma

WINGATE'S RAIDERS. By Charles J. Rolo. The Viking

ITTLE has been written about one of the most incredible episodes of the war. Last spring Brigadier (now Major General) Orde Charles Wingate smuggled a force of several thousand Allied troops from India into the very heart of northern Burma under the noses of the Japanese occupants. "Wingate's Mob" stayed there two months, wrecking communications, doing other mischief which cannot yet be revealed, and perfecting a technique of jungle warfare. This sub rosa invasion forced the Japanese to divert thousands of troops which they might have used against the Chinese in Yunnan or, perhaps, for an invasion of India.

Not the least incredible part of the tale is Orde Wingate himself, one of the military freaks, like Lawrence of Arabia, which England periodically produces. Wingate seems to be odder than most. His cantankerous contempt for his superiors in the British army would have landed anyone else in

PACIFIC OCEAN HAND BOOK

By ELIOT G. MEARS

Professor of Geography and International Trade, Stanford University

Streamlined Pacific Geography

Sixty Illustrations with Additional Global Maps 200 Pages PRICE, $1.00

> JAMES LADD DELKIN Stanford University, California

VATICAN POWER POLITICS IN EUROPE

By Leopold Mannaberg, Ph. D.

The pamphlet used by Moscow last week in the Russo-

PRICE - 25¢; Sle for $1.00 Other pumphlets on this question:

"CATHOLIC CHURCH IN HITLER'S 'MEIN KAMPF'"

"CLERICAL FASCISM IN THE UNITED STATES"

"CLERICAL FASCISM IN ITALY" .18

"JAPANESE-VATICAN ENTENTE" 33 "HOW THE POPES TREATED THE JEWS" .15

ALL SIX PAMPHLETS POSTPAID FOR $1.00.

Order from:

AGORA PUBLISHING CO. 229 WEST 40th STREET, NEW YORK 19, N. Y.

STAGE PLAYS

"A real evening in the theatre" N.Y. Times
"DFCISION"

BELASCO THEA. 44th ST., EAST OF BROADWAY

MICHAEL TODD Presents
BOBEY CLARK IN

MEXICAN HAYRIDE

by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS . Staged by HASSARD SMORT
SONGS BY COLE PORTER

WINTER GARDEN, 8'way & 50th 51. Mots. Wed. & Sat.

"A definite hit . . . gay, glib, daffy — enormously funny."

RUTH GORDON

OVER TWENTY-ONE

ISIC BOX 45th St W of Rivay C18,4636—Fvas 8:40 Em. Feb. 22 Thurs & S2

MOTION PICTURES

20th Century-Fox presents LLIEU HITCHCOCK'S

LIFE BUAI

Starring Tallulah Bankhead with WILLIAM BENDIX
Continuous Performances ASTOR B'WAY at 4518 ST.

"A DEEPLY TOUCHING STORY OF PERSONAL SACRIFICE."

—Crowther, N. Y. Times

THE SULLIVANS

With ANNE BAXTER THOMAS MITCHELL STEEN BOYLE
A 20th Century-Fox Picture
NOW PLAYING ROXY 7th AVENUE at 88 STREET

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
55 Fifth Avenue
New York 3, N. Y.

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give us at least two weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine:

☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8 ☐ 3 Years $11

Remittance is inclosed

.....

☐ Bill me

INTRODUCTORY OFFER TO NEW SUBSCRIBERS ONLY:

Oash with order

Canada $1 a year extra Foreign $1 a year extra Pan American Union requires no extra postage

NAME......ADDRESS.....

2-19-44

the guardhouse, but General Wavell knew genius when he saw it. If Wingate indulged one of his several manias by spraying Flit on the bald heads of two visiting generals—well, they would just have to put up with it. If Wingate was such a religious fanatic that he coded his military messages in Biblical quotations—well, he did get results.

The whole idea of the invasion of Burma last spring was so crazy that the British army wouldn't give Wingate firstline troops. He had to take draftees: factory hands from Liverpool and Manchester. First he spent six months making jungle fighters out of these city men; he taught them how to kill in the dark, how to march without leaving tracks, how to scare off wild animals, how to cook pythons. When his guerrilla invaders had finished their havoc in Burma, there seemed little hope of getting back to India; the entire reinforced Japanese army in northern Burma was on their trail. Wingate's own column stayed motionless in the jungle for a week, hoping to fool the Japanese. During that nerve-racking week Wingate recited poetry to his starving men-but in a whisper, lest enemy scouts hear. He softly lectured them on the painting of the eighteenth century. He argued quietly, stubbornly, that Wimpy in the comic strip was a more human character than Popeve. When it came time to kill the mules for food, Wingate knew how to do so without firing a tell-tale shot; he slit the carotid arteries, explaining the operation as would a surgeon in medical school. More men returned to India than Wingate originally had expected.

The story of Wingate's Mob is told by Charles J. Rolo, a young man in his twenties who works for the British Information Services in the United States. He talked to men who came out from the raid and had access to the official records. One would think that he had been along. His feat of creative chronicling is comparable to that of William L. White in "They Were Expendable." He picked up the human details that make the story live and wove them together with the skill of a dramatist.

The Wingate raid proved several interesting and heartening points. First, British men from Manchester and Liverpool could be turned into better jungle fighters than the Japanese, given the right leader. Second, a large army could exist in enemy-held territory without land communication with its home base. Wingate's men were supplied entirely by airplanes that dropped all their food and ammunition; and also dropped such items as mail, false teeth, a monocle, and an autographed copy of the new biography of Shaw. Third, the Burmese were not as anti-British as they had been painted, or else had changed their minds after sampling Japanese rule. Of course Wingate is a man who gets along better with native races, whom he respects, than with his army superiors. He had the wit to take with him a propaganda section, headed by a Burmese. The natives had many lucrative opportunities to betray the British, but instead helped them.

What Wingate is doing at the present moment is not disclosed. The way he cut through Burmese jungles encourages one to hope that he is continuing to cut through military red tape, and will return to bedevil the Japanese in his own brilliant, fanatical way.

MARCUS DUFFIELD

DRAMA

WASN'T going to mention "Decision" (Belasco Theater) because I thought it crudely conceived, execrably written, and for the most part ineptly performed. Frankly I didn't think the play could last as long as it takes to get a Nation review into print, and I see no point in kicking a bad play when it's down. I still doubt that "Decision" would have lasted as long as it has if most of the drama reviewers had not rushed in with phrases of praise which could easily be extracted, for advertising purposes, from the reservations that accompanied them.

The reviewers were motivated no doubt by a worthy purpose-"Decision" purports to deal severely with the coming American fascism-but to drum up a bad play for that reason, or for any other, seems to me of very doubtful value in the fight against fascism. There is something disturbing as well as ridiculous about the spectacle of a whole row of drama critics leaning over backward and burying their heads in the sand. (It was a great relief to find Wolcott Gibbs still upright.) And isn't it faintly ironical that the hero of "Decision" is a hero because he insists on sticking to his last?

As a matter of fact, the melodramatic events in "Decision," in which a courageous high-school principal gets murdered for opposing the "interests," have no more-if no less-relation to fascism than, say, the murder of Frank Little in Montana several decades ago or the current persecution of John Longo by Mayor Hague. The coming American fascism may be identical with old-fashioned American reaction, but I for one suspect it will be more subtle in form and content. And certainly a convincing and effective play about the subject would have to be a great deal more subtle—on both counts—than "Decision."

MARGARET MARSHALL

RECORDS

THANKS are due both Victor and Columbia for issuing recordings of important works that music-lovers in this country have had little or no opportunity to hear.

Columbia's contribution (Set 544; $3.50) is Mozart's Piano Concerto K.414, which is smaller in scale than some of his other concertos but is written in their idiom and style, and which has a first movement that is characteristic in its mingled grace, poignancy, and gaiety, and an affecting slow movement, but a weak finale. Kentner's performance of the solo part is musically intelligent, though occasionally overpercussive; the orchestral part is beautifully done by the London Philharmonic under Beecham. The recorded sound is clear but not bright—which may be because the treble is too weak for the heavy bass; the surfaces of my copy are poor.

Victor gives us (Set 954; $2.50) Nos. 1 and 3-"Gigues" and "Rondes de printemps"-of the orchestral "Images" by Debussy, of which No. 2 is "Ibéria," one of the greatest of his works. "Gigues" and "Rondes de printemps" are smaller than "Ibéria," but are written in its densely polyphonic, harmonically rich and subtle orchestral idiom. The idiom is especially rich in "Rondes," where it is fascinating in itself, but also lends itself wonderfully to the purposes of an "image" of spring. "Gigues" is less impressive at first; but after several hearings one may be struck by "the capacity for investing an apparently insignificant and lighthearted tune with an almost tragic significance" that Constant Lambert, in his book "Music Ho!," finds in all three pieces, after pointing out that the original title of this one was "Gigue triste." Monteux's performances with the San Francisco Symphony seem excellent, and are recorded with great beauty of the over-all sound, in which individual strands of the polyphony are sometimes not clearly audible. Only one surface of my copy is noisy.

Other Victor records which I have played thus far include a single disc (11-8528; $1) with the great Fugue in E flat for organ (often referred to as the "St. Anne") that concludes one of the volumes of Bach's "Klavierübung." It is usually played with the equally fine Prelude in E flat that opens the volume; but on the present record we get the Fugue by itself, well performed by Joseph Bonnet, and well recorded up to the last third, where the polyphonic texture becomes unclear. Surfaces are noisy.

On another Victor single disc (11-8580; $1) is the performance of Johann Strauss's "Blue Danube" Waltz by Toscanini and the N.B.C. Symphony that took one's breath away a couple of years ago with its freshness of conception, its buoyancy, fire, and grace. It is recorded with remarkable fidelity to the sound of the orchestra in acoustically hard and reverberant Studio 8H; surfaces are poor. And on still another single (11-8487; $1) is an unfamiliar piece by Haydn, "L'Isola diabitata," which is pleasant to listen to, though not of great consequence. It is well performed by Sevitzky with the Indianapolis Symphony, and excellently recorded; surfaces again are noisy.

Columbia's choice from its catalogue for its February record classic is Fauré's Requiem, performed by French singers and instrumentalists under the direction of Bourmauck (Set 354; $5.50). As before I find this work of Fauré very beautiful; and I continue to prefer this sensitive and clearly recorded performance to the one in Victor Set 844. In this set too surfaces are poor.

Having only now received Decca's set (359; $5) of music from "Oklahoma," I can report that the delightful Rodgers tunes and Hammerstein lyrics are sung as well by Celeste Holm, Lee Dixon, Alfred Drake, and all the others of the New York company on these records as on the stage, and that the performances are excellently recorded. Present-day surfaces being what they are it is a surprise to find most of those in my copy quieter than average, and only a very few noticeably noisy.

B. H. HAGGIN

In Early Issues of The Nation

Action Tomorrow

A commentary on recent books by Archbishop Spellman and Monsignor Sheen

By G. A. Borgese

Konrad Heiden's "Der Führer"
Reviewed by Leopold Schwarzschild

Euclides da Cunha's "Rebellion in the Backlands" Reviewed by Elizabeth Wilder

Vernon Bartlett's "Tomorrow Always Comes" Reviewed by Albert Guérard

40% OFF

In place of its regular yearly subscription rate of $5, The Nation offers a special 40 per cent reduced rate of $3 a year to all men now in the armed forces who have a service address in the United States or United States possessions.

TO THE MEN

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 52

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 As a fugitive or his trousers might be (two words, 4 and 7)
- 9 Just the girl to run away with a writer!
- 10 They advance backwards
- 11 Fringe of the Rame clan?
- 12 The winding course of Cockney courtship
- 14 Perhaps this ensemble from "Lucia di Lammermoor" is m favorite of vours?
- yours?
  15 Thrown into the shade perhaps
- 17 They require looking into for the future
- 20 Bring forward, with Signor Mussolini bringing up the rear
- 22 Opens out
- 24 What a tractor does in reverse?
- 26 Thanks to ruler, it is quite attractive
- 27 A disturbing person
- 28 He doesn't correct his own mistakes, a man of this type! (hyphen, and 6)

DOWN

- 2 "Arrest Abe!" (anag.)
- 8 If you make one of yourself, you can't complain if others wipe their boots on you!
- 4 Done effectively by a Scot very merry or sober
- 5 They cross the avenues in New York

- 6 Angelina sued him for breach of promise in the Gilbert and Sullivan operetta
- 7 Males come first in this household 8 "Without s -----, without a tide, She steadies with upright keel" (Ancient Mariner)
- 13 Richard III offered his kingdom for
- one
  16 It is not wise generalship to
  ----- the enemy
- 18 Ran down with Dan for a spree
- 19 A brisk movement in music
- 20 Never lost a war, or won a conference, according to Will Rogers
- 21 Bird which lays other birds' eggs, or something
- 23 Rosie in m tree!
- 25 A beastly place

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 51

ACROSS:—1 SESAME: © COPECKS: 10 SIDE ISSUE: 11 NYLON: 12 EIDOLON: 13 SUCCEED: 14 SPEAR: 16 INELASTIC: 18 UNPOPULAR: 20 WORTH: 22 MOONEYS: 24 HALIDOM: 26 TRIBE: 27 BRITISHER: 28 DONATED: 20 GEMINI.

DOWN:-2 ENDED; 3 A HITLER; 4 ESSEM. TIAL; 5 CREWS; 6 PANACEA; 7 COLLEC-TOR; 8 SYNODIC; 9 USHERS; 15 EXPLO-SION; 17 EARTHLING; 18 UNMATED; 19 PRESENT; 20 WILLIAM; 21 HOMERS; 23 EMBED; 25 DEHAN.

CONTRIBUTORS

ALTER BRODY is well known as a writer on foreign affairs. He has contributed to the New Republic, the New Masses, Soviet Russia Today, and other magazines, and has published two books, "A 'Family Album' and 'Lamentations.'

RUSTEM VAMBERY, formerly professor of criminology at the University of Budapest, is chairman of the American Federation of Democratic Hungarians.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH is Brander Matthews Professor of Dramatic Literature at Columbia University. Among his books are "The Modern Temper," "Comedy and Conscience After the Restoration," "Five Masters," and "Experience and Art." He is now devoting a sabbatical year to writing a book on Samuel Johnson.

EDGAR SNOW worked as a newspaper correspondent in the Far East from 1928 to 1941. He has published a number of books, including "The Political Battle of Asia," "Red Star Over China," and "Far Eastern Front." He speaks and writes Chinese, and has published a book in that language, "Impressions of the Northwest."

LOUIS KRONENBERGER, drama critic of PM, is author of "Kings and Desperate Men," editor of "An Eighteenth Century Miscellany," and translator of the maxims of La Rochefoucauld.

DOUGLAS HASKELL, a member of the staff of the Architectural Record, has written frequently for The Nation on housing, architecture, and industrial design.

F. W. DUPEE teaches English at Columbia University.

MARCUS DUFFIELD writes the weekly review of events, "History in the Making," for the Sunday edition of the New York Herald Tribune.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

American History in Schools and Colleges. The Report of the Committee on American History in Schools and Colleges. Edgar B. Wesley, Director of the Committee. Macmillan. $1.25.

Tomorrow Always Comes. By Vernon Bartlett. Knopf. $2.

Comparative Economic Systems. By Ralph H. Blodgett. Macmillan. $4.

THE Vation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 158

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · FEBRUARY 26, 1944

NUMBER 9

IN THIS ISSUE
THE SHAPE OF THINGS	237
EDITORIALS
Wendell in the Lions' den	239
The Test of Crowley	240
Peace Terms for Japan	241
ARTICLES
Victory Lies in China by Maxwell S. Stewart	242
25 Years Ago in The Nation	244
If We Take Arabian Oil- by I. F. Stone	245
Atoms at Work by Orlando Aloysius Battista	247
In the Wind	248
POLITICAL WAR
Brazil Has an Underground by A. del V.	249
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus	253
BOOKS AND THE ARTS
Action Tomorrow by G. A. Borgese	254
The Romantic as Actor by Joseph Wood Krutch	255
"Down Under" by Marcus Duffield	258
Thurber's Creatures by Clement Greenberg	260
In Brief	261
Films by James Ages	261
Music by B. H. Haggin	262

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 53 by Jack Barrett

Managing Editor

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Washington Editor Literary Editor
I. F. STONE MARGARET MARSHALL
tor Political War Section

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor
J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

J

Drama Critic Joseph wood krutch

263

264

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
LOUIS FISCHER REINHOLD NIEBUHR

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Advertising Manage

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD BLLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U.S.A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 55 Fifth Ave., New York 3, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 818 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THE ATTACK ON THE STRONGHOLD OF TRUK is the boldest step yet taken by the Allied forces in the Pacific war, Destruction of this powerful base would so weaken the Japanese position in the Southwest Pacific that the entire area south of the Mariana Islands and east of Yap and the Netherlands Indies might have to be given up. The seizure of Truk is probably the most important single goal for the navy short of the Philippines and the China coast. For Truk is the only island in the entire South Pacific suitable for development as a major naval base for the final attack on the Japanese homeland. However, we have not yet attempted to land on Truk, and Japanese reports to that effect were either the result of panicky expectations, or, more probably, intended to preface stories of a repulse. The attack was a softening-up raid made by carrier-based bombers, which caught and sank an impressive number of Japanese naval and cargo vessels, as well as heavily punishing ground installations. At the same time it served to prevent any interference by the enemy with our seizure of the Eniwetok atoll, possession of which gives us an advanced base for later operations against Truk. Admiral Nimitz's offensive is rolling according to plan, and no one can any longer complain that the war against Japan is being neglected.

~

THE ARGENTINE POLITICAL CRISIS HAS arisen as the result of a clash of personalities, and a division of opinion regarding methods, rather than by reason of any ideological split in the ruling military-nationalist camp. The conflict came into the open with the leakage of plans for a declaration of war on Germany and Japan. Immediately a group of young officers occupied the Foreign Office and forced the resignation of General Alberto Gilbert, the Foreign Minister, and Enrique P. Gonzalez, Presidential Secretary, who together with President Ramirez composed the inner triumvirate of the government. There is no reason to suppose that Ramirez had suddenly become a sincere convert to the cause of the United Nations. But he was under strong pressure from America and Britain, and, to his disappointment, his mere break with the Axis in January had not produced any sign of the lend-lease armaments which he was counting on to regain parity with Brazil. In addition, according to some well-informed commentators, it was his intention to order a general mobilization following the declaration of war—a step which might have enabled him to regain control of the officers' corps. The Foreign Office coup, carried out by a group whose sense of solidarity with the Nazis did not allow them to stomach the triumvirate's opportunism, has put Ramirez in the humiliating position of being forced to deny that he contemplated war or that undisciplined officers had ousted his Foreign Minister. This revelation of weakness substantiates our frequent assertion that Ramirez is merely a dummy for still more sinister forces.

×

IT SEEMS LIKELY THAT THE PRESIDENT WILL accept most of the recommendations made by Bernard Baruch and John Hancock for demobilization and reconversion of industry, and, if he does so, business at least will have no cause to kick. For the report of these two eminent graduates of Wall Street is, as one would expect, based squarely on the philosophy of private enterprise. Its whole purpose is to get the government out of business as rapidly as possible, to dispose of all government plants and to liquidate all government controls. Provided we create "that atmosphere in which private initiative and resourcefulness can flourish," there is, we are told, no need for depression. Within this frame of reference Messrs. Baruch and Hancock have made a number of sensible proposals. They endeavor to provide speed in terminating contracts and clearing the way for reconversion to normal production with administrative safeguards against fraud. They urge measures to ensure that small business will be given full opportunity to buy surplus materials, machinery, and property, and suggest special credit provision for such enterprise, including liberalization of the Federal Reserve System loans. To guard against the cornering of surplus production facilities by monopolies they propose that the Attorney General be placed on a Surplus Property Policy Board. Their report leads off with recommendations for dealing with the "human problems of demobilization" but the sketchiness of this section contrasts oddly with the detailed provisions made for the solution of business problems. Another significant feature is that while great emphasis is placed on the usefulness of the industry advisory committees of the War Production Board and suggestions made for their strengthening, nothing is said about the need for close association of labor and consumer organizations in the tasks which the report outlines.

*

MR. ROOSEVELT'S GENIUS FOR WINNING when the blue chips are down has never been more effectively demonstrated than in his triumph in the longdrawn-out subsidy fight. For months Republicans and recalcitrant Democrats had won overwhelming victories in every important test in the House and Senate on the anti-subsidy bill. But when the President delivered a scorching veto message, making it clear that those who voted against subsidies would have to assume responsibility before the American public for the collapse of the entire stabilization program, the House sustained him by a margin of twenty-five votes. Election-year politics undoubtedly played a much larger role in the entire fight than most Congressmen would like to admit. Many Senators and Representatives appear to have voted against subsidies in the secure knowledge that the bill would ultimately be vetoed, thus strengthening their position with the farm bloc without running the risk of actually destroying the stabilization program. The battle is not yet over, of course. The opponents of subsidies will undoubtedly try the same tactics again when the bill for the extension of the Price Control Act comes up for consideration. But with the election approaching, we cannot believe that the final result will be any different from the outcome on this occasion.

×

MR. CHURCHILL HAS PROMISED ARMS TO the French underground, according to unofficial reports from Algiers. We hope these reports are true, not only for the sake of the many brave Frenchmen who have been fighting the Nazis with bare hands, but for the sake of the American and British troops who must soon undertake the invasion of Europe. No one any longer doubts that the establishment of beachheads and the penetration of the German defenses which stretch far inland will prove one of the most formidable tasks ever tackled by an army. But it can be lightened if we give our friends on the Continent a chance to help us. Behind the German lines there is already the nucleus of a guerrilla army which could do untold mischief to enemy efforts to concentrate troops and supplies at the points of danger. The Germans are well aware how great this threat from within can be, and with the aid of their Vichy puppets they are making frantic efforts to conscript for slave labor all men of military age in France and to round up the thousands who have taken to the bush. Under Joseph Darnand, a veteran fascist terrorist who has been charged by Vichy with the "maintenance of order," special mobile forces have been organized to hunt down the underground fighters, and stringent economic measures are being taken to starve them out. To enable them to resist, to help them keep their organizations intact for the day of invasion, it is imperative that the trickle of arms that has been delivered by parachute to the French guerrillas be rapidly increased. In a recent speech President Roosevelt spoke of the approaching moment when the Nazis will learn that the people of France are not out of this war. We can count on the French to fulfil this prophecy if we give them the tools for the job.

×

THE DIES COMMITTEE HAS ADDED LITTLE TO public knowledge of the Peace Now movement and in fact omits a lot of illuminating detail previously brought to light by enterprising reporters for the New York Post, World Telegram, and PM. These investigators had turned up a good many leads suggesting links between Peace Now and figures in extremist pre-Pearl Harbor isolationist organizations, including some now under indictment. The Dies probers, however, have chosen to concentrate much of their fire on a mysterious Norwegian, John Albert Collett, who for a time acted as field secretary for Peace Now. His official connection came to an end last fall with his conviction in Cincinnati as a "peeping Tom" - an offense which the Dies committee describes with understandable delicacy as "too disgusting to be recounted in all its details." Collett, it is alleged, obtained a passport from the Nazi authorities in Oslo after the German occupation of Norway, but this suggested link between the Nazis and Peace Now is not followed up in the report. In fact, the evidence presented by the committee hardly sustains the charges of treason it makes against this organization, pernicious as its propaganda is and indifferent as it seems to the company it keeps. Moreover, its membership and financial support appear rather picayune compared with that of some other organizations up and down the country which combine pacifism with divisive agitation of various sorts. If Mr. Dies really wants to expose treasonable activities, there are pools to be fished in the Mid-West promising embarrassingly big catches. Judging by his past performances, however, his hasty job on Peace Now is only a gesture of impartiality heralding a really riproaring "investigation" of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee.

X

THE FOURTH WAR LOAN DRIVE EASILY exceeded its announced goal and to that extent must be counted a success. But it was a success made possible by institutional and corporate investors—other than commercial banks—which topped their quota by a large margin. In spite of—or could it be because of?—the tremendous ballyhoo which accompanied the drive, individual sailed to produce the volume of dollars expected. Up to date, individual subscriptions total only 72 per cent of their allotted quota, but some of the leeway will be made up, as the campaign is to be extended until the end of the month. There is therefore still time for those who have been disinclined to heed the call to "sacrifice," or those who have been repelled by the use of this very inappropriate word, to make a thoroughly sound investment yielding a very favorable return. Incidentally, it may be noted that the lower-income groups have made a much better showing than those more comfortably situated. Sales of the E bonds, the small man's investment, have been far in excess of those during the third warloan drive and will almost certainly exceed their quota at the final tabulation. The lag has been in the marketable issues which are designed to appeal to large investors, and the explanation is that subscriptions have been discouraged by the Treasury's efforts to prevent speculative purchases. In so far as such purchases merely served as window-dressing both for the Treasury and the "patriots" who made them, the lower total for this category of bonds compared with that achieved in the last drive may reflect a greater volume of real savings. But whatever the explanation, it appears that people in the higher income brackets are not, as a class "backing the attack" to the full extent of their ability.

Wendell in the Lions' Den

THE country, it seems to us, is obligated to Wendell L. Willkie for launching the 1944 Presidential season well above the wardheeler's level. Dispensing with the calculated coyness of the professional, Mr. Willkie announces early in the game that he is a candidate and that he thinks the nation is confronted with certain major issues, which he proceeds to enumerate and discuss—all in violation of the traditional rules of winning blocs and influencing delegates. What is more, he challenges his audiences to make miserable the lives of all candidates. "Take no man on faith," he warns: "make him tell you what he believes."

Mr. Willkie thus assumes in fact what candidates generally concede only in rhetoric, to wit, the intelligence of the electorate. And he has made a good beginning of subjecting his own views to the test of that collective intelligence. It required political courage for a Republican leader to urge heavier taxes rather than "economy" as the way to reduce the national debt; to come out bluntly in favor of the federal soldier-vote bill, and to warn farmers against the "good-old-days theory that it no longer is necessary to depend on supported prices, a soil-conservation plan, and federal guaranties of stable market conditions." It required not only courage but political insight to call on the people for further sacrifice -the Churchillian appeal for blood, sweat, and tearsrather than pander to their natural but none the more noble inclination to grouse about gas restrictions and the nuisance of rationing.

By addressing himself in this way to the understanding and fundamental decency of the voters Mr. Willkie places other functionaries of his party in an unenviable position. The larger he grows in stature the more they tend to shrivel. Contrasted with his frankness, the cool slyness of Governor Dewey seems picayune rather than potent. Beside his posing of the issues Landon's cry that "fascism is here in America, and its name is the New Deal" sounds like the shrill hysteria of an abandoned fishwife. About the fatuousness of the Brickers and the manic raving of the McCormicks nothing need be said here.

But this very isolation of Willkie from his fellow-Republicans is the strongest argument against his candidacy. And it is on this score that he abandons logic and prefers to ignore the record. To illustrate President Roosevelt's failure to hold the support of his party in Congress, Willkie told a Seattle audience, "The Secretary of the Treasury presented what I regard as a wholly inadequate tax measure, and yet a committee, a majority of which was made up of members of the President's own party, refused to give him more than one-quarter of the amount asked for." Would the Republican minority of that committee, who were all too glad to join their Democratic colleagues in slashing the President's request, have supported the still higher figure suggested by Mr. Willkie?

No more than they did in fact support the head of their party on the most important measures of the past four years. Willkie favored repealing the arms embargo, but House Republicans opposed repeal by a vote of 143 to 21, and Senate Republicans by 15 to 8. Willkie favored lend-lease, but his party in the House opposed it 135 to 24; in the Senate 17 to 10. A majority of Republican Senators, like Willkie, favored the draft act, but House Republicans voted against it 112 to 52. The list can be extended indefinitely, but to add only the most recent instance of the gap between Willkie and his Congressional colleagues, we refer him to the fight in the House over the federal soldier-vote bill, which 18 Republicans favored as against 175 opposed. Judging by his own standards, there is little sense in Willkie's contention "that the most positive and constructive instrumentality to solve a task of such magnitude [post-war reconstruction] is to be found in the Republican Party."

The "constructive instrumentality" is furious enough at Mr. Willkie as it is. If circumstances dictate his nomination, the Hoffmans, Fishes, and Nyes will accept his leadership with the same degree of warmth and admiration that the Dieses, Coxes, and Wheelers entertain for Mr. Roosevelt, the titular head of their party. Enthusiasm will not be lacking, but it will be less the spirit of a following than that of a pack in full cry. The main difference between Roosevelt and Willkie in this respect is that the one is a veteran master in the art of handling politicians, the other a wide-eyed neophyte.

The Test of Crowley

NE of the most interesting aspects of the report recently made available by the Kilgore committee on international cartels is the ease with which important German concerns slipped back into German hands after the last war. One of the most important of these was the Bayer concern, whose properties and patents were sold to Sterling Products after a promise in December, 1918, that they would not be allowed to return to German ownership or control. Prior to the sale the Alien Property Custodian of that time investigated and found "no taint of German ownership—direct or contingent—and no trace of German influence-near or remote-in the company." But by 1924 the dyestuffs part of the business was back in the hands of Bayer, subsequently becoming the core of the business now known as General Aniline and Film. And even earlier than that, by 1919, Sterling Products-now Sterling Drug, Inc.-had promised to pay the old German owners 50 per cent of its profits on the sale of pharmaceuticals in Latin America. By the time World War II began, Sterling was helping I. G. Farben—which Bayer helped to form in 1926—to blackjack anti-Nazi papers in the Argentine and to evade the British blockade. It is in the light of this past record of good governmental intentions, corporate deception, and broken promises that one must read Leo T. Crowley's first report as Alien Property Custodian in this war. Crowley does, indeed, say that in disposing of these properties he will reserve "the right to weigh, in addition to monetary considerations, the competence of the bidders to maintain the property as a valuable producing concern, their willingness to maintain it as a freely competing institution, and operate it with due regard for the national interest of the United States." Crowley, too, has pledged himself not to let these properties and patents slip back into alien hands, where they may again become the basis of international cartels.

But as our Washington editor, I. F. Stone, pointed out in his letter last week, the patent policies applied by Crowley, the men with whom he is associated in his $75,000-a-year job as head of Standard Gas and Electric, the policies he is following in the management of alien business concerns, and the directors he has appointed create serious misgivings. The key to the job he has been doing lies in the directors and managers he has appointed to operate the alien businesses he has taken over. His report fails to provide a list of those directors and managers; it is clear from his veiled references that in many cases existing managements have been left in control. The public should be fully informed of such cases so that it may judge for itself whether the men are reliable. In one case uncovered by Stone in PM, a leading member of the Schroder banking family was long vicepresident and director of the Schering Corporation under the Alien Property Custodian, although the Schroders were the bankers for Schering in the international hormone cartel. Crowley has appointed Victor Emanuel, his employer in the utility business, to the board of General Dyestuffs and five of Emanuel's associates to the board of General Aniline and Film, although Emanuel was backed by the Schroders financially and the Schroders had many links with I. G. Farben, parent concern of General Aniline and its sales subsidiary, General Dyestuffs.

General Aniline is the most important German concern in the Americas. The Germans, shrewder this time than last, placed key stock control in the hands of Germans who became naturalized Americans and in the hands of Dutch and Swiss dummy corporations. It will be hard to keep the concern from going back to these nominal owners once the war is over; now, while we are in possession, is the time to reorganize General Aniline and to break its cartel ties with I. G. Farben. But after being two years in possession Crowley has yet to take such action. These policies and appointments and this inaction seem a better clue to what Crowley has been doing than his pious rhetoric about preventing "the reappearance of restrictive international cartels." Crowley has indicated his intention of resigning as Alien Property Custodian. We hope his successor will show more understanding of the problem. If he does he will reject Crowley's policies and many of his appointments.

Peace Terms for Japan I: Military

RECENT revelations of the cruel and barbarous treatment of American prisoners of war by their Japanese captors have destroyed the possibility that anything short of the unconditional surrender of Japan will be tolerable to most Americans. But there has been little public discussion of what the actual terms ultimately imposed should be, though the United States will probably play a much more active role in settling the terms for Japan than those for Germany, with which both Russia and Great Britain are more directly concerned.

At the Cairo conference the leaders of Britain, China, and the United States agreed that Japan should be stripped of all territories seized by aggression since 1895. This means that Japan's future boundaries have already been established for the most part—the one element of uncertainty being Russia's possible attitude regarding the southern half of Sakhalin and the northern Kurile most important single step that can be taken to prevent Japanese militarists from renewing their bid for world domination in another twenty or thirty years. For Japan's present economic and strategic strength lies very largely in its empire. Japan's armament industry is dependent on the iron and coal of Manchuria and North China. Sakhalin was its only important domestic source of oil before the war. And Japan's naval and air strength has been made far more effective by possession of strong outlying bases in Korea, Manchuria, Formosa, and the mandated islands.

It must not be assumed, however, that the loss of this territory, vital though its resources have been in building up Japan's present strength, will permanently destroy all danger of Japanese militarism. Numerous other military, political, and economic limitations will have to be imposed on Japan before there can be any such assurance. Most Americans are disposed to be severe without having any clear idea what effect any particular proposal may have on Japanese psychology or the future well-being of Asia's millions. Mere vengefulness, or an effort to keep Japan in a state of permanent subjugation, will, however, be self-defeating. The Japanese are an able, resourceful people. If they are left with nothing to live for except the prospect of revenge, they will ultimately try to make another bid for glory.

There will be general agreement on the necessity of taking every precaution against such an uprising of the Japanese militarists at some later date. As a minimum Japan should be required to surrender what may remain of its navy and air force. All munitions of war should either be destroyed or turned over to the United Nations. More important, all plants and all shipyards capable of producing military equipment should either be destroyed or converted to the production of peace-time goods. The Japanese army should either be limited to a small token force or disbanded, preferably the latter. All pilot training should be prohibited, even under civilian auspices.

Enforcement of these terms will require the stationing of international inspectors in all important Japanese cities for many years to come. Without question these inspectors will be resented as living symbols of Japanese humiliation. Yet not a single one of those restrictions can be safely omitted.

Alone, even these precautions cannot serve the purpose of keeping Japan at peace. The key to success in dealing with that country will not be the effectiveness of disarmament measures but the extent to which the outlook and motivation of the Japanese people can be changed. This in turn depends on whether the spirit of militarism can be rooted out of Japanese psychology after the defeat. Military safeguards will have to be supplemented by positive political and economic measures designed to encourage the growth of democracy and thus undercut the resurgence of militarism. The possibility of developing such measures attuned to the peculiarities of Japanese society will be discussed editorially in early issues of The Nation.

Victory Lies in China

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

ASIC Allied strategy in the Pacific war has been made clear recently both by the unfolding of offensive action and by the statements of high naval and military leaders. Although assaults will be made at many places on the perimeter of Japanese defenses, the main attack will presumably be straight across the Pacific, backed by all the striking power of the American battle fleet, its ultimate objective being the seizure of one or more ports in China to serve as bases for the final drive against Japan itself.

On his return from an inspection trip to the newly conquered Kwajalein Atoll in the Marshalls, Admiral Nimitz was completely frank regarding this basic strategy. Declaring that in his opinion "Japan can only be defeated from bases in China," he said that his objective was "to get ground and air forces into China so that we can start the ball rolling." He added that it was no secret that "we shall try to land wherever we can in China." The same view was expressed a few weeks ago by General Henry H. Arnold, chief of the Army Air Force, in a report to Secretary of War Stimson. General Arnold asserted that "potentially" China constitutes "our most effective base for aerial operations against Japan."

The qualification in General Arnold's statement is significant. For under present conditions China is hardly more than a minor front in the Pacific war. Most Americans find this gap between China's potential importance and its actual role puzzling. There has been relatively little analysis, even in general terms, of the difficulties which have hindered and still stand in the way of effective use of China's geographic advantages and immense human resources for a major thrust against the enemy.

The primary obstacle to full utilization of China as a base is, of course, the hitherto insoluble problem of supply. It is now generally recognized that the reopening of the Burma road will not materially relieve the bottleneck in transport. An increment of 20,000 or 30,000 tons monthly, which is the best that can be expected during the first year after the Burma road is reopened, would be insignificant in terms of supplying an American force, although it might strongly support the efforts which the Chinese themselves are making. Consequently no marked change in the situation can be expected until Canton or other South China ports are regained and placed in full operation by United Nations forces. Even then it will be exceedingly difficult, within any short period, to transport and equip a large foreign expeditionary army for operations in China. It is true that a gradual improvement in the delivery of supplies is taking place, even under present conditions. Tonnage carried from India by air already exceeds the 15,-000 to 20,000 monthly maximum formerly handled by the Burma road. It will further increase when General Stilwell's new huge cargo carriers start operating in the near future. The next step, dependent on military successes in northern Burma, may be the extension of the Ledo road to some junction point along the Burma road. Then will come the reopening of the Burma road itself. The limited total tonnage that can be brought in, however, will continue to impose restrictions on strategy and to demand the greatest possible utilization of Chinese resources. Thus for the immediate future progress tends to be restricted to (1) the full equipment and activization of Chinese land armies, and (2) the establishment in China of foreign specialized units, mainly air forces.

The problem of placing the greatest possible number of adequately trained and equipped Chinese divisions in the field for the offensive that General Stilwell has said will accompany Admiral Nimitz's drive to the China coast is being tackled from various angles. For more than a year a considerable number of Chinese troops have been receiving training in India in the use of the most modern equipment. Some of these Chinese troops are now attached to the Fourteenth Army, which is operating in northern Burma. Within China itself the besttrained army divisions are already capable of sterling performance in the field under the most exacting combat conditions. An expeditionary Chinese force consisting of such divisions has been organized and placed under the command of General Ch'en Ch'eng, one of the ablest of China's military leaders. This force, it is expected, will drive into northern Burma-and later, probably, into Thailand and Indo-China-in coordination with an offensive launched by Lord Louis Mountbatten.

For the ultimate campaign that will drive the Japanese out of China far larger Chinese forces will be required. Some of these are already available and facing the Japanese, but they need additional equipment in order to pass from the defensive to the offensive. Others are immobilized by political conditions within China. One of the best of the Chinese central armies, generally estimated at about 500,000 troops, is assigned to a military blockade of the so-called Border Region, the base area of the Chinese Communist forces. The excellent equipment and leadership of this army, commanded by General Hu Tsung-nan, would make it a powerful contin-gent of the forces needed for the final offensive against Japan. But its use requires a political solution of the differences between the Chinese central authorities and the Communist leaders.

If this political solution could be obtained, it would open the way to full utilization of the final contingent of land forces needed for a full-scale offensive—the Chinese Communist armies themselves. These armies are currently engaging the Japanese in all the North China provinces and in many parts of the Yangtze valley. Their exact strength is not known. Last summer, when civil war threatened, the Communist leaders indicated that they could rely upon 500,000 troops to counter any attack directed against them. The regulars of the Eighteenth Group Army and the New Fourth Army are the equals in organization and leadership, if not in equipment, of the crack divisions of the central armies. Much larger guerrilla forces are operating in conjunction with the regular troops. Ably led and well disciplined, they form a major reservoir of military effectives.

But before any offensive against Japan's armies of occupation can be undertaken, a powerful air force must be built up in China. The necessity of creating such a force is enhanced by the fact that the China front affords an opportunity to set up air bases within striking distance of Japan's vital industrial centers. A good beginning has already been made. In China today the United States Fourteenth Army Air Force is slowly extending the scope of its operations, both in tactical support of the Chinese armies and in the strategic bombing of enemy areas and supply lines. According to General Arnold, however, strategic bombing has merely entered its preliminary stage. "We have no intention," he told Secretary Stimson, "of allowing our air operations from the Asiatic mainland to remain on the level of guerrilla warfare. Neither Japanese shipping nor Japanese industry will survive the bombing in store for them."

At present the bases of the Fourteenth Air Force are restricted to the area south of the Yangtze River. Its strategic bombing orbit takes in northern Burma and Indo-China, most of Thailand, the islands of Hainan, Hongkong, and Formosa, and China's southern coastal waters and ports from Shanghai to Canton. While extensive, this orbit still lies too far south for maximum strategic effectiveness. Of the targets listed above, only Formosa possesses industrial installations of any importance; the primary targets lie farther north-in Japan, Korea, and Manchuria. If concentrated bombing raids are to be launched against Japan's inner empire, air bases in North China are essential. From certain sections of the Shantung promontory or from the coastal areas of Kiangsu above the Yangtze estuary, for example, long-range bombers could attack the greater part of Japan's industrial heartland.

Units of the Eighth Route Army or its guerrilla auxiliaries occupy much of the interior of Shantung, including the eastern promontory, and units of the New Fourth Army are operating along the coast of Kiangsu above the Yangtze estuary. These facts do not suggest that the Fourteenth Air Force would immediately find it possible to establish air bases in those areas. Air bases require secure lines of access and supply and must be defended by land armies capable of holding off large-scale attacks. But the extensive territory held by the Communist forces in North China should be utilized to the full in pushing the air war against Japan's economic centers.

In considering the possibilities in this field, it is necessary to have in mind the general military-administrative picture in North China. The whole area eastward from the bend of the Yellow River to the coast is covered by a network of guerrilla bases, ensconced between the main rail and river lines of communication held by the Japanese. Between the Yellow River and the coast five major guerrilla administrations exercise authority over large parts of Suiyuan, Chahar, Shansi, Hopei, Honan, Shantung, and Kiangsu provinces. No exact figures on the population of these guerrilla areas are available, but an estimate of 30,000,000 to 40,000,000 is well within the range of probability.

The guerrillas' headquarters base is west of the Yellow River in the Border Region, whose capital is at Yenan in Shensi. The Border Region consists of twenty-odd counties in Shensi, Kansu, and Ninghsia, with a population of about 2,000,000. Here are located the Eighteenth Group Army's military headquarters, the major educational institutions and training schools, some of the medical centers, and the central offices of the chief Communist political and military leaders. None of the Border Region is occupied by Japanese forces; the "regular front" of the Communists extends along the bend of the Yellow River, the region's eastern boundary.

We have seen that sooner or later, as our military operations make progress against Japan, it will be necessary to establish air bases in North China. What are the immediate possibilities of action along this line? The Border Region is securely defended against Japanese invasion. It also occupies a strategic position for the initiation of air attack upon Japan's inner zone. The greater part of North China is within effective bombing range of planes operating from a base in this area. The key installations of the Kailan mines, supplying a major part of Japan's best coking coal, could be attacked, as well as the vital North China rail system, which carries large amounts of coal, iron ore, cotton, salt, and grains, the ports of Tientsin and Tsingtao, and sections of Japan's northern sea lanes. If two conditions are met, it should be possible to establish an air base in the Border Region at once. These conditions are the accumulation of adequate supplies by the Fourteenth Air Force, and the lifting of the blockade which now prevents access to the region, even for foreign military observers.

After establishing an air base in the Border Region, it would be necessary to push out toward the coast, through Shansi, Hopei, and Shantung, and create additional bases in those provinces. In the last analysis, the military problem here would reduce itself to one of strengthening the land forces in the area sufficiently to defend such air bases. The effectiveness of the guerrilla forces operating in these North China provinces reduces the difficulties of such a task. In the key areas chosen for air-base sites, an adequate defense could be speedily assured by feeding in certain amounts of rifles, machineguns, and light mountain guns to the guerrilla forces. Over much of the North China territory lend-lease supplies of this kind would enable the local guerrilla commands to pass over to an offensive that would seriously embarrass the Japanese forces of occupation. Such action, however, must again wait upon a solution of the blockade problem.

The necessity for working out some settlement of China's internal political problems as a prerequisite to the development of an all-out offensive against Japan appears to have been faced at the Cairo conference. One of the correspondents covering the conference reported that "the conference stook cognizance of the fact that internal differences between the troops of Chiang Kai-shek and the Chinese Communist armies must be overcome before China could be opened as a primary base for direct attack against Japan itself." Subsequent reports from Chungking fail to say definitely whether progress has been made toward a solution. Direct negotiations are believed, however, to be under way between government representatives and Communist emissaries. An agreement is by no means impossible. It will be recalled that a working arrangement between the rival groups existed in the early days of the war. Each side subsequently accused the other of violating this arrangement. But it could conceivably be reconstituted much in its original form if sufficient pressure were brought to bear on both groups. This pressure might well come from China's allies. For it is evident that what originally could be regarded as simply a private Chinese quarrel has become a basic problem affecting the nature and length of the Pacific war.

[The effect of China's internal economic difficulties on its functioning in the war will be discussed by Mr. Stewart in an early issue.]

25 Years Ago in "The Nation"

HIS WOULD SEEM to be an unfortunate time for the Associated Manufacturers and Merchants of New York . . . to urge the discontinuance of the United States Employment Service. Whatever its failings, the Employment Service is the only organization prepared to combat on a nation-wide scale the growing menace of unemployment. . . The returned soldiers are everywhere demanding that the government which took them bodily from their homes and their work shall see that work is restored to them—good work at good wages. . . . It would be well for . . . employers who look forward with satisfaction to a glutted labor market to read the contemporary history of Belfast and Glasgow.—February 8, 1919.

STRIKES ARE MANY, widespread, and obstinate in all major branches of British industry. The City Corporation of Belfast has been superseded by a strike committee or industrial Soviet, "uncommonly well organized," as one dispatch admits, which administers the affairs of the city from its sessions in Artisans Hall. Important public utilities of Glasgow are controlled and administered by the local strike committee, whose power appears to be increasing so rapidly that the city looks forward . . . to a state of things essentially similar to that existing in Belfast.—February 8, 1919.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE, in dealing with the problem of the disposal of the German colonies and of parts of Turkey, is said to have adopted the policy of placing the colonies in charge of mandatory powers. . . . Mandatories have an ugly habit of forgetting their mandate and of considering their temporary charges as permanent property.—FRANZ BOAS, February 15, 1919.

"THE HIGHER LEARNING IN AMERICA. A Memorandum on the Conduct of Universities by Business Men." By Thorstein Veblen. . . . With so much of concession to those who insist that ways and means and balances of powers are the true ends of man, let the concluding emphasis of the book remain: that Mr. Veblen, like President Wilson, places himself with those who believe in principles first.—February 22, 1919.

If We Take Arabian Oil-

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, February 18

THE proposed Arabian oil deal brings us to the first great crossroads of post-war international policy. In one direction lies a new world order; in the other, a return to imperialism, with all it entails. To go into a colonial country and buy oil concessions by favors to desert sheiks, to embark on a long-range program for the exploitation of natural resources which belong to another people, is imperialism, however we choose to disguise it.

We are going into an area without representative government, a Biblical corner of the world whose people are likely in this generation to be inundated by modern ways. It is quite probable that, after awakening, they may resent, as the Mexican people resented, the transfer of the natural riches of their country to aliens, particularly aliens as arrogant and ruthless as our great oil companies have shown themselves to be in dealing with the weak, whether at home or abroad. One may be sure that these companies will do nothing to hasten the region's awakening, that they will link themselves with and support the most backward elements, political and religious, in Arab lands as they did in Latin American. The familiar imperialist headaches lie ahead of us if the Arabian oil deal goes through.

If we are to depend on Arabian oil, we must be prepared to defend the sea and air routes over which it must travel to the United States. The air routes across Africa, the sea lanes through the Mediterranean; will become national lifelines. We have a two-ocean navy; we shall need a three-ocean one. The Mediterranean, as well as the Atlantic and the Pacific, will become our concern. Any increase of British or French or Italian or Turkish or Russian naval or air power in the Mediterranean and Near Eastern areas will call for a comparable increase in our own. Arabian oil is supposed to be very cheap, and no doubt will continue to be so as long as Arab governments are willing to sell their resources cheaply, and Arab workmen will provide their labor at low wages. But what will the real cost of this oil be when we finish paying for the armament required to defend it?

If we have learned anything from this war, it is the precarious condition in which even the greatest of powers may find itself when dependent on distant sources of supply. We have seen how quickly and easily the American, British, and Dutch empires, with all their power and their supposedly impregnable fortresses, were cut off from their sources of rubber, tin, quinine, and many other raw materials, including the oil of the East Indies. We have seen that the possession of these raw materials was in some degree an obstacle to their national defense; Britain's oil and rubber interests, for example, successfully fought the establishment of synthetic sources of supply at home. For under capitalism these resources in lands which on the maps bear the same color as our own do not belong to you and me; these resources are in the hands of independent economic sovereigns whose profit and interest often run counter to those of the national sovereigns who defend them. Judging from the tenor of current discussion in Washington, I think all this needs to be spelled out again,

In peace time those who have the oil will be only too happy to sell it to us. In war time it will be sold to any power which controls access to it, whether its nationals were the pre-war owners or not. Military power will decide the question even before war has broken out, as the military power of Japan before Pearl Harbor provided the final argument for the sale to Japan of East Indian oil, nominally owned by the British, Dutch, and Americans. Economic interest will override national advantage; the Japanese had no trouble in buying scrap from us, though they were hardly in a position to seize Pittsburgh, as they were in a position to seize Borneo. It is true that in the "principles of proposed agreement" between the government and the oil companies it is said that "no sales of petroleum or other products will be made by the companies to any government or the nationals of any government when, in the opinion of the Department of State, such sales would militate against the interests of the United States." Let us not forget how easily these oil companies succeeded in deceiving the State Department, how willingly the State Department was deceived, how passionately it fought embargoes on the sale of our own domestic oil and scrap to Japan before the war.

The propaganda campaign which preceded this proposed Arabian oil deal is much like that which made it possible for Standard Oil interests after the First World War to muscle in on British oil preserves in Iraq. Now as then the aim has been (1) to spread fear that our oil resources are nearing exhaustion, and (2) to arouse suspicion of the British. Figures on oil resources need careful investigation; they seem to be adjusted upward or downward according to what the oil companies want at the moment. When it is proposed to begin the production of oil from coal, such Standard Oil experts as Per K. Frolich assure us that we have ample reserves of petroleum for this century anyway. When it is desired to embark on the financing of foreign oil resources, we are told that our oil is on the verge of exhaustion. In 1922, at the height of the last post-war scare, a committee of noted oil geologists assured us that we had only five billion barrels in reserve; proved reserves today, twenty-two years later, are twenty billion barrels.

"There is little enough oil left in the Western Hemisphere and in the United States in particular," Secretary Ickes recently wrote Senator Mead; ". . . our reserves in this country have a relatively short life expectancy of fourteen years." But the report made here by the Truman committee puts this estimate differently. It says that proved reserves are equal to but fourteen years' supply "based on current consumption," which is a horse of another color, for consumption today is at abnormal war-time levels. Let us compare these figures with those in the report of the National Resources Committee to the President in January, 1939. This report, on "energy resources and national policy," says that in 1938 we had fifteen billion barrels in reserve, or a twelve-year supply at the 1937 rate of consumption. So that we find ourselves today, in the midst of a great war, with five billion barrels more in reserve than we had then and a twoyears-longer life expectancy, even at war-time rates of consumption. The final touch in this picture is supplied by a speech which Wallace E. Pratt, petroleum geologist of Standard Oil of New Jersey and its one "liberal" director, made before a Sigma Xi luncheon at Columbia University on December 6 last. Pratt said our petroleum reserves would probably last a hundred years; that recent scare stories were based on half-truths; that proved reserves were not necessarily a reflection of actual reserves; that the proved reserve has many times been low in our history; and that at least one-half of the prospective oilproducing territory of the United States has not been explored.

I believe the Arabian oil deal will serve to retard development of oil possibilities at home. I note that the big oil companies hope to couple it with "conservation" of resources in the United States-that is, restriction of domestic output and an international oil compact for restriction abroad. The National Resources Committee, in discussing the question of our future petroleum supply, dwelt on the role to be played by improved technology. The committee pointed out that from 1922 to 1936 the geologist had helped drillers add 10.8 billion barrels to reserves despite the production of 12.8 billion barrels during that period. It pointed out that from 1920 to the end of 1936 the chemist, by improved cracking processes. had conserved 8.5 billion barrels of crude oil, or an amount equal to three-fourths of total production from 1922 to 1936. It pointed out that today 65 to 85 per cent of the available oil still remains in the ground "after a field no longer yields oil by the older methods of production," and that this enormous margin of wastage is a challenge to the petroleum engineer. Finally, the committee reported that "the volume of the coal resources of the United States is such that they may be depended upon [by hydrogenation and other processes] to provide an adequate supply of motor fuel for many centuries after a shortage in crude petroleum arrives." Is money likely to be invested in the development of these possibilities so long as low-cost Arabian oil is available? Wouldn't we be better prepared against emergency if we developed these possibilities instead of becoming dependent on a distant and precarious source of supply?

The reserves of Arabia have been as exaggerated as the reserves of the United States have been understated. "Estimates by responsible authorities of the total reserves in Saudi Arabia," the Truman report says, "have varied from two and one-half billion barrels to twenty billion barrels, but most experts estimate it to be between two and one-half and three billion barrels." The figure used by most newspapers is twenty billion barrels. Coupled with this has been an alarmist and nationalistic exaggeration of the share we are supplying to the fuel requirements of United Nations in the war. The United States is currently producing about 70 per cent of all the petroleum used by the United Nations, and this is represented as a disproportionate sacrifice, though it would hardly seem so when equated with the greater sacrifice of men and resources by the Soviet Union and Great-Britain. But the real reason we supply so much of the war's oil is because we control so much of the world's oil within and without our borders. Our share in the fueling of the war is almost exactly the same as our normal share in world petroleum production, which was 70.6 per cent in 1938, the last peace-time year. Twofifths of the world's known reserves are within our own continental borders, and Americans control 571/2 per cent of the total world reserves. Under these circumstances, to picture the United States as a duped and plundered oil pauper is ludicrous. Just how much of the world's oil do we propose to hog! The oil scare hit the headlines in the wake of the tour of the five Senators to combat areas last summer. The Truman report is based, presumably, on their findings-actually, on their preconceptions. The best of the five, Mead and Brewster, proved themselves extraordinarily naive, shallow, and credulous in discussing the Near Eastern oil situation. The worst, Chandler of Kentucky, a member of the "Beat Japan First" and anti-British blocs, had obviously an ax to grind. The whole drift of the Truman report is in the direction of an intense Anglo-American imperialist struggle for oil in the Near East. Its frame of reference is not a new world order in which basic resources may be developed for the benefit of all peoples. Its frame of reference is that we'd better hurry up and grab some oil before those wicked British take it away from us. It is not irrelevant to recall that before the war the Standard, Texas, and Gulf companies were allies of such great Nazi concerns as I. G. Farben against the Anglo-Dutch oil and rubber combinations. This kind of anti-British talk plays beautifully into German hands.

The kind of thinking the Senate has done in this field is indicated by the Truman report's discussion of the role government should play in the Arabian development. Government ownership of foreign oil concessions, the report says, "would presuppose a radical change in our economic system," while "partial government ownership . . . might discourage private enterprise." Did Britain become a socialist country when Churchill in 1913, under similar circumstances, insisted on obtaining for the British government majority control of the stock of the Anglo-Persian Oil Company?

Atoms at Work

BY ORLANDO ALOYSIUS BATTISTA

URING the past decade or two scientists have literally exploded the atom and in so doing have brought to light many phenomenal universes never dreamed of before. By a rather simple calculation, if you know how to make it, it can be shown that the air which occupies the finger space in a thimble contains at least thirty billion molecules. If all the clocks in the world were kept wound up, it would take them a hundred centuries or more to tick out the number of atoms in a single drop of rain water. If you were able to count the atoms on the surface of a speck of dust which could be seen only under a microscope, you would find they numbered millions. So when we talk about atoms we are talking about infinitesimally small particles of matter, particles so small that man will never be able to see them no matter how powerful he may build his microscopes.

Fifty years ago these atoms were looked upon by the world's foremost scientists as hard, discrete, indivisible particles of matter which formed the building bricks of everything in the universe. But the concept of the structure of matter that had held sway for some twenty-five centuries crumbled into myth when such men as Thomson, Rutherford, Lawrence, and a host of others published the results of their researches. Today we know with the certainty that comes from reliable experimental evidence that each little atom is a veritable universe in itself, having a sun-like nucleus at its center and many planetary electrons—units of pure electricity—whirling about this core at speeds exceeding those of many planets in their orbits.

The discovery of the atom universes with their incredible riches was speeded up by the invention of an American scientist, Ernest Orlando Lawrence. A little more than ten years ago Professor Lawrence succeeded in producing a powerful atom-smashing machine, called a Cyclotron, which already has opened up dozens of new avenues of scientific research. More than forty of these machines are now in existence, most of them in the United States. The original one is at Charter Hill in Berkeley, California, where its inventor, with the aid of a capable group of associate scientists, hopes to use it to reveal even greater marvels in the hidden world of the atom. The Charter Hill Cyclotron is so powerful that it will be able to produce invisible electric bullets propelled by more than 100,000,000 volts and traveling at a speed in excess of 50,000 miles a second. The penetrating power of the "accelerated" electrical particles will be so intense that they could be made to cut through steel very much as a knife cuts through butter. The scientists who run this monster have to operate it by remote control in rooms 150 feet distant.

A glance at a few of the momentous discoveries made by our atom-smashing scientists delving into matter with electric rays instead of microscopes shows the possibilities of further work in this field. We know now, for example, that all matter, even the armor-plate on our battleships, is literally full of holes. It has been proved beyond question that 99.9 per cent of the mass of all matter is concentrated at a mathematical point in the center of each atom universe. This leaves so much free space inside the atom that the core, which contains all the weight, may be compared to an orange suspended in the center of Radio City Music Hall. The human body is so full of empty spaces that if we removed all of them from Joe Louis he would shrink to the size of an aspirin tablet.

But smashing the atom has brought forth a lot more than this amazing fact. Nuclear physicists can bombard an atom of mercury and change it into gold, an atom of magnesium and change it into sodium. In addition to being able to make new elements almost at will—though in relatively minute quantities at the present time—scientists can bombard the atoms of some of our most inexpensive salts with extremely fast electrically charged or neutral bits of matter and obtain what are known as radioactive salts. These salts are of great value in medicine, for they are as effective as radium in curing certain malignant diseases. Their rays are as potent as radium's, but they give them off for only a few days, whereas radium will continue to give off powerful radiations for centuries. For this reason the artificially produced radioactive salts are more practical to use than radium, besides being far less expensive.

An important field of radioactive research today is concerned with the quest for specific radioactive salts that are not harmful and that will allocate themselves selectively in cancerous parts of the human body. Since it is known that cancerous tissue can be destroyed by means of carefully controlled exposure to radioactivity, the possibility of dispatching into various parts of the human body tracer bullets short-lived in their potency and capable of destroying diseased tissues selectively is a goal whose achievement would be invaluable to medical science.

When iodine that has been made radioactive is taken internally, it collects in the thyroid gland, a tendency that has enabled us to learn most of what we know about the workings of this vitally important gland. Radioactive calcium accumulates in the body in exactly the same manner as calcium which is not radioactive; with its aid it has been demonstrated that even when our teeth are fully developed they continue to absorb calcium from the food we eat. A speck of radioactive iron put in the food eaten by a cow enables us to see that in ten minutes' time the iron is present in the cow's milk. By putting radioactive substances in solutions or soil upon which plants depend for their nourishment, botanists have gained an intelligent insight into the complicated synthesis by which plant converts water and sunlight into sugars and starches. When the element yttrium is made radioactive it can be used to detect flaws in battleship armor. Of course, the reason these radioactive materials can be used to such great advantage is that they give themselves away by the radiations they are constantly sending out. Extremely sensitive electroscopic detectors have been developed which permit scientists to chart their routes accurately.

The atom also offers us unlimited stores of energy. Physicists have authoritatively proclaimed that there is enough useful energy locked up in a jug of water to furnish more than a billion kilowatt-hours of electric power. The extraction of energy from the atom has up to now been accomplished only in a very small way. The difficulties to be overcome in this field of atomic utility are far more obstinate than those encountered in adapting radioactive substances for use in medicine, biochemistry, or genetics. Nevertheless, there is definite promise that some day it will be possible to extract and control atomic energy.

Thus the remarkable work of atomic scientists is benefiting mankind in a thousand ways, and the inspiring fact is that this work has only begun.

In the Wind

TUMBER, PLEASE! The commandant of an army camp tried to telephone an officer at his home in a nearby community. The officer's phone was on a three-party line, and for half an hour the commandant got nothing but busy signals. Finally he called the operator and asked if something couldn't be done about it. "After all," he said, "it isn't such a long distance. I could walk there in half an hour." "Okay, Bud," replied the operator, "get walkin'."

THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT has taken official cognizance of the servant problem. The London Daily Mail reports that Mr. Bevin's office is going into the matter and will probably make recommendations as to minimum wages and maximum hours.

PHONOGRAPH-RECORD COLLECTORS tell us they are no longer allowed to do any international swapping. It seems that some records have unintelligible background noises which the authorities fear might possibly be code messages.

GEORGIA'S SUPREME COURT has declined for the second time to review an examination on the basis of which the State Board of Bar Examiners has refused to recommend a license for George Elmer Ross, a Negro. The law requires the board to recommend licenses for all who pass its examinations. Mr. Ross, a graduate of the University of Chicago Law School, insists that he made more than a passing grade. In refusing to look at the evidence, the court held that the board is the sole judge of grades and that there is no appeal from its decisions.

SEVENTEEN LIVES WERE LOST when the steamer Northern went down a year ago. The Union Steamship Company, owner of the ship, was recently tried and found guilty of providing insufficient lifeboat accommodations. The penalty was a fine of $100.

THE QUALITY of the news broadcasts of the Nazi-controlled Paris radio is indicated by this item: "Alvarez del Vayo—typical representative of those Soviet-minded politicians who led Spain to her Calvary—has been in Casablanca since January 15." The staff of The Nation wonders who that man is who comes into the office every day. He looks, talks, thinks, and writes exactly like Alvarez del Vayo.

FESTUNG EUROPA: German reserve officers employed as supervisors in Belgian factories have been recalled to Germany for active service . . . Several members of Vidkun Quisling's private bodyguard have been arrested for listenings to news broadcasts from London. . . The greatness of the Nazi soul was recently demonstrated in Holland when a quarrel over precedence between two officials of the Dutch "Chamber of Culture" made it necessary to hold two formal openings of an exhibition.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—Editors the NATION.]

Brazil Has an Underground

HOSE who believe that the worldwide struggle against fascism can be successfully fought in alliance with fascists have been taught another lesson in political realism. Hardly a week had passed after Argentina's break with the Axis before Colonel Peron, Minister of Labor and Welfare in the Ramirez government, and a number of other officers undertook to "readjust" matters with an eye to the interests of Germany. It was to be expected. As Ghioldi, Solari, and other democratic Argentine leaders have repeatedly said, the problem for the Allies was not to help Ramirez simulate friendship for their cause but to help the Argentine people rid themselves of Ramirez. Only a government that represents the Argentine people can bring Argentina to the side of the Allies. Only coming from such a government will a break with the Axis make sense. The Allied diplomatic victory at Buenos Aires was one of those Pyrrhic victories which appeasers have been winning since 1938.

About the Argentine situation the American public is at least well informed; it knows that the Argentine fascists have the upper hand. But it is under a dangerous illusion about Brazil, which it hears described as the Allies' best friend in South America. It has even been induced to think that Getulio Vargas is becoming a little Lincoln under the influence of his northern mentors.

Brazil is, for Americans, behind a veil. A conspiracy of the press, the news agencies, and the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs, abetted by Allied diplomacy, allows practically no political news to come out 'of Rio de Janeiro. Some documents have come into our possession, however, which cast a revealing light on the temper of the people and which we are therefore glad to bring to the attention of our readers. They have not been published hitherto in the American press.

It is extremely difficult in Brazil, as in any dictatorship, to circulate unfavorable comments on the regime. It is even more difficult to find anyone willing to print them. The press cannot publish them, of course, since there is a rigid censorship. Usually even commercial printers do not dare to print any criticism of the government, and therefore the opposition's documents are distributed in typewritten form; duplicating machines of all kinds, including mimeographs, are subject to strict surveillance. Persons found in possession of such documents or suspected of distributing them have been sentenced to prison terms of years. The risks that must be run in attempting to send any anti-government material out of the country explain why we have only now received this information.

To understand the significance of the documents, it is necessary to recall the background of the present political situation in Brazil.

Getulio Vargas first became head of the Brazilian government on November 30, 1930, as the result of a revolutionary movement to "perfect the democratic institutions of the country." He governed until 1934 with discretionary powers, and in 1934, when a constitutional democratic regime was reestablished, he was elected President of the republic by a Constituent Assembly. On November 10, 1937, he executed a coup d'état, under the pretext that the country was menaced by the Communists, and immediately decreed a "state of emergency." He then promulgated a new constitution, dissolved Parliament, banned political parties, arrested some democratic leaders and exiled others.

The "state of emergency" is still in force, and although the six-year Presidential term provided by the new constitution ended on November 10, 1943, Vargas continues to hold power. His excuse is that the war does not permit the holding of elections. To an increasingly rebellious population he promises that elections will be held after the war, of course according to the pattern of the corporate state as defined by the new totalitarian constitution.

MANIFESTO OF THE STATESMEN AND INTELLECTUALS OF MINAS GERAES

Early in November, 1943, a typewritten manifesto signed by numerous politicians and intellectuals of the state of Minas Geraes was circulated through the country. The signatories included Arthur Bernardes, President of the republic from 1922 to 1926; Affonso Penna, Jr., former president of the Liberal Alliance, from which the revolutionary movement sprang; Pedro Aleixo, former president of the House of Representatives of Brazil; Odillon Braga, former Minister of Agriculture in the Banco do Brasil; Alaor Prata, former mayor of Rio de Janeiro; F. Mendes Pimental, an outstanding jurist; and many former members of the national Parliament, some of them Vargas's friends.

The manifesto was long and, according to the traditions of Minas, phrased in moderate language. Its spirit can be shown by the following quotations:

Unity, in our opinion, is spontaneous harmony, not forced unanimity; voluntary and clearsighted of pur-

THE RESOLUTIONS BEFORE CONGRESS

Similarly worded Resolutions have been introduced into the House of Representatives by Congressmen Wright and Compton and into the Senate by Senators Taft and Wagner, in regard to the White Paper on Palestine and the constituting of Palestine as a Jewish Commonwealth. The text of these Resolutions is as follows:

Whereas the Sixty-seventh Congress of the United States on June 30, 1922, unanimously resolved "that the United States of America favors the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of Christians, and all other non-Jewish communities in Palestine shall be adequately protected"; and

Whereas the ruthless persecution of the Jewish people in Europe has clearly demonstrated the need for a Jewish homeland as a haven for the large numbers who have become homeless as a result of this persecution: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the United States shall use its good offices and take appropriate measures to the end that the doors of Palestine shall be opened for free entry of Jews into that country, and that there shall be full opportunity for colonization, so that the Jewish people may ultimately reconstitute Palestine as a free and democratic Jewish commonwealth.

Appearing before hearings of the House Foreign Affairs Committee on Tuesday and Wednesday, February 8th and 9th, Mr. Lessing J. Rosenwald, President of the American Council for Judaism, made the following statement:

I appreciate this opportunity to appear before you in regard to the Resolution on Palestine that you are now considering. I am deeply grateful for the spirit that has animated you and your fellow-congressmen to take up the cause of the suffering, dispersed and persecuted Jews of Europe. The consideration that you are giving to that problem is one more testimony of the fine American tradition of sympathy with, and help for, the unfortunates of all faiths. It is of a pattern with the recent action of our President in naming . War Refugee Board and with the formation in this city of Committee headed by such distinguished public figures as Justice Murphy, Vice-President Wallace, Governor Goodland of Wisconsin, Governor Maw of Utah, and others, to counter the dread cancer of bigotry in our national life.

I appear here, both in my own capacity an an American citizen of Jewish faith and as President of the American Council for Judaism, Inc.

This organization, let me explain, was founded only recently to enlist support among like-minded Americans of Jewish faith in our stress on the religious character of the Jews and in resistance to the forces of racialism which we believe to be false doctrines in Judaism.

It may interest you to know that in the brief period of a few months, we have enlisted an active membership of close to 2500 leading Jews all over the country and the interest and approval of many, many more.
We are still, so you see, a young organization but, I daresay, we are probably the most rapidly growing organization in the Jowish community in the United States.

With this brief introduction, I beg to call to your attention the following, relative to the Resolution now before both houses of Congress: The text of the Resolution calls upon the United States to use its good offices for two purposes. I ask you to note that there are two purposes, that they are distinct and different and that they are, therefore, properly subject to different reactions.

One part of the Resolution calls for taking "appropriate measures to the end that the doors of Palestine shall be open for the free entry of Jews." I do not wish here to linger over the phrasing of this part of the Resolution. I do want to say that the purpose of this part of the Resolution is plainly humanitarian, consistent with American humanitarian traditions and characteristic of our desire to expand democratic processes wherever they can be expanded.

As you know, this Resolution has an its background the White Paper issued in 1939 by the British Government as the mandatory power for Palestine which, among other provisions, shuts the immigration doors of Palestine to Jews and restricts their acquisition of land in that country.

In mercent statement issued by the organization which I have the privilege of heading, we said as follows:

"We of the American Council for to those provisions. In behalf of the substantial section of American Jews whose views on Jewish problems coincide with ours, we petition our Government to use its best offices to prevail upon the British Government not to proceed with so prejudicial and unjust a policy.

"We base our attitude on this fundamental fact: that proposals which exclude Jews, as Jews, from right of entry and restrict Jews, as Jews, from the acquisition of land, do violence to the fundamental concept of democratic equality and thus to the very purposes and ideals to which the United Nations are pledged.

"The American Council for Judaism is dedicated to the view that Jews, a religious community, shall have, as of right and not on sufferance, full equality all over the world. As stated in our Declaration of Principles, 'For our fellow Jews we ask only this: equality of rights and obligations with their fellow nations.' This means equality in the countries in which we live and choose to remain; equality to return to those lands from which Jews have been forcibly driven; equality to migration.

"We ask for no special privileges for Jews anywhere in the world. We will resist to the utmost the imposition of any disabilities on Jews anywhere in the world. There is no compromise on this basic demand."

This is the position of our membership and we believe that this viewpoint is supported by all American citizens of the Jewish faith and by an overwhelming body of our fellow-Americans of Catholic and Protestant faith.

We are, therefore, in hearty accord with the purpose of the first part of the Resolution. We feel that it seeks to express the profound and invaluable sympathy of the American people for those driven from their lands by tyranny and terror.

There is, however, a second section of the Resolution on which I feel obliged to convey to you, frankly and fully, our questions and our doubts as to its wisdom. It now reads, "... so that the Jewish people may ultimately reconstitute Palestine as a free and democratic Jewish commonwealth."

I urge you to read and reflect on this part of the Resolution with the utmost care. This is no longer designed to serve a solely humanitarian purpose. This brings you, and through you—the American people—at once into a field of international controversy and into a subject that has deeply divided the Jewish community in this country.

(Continued on next page)

The proposal, you will note, speaks of the establishment of a free and democratic "Jewish" commonwealth. I stress the word "Jewish." It does not say the establishment of a free and democratic "commonwealth." It specifically uses the word "Jewish," a word which has essentially a religious connotation only, although it has been used in a racial sense by the Nazi enemies of the Jews and of democracy.

But the concept of the theocratic state is long past. It is an anachronism. The concept of m racial state—the Hitlerian concept—is repugnant to the civilized world, as witness the fearful global war in which we are involved. We have reached a point of civilization where nations and states have their proper recognition without regard to the religious composition of their populations. I urge that we do nothing to set us back on the road to the past. To project at this time the creation of m Jewish state or commonwealth is to launch m singular innovation in world affairs which might well have incalculable consequences.

It may well be that this was in the mind of the King-Crane Commission in its report to President Woodrow Wilson and the State Department in the years after the last war.

You will recall that President Wilson, disturbed by the problems of the Near East, dispatched a Commission there in 1919 for a careful survey. This Commission, known as the King-Crane Commission, was to submit a report which would be of assistance in the final formulation of the peace treaties. With regard to Palestine, that Commission reported that "a national home for the Jewish people is not equivalent to making Palestine into a Jewish state." No doubt, your predecessors of the 67th Congress of the United States had this report at hand when they adopted the Resolution which forms a preamble to your present Resolution.

I ask you to look at your present Resolution again and, especially, at that part of it which reads, "... so that the Jewish people may ultimately reconstitute Palestine as a free and democratic Jewish commonwealth."

The language of the Resolution thus makes "the Jewish people" the agency for the establishment of a free and democratic commonwealth. Here are some serious considerations on that section:

The accepted procedure of democracy is to have a commonwealth established with the participation of all of its people or citizens. It is a self-contradiction to speak of a democratic state organism which is the creation of only a part of the population within the country. The population in Palestine is made up of Christian, Mohammedan and Jew. I believe you will agree with me that true democratic developments in that country can only come about as the result of the efforts and with the participation of all of the elements of the population. All of Palestine must share in the establishment of a democracy. Any exclusion is undemocratic in character and defeats the very purpose that your Resolution may seek to achieve.

Moreover, the language of the Resolution places the responsibility for creating a commonwealth at the door of "Jewish people," presumably those outside of Palestine as well as those in Palestine.

Yet I wonder whether the authors of this Resolution actually intended this to be the case. The "Jewish people" are not organized politically, are not and do not want to be a political unit. They are nationals, loyal citizens of the various countries in which they live. They are to be found in all classes, in all political parties, in all economic levels. They are united only in their common derivation from a great religion and in their natural resistance to those who would destroy them. This being the case, it must be clear why the language of the second part of the Resolution can only create confusion and encounter perhaps insurmountable difficulties. Tews in the United States and the world over, not being a national group but essentially a religious community, it is clear that they cannot assume responsibility anywhere as = political unit.

The development of such institutions, in the last analysis, must be the responsibility only of those in Palestine at the time such institutions are developed. All sections of the country, Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans, Palestinians all, whose proper concern is the welfare of their country, will determine and be responsible for its insti-

In the Statement of Principles issued by the American Council for Judaism, we expressed the following views on Palestine:

"Palestine has contributed in a tangible way to the alleviation of the present catastrophe in Jewish life by providing a refuge for a part of Europe's persecuted Jews. We hope it will continue as one of the places for such resettlement, for it has been clearly demonstrated that practical colonizing can be done, schools and universities built, scientific agriculture extended, commerce intensified and culture developed. This is the record of achievement of eager, hardworking settlers who have been aided in their endeavors by Jews all over the world, in every walk of life and thought.

"We oppose the effort to establish a National Jewish State in Palestine or any-

"We oppose the effort to establish a National Jewish State in Palestine or anywhere else as a philosophy of defeatism, and one which does not offer a practicular solution of the Jewish problem. We dissent from all those related doctrines that stress the racialism, the nationalism and the theoretical homelessness of Jews. We oppose such doctrines as inimical to the welfare of Jews in Palestine, in America, or wherever Jews may dwell. We believe that the intrusion of Jewish national statehood has been a deterrent in Palestine's ability to play an even greater role in offering a haven for the oppressed, and that without the insistence upon such statehood. Palestine would today be harboring more refugees from Nazi terror.

"Palestine is m part of Israel's religious heritage, as it is m part of the heritage of two other religions of the world. We look forward to the ultimate establishment of a democratic, autonomous government in Palestine, wherein Jews, Moslems and Christians shall be justly represented; every man enjoying equal rights and sharing equal responsibilities; m democratic government in which our fellow Jews shall be free Palestinians whose religion is Judaism, even as we are Americans whose religion is Judaism."

I earnestly commend these views for your consideration. I believe that your own compassionate purposes will be fully served by retaining only the first part of the Resolution or by modifying its second provision so that it reads as follows:

". . . and that there shall be full opportunity for colonization in Palestine, ultimately to be constituted a free and democratic commonwealth."

We invite readers of The Nation to send us their opinions and to communicate with us on our program

THE AMERICAN COUNCIL FOR JUDAISM, Inc.

Telephone RITtenhouse 8357

PHILADELPHIA 7, PA.

President

LESSING J. ROSENWALD, Philadelphia

Vice-Presidents

Vice-Presidents

RABBI LOUIS WOLSEY, Philadelphia, Pa.

FRED F. FLORENCE, Dallas, Tex. RABBI LOUIS BINSTOCK, Chicago, Ill.

RABBI IRVING F. REICHERT, San Francisco, Calif.

Treasurer

D. HAYS SOLIS-COHEN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Executive Director RABBI ELMER BERGER, Philadelphia, Pa.

RABBI ELMER BERGER American Council for Judaism, Inc. 1321 Arch Street, Philadelphia 7, Pa.
☐ I am interested in knowing more about the American Council for Judaism, Inc. Please send me your literature.
☐ As an American Jew, I want to join the American Council for Judaism, Inc. Herewith two dollars minimum membership dues.
Name
Address
City State

P----

pose, not a sum total of insincere adherents. A nation which is forced into silence and deprived of the privilege of thinking and freely expressing its opinion is a corroded body, incapable of assuming the tremendous responsibilities attendant upon participation in a conflict of such proportions as the one which engages humanity.

If we are fighting against fascism alongside the United Nations so that freedom and democracy may be reestablished in all countries, it is certainly not too much to claim for ourselves the rights and guaranties which characterize freedom and democracy.

The reaction to this manifesto came quickly. Those among the signers who held public office, even civil-service positions, were dismissed. Lawyers for private concerns were dismissed, or they tendered their resignations so that their companies might avoid prosecution. The Banco Hypothecario e Agricola of Minas Geraes, some of whose directors had signed the document, was immediately taken over by the government. However, the manifesto continued to circulate by secret channels, with new signatures added.

MANIFESTO OF THE "CENTRO 11 DE AGOSTO" OF SAO PAULO

The students' association of the Law School of the University of São Paulo, known as the "Centro 11 de Agosto," has always been an active and fearless representative of public opinion in Brazil. It is the most important association of its kind in the country. At some of its meetings there were demonstrations for the reestablishment of democratic institutions in Brazil. Thereupon the police invaded the school and closed the Center's offices. Students who demonstrated for freedom in the streets were machine-gunned.

The Center then distributed a typewritten manifesto bearing the signatures of hundreds of law students. Some excerpts from it follow:

A little more than a year ago we, the law students, together with the other university students of São Paulo, led our people into the streets to demand that our country take a firm stand against the German aggression. This attitude was not prompted by momentary excitement. Long before our seas had been tinted with the blood of Brazilians murdered by the totalitarian enemy, we had been struggling for Brazil's effective participation in the war against the fascist gangs. The breaking of diplomatic relations with the Axis countries, the declaration of war last year, and the adherence to the Atlantic Charter were democratic actions on the part of our Foreign Office. They filled us with happiness and hope, for in them were foreshadowed definite changes in internal politics-that is, the country's return to its natural condition, to a regime of law and democracy. These hopes have now vanished.

The war policy adopted by the government in response to the appeal of our nation has practically lapsed. Unfortunately, the war is becoming more unpopular every day. The people are apathetic, and their best energies are being undermined. What is the cause of such a deplorable situation? We believe that the growing apathy of our people has its roots in their distrust of Brazil's present political regime.

After many other declarations of this nature, the manifesto concluded:

In Brazil war has to begin in the country itself, against disguised fascism and for real democracy—that is, for human dignity. A cry has been heard and victims have fallen. History repeats itself. Let our password be the first battle cry: Down with the New State!

LETTER WRITTEN BY GENERAL MANOEL RABELLO

General Manoel Rabello of the Brazilian army was one of the military men who brought about the revolution of 1930. He has always supported Vargas. He has been Intervener, or Governor, of the state of São Paulo, and has had high military posts. At present he is a judge of the Supreme Court of Military Justice. He is also president of the Association of Friends of the United States. In a letter addressed to Vargas General Rabello makes important revelations concerning General Gaspar Dutra, Brazil's War Minister, who is a pillar of Vargas's "New State." He says, among other things:

for buying German equipment, although everyone except the pro-Nazis anticipated that Germany would not be able to furnish it. It was still to be manufactured, and the war would certainly begin before the date of its delivery. That is what happened. We paid in advance for the first consignment of the armaments ordered, but only a small part of it reached Brazil. . . . Up to now we have received nothing for most of the money we paid. For a long time there was strong opposition to buying American material, under the pretext that it would mar the uniformity of our equipment. Actually, this represented a very minor inconvenience, since the quantity of German material we had received was extremely limited, as compared to the total amount ordered.

And further:

In all his public declarations and speeches, with the exception of one or two occasions when he has been more explicit, General Dutra always leaves in doubt the identity of the enemy whom we have to fight. The words "fascism" or "Nazism" are never heard on his lips. In his orders to the commanders of corps His Excellency always mentions the Communist danger, but never a word of warning against the Nazi or Fascist regimes with which we are at war. From his speeches, which are so frequently quoted in civilian and military circles, one would think that Brazil's enemies were the Americans, the British, and especially the Russians, as well as the Germans, Italians, and Japanese. It is only now, at the very last minute, on the eve of his departure for the United States, where His Excellency is going to receive the homage of the American government, which has always been the object of his dislike— It is only now that we see with astonishment the sudden change in his opinions.

Other protests by prominent Brazilian leaders in exile, among them Armando Salles, former Governor of São Paulo, and Dr. Octavio Mangabeira, former Minister of Foreign Affairs, confirm the impression made by the documents we have quoted. We do not print them here since they have already been widely circulated.

A. DEL V.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

GERMAN political propaganda continues to observe the caution which it was taught by unhappy experience. It carefully avoids counting on the success of any military operation in advance of its completion. As these lines are written, the Germans are attacking at Anzio and Nettuno. The American newspapers are indulging in alarmed speculation. But the optimism that should be its counterpart in Germany is entirely lacking. There has been no announcement that the beachhead would be eliminated, no discussion even of such a possibility. Expectations are systematically kept low so as to rule out any disappointment.

In one connection only is there any deviation from this policy. The people are definitely assured that the coming invasion in the west will be a failure. That it will be attempted is not denied. But absolute confidence is expressed that the attempt will be smashed. A statement in the Münchner Neueste Nachrichten of January 20 is one of a thousand that might be cited:

We have no reason to conceal the fact that we are calmly awaiting the invasion attempt. We are even eager for it to be made, for, having confidence in our preparations, we consider it a means of shortening the war. The enemy's gigantic concentration between Iceland and the Azores will not bring him success. Germany, too, has planned every move very carefully.

It is more than questionable whether the German people share this confidence. An incident that occurred in Oberhausen, one of the great industrial towns of the Ruhr, shows rather that they are awaiting the invasion in a state of nervous tension. The leading newspaper of the region, Herr Göring's National Zeitung, on January 27 reported the incident as follows:

Some time ago the rumor spread like wildfire through Oberhausen that strong formations of Anglo-Americans had landed on the Channel coast. It can scarcely be imagined how much time and nervous energy were lost through the excitement caused by this rumor. The number of working hours lost cannot be calculated. Of course the news was discussed endlessly in the factories.

The newspaper went on to say that the source of the rumor had been discovered. A workman made it up one morning to scare a companion. "By noon the story was known not only to everyone in the factory but to everyone in Oberhausen. The next day it spread to the neighboring towns."

The Minister of Finance in Germany, as in all the belligerent countries, is constantly worried by the growing excess of money in circulation. And like his colleagues he tries to draw off or freeze as much of it as possible. One of his devices should interest Mr. Morgenthau. A variation on the English system of compulsory savings, it is called "iron savings."

In England, as is well known, a percentage of everyone's wages is set aside in a savings account which cannot be drawn on during the war. Because of the element of compulsion Washington has refused to consider this very effective anti-inflationary measure. Now the Germans have devised a way to stimulate saving by making it not compulsory but extremely attractive. Nobody is obliged to but everybody may start a savings account which cannot be touched for the duration—and the amount put in is exempt from the income tax. This exemption is a very strong attraction. Several billion marks have been paid into the "iron-savings" accounts, even though the majority of the people are convinced that after the war the mark, and therefore all savings, will be practically worthless.

The induction of boys into the German war machine is making rapid progress. The latest news on this subject is that (1) all the seventeen-year-olds are now in the army; (2) the sixteen-year-olds were obliged to register for military service in January and their induction has begun; (3) it is now the turn of the fifteen-year-olds. Recently all German newspapers carried an announcement signed by Hermann Göring asking fifteen-year-old boys to volunteer for the Luftwaffe. The notice promised that all who joined now would receive officers' training—and not have to wait long to be called up.

But even that is not enough. Mobilization is now reaching down to the ten-year-olds! On December 11 a decree was issued making all boys and girls between ten and seventeen years subject to compulsory war work. On January 28 detailed rules for their employment were published. In principle the war work is to be carried on in conjunction with school instruction and service in the Hitler Youth, but when the three cannot be combined "without overburdening" the children, war work has first priority. A dispatch from Berlin printed in the Aftontialningen on January 22 said that the first consignment of these youthful forced workers had been selected. Some 53,000 boys and girls between thirteen and fifteen have begun to work in the armament factories.

PHRITC LIERARY

BOOKS and the ARTS

Action Tomorrow

ACTION THIS DAY: LETTERS FROM THE FIGHTING FRONT. By Francis J. Spellman. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

THE ROAD TO VICTORY. By Francis J. Spellman. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.75.

PHILOSOPHIES AT WAR. By Fulton J. Sheen. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

FLYING with him around the world, one learns to like Francis J. Spellman, Archbishop of New York. A native, at some refueling place of his globe-spanning itinerary-February 9 to August 1, 1943-asked him how many stories high his archbishopric was; and no matter how tall the headquarters, the diocese of New York is large and mighty indeed. Yet its supreme dignitary has preserved the simplicity of a country curate. It is refreshing to read that "leaving Khartoum, one goes up the Nile flying south, which sounds strange to us, as along our rivers we usually go 'up' flying north"-or that "it is possible to see a great deal of Turkey from the car windows because many towns are located on the railway route." The reader who felt outraged by Monsignor Spellman's tribute to the Escorial of Philip II, the Inquisitor King-and gave public vent to his ire, heckling: "Better a pigsty!"-would have felt more relaxed if he had noticed how impartial is the elation of the winged prelate at whatever looms oversize and gorgeous. A priest of Baal, the man-eating god, he certainly is not; yet, no less than by the Escorial, he was overawed by the colossal ruins of Baalbeck-not to speak of the chandelier Queen Victoria presented to the Sultan, so huge that it could not be stood anywhere except in the custom-made palace that was erected as its container.

But the reader would also be wrong who thought that the charm of this diary lies only in its frequent attunement to states of mind whose classical models we recall from "Innocents Abroad." There is more than that. While preening himself with lovely candor on his proficiency in geography -or even in that auxiliary hobby, stamp collecting-the apostolic pilgrim keeps a truly open eye on all the shapes and colors of this attractive planet; and together with the poetic thrill goes the throb of a heart where all the griefs and trials of the human race are sure to stir an echo of mercy. There are, off and on, quick but memorable snapshots of his meetings with patient missionaries, with heroic nuns, in hospitals, in leprosaries, in scorched wastelands. And, above all, there are those paragraphs, as unassuming as they are impressive, in which he records how he felt when, a newly ordained young priest, he offered his first mass in Rome-how he feels now, an aging hierarch, as he offers mass in the other holy site, Jerusalem. No reader, be he stony agnostic or an impenitent heretic, will remain untouched by the genuineness and contagion of that fervor.

Spellman's temper is, to speak in popular terms, of the "Franciscan" type. He knows it; indulging in occasional self-praise, he mentions his own "traditional meekness." In sharp contrast to it stands the mood of the other monsignor, Fulton J. Sheen, a "Dominican" character-if the word, as folklore has it, meant "hound of God, domini canis." The aggressiveness of his proselyting zeal is manifest from the very front cover of a book which, however thin, wears no humbler a title than "Philosophies at War." His confidence in his own wisdom and science is uncompromising; his ardent hurry stops at nothing. It does not matter to him whether, when accusing Herder of racial prejudice, he had in mind Hegel (we guess) or some other infidel assonance; to correct the spelling of Treitschke ("Treitzscke," on the same page-maybe a crossbreed with Nietzsche) is to quibble, since no tough armor of consonants will make that worthy hellfire-proof anyway; Hume, Kant, and Voltaire, "corrosive men," find themselves in the same boat, to their mutual surprise; the French Revolution doubts, in Pirandello style, its own identity when court-martialed for the crime of having "isolated man from responsibility to a political community or the state." But doubt has no shadow to cast over Sheen's unrelenting pages; for does he not know, does he not notify the reader, that "we [Sheen] look at the war through the eyes of God"? Does he not add, as a seal to so remarkable an affidavit, that "our [Sheen's] approach is from the divine point of view"? The reader is speechless.

Only on one occasion would the reader like to stop the author for a moment and have his say; and this is apropos of a short story in which God is inescapably on the spot. "Some time ago a Nazi soldier in occupied France took his French wife into a hospital. Seeing a crucifix on the wall, he ordered the nun to take it down. She refused! He ordered her again saying that he did not want his child ever to look upon the image of a crucified Jew. The nun took it down under threats. The father's wish was fulfilled to the letter. The child was born-blind." Reacting to so cruel a passage, the reader-who, like the devil, can quote Scripture-wonders whether the author is not behind the times, not only our own and those to come, but the times of the ancient Ezekiel, through whose encouraging lips the Lord waived the right to be a Sheen-like God, and pledged that "the son shall not bear the iniquity of the father." Christ, we had been told, came as a healer to restore the eyesight of the sinner, not to blind his little children.

Yet even so strange a book has plausible pages. Those on the decay of the family are dictated by earnest passion—even though the thesis that a chief cause for this war lay in that decay is untenable if in Italy, motherland of Fascism and of Fascist aggression, the family institution was on the whole as firm as Monsignor Sheen and Monsignor Spellman might desire, with birth control banned by both church and state, and divorce forbidden, except when conceded under the name of annulment by the papal Curia to a few unhappy but wealthy pairs. The chapter on The Need of an Absolute is, in general, sensible. To be sure, it is difficult to extricate in one's memory or notes the quotations belonging to Sheen from those we owe to Spellman or to a hundred others. The critique-often, alas, too vague or sophomorically documented—of our aimless past and our confused present has become stock material, with whole pages and chapters interchangeable among thousands of books and articles, Catholic or not, and with the repetitious strain cheapening the idea while, perhaps, widening its influence and, let us hope, ripening our tragic society toward more fortunate efforts. When Sheen in the wake of Spellman, or Spellman in the wake of Sheen, says that hatred of Hitler alone will not win the war and the peace; when one and the other warn us that we know what we are fighting against but not what we are fighting for; when both, in unison with a most undenominational crowd, state that "the Sword cannot breed Peace," that "only a faith can prevail against a faith"-we have no objection to make. We all wholeheartedly agree that what is needed, as Sheen puts it, is "the offensive of a great idea."

What weakens the aid-highly relevant and welcome, no matter how belated-that is being proffered from strictly Roman quarters is the minor premise of a sophism running approximately as follows: the brotherhood of man is possible only under the fatherhood of God; but God speaks only through the Roman pontiff; hence, etc. It is one thing to proclaim that a competent medical science—as they put it, the vindication of theology—is indispensable for individual and social welfare; and quite another to prescribe, and if possible to administer by force, a particular formula or nostrum as the one cure-all and irreplaceable elixir of inextinguishable life. Picturesquely, as usual, Spellman upholds the monopolistic view even as he reports that the temple of Hagia Sophia in Constantinople, formerly "a place of worship," later on became "a mosque," thereby implying that the word worship cannot be applied, without sullying it, to the piety of a Moslem. Vehemently, as usual, Sheen goes so far as to propose that the Roman pontiff should be present at the peace table-an acceptable proposition if the same invitation be extended to all chiefs of great spiritual collectivities, starting with Gandhi-while proposing, no less forcefully although less acceptably, that a victorious Russia be excommunicated from the coming League of Nations unless it consent to enact "freedom of religion." On the other hand, when they write "religion" they mean that particular religion; and freedom is defined, by Sheen and Spellman alike, as the "freedom to do what one ought to do." The definition is irrefutable, provided that no one-individual or institution-claims the authority, and the power, to decide, infallibly, "what one ought to do." Otherwise their "freedom" was described by the mild humorist of milder years who devised a "liberal" slogan with the first three words in large capitals and the other four on a line below in nearly invisible type: "LIBERTY FOR ALL who think like myself."

Spellman, while borrowing from an eminent friend, Mr. Churchill, the title of his recent book, "Action This Day," omits to tell us what the action, so pressing, was about. If these "letters from the fighting fronts" were our only source of information, his "dear father"—to whom the epistolary is supposedly addressed—and ourselves would be at a loss to understand how so conscientious a shepherd could roam so fancifully and extensively away from his diocesan flock—24 weeks, 46,000 miles—for the sake of sightseeing. We, however, and, we surmise, the good old man in Boston, are well posted on how weighty was the enterprise on which the Archbishop was engaged all through that time and space. No one played a more systematic role than his in promoting, between Casablanca and Salerno, what was to be called Demofascism, that is, Restoration; that is, liberty for all who think and act as they "ought to," in the shape of neo-Darlanism, or Badoglism, or appeasement of Franco, or any other variety.

Now the faith in that method of political warfare on the Italian battlefront is at the end of its rope. It does not seem to be much more successful in Algiers or Madrid. And the gate of Rome will open, perhaps soon; but it will be another Rome, sooner or later. "Just as we devote ourselves as a nation," said Dr. Douglas Horton only yesterday, "to putting down nationalism, so the denomination which is most in accord with the mind of Christ is the one which is the most intent on losing its life in a large whole." This applies to Dr. Horton's Congregational churches as it does to any other; and this is bound to be action tomorrow, outside as well as inside the Church of Rome.

Paying tribute not so much to the Escorial of Philip as to Franco Spain, Spellman blandly admits that "Spain needed reform and so does every nation and person." Yes, and every institution. Sheen exclaims, from the jacket of his book: "On the anvil of this war amidst the fire of sacrifice, there is being hammered out a new order and a new civilization." Yes, but new is not old. It has been said that no one can kill his successor. Neither can anyone, individual or society, beget his grandmother.

G. A. BORGESB

The Romantic as Actor

GOOD NIGHT, SWEET PRINCE: THE LIFE AND TIMES OF JOHN BARRYMORE. By Gene Fowler. The Viking Press. $3.50.

JOHN BARRYMORE was a very good actor as actors go, though just what and just how much such a statement means might be lengthily disputed. John Barrymore was also a romantic egotist of the Byronic type, and it is his personality rather more than his art with which the present generally admiring biography by a professional cynic is concerned. Mr. Fowler—ex-sports reporter, and author, among other things, of a flamboyantly jocose account of the career of Mack Sennett—knew Barrymore, apparently liked him, and without denying himself the privilege of recognizing some of his subject's absurdities, presents him in a favorable as well as frequently "glamorous" light.

Barrymore's alcoholism and miscellaneous philanderings were, Mr. Fowler seems to think, more obviously than is always the case, motivated by a profound impulse toward self-destruction; and the obscene public clownings of the last days were, he believes, expressions of Barrymore's self-contempt quite as much as of his contempt for the audience. His sister Ethel and his brother Lionel are both categorical in their statements that none of the trio really wanted very

IMPORTANT NEW BOOKS

Persons and Places

The Background of My Life
by GEORGE SANTAYANA

"It is the most tranquil book of this stormy year; it is the fresh, springlike distillation of a philosopher whom we can at least claim for our own; and the shading, the irony, and the sheen of its English make its prose a joy to read aloud."—Atlantic Monthly.

$2.5

Liana

The new novel by MARTHA GELLHORN

"A beautifully written book, full of the tropical beauty of a French Island in the Caribbean Sea. And one of the most bleakly sad and savagely ironic stories any author ever conceived. Sad and beautiful and powerful."—Saturday Review of Literature.

$2.50

Democratic Thinking and the War

by FRANCIS BIDDLE
Attorney General of the United States

In these provocative pages one of the leaders of contemporary American democracy interprets the basic themes of current democratic thought as they have developed among our people under the stress of war.

The Legacy of the Liberal Spirit

Men and Movements in the Making of Modern Thought

by FRED G. BRATTON

"This book is long overdue. It is a discussion of the spirit and meaning of liberalism. It is a call to a new world and to a new intellectual and spiritual emancipation."—Chicago Sun. $2.75

A Certain Blind Man

Essays on the American Mood by ROBERT ELLIOT FITCH

An incisive, and at times sharply satirical, critique of the Anglo-American "culture of complacency," together with a constructive analysis of the spiritual traditions and the spiritual destiny of the American people. $2.00

at your bookstore

Charles Scribner's Sons :-: New York

much to become an actor. John seems to have resented more than the others a family tradition which all but forced him on the stage. His lack of respect for his profession was increased by the ease with which he succeeded in it, and he felt some genuine shame at the thought that his "beauty" made him the object of attention which he felt contemptible. Various facts tend to confirm this diagnosis. He easily tired of parts. Only during the relatively brief period between his first serious success in "Justice" and his triumphant appearance in "Hamlet" did he work hard. And after "Hamlet" there seemed no other worlds worth conquering. The notorious slovenliness of his off-stage appearance and his avoidance of the rich and famous who were anxious to lionize him confirm the impression that he found his kind of success more painful than gratifying to his ego.

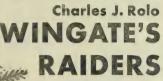

The question how much the romantic self-destroyer actually destroys is a question which is not only impossible to answer but difficult even to make a very responsible guess about. Other romantics usually tend to assume that almost any drunkard would have been a genius if he had stayed sober, but there is always, of course, the legitimate suspicion that the subject's own realization of how much more he expects of himself than he can ever hope to achieve is the real cause of the drinking. Bernard Shaw wrote Barrymore a blistering letter accusing him of having sacrificed a third of the text of "Hamlet" in order to leave time for his own pantomiming, but no one suspects that Garrick was not a great actor despite the fact that even more serious charges could be made against him; and when Barrymore refused to practice his own art he destroyed a performer who was, at the very least, a good deal better than most. If Mr. Fowler is to be believed, he also destroyed a rather attractive man who had wit-for example, the remark apropos the puffy ankles of his last phase: "It's the first time I ever saw an actor swollen at this end." But to judge the real personal worth of a romantic actor is even more difficult than to judge that of a romantic poet. As the biographer remarks in a-for him-unusually straightforward sentence, "One is never quite certain, when appraising the private lives of actors, as to where the realities cease and the simulations begin."

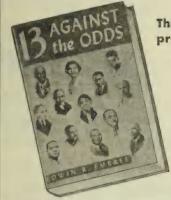

So far as the book as a book is concerned, it is unquestionably entertaining and full of the sort of gossipy anecdote which makes a wide appeal. It seems also intelligent in its analysis of character. Unfortunately, however, it is sometimes irritating in style, and it is not always presented in a fashion calculated to inspire complete confidence in its dependability. The author affects a flamboyantly jocose style in which a doctor is an "Aesculapius," a pot containing chili con carne is an "aromatic caldron," Broadway is "the street of fickle luster," and the fittings of a dingy bathroom are "cracked and homely porcelains." On the whole he depends less and less upon this sort of thing as the book proceeds, but he is also a victim of the dubious habit of being so anxious to be detailed and picturesque and vivid that he describes, both in direct discourse and with an abundance of particulars, scenes of which he cannot possibly have more than the most general sort of knowledge.

No doubt pedantry and footnotes are terrible things, but biography ceases to be biography unless the reader has at least some general idea of what is pure fancy and what rests

One of the greatest heroic exploits of the war-told in full for the first time

Brigadier Wingate—the man they call this war's Lawrence of Arabia—opened the battle for Burma with his daredevil band of commando-trained men. His adventure was first reported in Life Magazine: now the whole tale is told, from the arduous training of themen through every hazardous detail of their raid. Illustrated. $2.50

They fought against prejudice—and won!

These vivid "profiles" of thirteen contemporary Negroes are dramatic success stories in the finest American tradition. In spite of every obstacle, each of these remarkable persons has reached prinacle of achievement. Together they form a significant and inspiring group. Illustrated. $2.75

By Edwin R. Embree

Lusty, robust humor in the great Texas tradition of the tall story

GEORGE SESSIONS PERRY writes one of the most completely entertaining books in years—"whopper" tales with all the charm and wit of O. Henry and Mark Twain.

Hackberry Cavalier Just published
THE FIRST NOVEL
FROM THE PEN OF Ludwig

Promofmans

It's the story of a South American general who flees the shadows of war in Biarritz, dallies with his mistress in intrigue-ridden Casablanca, merrily jolts cafe society in New York, and finally—with his astonishing retinue—returns to his hacienda in Ecuador.

... An extraordinary book which will amuse everyone ... a real reading experience." HENRY SEIDEL CANBY, Book of the Month Club News, $2.50

A Book-of-the-Month

NOW I LAY ME DOWN TO SLEEP

GREAT WINTER NIGHTS' ENTERTAINMENT FROM THE VIKING PRESS, N. Y.

upon some sort of evidence. Mr. Fowler seems to know, for instance, precisely what various ancestral Barrymores and Drews said on various crucial occasions. But it is remarkable that their turn of phrase is singularly like his own. If Barrymore père actually did call one of John's early teachers "a priest so honest that Diogenes would have put away his lantern, and so learned that Plato would have kicked Socrates in the behind," or if Grandmother Drew actually did say to Lionel after a doctor's visit, "Whatever it was that the learned calomel merchant has been telling you, pay no attention," then one can only say that the whole tribe spoke a language astonishingly similar to that later to be affected by the biographer of one of their descendants. And of course it is difficult, once one has begun to doubt the actual words, not to begin doubting the whole incident.

One elaborate story is told concerning some white mice which Lionel as a boy released in the house, with the startling result that the premises were presently overrun by hoards of mongrels, "blazed, piebald, calico, half-and-half, pinkeyed but brown-bodied." After that passage no Mendelian is going to have great confidence in the authenticity of any alleged incident reported without supporting affidavits.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

"ERSATZ" DEMOCRACY

For a better understanding of TRUE DE-MOCRACY, read this statement of the Liberal position (as it differs from the merely "Liberal" position) in three challenging articles by THOMAS F. WOODLOCK:

I—THE CITY OF CONFUSION (proposed by the 17 signers of "The City of Man")

II—THE BOOK NOBODY READ
(the truth about the "Syllabus of Errors")

(how to tell one from the other)

Reprinted from three recent issues of COLUMBIA, published by the Knights of Columbus, in a pamphlet of about 12,000 words. The pamphlet will be sent postpaid to any reader of The Nation on receipt of ten cents in coins or stamps. Address your order to

P. O. Drawer 1670, New Haven 7, Conn.

BUY YOUR BOOKS THROUGH THE NATION

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (set free) provided payment is received with the order, as publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Readers' Service Division
THE NATION • 55 FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK 3, N. Y.

"Down Under"

PACIFIC PARTNER. By George H. Johnston. World Book Company. Distributed by Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.50.

BEFORE the war Australia had never made an automobile, chiefly because English manufacturers wanted to preserve a virgin colonial market. Now Australia makes not only tanks but also war planes. Before the war Australia had never disputed England in the matter of foreign policy. In 1941 Australia served notice upon England that it would not ratify any appeasement bargain which London might reach with Tokyo if it was detrimental to China. The land "down under" is growing up, and Mr. Johnston, a passionately patriotic Australian newspaperman, is proud.

He is proud of the fact that the Labor Prime Minister, John Curtin, is a policeman's son who had to quit school and go to work as a printer's devil when he was twelve, and that the Air Minister is a locomotive engineer, and that the Supply Minister began his career as a barber, and that the top military commander, Blamey, is a former police commissioner. He is proud that the income-tax rate rises to 92.5 per cent after $16,000 a year. Mr. Johnston is particularly proud that the Australian rulers of New Guinea never have permitted exploitation of the natives; instead the colonial policy has been "Papua for the Papuans." As a result, the Papuans worked unstintingly to help beat the Japanese-except one notoriously bad tribe which allied itself to the Japanese, then discovered its error, and later shamefacedly presented to the Australians, as prisoners, its own former leaders who had entered into the Japanese alliance.

An American soldier in Australia asked Mr. Johnston to recommend a book which would give a good general idea of the nation. There was no book to recommend, so Mr. Johnston wrote one. He included a dash of Australia's history, an outline of its political ideals, rather too much about the glory of its feats at arms, sketches of its leaders, and a good analysis of the over-all strategical war problem in that area. Although his book is more journalistic than scholarly, it presents a useful and entertaining picture of Australia at war and simultaneously in transition.

On the subject of General MacArthur, Mr. Johnston is obviously puzzled. He thinks the General has led Australia's forces well, but he cannot relish MacArthur's flamboyance, his "incredible veneer of showmanship." The author's real enthusiasm is for Lieutenant General George C. Kenney, the air commander whom Washington sent out to serve under MacArthur; his appointment was "one of Australia's luckiest breaks." It was General Kenney, according to Mr. Johnston, who patiently and tactfully persuaded MacArthur that the airplane could be useful in warfare.

Mr. Johnston is "convinced that MacArthur has no political ambitions in his own country, the United States." This conviction is by no means shared by newspapermen who have talked to the General more recently. On the contrary, a mounting mass of later evidence suggests that MacArthur now regards himself as the one man who could rescue the nation from President Roosevelt.

MARCUS DUFFIELD

This is the book they're talking about...

Read it and prepare for the most dangerous moment in all history...when Germany, losing this war, lets loose the campaign for winning the next

GABRIEL HEATTER: "In this book I found the answer to the question millions of us have asked — What to Do With Germany. Read it and you will see what has to be done to save your child another war. This book will take hold with the fury of a prairie fire."

PHILADELPHIA RECORD: "Probing, compact, educative, sane and magnificently constructive, 'What to Do With Germany' strikes us as essential reading . . . It is no over-statement but rather an exact definition of its importance to say it deserves to circulate in the millions."

CLEVELAND PRESS: "His 200-page book is the most provocative study we have seen on the question of what should be done to Germany." CAPTAIN EDDIE RICKENBACKER: "The most comprehensive, allimpressive human document put forth to date. Every statesman and politician should be forced to read and digest it."

CECIL ROBERTS: "It is the most searching and balanced analysis to which Germany has ever been submitted."

VICE-PRESIDENT HENRY A. WALLACE: "A timely book for those who are doing serious thinking about the post-war period."

cuiffon fadiman: "A calm, cool, completely documented, bullet-proof demonstration of the fact that unless the German nation (not merely the official Nazi gang) surrenders unconditionally, we are inviting another war with the Germans twenty years hence."

PRICE, $2.50

ZIFF-DAVIS PUBLISHING COMPANY

Paramount's Technicolor Triumph

"LADY IN THE DARK"

Starring

GINGER ROGERS, RAY MILLAND, WARNER BAXTER, JON HALL with MISCHA AUER In Person — THE RHUMBA KING

XAVIER CUGAT and His Orchestra
WALTER "DARE" WALL — DEAN MURPHY
PARAMOUNT • TIMES SQUARE

20th Century-Fox presents ALFRED HITCHCOCK'S

LIFEBOAT

Starring Tallulah Bankhead with WILLIAM BENDIX
Continuous Performances ASTOR B'WAY at 45th ST

STAGE PLAYS

"A real evening in the theatre" NICHOLS,

"DECISION"

BELASCO THEA, 44th ST., EAST OF BROADWAY

MEXICAN HAYRIDE Ny HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS . Staged by HASSARD SHORT SONGS BY COLE PORTER WINTER GARDEN, B'way & 50th St. Mets. Wed. & Sat.

"A definite hit . . . gay, glib, daffy - enormously funny."

RUTH GORDON

OVER TWENTY-ONE
MUSIC BOX, 45th St. W. of B'way, CI 6-4636—Evs, 8:40, Mats, Thurs, & Sat. 2:40

OPERA

N.Y. CITY CENTER OPERA COMPANY

MON, & TOSCA Glaunini, Herini, Camileri, Aruelli, Belarsky, RED, EVES, BRILL, REMAN, Corriy, Rem., Norville, Tues, FRI., SAT. EVES.

THUR., SUN. EVE. CARMEN Tourel, Birney, Light, Bratchelwsky, Camiled, SAT. MAT.

N. Y. CITY CENTER, 131 WEST 55th STREET 85c, 1-10, 1-65, 2-20

NATION SUBSCRIPTION RATES

I Year $5 • 2 Years 50 • Three Years $11

Introductory offer to New Subscribers: 10 weeks for $1.00

Canada, $1 a year extra; Foreign, $1 a year extra.

Pan American Union requires no extra postage.

Mail all orders to

THE Nation

55 Fifth Avenue . New York 3, N. Y.

Thurber's Creatures

MEN, WOMEN AND DOGS. By James Thurber. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

THE cartoon began as a reprover and corrector of manform I think two things are largely responsible: the breakdown of the Renaissance conception of the personality and industrialism's mutilation of man. Being the first to witness the latter development, the English produced in Hogarth and Rowlandson the first great cartoonists. Thurber, another Anglo-Saxon, continues in his own minor way the criticism of humanity and society which they began.

Thurber's cartoons express the shamed amusement at itself of our literate middle class, with its frustration and boredom, its inability to be spontaneous except when drunk, its impersonal energy, and its desperate, sociable aggressiveness. The incompleteness of his creatures grows out of their surrender to simultaneous environmental and internal pressure, which squeezes to the surface the unattractiveness that is inside us all. There it clamors for love, attention, and excitement—and the less we get the more we want, being the neurotics we are. "Please let every moment be an adventure." The convulsive passes Thurber's creatures make a tone another, their bursts of violence, exhibitionism, and irrelevance express the profoundest dissatisfaction with contemporary experience and, by inference, with society.

Thurber, whether he knows it or not, aims at specific class—the people who read reviews like this and find or might find that the New Yorker satisfies a need. Humanity in general is not at issue.

The deepest emotion we receive from Thurber's drawings involves our lack of any desire to have his creatures actually exist, as, say, we might want Mutt and Jeff to. It is a part of our reaction to neurotics and neuroses-which in our time seem the only things capable of compromising human beings in their very essence, as sin once could. And then Thurber's art itself does not do enough. To a drawing by Rowlandson, you can say that only part of you is like that; the art itself shows how much of the hopeful is still left to be said. But seeing yourself reflected in a Thurber drawing, you are forced to admit that accidental resemblances are disastrous: if you are in any way like that you are hopelessly compromised. The fact is that Thurber is not good enough to take us out of the plight in which he finds us. The great defect of any humor less than first-rate is to define our limitations without by that very act transcending them. The only world it knows is the one you never made-whereas first-rate humor avows that everything can be converted into consciousness and the world become thereby one of our own making. Of course, the fault is only partly Thurber's. In Rowlandson's time it was still possible to conceive of an attainable way of life possessing dignity and interest. Today we can scarcely even dream of one.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

Coming Soon in The Nation"A Dictionary of American English" Reviewed by George Genzmer

IN BRIEF

THE BOOK OF CANADIAN POETRY. Edited with an Introduction and Notes by A. J. M. Smith. University of Chicago Press. $3.50.

For the serious student of Canadian poetry this book is indispensable. In time it spans 118 years; 76 authors are represented by 250 poems. These authors are introduced by biographical notes and, frequently, by individual critical estimates. Their work is presented under six different headings: Part I, Indian poetry and French-Canadian folk songs (other poetry in French is excluded from the intention of the volume): Part II, Pioneer and Emigrant: the Rise of a Native Tradition: Part III. The New Nationalism, "The Golden Age"; Part IV, Varieties of Romantic Sensibility; Part V, Modern Poetry: the Native Tradition; Part VI, Modern Poetry: the Cosmopolitan Tradition. There are also a bibliography, divided into several useful sections, and indices. The editor, A. J. M. Smith, himself a poet whose work deserves to be better known, contributes an introduction. In addition to patient scholarship, he has that other patience which enables him to see the poet beneath the trappings of fashion; and he understands well the peculiar problems of dress that colonialism imposes on literary aspirants. Unhappily, the general reader who does not possess his patience and insight will be apt to find the search for Canadian poetry something like looking for a needle in a havstack: pages 35-429 assay a good deal more verse than poetry, until one begins to wonder whether our increasing delight in the poems toward the end of the book may not be as much a recognition of contemporary fashion as of a poetic naissance. For the reader who feels that Mr. Smith's enthusiasm requires some corrosive correction, the poem entitled The Canadian Authors Meet, by F. R. Scott, is recommended.

MY REVOLUTIONARY YEARS. The Autobiography of Madame Wei Tao-ming. Charles Scribner's Sons.

The life story of the remarkable wife of the Chinese ambassador to the United States is an epitome of recent Chinese history. Born into a Mandarin family and brought up under the regime of the Empress Dowager, Tcheng Soumay became a secret agent of the Kuomintang at the tender age of fifteen, as a dynamite runner. Later as a student in France she was involved in China's refusal to sign the Versailles treaty. Doctor of Laws of the Sorbonne, she became China's first woman lawver, first woman magistrate, and first woman president of a law college. She was offered the post of Minister to France, but she preferred to remain at home as a leader of New China, where, like her husband and former law partner, she has taken a prominent part in civil administration and in national resistance.

THE INNOCENT EMPRESS: AN INTIMATE STUDY OF EUGENIE. By Erna Barshak, E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.50.

This is a sympathetic and well-grounded biography of a remarkable, fascinating, and curiously unsatisfactory woman. It is appropriately illustrated and written in a style characterized by both taste and point, in spite of a few minor lapses due to the author's lack of complete familiarity with the English language-turn of phrase, correct usage in regard to titles, etc. But these will not spoil the reader's pleasure. The author is a distinguished Central European psychologist now in this country.

THE END IN AFRICA. By Alan Moorehead. Harper and Brothers.

This is an unusually worth-while book of its type, written by an Australian correspondent. The author's personal history and portraits of himself and the people, great and small, whom he encountered are truly incidental to the story of the Tunisian campaign, and broad political implications and the principles at stake are not lost sight of in the hurry of events and impressions.

FILMS

PHANTOM LADY" is the first picture produced by Joan Harrison, who worked with Hitchcock as secretary, idea woman, and script writer from 1934 to 1941. Much of it is good, It is also a pleasure to see because Miss Harrison got to make it, apparently, through a combination of the strong arm, luck, and the sensible willingness of Universal's executives to take chance on a B thriller: because within limits she clearly knows what she is doing; and because the critical and popular success of the film may possibly encourage other film executives to take chances on other dark horses and may also encourage other horses, dark or white-haired, to take chances with their best rather than their merely safe ideas and abilities.

Even so, I feel the film is being talked about a little too excitedly. Miss Harrison is doing nothing that Hitchcock has not done a great deal better, and little, for that matter, which was not a commonplace ten to fifteen years ago in American city melodramas. She is simply an intelligent, entertaining werker in an idiom which badly needs not only restoring but developing. She gets from Hitchcock none of his finegrained business and eye for detail, only some of the broad and show-wise aspects of his style. She knows, for instance, when and how to use silence, and she has a better than average sense of place, mood, timing, cutting, and sound. She has a nicely unconventional sense of casting which brings one fine bit by a hatmaker who looks like a maltreated Renaissance angel, and which uses Franchot Tone as a cultivated paranoiac; but Tone's performance cannot get above his mediocre lines and her

THE RACES OF MANKIND

RUTH BENEDICT and GENE WELTFISH

Up to Date Facts You Need to Know. . . . To Fight the Nazi Myth of a Superior Race.

TIME says: "Brightly written . . . brightly illustrated . . .

10¢ at your bookstore, or order from

THE PUBLIC AFFAIRS COMMITTEE, 30 Rockefeller Plaza, New York 20, N. Y.

fancy lighting of his obsessed hands. Miss Harrison seems, in fact, to know much less about people, and how they think, feel, talk, and move, than about effects. Some of the dialogue ("You should see how they've twisted him, hurt him . . . and his mind was so full of beautiful plans for model cities") is like a nail on a slate; and the producer also permits a good deal of amateurish reading. Even the effects are not all they might be. There is a suspense scene on a late-night Elevated platform which is excellent up to the ten seconds which should tighten and pay it off; there it shifts into second gear, and not even the frightening jolt of the turnstile which relieves it can rescue it. There is another scene, a jam session used as a metaphor for orgasm and death-which in turn become metaphors for the jam session-which is good but would gain, I think, if it were less intensely romanticized; the chief mistake there, it seems to me, is a narrow table crowded to all its edges with liquor bottles. That, too, is good, physically vivid metaphor; but it is juvenile-delinquent jazz. The late reels of the picture slacken, and the ending, upon which Universal insisted, is half-heartedly done. But this is written as a would-be corrective of too much indiscriminate praise. There is plenty in "Phantom Lady" to enjoy, and to be glad of. JAMES AGEE

MUSIC

AHLER'S Fourth Symphony, when Bruno Walter conducted it recently with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, made me freshly aware of certain important qualities of Mahler's music and of the mind that produced it. The work is unusually relaxed, genial, gay, humorous; it is characteristically expansive and longwinded; but characteristic also is the unfailing alertness and attentiveness of mind that keeps the progression freshly interesting. It is only with such alertness and attentiveness that one can use a huge orchestra as Mahler does, choosing now these few instruments, now those to produce detail after detail that is as delicate and subtle as it is strikingly original. The same qualities of mind are evident in Mahler's daring harmony and counterpoint; and they make his thought as fascinating as his language and style.

In Mahler's music Walter's tendency to carry relaxation to the point of softness and slackness is not the weakness it is in Beethoven or Mozart; and the performance was superb. In its own way it constituted an additional devastating comment on the conception, the feeling, the style of Rodzinski's performance of Mahler's Second earlier in the season. And the pleasure which the orchestra had in working with a relaxed conductor instead of with a tensely driving one was audible in its playing.

Haydn's Quartet Opus 54 No. 2 in C major, which the Budapest Quartet played at its fourth Y. M. H. A. concert, is one of the works in which the Hadyn process that I have talked about produces a new breath-taking surprise with each movement-the unusual form of the slow movement, with lower strings gravely developing a single sustained phrase while the first violin soars above them in poignant quasi-vocal, quasi-improvisatory florid melody; the solemnity of the finale; and perhaps most amazing of all, the dissonances in the trio of the minuet movement, conveving a heart-piercing anguish. The effect of this trio was spoiled by the Budapest group's excessively fast tempo for the movement; aside from this the performance was one which only the Budapest Ouartet itself could have surpassed; and the group would in fact have played the work with the same phenomenal beauty of sound, precision of ensemble, and subtlety of phrasing as it did Beethoven's Opus 135 if it had worked as long on the Haydn as it has on the Beethoven. Actually the two works sounded as though they were performed by two different groups; and the roughnesses heard in the Haydn were also heard in Mozart's Quintet K.593 in D major, which has its own breath-taking moments, particularly in the slow movement.

Victor's February list includes a new set (950; $4.50) of Chausson's Symphony in B flat performed by the late Frederick Stock with the Chicago Symphony. Chausson is known to most people through his "Poème" for violin and orchestra, which has long been one of the staples of the violin literature and more recently has been used by Antony Tudor for his ballet "Lilac Garden." The scale of the hauntingly lovely "Poème" is perfectly suited to its feeling and idiom; but in the Symphony these are inflated and expanded in a way that makes for grandiloquence and tedium. The performance seems excellent, and is recorded with superb fidelity, spaciousness, and richness. Played with a light, wide-range Brush pickup the surfaces of my copy are not quiet but are better than surfaces have been recently; with a heavy, limited-range Astatic Trutan pickup they are quiet.

Victor also has issued a set (929; $4.50) of the first four of the seven movements of Holst's Suite "The Planets": "Mars, The Bringer of War," "Venus, The Bringer of Peace," "Mercury, The Winged Messenger," and "Jupiter, The Bringer of Jollity." I recall my first hearing of this music at a Stadium concert in the mid-twenties, and the impact of the crescendo of the ominous ostinato rhythm in "Mars." This time there is no impact from that device; and all these pieces realize their programmatic content in a facile flow of third-rate music. The performances by Sir Ernest MacMillan with the Toronto Symphony seem good; and their recorded sound would be excellent if it were not blurred in heavily scored fortissimo passages by reverberation. With the Brush pickup the surfaces are a little noisier than those of the Chausson set: with the Astatic Trutan they are quiet.

Victor's set (955; $4.50) of excerpts from Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass" spoken by Ralph Bellamy I played for a friend with more knowledge of the subject than I have, whose comment formulated the impressions I had received. Briefly, it was that Bellamy does not have the vocal resources for the reading of poetry that Maurice Evans, for example, brings to the recorded excerpts from "Richard II"; and that his way of dealing with it is to speak it as prose.

B. H. HAGGIN

CONTRIBUTORS

MAXWELL S. STEWART, an associate editor of The Nation, is a member of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations and editor of the Public Affairs pamphlets. His latest book is "Building for Peace at Home and Abroad."

ORLANDO ALOYSIUS BATTISTA is a research chemist for the American Viscose Corporation.

G. A. BORGESE is professor of Italian literature at the University of Chicago and author of "Goliath: The March of Fascism."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS
THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York 3, N. Y.
Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic:
One year 55: Two years $5: Three years $11,
Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1:
Canadian, $3. The Nation is indexed in Readers Digest, Index for Authorities, Public Affairs
Information Service, Dramatic Index, Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

Letters to the Editors

Mothers, Inc.

Dear Sirs: Although Mrs. Dilling is indicted again, her "thundering herds," as she calls her followers, are at their posts. They may seem to be under cover, as compared to pre-Pearl Harbor days when their mourners' veils darkened the Senate galleries and when they stampeded the offices of Congressmen who did not share their views, but the Mothers, Incorporated, are still on the job.

In Chicago their most recent appearance was at the United Nations Association Congress on January 15. They entered the last session separately and seated themselves in different parts of the hall almost as though they were normal human beings. What provoked their wrath was references to Russia, Great Britain, or a lasting peace. When the chairman had finally spotted all the incorporated mothers and had ceased to recognize them, they turned to noisier tactics. One of them stamped up the aisle shouting their favorite refrain, "Hucksters of Other Men's Blood!" while others screamed, "Slackers!" Apparently there was one incorporated father in their midst, a dilapidated-looking fellow who offered himself to the assembly as Presidential candidate. All he asks is cash to finance his campaign, and then he will settle "the doublecrossers in Washington," who "stole their ideas from the Nazis." His platform clarifies the five enemies of our country: (1) the British Empire, (2) the Russian Communists, (3) the German Nazi Party, (4) the Japanese Empire, and last and greatest, from the space given this point, the "F. D. R. Gang." Meanwhile, on a more dignified plane, other women distributed brochures announcing the Women's League for Political Education, whose lofty message to the "Mothers and Daughters of America" sounds like the League of Women Voters with a drop of poison underneath.

This particular appearance of the Mothers is of interest because it is typical and not unique. A liberal Catholic reports that these women haunt his lectures, and once in a paroxysm of enthusiasm two of them heiled Hitler in front of him. Chicago may be a center for such groups, and there were enough of them to fill their own meeting for Gerald Smith the other night when they booed England, the Jews, Roosevelt, and Willkie. Nevertheless, delegates at the congress told of similar activities in cities as far apart as Los Angeles, Detroit, and New York.

During the next critical months these activities will probably increase. Since they are trained for the offensive, while an audience is unprepared and bewildered, the intruders can waste considerable time if they do not actually sow dissension and break up the meeting. Nevertheless, it is the Mothers who are really on the defensive. Ask them to state their names, mention the FBI and "Under Cover," and they become suddenly tongue-tied or look for an exit.

E. T. D. Chicago, Ill., January 19

Independent Poll

Dear Sirs: A few weeks ago Harrison Spangler announced that a Presidential poll had been taken in England by some army officers, and that the G. O. P. had come out on top by a small majority.

I decided to take a poll of my own unit as between Roosevelt and Dewey, the likeliest candidates. I intended to get at least 300 votes but stopped at 149 when I read about the hot water Spangler and his officers have got into for conducting the straw vote. Here are the results: Roosevelt, 112; Dewey, 29; Undecided, 8.

Incidentally, the soldiers here are mostly all Northerners. The main factor for the Roosevelt runaway was definitely "Don't change Presidents during the war." Many fellows told me they were 100 per cent Republican but absolutely would not vote for a new President. And a few others didn't believe me when I told them of the November elections. They said it was unlawful and unthinkable to hold a Presidential election in war time.

I was amazed and delighted by the results of my poll, which I believe is indicative of the soldier vote anywhere.

This is what I read in headlines on the second page of yesterday's newspaper: "Fourth Term? Soldiers and Marines Say No; Navy Yes." And here are the figures in the straw vote taken by Pat Robinson of INS in the South Pacific area: Do You Favor a Fourth Term for the President?

	Yes		No
Army, Marine Officers	166 .		190
Army, Marine Enlisted	220 .	.7	251
Navy Officers	90 .		82
Navy Enlisted	163 .		161
Colored Soldiers	85 .		0
Marke we don't all	044 4	ha	00000

Maybe we don't all add the same way.

Incidentally, many men might not favor a fourth term but would still vote for Roosevelt in preference to the Republican candidate.

After talking to 149 soldiers there is no doubt in my mind that the election won't even be close—at least so far as the service men are concerned.

CORPORAL M. A. B. Somewhere in Texas, February 1

Russia and Bukovina

Dear Sirs: I do not understand how, in Leigh White's generally fair and competent review of "Road to Peace and Freedom," he came to make a comment so misleading to readers as his discussion of what I said about the Russian occupation of northern Bukovina. It is quite true, and I thank him for calling attention to it, that I incorrectly spoke of this phase of Russian territorial expansion as occurring in 1939 But in commenting on my statement that the purpose of the occupation was "to give Soviet Russia and Czechoslovakia a common boundary along the Carpatho-Ukraine," he says that I ventured a little beyond my depth because, "actually, Bukovina was not occupied until June 27-30, 1940, when Czecho slovakia had ceased to exist and when the Sub-Carpathian Ukraine had bees occupied by Hungary."

Any reader of the review would assume that, in addition to the error as to the date, I had through ignorance failed to take account of facts which vitiated my argument. Who would dream that in the very next sentence I had said that "the actual effect at the time was to provide a common frontier with Hungary," because of its prior seizure of the Carpatho-Ukraine? Contrasting effect and purpose, I went on to say that "Russia's present [1943] support of the Czechoslovak title to the Carpatho-Ukraine, which would deprive Russia of a common frontier with

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 53

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 People who snore do and are (two words, 5 and 6
- 9 A finger in the pie? No, fifty, and that's a heap
- 10 A model world
- 11 A kick from horse
- 12 Journalistically sent by telegraph
- 13 "One self-approving hour whole years outweighs Of stupid -----and of loud huzzas" (Pope)
- 15 Set free
- 16 Broadcasters, but not on the radio 18 Wrap up closely—anyway, with a couple of articles following direction
- 21 Belief that includes Paradise
- 24 Shades of Arabian Nights? Well, one of them (two words, 3 and 4)
- 26 "He's rude!" (anag.)
- 28 You couldn't dub Leander this
- 29 Hold forth
- 30 A jewel is as nothing with a real friend
- 31 Little looked after, and somewhat mean (hyphen, 5 and 6)

DOWN

- 2 Fly beyond the mark
- 3 An arm goes back and gets things worth finding
- 4 The people who run this throw off all restraint

- 5 His duel with Hamlet really started something
- 6 What a break of three produces 7 French poet who confessed that he knew everything except himself
- 8 Sporting employee who keeps his board in order
- 14 Order that is changed when cited 17 "Never mind the why and -----, Love can level ranks, and therefore ..." (H. M. S. Pinafore)
- 19 Character in Pickwick Papers ("Sam, beware of the vidders")
- 20 Oil added to a dying ember is likely to cause trouble
- 22 Ten pies for a sculptor
- 23 Living together
- 25 Great commercial activity about middle age—the prime, in fact
- 27 Far from excited; still it may be

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 52

ACROSS:—1 HARD PRESSED; 0 PENE-LOPE; 10 ROWERS; 11 MACRAME; 12 MEANDER; 14 SEXTER; 15 OBSCURED; 17 CRYSTALS; 20 ADDUCE; 22 UNROLLS; 24 RETRACT; 26 TAKING; 27 AGITATOR; 28 PROOF-READER.

DOWN:—2 ABERRATES; 3 DOORMAT: 4
REBL; 5 STREETS; 6 EDWIN; 7 MENAGE;
8 BREEZE; 13 HORSE; 16 UNDERRATE;
18 RANDAN; 19 ALLEGRO; 20 AMERICA;
21 CUCKOO; 23 OSIER; M LAIR.

Hungary and give her one with Czechoslovakia instead," leads to the conclusion "that Russia's occupation of northern Bukovina was in anticipation of the restoration of Czechoslovakia to its pre-Hitler status."

I can point to a couple of other dates in the book that are incorrect, but any-body who doubts the soundness of this interpretation of the motive for Russian seizure of Bukovina need only read the news accounts of the treaty just signed between Soviet Russia and Czecho-slovakia, and note the heavy emphasis placed upon a common frontier. Finally, I have never thought it necessary to discuss Czechoslovakia as if it no longer existed, even if the State Department did ask the National Geographic Society to eliminate it from its post-1939 maps.

IRVING BRANT

Gatlinburg, Tenn., February 2

Knockdown House

Dear Sirs: As a postscript to the exceptional article by Francis Westbrook, Jr., in your issue of January 8 on Houses on the Belt, let me say that the first prefabricated house of which I can find any record in this country was set up in Windsor, Connecticut, by William Holmes.

Holmes, a settler at Plymouth, Massachusetts, began trading knives and mirrors with the Indians in 1633. Two years later, having stored a knockdown house in his hold, he sailed defiantly past the fortified post of the Dutch at Hartford, notwithstanding a threat to open fire, and proceeded to the mouth of the Tunxis (Farmington) River, and set up his house at Windsor, the first permanent settlement in Connecticut.

One may reflect with envy in these days that the people of Windsor paid their town taxes in onions.

SILAS BENT

West Palm Beach, Fla., January 11

The Obverse

Dear Sirs: Your In the Wind department of January 22 took a gentle dig at me, under the caption "Immaculate Fertility," for a sentence in my book "The World of Sholom Aleichem"—to wit: "Jews were too busy having children to bother with sex." But if you invert the sentence you'll get the obverse truth: "People are too busy with sex to bother having children."

MAURICE SAMUEL

New York, January 27

THE Vation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 158

EDITORIALS

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MARCH 4, 1944

265

267

277

290

NUMBER 10

I	N	T	H	IS	IS	S	U	E

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

Tollies, Oralle and I city	20,
Fiscal Fiddling	268
Mr. Churchill Reports	268
ARTICLES
Reaction's Unhappy Prisoner by I. F. Stone	270
The Civil Air War by Keith Hutchison	271
10 Years Ago in The Nation	274
G. I. in India	275
William Allen White by Lewis Gannett	276

In the Wind POLITICAL WAR

Can We Make Use of Hirohito? by Edward Hunter	278
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus	280

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Dancing Star by Rolfe Humphries	28:
Heiden's Hitler by Leopold Schwarzschild	281
Man and Food by Benjamin Harrow	284
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling	286
The Function of Philosophy by Martin Lebowitz	280
Films by James Agee	288
Art by Clement Greenberg	288
Music by B. H. Haggin	289

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

CROSS-WORD	PUZZLE	NO.	54 B	by tack	Barrett	292

Editor and Publisher FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

Washington Editor Literary Editor
I. F. STONE MARGARET MARSHALL

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor
I. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic Drama Critic

B. H. HAGGIN JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL
LOUIS FISCHER
Business Manages

JONATHAN DANIELS
REINHOLD NIEBUHR
Advertising Manager

HUGO VAN ARX MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Asso-

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 55 Fifth Ave., New York 3, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

WHETHER GENERAL PEDRO RAMIREZ FELL without fighting or after a heroic struggle with his colonels may be an interesting item in the military history of Argentina but it does not affect in the least the gravity of the South American situation. The only important fact is that the G.O.U.—responsible for the coup d'état of July-retains power. Indeed very little has changed in Argentina since the day the pro-Nazi clique in the army, considering President Castillo a toohesitant fascist, threw him out of the Casa Rosada. Even the rupture of diplomatic relations with the Axis, about which a section of our press and some officials in Washington so noisily rejoiced, was pure farce. Nothing has changed fundamentally in Buenos Aires; but the intentions of the instigators of the July revolt have taken more definite shape. Events in Chile, in Peru, in Uruguay prove that we are witnessing the development of an articulated plot to seize power in the Western Hemisphere and that Hitler, while losing battles in Europe, is gaining ground in Latin America.

~

IN SANTIAGO DE CHILE ONE OF OUR democratic friends, the former Consul General in New York, Anibal Jara, now at the head of the government press service, has just exposed the continued activities of Nazi agents in Chile, and a hundred of them have been arrested. From Peru comes word that again last week government circles feared developments in Buenos Aires might produce violent repercussions in Lima. Even in Montevideo new activities of Axis agents have recently come to light. In the face of a threat of such dimensions the reactions of Allied diplomacy remain slow and weak. It should not be necessary to wait until the last shred of evidence is produced to show whether General Ramirez left the presidency in good health, slightly indisposed, or collapsing with "fatigue." It is clear that the G.O.U. by its pretense of legality in substituting Vice-President Farrell is merely trying to avoid the difficulties which, in the case of Bolivia, led to the withdrawal of recognition by the United States and Great Britain. The only policy for the Allies to adopt is to break all diplomatic and economic relations with Argentina and to do it promptly.

THAT THE FRANCO REGIME IS BEHIND THIS whole troubled situation in Latin America is not doubted any longer even in official circles. The subversive character of the Falange was emphasized last week by no less an authority than the Attorney General of the United States. In a document remarkable for its precision and outspoken language, Mr. Biddle pointed out that General Franco headed the Falange and dictated its policy. The "national cause" of the Falange, he continued, looks to the establishment and preservation of a totalitarian state, the unity of Spaniards throughout the world, and the restoration of the ancient Spanish empire. "The Falange claims to have organized, in all the Latin American countries and in the Philippines and Puerto Rico, groups that subscribe to these doctrines." Following the Attorney General's denunciation of the Falange, Representative Coffee of Washington brought to the attention of Congress a series of specific cases showing the support given to the Nazis in Latin America by Franco agents. If obliged to choose between the concrete accusations of the Attorney General and Representative Coffee and the pious attempts to fabricate a new pro-Allied Franco undertaken by Archbishop Spellman and journalists like Henry Taylor, we choose Mr. Biddle and the Congressman from Washington. We consider both men more conscious of their responsibility to their own country and less susceptible to the influences of the Vatican and to the charms of Madrid society-where Mr. Taylor discovered that Spain under Franco is the happiest nation in the world. As long as the Spanish dictator is allowed to move his agents into the Western Hemisphere under the protection of diplomatic immunity we shall suffer one defeat after another in Latin America.

×

THE RUSSIAN WINTER OFFENSIVE SHIFTED into high gear as the Red Army celebrated its twentysixth anniversary. Within a few days two of the greatest Nazis bases, Krivoi Rog and Vitebsk, which had held out for months against strong pressure, were seized. At the same time the Soviets opened an attack on the longquiet center of the White Russian line, overrunning the important town of Rogachev. In the north, where the Red Army has been on the offensive for more than a month, it has been advancing an average of ten miles . day toward the key railway center of Pskov. This sudden speeding up of the Soviet offensive seems to be partly the result of a cold wave which has frozen the rivers and lakes hard enough to bear the weight of mechanized equipment. But the German defeat on the Leningrad front and the isolation of a sizable German force in the Dnieper bend may have so weakened the Nazi position that a general withdrawal could no longer be avoided. Having lost the iron of Krivoi Rog, the manganese of Nikopol, and the strategic positions in the Leningrad area, the German high command has little reason to defend positions east of the old Russian border.

*

WE HOPE ATTORNEY GENERAL BIDDLE'S thoughtful and courageous address on the cartel system before Harvard Law School alumni in New York will get the attention it deserves at home and abroad. Mr. Biddle's program for the breaking up of such great German cartels as I. G. Farben and for rooting out its influence in occupied Europe must be an important part of any postwar plan that offers hope of eradicating the conditions in which fascism has been nurtured. His demand for full publicity on all foreign commercial agreements should help secure the passage through Congress of the O'Mahoney bill for that purpose. Especial interest attaches to his insistence that the fruits of Axis research during the past decade be thrown open to all of industry. This implies an end to the policy whereby the Alien Property Custodian has left untouched those alien patents under which a number of American firms enjoy exclusive licenses. We recommend to our British friends those portions of Mr. Biddle's address dealing with their probems. Thanks to Congressional investigations we know a great deal more about the harmful part cartels played in hampering England's defense than the British themselves do. If these revelations were better known in England the British might be less complacent thanthey tend to be about the cartel system.

>

THE NATION APPLAUDS HERBERT GASTON. Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and his colleagues of the Interdepartmental Committee on Employee Investigations for the spirit and the findings of their first annual report to Attorney General Francis Biddle. "Administrative action," the committee says, "shall not disregard those traditional American principles whose fundamentals include free speech and liberty of conscience." This, rather than the Dies attitude, is the framework in which the committee has chosen to operate. It was set up in February of 1943 by the President to advise and assist federal agencies in determining the guilt or innocence of employees accused of advocating or belonging to organizations which advocate overthrow of the government by force or violence. Of 301 cases submitted to the committee, only 5 were found to warrant dismissal. The committee finds "no real basis for supposing that government service harbors any significant number of persons who are members of organizations which advocate the overthrow of the government of the United States by force or violence, or who personally so advocate." It is too much to hope that this will end what Henry F. Pringle in the Saturday Evening Post recently termed "snooping on the Potomac." But the report may at least provide progressives in Congress with ammunition against Dies.

*

BY A SIX-VOTE MARGIN THE HOUSE HAS rejected the notorious Johnson bill, which would have deprived Japanese Americans of their citizenship if they could be shown to have made any statements regarded as disloyal to the United States. The bill had the strong backing of a number of West Coast super-patriotic organizations which seek to denaturalize and deport some 7,000 interned persons of Japanese descent who have given equivocal answers to the so-called loyalty questionnaire. In theory, a negative or equivocal answer to the question regarding their loyalty to the United States is presumed to indicate subversive or disloyal tendencies. In reality, according to observers who have studied the conditions under which the questionnaire was presented, the answers probably have no such significance. It can be assumed that saboteurs, real or potential, were careful not to announce their intentions by a negative answer. Those who did reply in the negative appear to have done so for a variety of reasons which have little to do with the issue. Great confusion prevailed in the camps at the time the questionnaire was presented. The directors were given no instructions on how to meet the barrage of queries as to the meaning of the test. Many of the internees regarded the inquisition as insulting in view of their long record of loyalty and gave negative answers as a protest against the indignity. Others believed that an affirmative answer would force them to leave the protection of the camps.

Politics, Grand and Petty

In THE dramatic exchange between President Roose-velt and Senator Barkley it is possible to see one of those historic contests between the ruler and the people—but first you must strain your imagination until it cracks and blind both eyes to the realities of American politics in the year 1944. If you reject this prescription you will probably not fall into the illusion of the New York Daily News that Roosevelt is Charles I and Barkley is Cromwell; you will be surprised to learn from Representative Reed of New York that the episode is part of the "age-old contest between Anglo-Saxon liberty and attempted despotic rule"; and you will not confuse the gentlemen of the Seventy-eighth Congress with the noble barons of Runnymede.

Under the Constitution there has always been a tug-ofwar between the executive and legislative branches of the government. The creators of that document were wise enough to know that the lines of jurisdiction could not be drawn rigidly, that there would have to be a measure of give-and-take, depending on circumstances that could not be foretold generations in advance. They assumed that the safety of the Republic at any given time would be the measure by which a wise Executive and a responsible Congress would regulate the ebb and flow of their respective powers. In time of war the tide of authority necessarily and inevitably flows toward the executive branch, and there has never been a war in which Congress has not subordinated itself to the President. War Congresses have always grumbled, "investigated," and stood on their dignity, all of which they had a right and obligation to do. But, fortunately for the country, they have gone along on major matters.

The Seventy-eighth Congress has not contented itself with these traditional vents for letting off steam. Having displayed more than its quota of bitterness over the exercise of war-time powers by the Executive, it is now prepared to raise the question of constitutional jurisdiction in the midst of the most desperate war in the nation's history. Its choice of the tax bill as an immediate issue and the political circumstances of the Presidential campaign arouse grave doubts of its sincerity.

Do the rebellious followers of Senator Barkley really question the President's constitutional right to veto a tax bill? Do they think he had any recourse but to veto a measure which he regarded as inadequate to meet the financing of the war, inequitable in its distribution of the tax burden, and gravely short of what is needed to head off a calamitous inflation? They complain bitterly of "a small group of irresponsible theorists in the Treasury Department who advise the President on taxation and who seem to have lost patience with constitutional government" because they want Congress to follow their recommendations. But haven't these complaining Congressmen ever heard of the constitutional provision that the President, presumably advised by his Cabinet, "shall from time to time . . . recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient"?

Descending from the realm of high theory to the level of election-year politics, where we believe the true issue lies, we find that the Barkley coup confronts the President with the greatest challenge since he took over from Mr. Hoover the reins of a depression-ridden country. Congressmen do not gang up on the Presidential leader of their party when they think he has the backing of the country. Particularly do they avoid such behavior in an election year. Clearly, then, the Democrats who vociferously followed the Barkley lead count on one of two eventualities: that Roosevelt can still be headed off at the party convention, or that even if he is nominated and elected, he will represent a reluctant, war-dictated choice, and the voters will express their real sentiments by supporting hostile Congressional candidates.

In this situation the President has no choice, moral or political, but to face the issues, to present his case and his program to the people. If he surrenders, or glosses over the differences that separate him from the majority of his party in Congress, his victory, if any, will be worse than meaningless. For, like Wilson, he will be forced to work with a Congress bent on frustrating his every aim and armed with a fresh mandate from the people. In that sad eventuality he will be even less able to achieve an enlightened peace than a Republican executive supported by a Republican Congress. If, on the other hand, he explains to the voters the absolute necessity of Congressional support in such matters as war financing, he can, we believe, still achieve the one kind of victory that will have meaning. The stakes are too high for cleverness; they call for stature.

Fiscal Fiddling

Politics aside, the Barkley affair served the tories issues that the President was striving to illuminate by his veto of the tax bill. It is doubtful whether Mr. Roosevelt cared very deeply whether the tax bill was enacted into law or not. The defects in the bill, though irritating, were scarcely important enough in themselves to justify the veto. Although the suspension of the automatic increase in the social-security tax was wholly illogical at a time when revenue is desperately needed, the President must have had some qualms about favoring a tax that is wholly regressive while rejecting a bill that provided some additional revenue from corporations and highincome groups. But the two points which the President was trying to drive home through the veto were far more important than these details. The first was the utter inadequacy of the revenues provided by the bill in the face of the grave threat of inflation. The second was the failure of Congress to seek additional revenue in the pockets of those who have profited most by the war.

The crucial importance of taxes in the struggle against inflation cannot be overstressed. The President almost alone among our political leaders has understood from the beginning that the excess spending power created by the war must be absorbed by taxes if inflation is to be headed off. A year ago he pleaded with Congress to provide $16,000,000,000 in new revenue-a figure which competent economists even then regarded as an absolute minimum. Mr. Willkie's grasp of the essentials of war economics was not revealed until quite recently, too late to have any effect on the Republicans in Congress, who must share responsibility for the inadequacy of the bill just enacted. Mr. Roosevelt has probably reconciled himself by now to the probability of a financial breakdown on the home front, but he would not have been discharging his duty as President if he had not made one last effort to avert it.

No less important from the standpoint of sound wartime policy is the principle of equality of sacrifice. Both for the sake of morale and financial stability, the needed revenues must be raised from those who possess the existing surplus of spending power. The present tax measure violates this principle fundamentally. Special groups actually receive relief from existing taxes, and the special privileges granted to mining, lumbering, natural-gas, and commercial aviation industries invite invidious comparisons. The President was thus merely stating a fact when he said that the bill provided "relief not for the needy but for the greedy"—an expression that seems to have angered some members of Congress by its aptness.

The record is clear. The President has consistently and patiently urged a tax program that would uncover the hidden pools of excess spending power and prevent war profiteering. He asked for a war-time ceiling on incomes, after taxes, of $25,000 a year. Under his leadership the Treasury submitted a series of tax proposals that would have thrown the weight of taxation primarily on those who could pay higher taxes without sacrifice of essential living standards. But the Administration has been rebuffed on these proposals by a Congress bent on fiscal fiddling while inflationary fires burn. When the inevitable day of reckoning arrives, the voters may not be concerned about whether or not their Congressmen voted to override the President's veto of the tax bill, but they will ask why prices are out of control.

Mr. Churchill Reports

NWILLING to recognize the revolutionary implications of the war or to encourage the revolutionary forces it has set in motion, Mr. Churchill has depended heavily on nationalism to provide the driving power of the crusade against Hitlerism. Nor can it be denied that this emotion has deeply stirred the peoples of the occupied countries and inspired them to heroic resistance. Nevertheless the principles of nationalism provide no solution of the problems that beset Europe and form the most insecure foundation on which to build peace. Even now, before victory is assured, we are finding the ranks of the United Nations confused by rivalries of a bitterness which bodes ill for the future. The nationalist spirit is taking forms which Mr. Churchill obviously views with alarm but knows not how to exorcise. No wonder that his latest report to the House of Commons indicates both a loss of political bearings and an unwonted lack of confidence.

We do not complain because the military picture he painted was rather more somber than that which has recently been presented by eminent American and British authorities. Victory in 1944 has long seemed to us not a certainty but a reasonable hope, particularly if the United Nations developed a political third front as well as a military second front. But Mr. Churchill made it plain that, whatever plans were made at Teheran for the others.

no basis was laid for a political strategy which would assist in the disintegration of the enemy. On the contrary, his statement that the Atlantic Charter did not apply to Germany, the indications that he gave of a developing "spheres-of-influence" policy, the snub he administered to Italian democracy—all these things pointed toward sole reliance on military methods to win the war and sole reliance on power politics to maintain the peace. These are not policies which can in any way be presented to the German people as an inducement to abandon Nazi leadership. Rather they play right into the hands of Goebbels in his constant effort to bolster German morale, and provide valuable grist for those American propagandists whose aim is to weaken American morale and break down the United Nations front.

In his discussions of the military situation Mr. Churchill laid special stress on the air war. The intensity of the raids on Germany, he said, had by no means reached its climax, and "spring and summer will see a vast increase in the force of the attack." Since the Prime Minister went on to speak of this offensive as the foundation of Allied invasion plans, this may mean that the final attack on the Continent will not begin as early as had been expected. In any case Mr. Churchill seemed anxious to forestall any criticism of delay by stressing the total British contribution to the war, the extent to which Anglo-American air power was diverting the Luftwaffe and decreasing German ability to make war, and the importance of the Italian campaign as an absorbent of German military man-power.

It is, of course, perfectly true that the achievements of America and Britain on the sea and in the air, together with economic assistance to the Soviets, have made a bigger contribution to the Red Army's victories than Moscow has been willing to acknowledge. But the fact remains that Germany is a land power, which will only be finally crushed on land, and it is on the eastern front that the most spectacular steps toward this end have been taken. Until equally positive action is seen in the west, Russia will appear in its own eyes and in those of most of the world to be winning the war by itself.

That is why the successful invasion of the Continent as early as possible is vital from the political as well as the military angle. Until the Anglo-American forces are firmly established in Europe, Anglo-American diplomacy cannot take the initiative. At Teheran Stalin seems to have told Churchill and Roosevelt how he proposed to secure Russia's western frontiers, and they could only acquiesce—even though his plans conflicted with the Atlantic Charter. Mr. Eden, it is true, has denied that spheres of influence were agreed upon, but Mr. Churchill's speech certainly points toward an understanding about regional responsibilities which would amount to the same thing under a less provocative name.

Thus, while expressing a wistful desire for the postponement of territorial questions until after the war, the British Prime Minister asserted that some agreement regarding the Russian-Polish borders was urgently necessary. Declaring that Russian demands did not go "beyond the limits of what is reasonable and just," he went on to say that he had agreed with Stalin about Poland's need of compensation at the expense of Germany "both in the north and in the west"—a phrase which suggests the inclusion in Poland of much purely German territory.

Anticipating objections, Mr. Churchill explained that the Atlantic Charter did not apply to Germany "as a matter of right." But it did state that its signatories sought "no aggrandizement, territorial or other," and that they desired "no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned." These declarations, it might well be argued, represent an unwise reversion to Wilsonian self-determination. Nevertheless, as they stand, they cannot easily be squared with the dismemberment of Germany.

Nor can the democratic guaranties of the charter be squared with our Italian policy. Nevertheless, Mr. Churchill defended the continuation of King Emanuel and Marshal Badoglio on the ground that they command the allegiance of the Italian armed forces. But he was not able to give any very convincing evidence of the value of those forces, and it is clear that so long as the old regime in Italy continues, the Italian people are going to be fairly apathetic. The Anglo-American authorities, however, seem to have decided that a subservient Italian government is better than an enthusiastic one. A democratic regime, Mr. Churchill explained, might try to strengthen its position with the people by resisting the demands of the Allied armies.

Strangely enough he moved straight from this cynical dismissal of popular government in Italy to a tremendous eulogy of Tito and his followers. We welcome this belated tribute, wondering at Mr. Churchill's inability to realize that the same kind of social energy that suffuses the Partisans might have been released in Italy also if our armies had come truly as liberators. The difficulty, as we pointed out earlier, is that Mr. Churchill understands this war only in nationalist terms and so must fight it with one arm tied, unable to make use of the explosive political and social forces in Europe which transcend all national boundaries.

A dinner on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of Freda Kirchwey's association with The Nation was held at the Hotel Commodore in New York on February 27, 1944. Excepts from addresses made by Raymond Swing, Thurman Arnold, Reinhold Niebubr, Dorothy Thompson, Archibald MacLeish, and Miss Kirchwey will appear in early issues of The Nation.

Reaction's Unhappy Prisoner

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, February 25

T IS difficult for us who live so close to great events correctly to appraise them. Even those of us who happen to be Washington correspondents, and are reputed to be conscientious, know extraordinarily little of what is actually going on. The philosopher in Connecticut, with nothing to rely on but his daily paper and his knowledge of history, may have as clear a view of the operations of the men and forces which really determine the course of events as the reporter in Washington. The former's thinking is at least unaffected by the terrific clash of personalities in the capital, by the huge volume of supposedly authoritative but not very reliable information the reporter picks up, by the pull of partisan struggle and the undertow of wishful thinking. It is with this apology that I should like to contribute the little I can to an understanding of what has happened in the past seven days here. I am inclined to think it of momentous importance in American and world history.

The background of the week's events is comparatively simple, and may make the events themselves easier to understand. It is that the United States is emerging from the war enormously enriched and comparatively unscathed, and faces the post-war period the greatest capitalist power on earth. This country will henceforth, until adversity reawakens the people and revives the progressive movement, be the citadel of world reaction. As a result of compromises believed necessary to mobilize the nation, one strategic post after another has been relinquished to men representing monopoly capitalism. Wartime prosperity has stilled the desire for social reform from which the New Deal drew its life, and war-time disarrangements and hardships-petty as these are in perspective-have provoked a vast amount of dissatisfaction with the "ins"—the feeling among large sections of the people is on just that low plane. The producers in all ranks-labor, agriculture, and business-seem chiefly worried that someone else may be making more out of the war than they are, while the representatives of the great aggregations of wealth, tremendously increased by the war, use these dissatisfactions further to make the President their prisoner and the future their secure domain. In the process the ugliest reactionary tendencies of middle-class America are awakening and being encouraged. These are clearly visible in Congress.

The House that cheered Rankin after a speech in which he called Walter Winchell "kike" booed O'Connor of Montana into silence when the latter jumped to his feet, red-faced and shaken, to accuse his colleagues of not giving the President "the revenue to fight this war." The mob spirit of the House in overriding the President's tax veto was matched by the sentimental orgy with which the Senate celebrated Barkley's repudiation of his party chief. The whole affair has served to dramatize the fact that Mr. Roosevelt is in name only the head of the Democratic Party. On taxes, as on consumer subsidies and the soldiers' vote, the President no longer controls the party. The Democratic Party has always been a rickety vehicle for progressive Presidents, and what Mr. Roosevelt has been able to accomplish in the past has been done not so much because of the party as in spite of it. His strength has lain in appeals to the people, but the people are distracted, and the President himself seems undecided as to how far he can go in appealing to them over the heads of the party and of Congress. The apologetic telegram to Barkley on the eve of the Democratic caucus may have served to make Barkley's reelection seem less of a defeat for the President. But the price paid for that typical maneuver was to put the President back on the defensive, to rob him of the moral advantage of continued attack, and the people of the clear line of leadership only such attack could provide.

The weakness of the tax-veto message was that it did not sufficiently place the complex technical issues in their large framework. Its strength was the resurgence of the old Mr. Roosevelt, notably in its one great fighting phrase, its reference to the bill as providing "relief not for the needy but for the greedy." The tax-bill veto was a courageous document. It struck directly at some of the most powerful economic interests in America, among them mining, lumber, natural gas, and aviation, and it collided head-on with the general business antipathy to renegotiation of war profits. It could be, and may still be, amplified into a series of speeches to bring home to the people the great issues of the home front and of the post-war period. But at least temporarily the President has again decided on retreat, though it would seem that he has reached the point where there is little more to lose by a complete and open fight with Congress and a large section of his own party. This, of course, is an observation easily made from outside a situation which may appear considerably different to the man on whom final responsibility for the war rests. Further compromise will certainly be the advice of the President's major advisers, most of whom are now men of much the same outlook as the men in Congress he is fighting.

The most powerful of these advisers is James F. Byrnes. Never a progressive, he was appointed "assistant President" in the hope that his old contacts in Congress would make it easier for the President to obtain legislation for carrying on the war. But the compromises such an alliance entailed have proved one-sided; they have increased the power of Byrnes without perceptibly helping the President "on the hill." The President has become so entangled in the consequences of these compromises, become so completely the prisoner of the reactionary influences Byrnes represents, that it seems no longer possible for him to provide any clear line of progressive leadership. The same President who sent a fighting tax-veto message to Congress on Monday had surrendered over the week-end on a far more important front. Quickly and quietly he signed the "blank-check" directive written for him by Byrnes putting into effect the major recommendations of the Baruch-Hancock "millionaire's Beveridge plan" for post-war America. The one important instrument we have for a better life after the war. our vast government-owned productive resources, were thereby handed over to Will Clayton, Jesse Jones's chief lieutenant, a man of the extreme right, a trader in cotton of imperial and worldwide power, a dealer with Axis countries before Pearl Harbor, and a monopolist to the core. At the same time Frank T. Hines, a reactionary hack politician, a leftover from the Republican '20's, an opponent of New Deal work-creation measures, was placed in charge of the job of providing work for returned soldiers. These appointments and the Baruch-Hancock report represent a crucial victory for monopoly capital, and make a farce of the repeated promises of "full employment" after the war. When these two major events of the week are placed side by side—the fight on taxes and the surrender of resources-is it any wonder people are bewildered?

The Civil Air War

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

ALTHOUGH all phases of post-war aviation are newsworthy, its international aspects have won most of the headlines in the past year. The prospects of air rivalry between the powers, the debate on the future of lend-lease bases, the quarrel between the nationalists and the internationalists, the struggle between the advocates of monopoly and the proponents of competition, the problem of translating the ideal of "freedom of the air" into practical terms—all these are matters with which even casual newspaper readers have become familiar.

It would have been fairly easy, however, to have over-looked another conflict which has developed in the last twelve months, a conflict over the post-war exploitation of America's own skies. News of this civil air war has seldom made the front pages, perhaps because it was less easy to summarize in large, dramatic terms, although the fact that the two chief antagonists—the air lines and the rails—are both prolific advertisers may also be relevant. In any case the comparative lack of publicity is no index of the warmth of the battle, for in many ways the intensity of competition is sharper in the domestic field than in the international.

The future of aviation has been depicted in such glowing terms that it is hardly surprising that a flock of imaginative entrepreneurs should be seeking to elbow their way into a preferred place in its development. Most of them, however, are content to seek opportunity at home. Realizing that overseas ventures would involve them in the mysteries of foreign politics, they are prepared to leave the international sphere to the big boys with the big money who know their way about. What the average would-be domestic operator is looking for is a flying truck route or a helicopter feeder line from his home town to the nearest metropolis.

One result of all this hopeful enterprise is that the offices of the Civil Aeronautics Board in Washington have been flooded with applications for "certificates of convenience and necessity," without which no flying common carrier in interstate commerce can leave the ground. Many of them have been filed by the existing air lines, which are seeking both overseas routes and extensions of their present domestic operations. Thus American Airlines, which already serves thirty-five cities in twenty-two states, has applied for new routes and extensions which would increase by 50 per cent the area it now covers. United Air Lines, another of the "Big Four," is asking approval of plans which would almost double the mileage of its present system. Ambitious schemes are also being promoted by many of the railroad companies. The Missouri Pacific, emerging from bankruptcy rich in cash, thanks to the war boom, has announced the formation of a subsidiary, Eagle Airlines, Inc., which has applied for a 6,000-mile network paralleling the parent company's surface lines. Dwarfing even this plan is the proposal of the Greyhound Corporation to combine its nation-wide bus operations with seventy-eight helicopter feeder routes covering 49,000 miles of air travel.

The possibilities of the helicopter—a matter of heated debate among aeronautical experts—are stirring imaginations even outside the transport business. Several big department stores are hoping to bring customers through the air directly to their roof tops. William Filene's Sons, for instance, has petitioned for six routes connecting its Boston store with forty-five cities scattered through New England. Its helicopters, it is suggested, would not only provide a passenger service but could also be used for the rapid delivery of parcels.

These are just some samples of applications filed with the CAB by large, well-financed corporations. But there have been a host of proposals by small companies and individuals, some of which are far less modest than the resources behind them. The story is told of a woman with a baby in her arms who presented a petition for the right to operate two transcontinental cargo and express routes. She was mightily disappointed not to get her certificate over the counter. A Washington schoolboy was better informed and more patient. He put in his bid with the idea that approval might be forthcoming by the time he had finished a college engineering course.

These are extreme examples, but obviously a great many of the applications now being so hopefully deposited in Washington must be turned down cold. Before the CAB can grant a "certificate of necessity and convenience" it has to hold hearings and decide on the basis of the evidence offered whether the proposition has inherent merit, whether its promoters are technically capable and financially responsible, whether there is a sufficient public demand to warrant the new service. Naturally, in cases of regularly scheduled services, existing air lines which have won their spurs have a big advantage. And among the active lines the "Big Four" trunk systems-American, United, Eastern, and Transcontinental and Western—which account for 76 per cent of air-line operating revenues, inevitably have a pull over the little fellows.

A vast extension of air-carrier routes is in prospect after the war. Civil airways within the United States at present total around 35,000 miles, with stops at 284 places. To give complete air coverage, according to Edward P. Warner, vice-chairman of the CAB, it would be necessary to increase route mileage to 200,000 and provide for service stops at 3,400 places. Granted that any such development is far in the future, there remains tremendous scope for enlargement of the services currently offered, and, indeed, there will have to be great expansion if civil aviation is to achieve its well-advertised aim of carrying all long-distance first-class mail and 80 per cent of first-class passenger traffic.

But who is to get the business? Are the big lines with their through routes to share the bulk of it by multiplying schedules where the traffic is heavy and by extending their systems so as to include the new local and feeder services? Or are the smaller lines to have an opportunity to catch up by being given first chance where there is competition for a new route or where the growth of business warrants increased service on existing routes?

Again, it is to be anticipated that a good many fliers returning from war service will be interested in getting into the aviation business on their own. Any attempt to restrict the field of air transport to the companies which have already staked out a claim would be bitterly resented. Finally, there is the hotly debated question of the extent, if any, to which surface carriers are to be allowed to take to the air. At present that matter is regulated by the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, which provides that the Civil Aeronautics Board may permit control of an air carrier by a surface carrier if it "finds that the transaction proposed will promote the public interest and will not restrain competition"; and then only where the proposed service is incidental to the operations of the surface carrier.

The present tendency of the CAB is to interpret this clause far too narrowly to satisfy the railroads, which are pressing for a change in the law. This is one of the reasons why the Lea bill, which was favorably reported on last year by the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, has since encountered very heavy weather and is now stranded on the rocks of the Rules Committee. The purpose of this bill is to codify existing aviation laws and to provide for an expanding future. Its two most controversial features are its omission of any mention of the surface carriers, whose ambitions will continue to be curbed by the 1938 act, and its assignment of all authority over "common-carrier" air operations to the federal authority-an attempt to preserve aviation from the regulation by forty-eight different authorities which has so bedeviled road transport.

This proposal to establish the principle that air sovereignty is a federal and not a state attribute has raised the usual clamor about states' rights, and it is under that banner that the Lea bill is being most hotly fought. There is some reason to believe, however, that this agitation is, in part at least, a cover for railroad opposition. In any case the alternative bill introduced by Congressional opponents of the Lea measure would, while preventing surface carriers from engaging directly in air transport, prohibit the denial of an application for an air route on the ground that the application was controlled by a surface company. In other words, the railroads would only have to form subsidiaries in order to gain entrance into the air-transport business.

It is, of course, very natural for the railroads to wish to obtain a share in a new form of transport that threatens to take away some of the cream of their own business. But it does not follow that the public interest would be served by ministering to their desires. The railroads' propaganda line is a clever one. They do not hint, of course, at any desire to dominate the airways; they do not even talk a great deal about their aerial ambitions. Their slogan is the blessed word "integration."

The case is argued in an elaborate brochure, published by the Transportation Association of America, which declares that the "present national policy of compelling competition between modes of transport" is likely to lead to widespread bankruptcy in the common-carrier industry and ultimate government ownership. To avert this catastrophe, the most effective method, it is suggested, would be "to provide for a limited number of competitive transportation companies under private ownership, each being permitted to develop and render all types of services under proper regulation." Such companies should be organized by negotiation between the existing common carriers subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in which all federal regulation would then be centralized.

On the surface this plan provides certain safeguards against monopoly, although the authors of the plan stress that competition between transportation companies should be on the level of services rather than rates. But as Wendell Berge, head of the Department of Justice Anti-Trust Division, showed in his recent statement to the Senate Military Affairs Committee, railroads have been in the habit of combining not only to block rate reductions but also to discourage the use of improved equipment and the provision of better services.

None of the air lines have shown any disposition to accept the invitation of the railroad spider to walk into its pretty integrated parlor. They have no illusions about the fact that any kind of vertical consolidation would, in view of the enormous disparity between the financial resources of the railroads and of other common carriers, leave the former in full control.

And they are hardly to be blamed for suspecting that the main object of any transportation trust so dominated would be to protect the existing investment of the railroads at all costs.

Rapid expansion of air transport depends primarily on a reduction of charges which will enable travelers and shippers to take advantage of the savings in time made possible by flying. Is it reasonable to suppose that railroad interests would be enthusiastic about reducing airplane fares and freight rates if it meant diverting traffic from the railroads and rendering equipment redundant? Would there not be an irresistible temptation to freeze air charges at levels which would leave flying a luxury and insure the maintenance of railroad rates?

On the other hand, if natural competition between air and surface carriers is stimulated, we can reasonably expect that the latter will find ways and means of cutting costs and prices. In an interview with the Railroad Age (quoted in American Aviation of December 15, 1943) an unnamed railroad executive declared that while some loss of business to the air lines was inevitable, competition could be met by providing faster, more comfortable, and cheaper trains. "Fares," he said, "must be reduced, and I ardently hope that they will be lowered immediately before the railroads empty their trains by incorrect pricing." How much chance would a policy so beneficial to the public have if air lines and railroads were integrated?

To the threat of surface-carrier encroachments the air lines, large and small, oppose a united front. It is not enough for them, however, to inveigh against the monopolistic designs of the enemy; they need to take more active steps to maintain competition among themselves. One of the most damaging arguments used by the railroad lobby is that the present setup in air transport tends to concentrate traffic in the hands of the trunk systems. The "Big Four" have 23,596 miles of route against 17,314 divided among the twelve others. And as they also cover the most productive territory, each mile yields them three times as much business as the smaller operators can gather per mile.

At a recent hearing before a CAB examining board concerning conflicting claims for the Detroit-St. Louis-Memphis route, a spokesman for the Chicago and Southern Air Lines propounded the theory "that the development of the sound domestic air-transportation system envisaged by the Civil Aeronautics Act requires that the present disparity in size between the Big Four and the twelve other domestic carriers be reduced." In reply Captain E. V. Rickenbacker of Eastern Airlines declared that it would be fatal to build up the small lines at the expense of the large. In allotting routes, he said, the ruling consideration should be which carrier can "most conveniently, efficiently, and economically" provide the service the public needs.

Granted that this must be the standard, the problem the CAB faces is not much nearer to solution. As between large company A and small company B, the former can probably offer better terms to the public at any given moment. But if the big boys are fattened by new business while the little fellows starve on the unprofitable crumbs, will the long-term interests of the public be served? The reasonably probable outcome is that the small companies will go broke or be forced to merge with larger competitors. And this in turn would result in the domination of domestic air transport by a handful of very powerful concerns, which, like most other businesses in a similar situation, would tend to find means of moderating their competition with each other in order to maintain monopolistic standards of profits.

With most types of public utility, competition is either uneconomic or impracticable. But as Oswald Ryan, a member of the CAB, has pointed out, "The inherent characteristics of air transportation, especially its freedom from the necessity of large fixed-property investment, the relatively small amount of capital required in proportion to the volume of the service rendered, and its relatively small fixed costs, make this industry peculiarly adapted to a competitive economy."

If the CAB adopts this view when formulating its general policy in relation to the mass of applications now in hand, it must surely decide to encourage competition to a greater extent than it has done hitherto. It will not leave heavily traveled routes to a single company; it will give the smaller operators a chance to expand and consolidate their systems; it will open a gate for entrance into the air-transport field by qualified newcomers. Such a policy need not cramp the present leaders, especially if they are permitted to expand overseas. And they ought to be the first to recognize that a certain restraint in their ambitions is the best justification of their demand that the air be left to the airmen."

10 Years Ago in "The Nation"

ROPAGANDA from Germany in behalf of its present government continues to clutter up my desk. . . . I am appealed to on behalf of the Deutsche Auslandsinstitut in Stuttgart with the request that I join them in explaining to the American public what a magnificent thing the Hitler government is. . . This is sent to the publisher and contributing editor of the first American periodical to be excluded from Germany by Adolf Hitler!—oswald Garrison VILLARD, March 7, 1934.

PERSONAL: Consider life for the masses not worth while. Organizing an Anti-Life Society. Members to bring no children into world. Communicate if interested. (ADVT.)—March 14, 1934.

IN AN OBSCURE CORNER of the financial section of the New York Times the following interesting item recently appeared: "Alarm over the slowing up of the destruction of coffee in Brazil was allayed in local trade circles yesterday when the New York Coffee and Sugar Exchange received a cable dispatch from the National Coffee Department of Brazil stating that there has been no change of policy. . . ."
Who said the depression was over?—March 14, 1934.

THE CATHOLIC and landowners' program in Spain is Catholic fascism, but though they have plenty of money they lack the mass base upon which fascism was able to step to power elsewhere, and they are faced by an almost completely united front, such as German and Italian workers were unable to form. The prospect in Spain, therefore, is prolonged, violent civil war, and the outcome is by no means as easy to forecast as it was in Germany or Austria.—

March 21, 1934.

THE NAZI DRIVE to coordinate Austria with Germany is not an end in itself. It is but an initial step in the realization of Nazi dreams of a self-contained Third Reich stretching from the Baltic to the Adriatic.—JOHANNES STEEL, March 21, 1934.

THE MACHINE-ART SHOW at the Museum of Modern Art puts ball bearings on black velvet, laboratory glass in rhythmic procession against a calculated light, and springs. propellers, plumbing, and stoves against fine woods and fabrics. . . A screw and a spring and a propeller are surely beautiful, but they are not art unless everything that is beautiful is also to be called art—a tree, a girl, a horse.—ANITA BRENNER, March 28, 1934.

G. I. in India

UR first thought, when we were assigned to this place, was to try to find it on a map. But it was not on the map we had, or on any of the larger maps of India we bought in town. When we arrived here we understood why.

Our camp was simply a cluster of tents and bamboo huts at the bottom of a valley. It was in a clearing ringed by tea fields and jungle grass. The inhabitants of the nearby villages were dressed in loin cloths and carried long curved knives. It was all rather like a story in the National Geographic. If Osa Johnson had wandered up to say hello, no one would have been surprised.

Instead, our receptionist was a billeting-office sergeant who, like all his kind in the army, seemed terribly harassed and wondered where the hell he was going to put us. He put four of us into a tent so full of holes that we swore it had been meant for a shower bath. The monsoons were on, and it rained almost every day, sometimes without halt for forty-eight or seventy-two hours. We built small platforms for our barracks bags, to keep them off the soaked earth, and arranged our cots so that they were not directly under the holes. But for six weeks, until we moved into bashas with raised brick floors and grass roofs, we never had dry beds or dry clothing. After a while our possessions became a moist, mouldy mass. One morning in disgust I threw away a pipe, a pound of tobacco, and a number of other things I had wanted sufficiently to carry halfway around the world.

Our tent was at the edge of camp, and every day small herds of cows would come to graze on the surrounding grass and on our tent ropes. We had once been at a place where a Burmese ape made a practice of cavorting across the mess table, at another where we had to guard the contents of our mess kits against marauding crows, but the cows were the most irritating of all. Their noisy chewing waked us up, and several times a day one would stick its head under the tent flap and moo.

The valley had been described to us as the "land of three M's"—mud, mosquitoes, and malaria. The description was dismally accurate. The whole valley bottom was thick, brown mud. Trucks moving along what were known euphemistically as roads were visible only above their wheel hubs. The mosquitoes were thick everywhere. One morning a tent-mate found eighteen bites on a small patch of his shoulder which had apparently touched his netting. He had heard somewhere that it took malaria three weeks to develop, and until the time was up suffered many imagined chills. It was a camp order to sleep under mosquito netting, and to tuck trousers bottoms into socks and roll down shirt sleeves at sundown. Most of the men required little urging. We used our nets as much to keep out flying cockroaches and stray snakes as mosquitoes. One man spent a long morning under his net waiting for a seven-foot cobra to move on.

During our first two months in this place our work schedule consisted of four twelve-hour day shifts followed by four twelve-hour night shifts, with a break of thirty-six hours when we changed over. At fourthirty in the morning we struggled into our damp clothes, walked out through mud and darkness, and usually rain, to the washroom, and from there to the mess hall for breakfast. Breakfast consisted of hotcakes, sausages, and a hot, dark fluid which the cooks sometimes identified as coffee and sometimes as tea. Later there was a gratifying improvement in our cuisine, but during the first month we lived on hotcakes, frankfurters, corned willy, and C ration. After breakfast we climbed into an open truck, and bumped and lurched over four miles of the world's must rutted road to the communications shack where we worked. Often we arrived in a sodden state and had to work in our shorts while our clothes dried. By the time our shift was over the sun would be going down, and the ride back through the tea fields in the soft light of evening was fine-when it did not rain. We had dinner as soon as we got back. and afterward, since there was nothing else to do. went to our tent to write letters. We wrote by lantern light. The lantern attracted swarms of insects. They flew into our faces, settled down on our paper, buzzed distractingly in our ears. We spent twenty minutes flicking them away for every ten minutes of writing. We soon took refuge in our damp but net-protected cots and talked lazily until we fell asleep.

It was a rigorous routine, but we had no acute sense of hardship. What bothered us most, I think, was the monotony and such inconveniences as lighting cigarettes with wet matches and trying to have clothes laundered in a place where the sun was the only drying apparatus and it rained most of the time.

One evening I walked into our tent and found the other fellows laughing over a copy of Life. There was an article in it by Hanson W. Baldwin complaining that American soldiers thought too much of steak and other equally pleasant American institutions, and that they were unwilling to endure hardships. He wondered how well American soldiers would "take it" in m Scottish commando camp, where men slept on plank beds six feet and some inches long and three feet wide. Several weeks before, our most comfortable bed for sixteen days had been a pile of railroad ties. For the last two of those days the four of us had had only three small cans of cold beans—about three spoonfuls for each of us a day—and some tea. The memory of it made the stern Mr. Baldwin seem very funny.

[This is the second of a series of intermittent letters which we began publishing last spring under the general title Letters from a Pfc. The author, now a corporal, is a veteran contributor to The Nation.]

William Allen White

BY LEWIS GANNETT

ILLIAM ALLEN WHITE, who died on January 29, was an American legend. He was the small-town boy who won international fame as small-town editor. Some folks thought of him as a great liberal; he was really great as a super-average American, and he never thought of himself as anything else.

When, in 1895, he borrowed $3,000 and bought the good-will and equipment of the Emporia Gazette, he knew how to do everything that had to be done in his one-room office. He could set type, feed the press, kick the jobber, keep books, solicit advertising, deliver papers, and write the whole sheet. He was twenty-seven years old, and he had been in the newspaper business, as printer's devil, substitute printer, reporter, and editorial writer, for ten years. He was coming home to the town he was born in, after growing up across the Flint Hills in El Dorado, going to college across the Kaw in Lawrence, and making good in the state capital of Topeka and in the big city of Kansas City, Missouri, across the state boundary.

"The new editor," he wrote in his first owner-editorial, "hopes to live here until he is the old editor. . . . He hopes always to sign 'from Emporia' after his name, when he is abroad. . . . He will support the Republican nominee first, last, and all the time. . . . The main thing is to have this paper represent the average thought of the best people of Emporia and Lyon County."

He was "Will White of Emporia" for thirty-nine years after that, and, except for a detour with Theodore Roosevelt, he always supported the Republican ticket. (He was mugwump enough to support a Democrat, Polk, for governor of Missouri, once, and between elections he was very friendly to both Woodrow Wilson and Franklin D. Roosevelt.) To the end of his days he stoutly insisted that he wasn't much if any better than, and very little different from, a dozen other Kansas editors; he'd just had more luck.

A year after young Mr. White took over the Gazette, he got into an argument on Commercial Street with a Populist who did not seem to him to be one of the best people of Emporia, and he was pretty mad by the time he arrived at his office desk. So he sat down and wrote a peppery editorial called What's the Matter with Kansas?—arguing that the matter was poor people, reformers, and assorted hell-raisers. Mark Hanna, the Republican national boss at the time, read it, liked it, and reprinted it by the million to help elect his William McKinley. So doing, Mark Hanna made William Allen White, at twenty-eight, the best-known country-paper editor in the United States, or in the world.

Will White meditated a lot about that editorial in later years. At first he boasted of it; by 1904 he was writing that "there wasn't an original idea or expression in the whole piece; it was merely what had been heard on the streets, in offices, or on trains. It was a mirror of the popular temper at that time." By 1906 he was calling it "paleozoic." Before he died he was ashamed of it, in so far as he was ever ashamed of what he regarded as the normal vagaries of the growing human animal.

He had the courage to grow. And it wasn't just courage; he liked growing. He loved living. On his sixty-fifth birthday he wrote, pretty honestly: "I have never had a bored hour in my life. I get up every morning wondering what new, strange, gorgeous thing is going to happen, and it always happens at fairly reasonable intervals." He said that years before he had seen a banner stretched across the Coney Island boardwalk reading, "Ain't It Grand to Be Bughouse," and that had been his life's motto ever since. That wasn't quite true. He wasn't bughouse; William Allen White's genius was that he was usually one, but seldom two, steps ahead of his fellowmen; he never doubted that Emporia, and Kansas, and the United States would catch up with him next year if not this.

That averageness was one secret of his success. His very unaverage talent for peppery phrase was another. Virtually every young newspaperman in the United States in the last third of a century has dreamed of buying a paper and rivaling William Allen White's success, but, as Mr. White himself often pointed out, even little county-seat newspapers can't be picked up these days for a borrowed $3,000; and furthermore, most of the would-be super-Whites lack both his invaluable sense of averageness and his actual superiorness. He was always on the wave length with Emporia. He had no itch, as so many young men of today and yesterday have had, to uplift and alter it; he just wanted to help it grow, and grow with it. He happened also to have a pungent writing talent that helped no end in consolidating his business position in Emporia. He paid off the mortgage the year after Doubleday and McClure, of New York City, published his book "The Court of Boyville"; he bought his Associated Press franchise after Scribner's issued "Stratagems and Spoils"; and the Saturday Evening Post's checks for his In Our Town sketches paid for the Gazette's first linotype machine.

Though he made fame and money outside of Kansas, his faults and his virtues were a part of his Kansasness. The geographical center of the United States is in Kansas, and that's where William Allen White belonged. Russell Fitzgibbon in 1937 collected a bookful of his editorials in "Forty Years on Main Street," and some of them were pretty bad-though Mr. Fitzgibbon didn't print the worst; and Mr. White added footnotes to the book pointing out how very bad some of them were. John T. Flynn, in a recent book, dug up some appalling pieces that Will White wrote during the Spanish War; Hitler himself couldn't have been more blatantly superior-Aryan. That was the mood of the American people at the moment; and White would not have been as effective as he was had he been far out of step with it. He had no talent or taste for the impossible lost cause; he fought his best fights when his people were divided and uncertain and movable-as about the Klan in Kansas in 1924, and about aid to the Allies in 1940-when his not inconsiderable weight could effectively help to tilt the scales.

He was, in other words, a genuine democrat. He believed in people. He expected to grow with the people, not to "make" people grow. And in that he was ably seconded by Sallie Lindsay White. If Will White was the legendary American country editor, Will and Sallie White were the legendary American couple. "I have never made even a secondary decision that we have not canvassed it together and agreed before the decision was made," he wrote on his fortieth wedding anniversary. "Sometimes she had her way, sometimes I had mine. But never until we had worked out what we felt was the truth and the way to go together. In the conduct of the Emporia Gazette she has been a full partner. She can come down to the desk and run the paper as well as I ... and she knows the town better than I do."

What Will White wrote about his daughter Mary, twenty-three years ago, in what is probably the most republished editorial in American newspaper history, was pertinent to Mary's father too. "She was the happiest thing in the world. And she was happy because she was enlarging her horizons," he wrote. "She was mischievous without malice, as full of faults as an old shoe. No angel was Mary White, but an easy girl to live with, for she never nursed a grouch five minutes in her life." Nor did her father.

If I'm right that Will White's genius was his superaverageness, it's a pretty proud thing to be able to say about Emporia, Kansas, and the U. S. A. But it isn't an encouraging phenomenon for neurotic intellectuals in the cities who dream of reforming the country by means of country newspapers, bought cheap.

In the Wind

A FRENCHMAN WHO RECENTLY arrived in New York brings this story from the underground. A Nazi colonel in Paris bought a newspaper from the same boy every day. The boy always said, "Voici le journal, grand con." Those last two words are a filthy term of abuse, which The Nation leaves untranslated to spare the sensibilities of the Postmaster General. The colonel asked a French acquaintance the meaning of con, which he could not find in any dictionary. The Frenchman, thinking fast to save the newsboy, told him it was an abbreviation of conquérant. Next day, when the newsboy used the term, the colonel patted him on the shoulder and said, "Non. Je suis le petit con. Le grand con c'est Hitler."

THE PLANNING BOARD of Nutley, New Jersey, has submitted to the Town Commission an agreement which post-war residential builders would be required to sign. One of its provisions reads: "No person belonging to any race except persons of pure Caucasian blood shall use or occupy any dwelling house erected on any lot, except that this covenant shall not be construed to prevent the occupancy by domestic servants of a different race when actually employed by the owner or tenant of any such premises."

THE COMMUNIST PRESS is not what it used to be. The New Masses criticizes I. F. Stone for deploring Roosevelt's omission of the Wagner Act from his list of New Deal accomplishments, and the Daily Worker comments thus on Henry Wallace's Seattle speech: "Vice-President Wallace unfortunately doesn't help the struggle against the anti-Teheran elements by his general attack on Wall Street. The widest kind of national unity is necessary to defeat them, including clear-headed business men from Wall Street."

AN ARTICLE on the renegotiation law in the Railway Clerk quotes Maurice H. Karker, chairman of the War Department's Price Adjustment Board: "In reaching a conclusion we allow an adequate margin of profit, plus a margin of generosity, plus a margin for good measure."

FESTUNG EUROPA: A current joke in Prague is that war daylight-saving time was introduced not to save an hour of daylight but to permit the Nazis to stay in the city an hour longer on the day of their defeat.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.]

BILLIE CAN

Can We Make Use of Hirohito?

BY EDWARD HUNTER

NITED STATES forces have made their first conquest of Japanese territory, American warships have bombarded at least the northernmost fringe of what the Japanese regard as their mainland, and "a Pearl Harbor in reverse" has been inflicted upon the great South Pacific base of Truk. The recent shake-up in the Japanese high command is good proof that the leaders of Japan recognize the seriousness of the military situation.

I fear, however, that their confidence in ultimate victory has not been shaken. As long as the Emperor sits upon his throne, supported by American propaganda, they know that military defeat can be made a temporary condition, a matter of a few decades of renewed preparation. As long as the Emperor is inviolate, Japan will not admit that it has been truly conquered, whether it officially accepts Allied terms of unconditional surrender or not. The Japanese people are patient. Defeat may jolt their pride; it may deprive them of land and resources. But if their man-god sovereign is permitted to lead them, then the road to world domination, though it be long and hard, lies straight ahead. Reverses mean only that faith has not been sufficiently strong to carry Japan to its final destination, and faith must be revived. This was the fundamental concept of Emperor Meiji, the creator of modern Japan. His minister, Hotta, proclaimed it when a department of foreign affairs was set up in 1858. "In establishing relations with foreign countries the object should always be kept in view of laying the foundations for securing the hegemony of Japan over all nations. . . . To have such a ruler over the whole world is without doubt in conformity with the will of heaven."

This "will of heaven" still governs the Japanese Foreign Office. Any compromise peace we might make would be an invitation to further aggression, an overture to new Pearl Harbors. In discussing the question of Allied political policy toward Japan, Dr. Sun Fo, son of the founder of the Chinese Republic, recently said that there can be no decisive victory over Japan unless "the Emperor and the cult of Emperor worship" are swept away, along with "the military caste and its officer cadre." The Japanese people, he pointed out, will no more be able to maintain peace in the future than they have been in the past "if the Emperor remains a divine institution and Emperor worship the state religion." China once had a Son of Heaven of its own, who lives in the memories of hundreds of Chinese. They know how distorted is the reasoning which would perpetuate such an anachronism.

When Japanese leaders examine the transcripts of American short-wave broadcasts and propaganda leaflets, it is not difficult for them to detect the reverent attitude which we assume toward Hirohito whenever we mention him, or to note that we usually go out of our way not to mention him at all. They can conclude, and justly, that our diplomatic and military forces have been warned to take no action, verbal or otherwise, against the Japanese Emperor. This policy of respectful silence is never violated by the Office of War Information, either in broadcasts to Asia or in propaganda for home consumption. In an article published in the New York Herald Tribune on December 13, 1942, Wilfred Fleisher, who has spent many years in Japan as a foreign correspondent, quoted Elmer Davis as saying that our propaganda made no reference to Hirohito "because of a policy laid down by the State Department." Those who administer American foreign affairs, the article continued, feel that Hirohito "may yet play a useful role in the peace to follow Japan's defeat." Our deference toward Hirohito, therefore, it said, was not merely a military expedientthe usual apology for political action-but the cornerstone of the post-war structure we want to set up in Asia.

Mr. Fleisher's statements were substantiated last November 15 by the Washington correspondent of the New York Journal-American. "The suggestion," this correspondent said, "that the 'high standing' of the Emperor in the affections of his people would make him an admirable democratic figurehead has been tossed out to news correspondents of late by officials whose duties carry them frequently into the White House."

Immediately after the United States declared war upon Japan, the government began to censor speeches in which the Japanese Emperor was criticized. Indeed, American propaganda short-waved across the Pacific has actually attempted to boost the stock of the Japanese Emperor in the eyes of his subjects. We have placed the entire responsibility for Japan's aggressiveness upon temporary figures like Premier Tojo, who can be replaced overnight without altering a single aspect of imperial policy. And we have implied time and again that Japan's militarists have acted contrary to the wishes of the Emperor. "On some future day known only to the gods," said Senator Elbert Thomas, in a short-wave broadcast prepared for the OWI, "the Japanese people may again bring forth the red-and-white victory lanterns. . . . That victory will commemorate the defeat of all Japanese militarists and the return of the Japanese people to the ideals of His Imperial Majesty-the Tenno."

Can we blame the Japanese people, then, for cherishing the comforting thought that if and when the war turns decisively against them, all they need to do is drop a few well-known generals and admirals, and lo, they may return to the status quo of December 6, 1941?

The idea that His Imperial Majesty is a mere puppet in the hands of his generals is either wishful thinking or a deliberate distortion of the facts. Members of the Emperor's family are in active service and hold key military positions. Imperial military headquarters have been established inside the Emperor's palace in Tokyo. There the attack against us was planned, and there decisive policy and strategy are made. John Goette, a veteran American correspondent in the Far East, reported in "Japan Fights for Asia" that Japanese imperial headquarters frankly stated in a broadcast on March 8, 1943, that the general plan of the war against the United States and Great Britain had been submitted to the Emperor for his approval. Hallett Abend, long the Far Eastern correspondent of the New York Times, wrote recently that Hirohito "is directly responsible for Japan's military adventures. He knows of his army's excesses and its offenses against civilians, and more than that, he approves of them." Abend quoted a Japanese consul general in Shanghai as saying that when he described the Japanese rape and pillage in Nanking, the Emperor listened eagerly and approvingly, demanding sadistic details.

Hirohito enunciated his policy in an imperial rescript when the Japanese-German-Italian pact was signed: "It is the bequeathed instruction of our imperial ancestors that justice be enhanced in all directions and the whole universe be placed under one roof. This instruction is the one that we are faithfully observing day and night." The "instruction" of Hirohito's "imperial ancestors" was contained in a proclamation by the Emperor Jimmu, who ruled Japan twenty-six centuries ago. It is recorded in the "Nihongi." "Hereafter," Jimmu said when he established his capital, "the capital may be extended so as to embrace all the six cardinal points, and the eight cords may be covered so as to form a roof."

This conception, known as Hakko Ichiu, is the official policy of Japan, unalterable as long as the Japanese imperial system exists. "The co-prosperity sphere in the Far East," declared Foreign Minister Matsuoka in a Diet session, "is based on the spirit of Hakko Ichiu, or the Eight Corners of the Universe Under One Roof. It is not that America's leaders can't understand this, but that they don't try to understand it."

Try to understand it we must if we are ever to admit Japan into the community of nations. We must understand that the tribal teachings of orthodox imperial Shintoism are responsible for the threat that Japan offers to all other peoples of the world; that the power of the Emperor derives not from any qualities of his own but from the holy garb in which the national religion has vested him: that while he holds the scepter the world will not be safe from Japanese conquest by divine command.

The Son of Heaven

The fear that insurmountable chaos would follow the overthrow of the Emperor is exaggerated and defeatist. The Japanese are no more deeply imbued with a belief in the necessity of an imperial system than were the Chinese hardly a generation ago. Moreover, a Japanese tradition will have been broken by this war, if we avoid appeasement—the tradition that Japanese soil never has been and never will be "desecrated" by foreign invasion. Allied and Chinese troops will march down Tokyo's Ginza. The Japanese have been indoctrinated with the idea that the Chinese are inferiors, to be despised. Chinese soldiers in Japan, victorious, cannot fail to arouse the deepest emotion in the breast of every Japanese peasant. That, indeed, will be something the simplest among them will be able to understand.

A Free Japan movement, a movement for a Japanese republic, will start spontaneously as the result of such a shock. The Allies can foster it by pursuing a statesmanlike policy. By subjecting Japanese people interned or resident within our borders to a vigorous propaganda campaign, we can gain powerful allies to further the republican cause in Japan. By maintaining an intelligent system of military government in Japan until a system considered safe for world peace has been established, we can supply the necessary impetus to the creation of a truly democratic regime. Moreover, we can make the Japanese "liberals" of whom Ambassador Grew and others have spoken in such hopeful terms into real liberals, not pretenders who use liberalism as a political mask. These "liberals" have been tainted by orthodox Shintoism more profoundly than Americans suppose. When Japan is freed of Shintoism with its worship of the Emperor, the "liberals" too will be freed, and will be able to assume an active role in the development of a progressive democracy.

The Japanese, like the Chinese, are practical about their gods. If one god does not answer a man's prayers, he is replaced by another. The Japanese have a host of gods and many religions. Many individuals, in fact, profess several religions. I have met persons who insisted that they were Christians, Shintoists, and Buddhists, all at once. The Emperor is a god because he has succeeded. Let him fail and he will be dispossessed—unless the United States government takes it upon itself to polish the jewels of the crown.

Behind the Enemy Line BY ARGUS

ANY prisoners of war from General Giraud down have escaped from Germany. Many stories about their escapes have been published in the newspapers. But none of them have contained any suggestion of the facts which a French officer who fled from Germany in the summer of 1943 confided to a Swiss newspaper, the St. Gall Tagblatt, and which that newspaper printed on February 2. The gist of the officer's surprising story is that the French war prisoners and forced laborers in Germany have a well-organized "resistance movement," that messengers go back and forth constantly between the prison camps and the "resistance" in France, and that the movement receives continuous aid from German sympathizers.

The officer who reports these facts escaped from the Stalag at Königsberg, but in the course of his three years' imprisonment he had been in several other camps, and he says that the same thing went on in them all. "The French resistance," he declares, "is perhaps more tightly organized in Germany than at home." He speaks of "central committees" in each camp and of a directing head on French soil.

What this organization actually accomplishes remains obscure. For the moment it seems to do little except try to keep up the spirits of the prisoners and maintain and increase its own strength. To further both aims, the officer writes, "we concentrated our efforts on one thing":

To prevent our work from being isolated, from being carried on, so to speak, in a vacuum, we had to form permanent connections with the resistance at home. The task before us was complicated and difficult. It was necessary to establish n liaison between the various camps, a liaison with the civilian workers, a liaison with the home country and with Algiers.

In order to make these liaisons, delegates are continually being helped to flee from the camps. In recent months an average of eleven persons a day is said to have escaped from all the camps in Germany. They make their way to France, but not to remain there permanently; "only to inform the maquis [the underground] of our activities and proposals and then to carry back to the prisoners of war word of the activities and decisions of the home front. In order to do this, the messengers, after fulfilling their mission in France, return to Germany in the guise of civilian workers."

But the most interesting part of the officer's story is his account of a widespread German organization which cooperates with the French prisoners:

Of course the whole scheme requires a vast network of branches which can procure false identity cards, money, clothing, and food. Had we not been able to rely on the active help of German workers and soldiers, nothing could have been accomplished. I left many good friends among the Germans when, one stifling summer night, we cut the barbed wire of the Stalag at an unguarded place and left the camp.

Our officer even goes so far as to intimate that the military police gives them some aid, at least to the extent that it does not allow the Gestapo to destroy their organization.

The Gestapo [he says] has exact information about the organization, which has been in existence for two years, but the military police, which has jurisdiction over the prison camps, does not tolerate any interference from the Gestapo, and thus the latter is unable to do anything.

The author of this report did not return to Germany. "An order came from Algiers not to leave the country, as a great task was before us. We have therefore stayed in France and become soldiers of the resistance army."

In one respect, he says, a marked cleavage exists between the French resistance, one may say the French people, and the escaped prisoners of war:

We soon realized that our attitude toward the Germans was very different from that of the people at home. We had seen Germans in their own homes, their daily sufferings, their weakness, and their fear of the future. But in the mind of the average Frenchman under the cruel occupation regime a German means the Gestapo. Whereas our hatred is directed chiefly against the collaborationists and profiteers, the hatred of Frenchmen at home is concentrated on the occupying nation.

These different points of view naturally caused tension between us prisoners of war and the members of the resistance movement within France.

So much for the officer's report. The writer of this column wishes to emphasize that he cannot test any of its statements, but that the St. Gall Tagblatt is not an irresponsible or sensational newspaper. It should be added that the French officer—obviously a Communist—is as wrong to form his judgment of Germans from a few sympathetic individuals as are those who form theirs from the most obnoxious specimens. With this reservation, his story seems important enough to be reprinted here.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Dancing Star

GARCIA LORCA. By Edwin Honig. New Directions. $1.50.

EDWIN HONIG'S book on García Lorca is conscientious, systematic, scholarly, and not a little pedestrian. But Lorca's own brilliance is sufficiently intense to offset considerable dullness on the part of his interpreters; moreover, Mr. Honig quotes him copiously, both in the original and in his own translations, which while not exactly inspired are accurate enough and adequate to give the general idea.

Both as regards biographical and bibliographical detail Mr. Honig presents, compactly, more material than has so far appeared in any book on Lorca in English. This material makes up Mr. Honig's opening chapter. In the second he traces, painstakingly, the poet's heritage, going back in his search as far as the eleventh century. He might have gone back even farther, for Quintilian, writing of Roman writers who originated in Spain, makes comments that indicate that certain elements, familiar in the pattern, were fixed even in his day; and, for that matter, who knows what archetypal strains of cante jondo may not have risen round Hannibal's campfires in the night, before Saguntum, or along the Ebro? From the eleventh century Mr. Honig traces the line through the period of the Golden Age, from Lope de Vega and the double spell of Góngora, through the gipsy influence of the fifteenth century, all the way to the transmarine impact of Rubén Darío and the trans-Pyreneean attractions of French classicism, symbolism, Parnassianism, and surrealism.

Lorca's work, in Mr. Honig's opinion, is readily divided into two periods, one from 1918 to 1930, the other from 1930 to his death in 1936. To the first period belongs most of the poetic composition; to the second, the dramatic. To each of these periods Mr. Honig devotes two chapters; it is clear that he considers the dramatic work the more important, but he is careful to show that the course of development was not single monolinear advance, but that there was a good deal of interaction, a simultaneous advance on several levels, as well as periods of distraction, regression, and confusion. Mr. Honig's last two chapters are devoted to summation. "The secret," he writes, "of Lorca's whole art is that as a poet he had an overwhelming impulsion to supplement the written word by a union of various artistic media; and that despite the consequences to which this led him, he succeeded in remaining primarily a poet."

Reading Mr. Honig's book, one is impressed, more than ever, with the fact that the trouble with Lorca—I use the phrase in its most literal sense, without derogatory connotation—was that he was so many kinds of thing at once. In answer to some political questionnaire, he once wrote, intending to be facetious, that he was a Catholic, Communist, Anarchist, Libertarian, Traditionalist, and Monarchist. But there's many a true word spoken in jest; and he might have added that he was also Granadan and globe-trotter; classicist and surrealist; man and woman; cinéaste, painter, musician (one hopes that some scholar, some time, will collect his compositions), lyricist, and dramatist; as well as student of philosophy and the law. Few artists in our time could have declared so truly, "Nihil humanum alienum a me puto."

But whether this is entirely good for the artist in our time is another question. Our Alexandrian culture, with its insistence on multiplicity, on specialization, pervades even those feudal, those medieval, areas which would seem strong enough to put up more than token resistance. The Leonardolike man is none of its requirement; and the artist like Lorca, whose energy responds so abundantly to any stimulus, is hard put to use all, without subduing any, of his potential talents. Like Yeats, whom Lorca surpasses in variety, he could be distracted occasionally, if never long detained, by phony seductions; unlike Yeats, he did not have to contend with a conflict against official religion. He could hardly have endured, with all his energy, much more conflict than he had to face. Mr. Honig seems to feel that in his later work with the poetic dramas he was making progress toward peaks of integration far beyond those attained in the "Romancero Gitano." Still, one is not too sure of this, not too sure that the extravagance might not have become, before too long, wearisome and self-defeating, and that Lorca might not have turned, in new directions, toward a simplicity and austerity, subsumed, as with Yeats, by all he had ever learned and much that he thought he had forgotten. What renunciations he would have had to make, what reconciliation he might have won, the Fascist bullet saved him the trouble of learning. But in his thirty-seven years what brilliance, what tenderness, what grace, music, perception, gaiety flowered from his confusion! ROLFE HUMPHRIES

Heiden's Hitler

DER FUEHRER: HITLER'S RISE TO POWER. By Konrad Heiden. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

UP TO the early thirties people in Germany looked on Hitler and his movement as typical Munich buffoonery. The educated did not feel called on to pay them much attention. Not until the party's success at the polls in 1930 and 1931 were they aware that something serious was afoot. Then they asked: What is this thing? What are these men?

A young writer was able to give an immediate answer. Ten years before, as a student at the University of Munich, Konrad Heiden had wrestled with Hitler's first followers. Even at that early stage of the movement he had felt impelled to gather all the information he could about Hitler and his enterprise. So now he had enough material to describe them to a curious public—in the first critical monograph on Hitler and his party. Shortly before the Nazis came to power he brought out "Die Geschichte des Nationalsozialismus" ("The History of National Socialismus").

Since then Heiden has written the same book several times, a book about the beginnings of Hitler and the Nazi Party. The second time it was called "Die Geburt des AMERICAN Russian relations in the postwar world are examined by a score of experts in this 128-page, illustrated special number. All contributors, save Henry A. Wallace, have been in the U. S. S. R. All approach the subject from the American point of view.

They show how a Soviet Middle East smacks of our Middle West . . . how we all but touch hands where Alaska reaches out . . . how postwar air routes will make us neighbors. They scan new horizons in Russian life and labor-in arts, folklore, race relations; among youth and women, workers and scientists; in health and things of the spirit. Then comes War Relief and Lend-Lease. Other contributors take up traits, education, trade; stumbling blocks and stepping stones; and those talks at Moscow and Teheran.

The contributors include Walter Duranty, Lewis Gannett, E. C. Carter, Vera Micheles Dean, Donald M. Nelson, Andrew J. Steiger, Louis Fischer, Maurice Hindus, Helen Iswolsky, Mary van Kleeck, Edgar Snow, Harriet Moore, Ruth Gruber, John A. Kingsbury, William Lancaster and others with Richard B. Scandrett, Jr. and Albert Rhys Williams as Special Editors.

Like many of its predecessors, this ninth number in our popular wartime Calling America Series will probably sell out quickly. To conserve paper we plan little overprint and no second edition.

Raymond Gram Swing holds "A wider reading of Survey Graphic would make for a wiser America." To introduce this monthly devoted to social and economic trends which shape your future, we offer a subscription at the reduced rate of

ONE YEAR FOR ONLY $2

(One-third off)

Subscriptions include American Russian Frontiers as long as they last. Mail the form below-today!

SURVEY GRAPHIC,	1
112 East 19th Street, New York 3, N. Y.
0 1 10 0 11 11 11

Send me one year of Survey Graphic, including American Russian Frontiers, at the special introductory rate of $2. I enclose payment.

Name
Address

Nationalsozialismus" ("The Birth of National Socialism"), and the story was carried to 1933. The third time, in "Hitler, a Biography," it was continued through the murder of Röhm in the summer of 1934. With this event "The Führer" now also ends. It is therefore the author's fourth presentation of the same early phase of National Socialism, a phase which ended ten years ago. The advantages which the book owes to this fact are obvious: the writer is well acquainted with the available material, and his literary skill has remarkably improved. The disadvantages are not less real. For an author who has stuck to certain interpretations for many years does not find it easy to revise them. In this case some of the interpretations were hardly acceptable when they first appeared. They are still less so today. And while the space allotted to this review might be used to acknowledge the book's excellences, it seems better to point out its disputable elements, which in fact touch basic questions.

Among these is a persistent overestimation of Hitler. In spite of Heiden's aversion to the "Anti-Christ" who is his hero, he cherishes an immense admiration for him, "As a human figure lamentable, as a political mind one of the most tremendous phenomena of all world history" is his verdict. Expressions of extravagant though hostile respect for Hitler's political ability are sprinkled all through the book. "Almost unerring feeling," "greatness of will," "unquestionable intellectual power," "uncanny acuteness" are only a few of the qualities ascribed to the "man of genius" in the domain of politics. "Greatness emanating from human nullity" is the formula used to sum him up.

That is an amazing combination, and in order to make it credible Heiden conducts the reader on many explorations into the depths of Hitler's soul. On page after page he describes the reflections, the sensations, the conflicts, and the illuminations which at times of stress are supposed to have agitated Hitler's consciousness and subconsciousness. But even if these psychological vignettes were jewels of art and logic, they would still lack convincingness. They are entirely synthetic. Despite vague hints to the contrary, Heiden has had no more access than anyone else to documents or other evidence that would afford a glimpse of Hitler's soul. He has deduced Hitler's political genius from one single fact—the fact of Hitler's success. There was never any manifestation of this alleged greatness except his success, never any other proof of it. The tendency to infer genius from success is widespread, and in Hitler's case this inference was drawn for many years by all the world. But where is that success now, in 1944?

For years the tremendous political mind of Adolf Hitler has reeled from failure to failure. Even his political acts have long been demonstrably impotent, imbecile, suicidal. What is left therefore of the hypothesis of his matchless "calculating intelligence"? Some day archives and witnesses will give up their secrets. The "sensational new material" that today definitely does not exist will then really come to light. Then we shall see verified the obvious conclusion that Hitler has been successful not because of his greatness in one respect but in spite of his nullity in every respect.

Incidentally, about other things too we shall undoubtedly get information at variance with this book. For it is not only as a political leader that the Führer fascinates his biographer. There is a tendency to enhance his stature in other fields. While highly doubtful material is often made use of if it is favorable to Hitler, more authentic material unfavorable to him is ignored. Speculations about Hitler's sexual life should not omit all reference to one of the few definitely known facts-namely, his collection of pornographic pictures, which was mentioned in an official report of the French ambassador, François-Poncet. In a consideration of the blinding of the brave soldier Hitler by poison gas, it should be stated that the hospital diagnosed the blindness as "hysterical." When conclusions are drawn from the socalled "Hindenburg will," there should be mention of the fact that this document is strongly suspected of being a pure falsification. But whatever the archives may yield about such side issues, it is already certain that they will not reveal any political genius in Hitler. Among the important things we have learned from the Hitler episode is that in the domain of politics the dullest idiots, through a concatenation of extraordinary circumstances, can become men of destiny. Portraits representing Hitler with the features of greatness dilute this truth, which is as significant as it is terrifying. Indeed, such portraits are not a little dangerous. They can contribute to the survival or the rebirth of a Hitler myth after Hitler's end.

Another aspect of the book is still less acceptable. It unrolls a consistently false picture of Hitler's historical background, the same picture that German nationalists have been successfully propagating for two decades. The thesis is that after the Reich had the bad luck to lose a world war it was constantly, arbitrarily, and unnecessarily mistreated, held down, and snubbed-the implication being that the victors of 1918 are therefore themselves to blame for what followed. The book does not offer a forthright defense of this thesis but suggests it on almost every page. For example, it describes Poland and Czechoslovakia as "states against Germany, to characterize them by their origin." Their mere existence was a kind of attack upon the Reich: "Like two daggers, Poland and Czechoslovakia thrust into Germany, menacing Berlin at a distance of less than 140 miles." That is going pretty far!

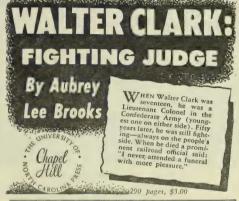

Sometimes Germany's sufferings as they are pictured here are scarcely understandable. What, for instance, is meant by the statement that Germany was obliged to live in "frustrated self-determination"? As a matter of fact, very soon after 1919 the Reich could do as it liked in internal affairs—except, theoretically, in military matters. But perhaps the phrase is one of those metaphors which have no exact meaning but which sound impressive. They occur frequently in the book. The depression of the thirties is changed into something more metaphysical—"the decline of the economic age"; Brüning tried to "preserve the economic age." There are many such "true children of the German political fantasy," to make use of Heiden's own expression.

But on other points the author is not at all vague. For weaker nations to try to insure their existence against Germany by defensive alliances was wanton provocation. They had no moral right to any damages from Germany. The reparations were ruinous. When after their cancelation in 1932 a token debt of three billion marks was left on the books—about as much as Hitler spends for one week

The story of a queat dissenter"

Years before Holmes and Brandeis, North Carolina Supreme Court Judge Clark fought—

- for the 8-hour day
- · for the property rights of women
- against monopolies
- against child labor
- for rule by statute, not by judges

NO FINER NEEDLE!

Turn the volume up to release all the full, glorious tone you want to hear. No needle noise or scraping of the record. Walco's unique design eliminates shank vibration. 10,000 plays, less wear. Ask your dealer, ELECTROVOX CO., INC., MAPLEWOOD, N. I.

IF YOUR COMMUNITY HAS NO BOOKSELLER ORDER YOUR BOOKS THROUGH THE NATION

> Books of any publisher will be delivered to your door at the regular list price, post free if payment accompanies order. Postage charges are paid by purchaser if books are mailed C.O.D. READERS' SERVICE DIVISION.

> > THE Nation

55 Fifth Avenue, New York 3, N. Y.,

of war-this microscopic residuum was still a "considerable sum." That all the money paid was actually money borrowed abroad is called "too simple." That Germany destroyed the value of its own currency is branded as untrue. That the great depression was less severe in Germany than in the United States is ignored. Even absolutely established facts, which are not open to any different interpretation, appear in the distorted form given them by German propaganda. The French, in particular Marshal Foch, it has been established, demanded in 1919 that the German provinces on the left bank of the Rhine be placed under the protection of a permanent British-American-French police force. According to Heiden, "Marshal Foch demanded the left bank of the Rhine for France." The French, knowing their inherent weakness, fought for the formation of a League of Nations army, the retention of conscription in both Anglo-Saxon countries, and the continued presence of large Anglo-Saxon armies on the Continent. According to Heiden, they fought arrogantly for "France's military hegemony over Europe." Hitler wrote that the First World War "was desired by the whole German people"; we hear now that "the last war at its outbreak was welcomed by nearly all nations." And so forth and so forth.

The evening that I finished reading this book President Roosevelt, just back from Teheran, spoke over the radio of the fifteen-year-long "pathetic whining" of the Germans after 1918, by which the other nations, "full of the milk of human kindness," were induced to undertake "well-intentioned but ill-fated experiments." "Those tragic mistakes," he said, "shall not be made again." I think that the President's ideas not only are closer to the truth than those of "The Führer" but have a better prospect of being carried out.

The question remains, what those who view German affairs as Heiden does will have to say about the settlement that is now drawing near. What thesis, more particularly, will they propagate inside Germany?

LEOPOLD SCHWARZSCHILD

Man and Food

MAN'S FOOD, ITS RHYME OR REASON. By Mark Graubard. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

THE author, a research associate in the Department of Biology at Clark University, approaches his subject with knowledge and a strong social conscience. It is his social conscience which gives the book its unique quality. To study dietetics as a branch of physiology is one thing; but to apply such knowledge to the feeding of men, women, and children is quite another.

My guess is that Graubard has steeped himself not too deeply but certainly with enthusiasm in Russian dialectics, and in the writings of such Englishmen as Haldane and Bernal. To a large extent it is this point of view which gives Graubard's book the distinctive quality it possesses, for if it is argued that one may go a little too far with this "social-conscience" business, Graubard may well answer that by neglecting it—as many of our food "experts" do so consistently—little can in reality be accomplished. The author is therefore justified in stressing the view that our leaders in the field must not only be authorities on the subject of nutrition but also be mindful of man's attitude toward food (which presupposes some familiarity with anthropology and religion) and of social factors which influence the choice of food (matters within the scope of economics and social social factors).

A simple illustration centers in the use of meat. Provided it is hygienically prepared, meat is an excellent source of protein—better than proteins derived from most vegetable sources, though no better than the proteins found in fish, in milk and its products, and in eggs. We have no scientific evidence that the protein found in beef is any better or any worse than that found in pork, in mutton, in horse meat, in dog meat, in fowl, or in game. Yet the religion of the Hindu forbids him to eat beef, and the religion of the Jew forbids him to touch pork, and the religion of the Brahmer forbids him to eat any kind of meat, and the prejudice of the Anglo-Saxon prevents him from enjoying horse meat.

And then again, assuming little prejudice, how can we ignore the problems of scarcity and of want—of poor crops, of bad distribution, of inadequate income, not to speak of ignorance and of popular misinformation, wilful or otherwise?

Graubard's book, then, serves a purpose which few books on nutrition can claim. We must know more about food, to be sure; but in order to get most out of such knowledge, we must also know more about man.

The general criticism of the book is that the writing is somewhat awkward. Such sentences as the following are not uncommon: "It is precisely because they [vitamins and minerals] are effective in small amounts that we may slip up in their delivery to the body, miss their physiological function and suffer severe consequences."

But there are also professional inaccuracies which cannot go unchallenged. On page 10 we are told that instinct alone guides rats to a proper choice of food, and on page 33 we are warned against leaning too heavily on instinct. Instinct alone is an insufficient guide; in fact, it is often a very treacherous guide. The paragraph devoted to the relation of diet and resistance to disease may be made much clearer by stating that resistance is always lowered whenever there is a deficiency in the diet. I doubt whether by merely changing their eating habits-a change "dictated by science"-"80 to 90 per cent of our malnourished population would have the means of obtaining a good diet." Here, surprisingly enough, Graubard treats the economic problem much too lightly. Fruits and vegetables are valuable not merely because they contain ascorbic acid. And the author plays directly into the hands of the unscrupulous advertiser when he tells us that large doses of ascorbic acid "have been proved to be beneficial" in colds and infections.

Far more credit should be given to Funk's pioneer work in the vitamin field than either Graubard or others have given it; and though Williams deserves honor for his researches into the chemistry of thiamine, Professor Clarke, of Columbia, should certainly not be ignored.

Where, I ask myself, did Graubard get the information that iron is a direct cure for pernicious anemia—a statement repeated on several occasions? On page 69 the author speaks

Letter to a P.O.W.

WILL YOU WRITE a letter to a Prisoner of War... tonight?

Perhaps he was left behind when Bataan fell. Perhaps he had to bail out over Germany. Anyway, he's an American, and he hasn't had a letter in a long, long time.

And when you sit down to write, tell him why you didn't buy your share of War Bonds last pay day—if you didn't.

"Dear Joe," you might say, "the old topcoat was getting kind of threadbare, so I..."

No, cross it out. Joe might not understand about the topcoat, especially if he's shivering in a damp Japanese cell.

Let's try again. "Dear Joe, I've been working pretty hard and haven't had a vacation in over a year, so ..."

Better cross that out, too. They don't ever get vacations where Joe's staying.

Well, what are you waiting for? Go ahead, write the letter to Joe. Try to write it, anyhow.

But, if somehow you find you can't finish that letter, will you do this for Joe? Will you up the amount of money you're putting into your Payroll Savings Plan—so that you'll be buying your share of War Bonds from here on in? And will you—for Joe's sake—start doing it right away?

Space contributed by
THE PUBLISHER OF THE NATION

of "starches and carbohydrates" when probably what was meant was "starch and other carbohydrates"; for is not starch a carbohydrate?

Casein as such is not "suspended in the form of fine particles" in milk, for the casein is in combination with calcium. In fact, the casein, insoluble in water, appears as such only when the milk becomes sour or is deliberately acidified.

On the whole, Graubard has written a challenging book, and it deserves wide attention.

BENJAMIN HARROW

Fiction in Review

THE HUNTED" by Albert J. Guerard (Alfred A. Knopf, $2.50) has rather more to say than most current novels; indeed, it is good enough to make one wish it were better. Mr. Guerard writes about the kind of people he seems to understand from experience, he is knowledgeable about life, and he tells his story by means of dramatic action. Perhaps one of the defects of his book is an excess of drama: there is surely an over-contrivance of plot which makes even his title too obvious. The main theme of "The Hunted" is the fate of a young singing waitress who marries a decadent poet-professor and comes to live in a narrow New England college town. To this primary narrative Mr. Guerard subjoins the story of a young fugitive from the law, a strange figure called the Bomber. At first, for the sake of sensation, both the professor's wife and the Bomber are taken up by the less reliable college element, but eventually-even inevitably-this disreputable society joins hands with bigoted respectability to betray and hound the two outcasts. Mr. Guerard's psychological girl-hunt, in other words, is very melodramatically underscored by his physical man-hunt, and the interweaving of the two narratives reveals the potential violence that lies behind what might otherwise be thought of as mere social snobbery. The trouble is that Mr. Guerard's man-hunt overstates his girl-hunt, and the girl-hunt reduces the pure terror of his man-hunt. The doubling of motifs, that is, works out to weaken the impact of each of them.

It is also a weakness of Mr. Guerard's book that, for all the author's obvious sympathetic interest in people, its leading characters turn out not to be finally very interesting. But this is a common failure in fictional people, and probably as little susceptible of explanation, except in terms of the creative chemistry, as the failure of perfectly plausible people to hold our interest in real life.

On the other hand, "The Hunted" is impressive, despite its shortcomings, because Mr. Guerard has something very important to communicate about American social psychology at the level just below political action. His picture of American college-fraternity life—its anarchy, its sensation-seeking, and its sexual cruelty—is more than a little disturbing and very convincing. We are used to the note of social horror in Southern novels; the existence of a comparable gentlemanly degeneracy in other parts of the country has yet to announce itself very loud in our fiction, though the fact that it does exist comes to us by way of hearsay, certain newspaper stories, and the intuition we often have of peculiarly native devil lurking beneath our more arrogant humors. Mr. Guerard doesn't weaken his novelistic case by naming the likely political outlet for this kind of anarchic energy, but sections of his book are as frightening as the sound of marching feet in early Hitler Germany.

Although I don't usually like tall tales, I very much enjoyed George Sessions Perry's "Hackberry Cavalier" (The Viking Press, $2.50). Mr. Perry is a most disarming spinner of yarns: he not only writes a superior prose but flatters you out of countenance by assuming that you too are generous enough to accept his generous lies. The Hackberry Cavalier is a young Texan of good family who has a weakness for inexpensive people and pleasures and for flamboyant fights. I can recommend his company for any blue Monday; and I especially recommend Mr. Perry's stories to readers of Jesse Stuart's "Taps for Private Tussie," a book which also deals with primitive people. Mr. Perry's fun is so much nicer and more decent.

The Function of Philosophy

THE USES OF REASON. By Arthur E. Murphy. The Macmillan Company. $3.

A BOOK of this sort is inevitably twice damned. Not only will the scholar condemn it for its cavalier handling of delicate issues, but the common reader—the "everyday, intelligent person"—to whom it is explicitly addressed and whom it might conceivably enlighten, will find much of it intolerably abstract. Every act of mediation tends, if successful, to betray both sides; Professor Murphy has intentionally diluted his wisdom, which is obviously great, but he none the less fails to produce a truly potable beverage.

His book, however, is in many ways extremely fine. The role of mediator is apparently habitual with him, as with most philosophers, and it takes various shapes. For example, defending reason against its current critics and opponents, he is perceptive enough not to remain uninfluenced by the people he aims to confute. His book, in consequence, treats contemporary questions without that false detachment, so common nowadays, which really amounts to evasion. Indeed, the unifying theme of the book is its criticism of the diverse forms which this evasion, this 'irresponsibility,' has taken.

Dogmatism of course is one form, and Dr. Murphy's initial concern is to equate reason with factual inquiry, to dissociate it, that is, from utility on the one hand and metaphysics on the other. But turning to the moral role of reason he finds that science, or rather a common misconception of science, has been even more baneful than theology: theology has at least affirmed the reality of ideals, while science, by ignoring them, has seemed altogether to negate them.

A firm proponent of science, Professor Murphy is convinced that science is not negative morally but neutral: it seems to negate our ideals only when we cease to view it within its own limited context. Professor Murphy traces some of the moral failures and perversions of our time to this false notion of science—cynicism and indifference on the one hand, and unscrupulousness and brutality on the other. What is therefore needed, however, is not less reason but more, for the moral value of reason is that it enables men "to discover what is true and use their knowledge to clarify and strengthen their common interests through cooperative activity that can complete itself in a common good, . . . The refusal to make this distinction between right and wrong is a failure to face issues rationally, with due regard for factors essential to their just evaluation." "Absolutism" and "relativism" are therefore both wrong, or at best "half-truths." For though ideals are not "metaphysically sanctioned," or indeed in any scientific sense "objective," they are none the less "publicly justifiable within a community whose common concerns they bring to reasonable expression and adjudication. . . ."

A very able controversialist, Professor Murphy is of course aware that discussions of this sort almost invariably beg the question; and in the final section of the book he defends his conclusions by explaining the general purpose of philosophic thought. His view is that of Whitehead, whom he quotes: "Philosophy is an attempt to clarify those fundamental beliefs which finally determine the emphasis of attention that lies at the base of character." In his own words, "it concerns our basic or ultimate commitments." And if we question the value or authority of such a discipline, he has an excellent reply: "We shall have philosophical commitments in any case; . . . the discipline of philosophy is the means of making them intelligently, adequately . . ."

It is impossible not to agree largely with this position. Reason clarifies both our preferences and their grounds, and makes possible their fulfilment. To say this in almost any other age than our own, Professor Murphy implies, would be gratuitous. Yet, as he suggests, reason is authoritative only for those who sense the need and value of justifying their beliefs. For the moral value of reason is not that it generates preferences—though of course it influences them but that it enables us to judge purposes in the light of their implications and consequences. Professor Murphy, naturally, is aware of this, and it is not clear from the text whether he is actually proposing anything more for philosophy than the job of explicating our pivotal beliefs. Certainly, however, he very often tends to forget what he elsewhere seems to imply—that moral judgment, however enlightened and refined, is valid and authoritative only in so far as it is the voluntary yet spontaneous act of a conscious individual.

He tends to forget, that is, that all the knowledge in the world-or, indeed, all the good-will-does not of itself entitle us to impose our preferences on others, though of course we may try to communicate our moral perceptions. Professor Murphy's emphasis on the social aspect of ideals, on the unity they often presume or produce, is no doubt very salutary at the present moment, and the Kantian injunction to "treat men always as ends, never as means" is perennially just; yet the alternative to unity is not necessarily chaos. On the contrary, we should not, as Professor Murphy sometimes seems to do, attach our faith to a single ideal or set of ideals, or even to a single species of ideals, but rather to reason itself. For the uses of reason, like its fruits, are very diverse, as Professor Murphy shows, and each of them is in some sense ideal. If democracy is the most rational of all societies, it is because reason is a power both to generate and to comprehend diversity.

Hortatory books, at least when they are as cogent as this one, are of course very often valuable. But their value varies with the degree in which we share their assumptions. For every rational form of persuasion must at some point beg the issue, assume what it aims to prove: its success must depend not merely upon whether it elicits assent but upon whether it illuminates our own beliefs and desires. Professor Murphy's book will help those who agree with him to learn what they actually believe.

MARTIN LEBOWITZ

MOTION PICTURES

"A rare, rich and rewarding picture."—Archer Winsten, N. Y. Post.

Paramount's Technicolor Triumph

"LADY IN THE DARK"

GINGER ROGERS, RAY MILLAND, WARNER BAXTER, JON HALL with MISCHA AUER

XAVIER CUGAT and His Orchestra
WALTER "DARE" WALL — DEAN MURPHY
PARAMOUNT • TIMES SQUARE

"By long odds, the most starkly moving drama of the war." . . . Mc-Manus, PM.

Continuous from 10 a.m. Midnight show every night.

VICTORIA

20th Century-Fox presents ALFRED HITCHCOCK'S

FILEROVI

by JOHN STEINBECK
Starring Tallulah Bankhead with WILLIAM BENDIX
Continuous Performances ASTOR B'WAY at 45th ST.

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD presents ROBBY CLARK IN MEXICAN HAVRIDE By HEMBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS = Staged by HASSARD SHORT SONGS BY COLE PORTER WINTER GARDEN, B'way & 50th 5th Marts. Wed. & Sat.

"A definite hit . . . gay, glib, daffy — enormously funny."

-- Morehouse, Sun.

RUTH GORDON

OVER TWENTY-ONE

MUSIC BOX, 45th St. W. of B'way. CI 6-4636-Evs. 8:40, Mats, Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

RED CROSS plasma is saving the lives of hundreds of wounded soldiers and sailors. But thousands of additional blood donors are needed. Give a pint of blood to save a life.

(10

ANI

TILMS

HE issues and fragments of the army's "Screen Magazine" which were recently given a civilian airing at the Museum of Modern Art are at once heartening, disappointing, and disturbing. It is disturbing to any anti-authoritarian to have to realize that we work more honestly and more effectively as semi-totalitarians than as semi-democrats: these films are miles ahead of any rough American equivalent-mainly newsreels-made for civilians. Even so, high-mediocre is the general ceiling. The commentators' voices are not, thank God, trying to strangle the buyer and embalm his corpse in the same inflection; but they do tend to be smoothly, unpleasantly folksy. There is an obligatory hell-and-damn or so to each issue, a rather frequent use of naked soldiers bathing, a good bit of backside comedy. Barring a slightly uneasy sort of chumminess, however, the tone and pace are generally relaxed and sensible, wonderfully pleasing to experience after waltzing across the little bits of broken mirror which make the average newsreel, or suffering the riveting-hammer, maniacal yammer of a March of Time. There is frequent intelligent use of an excellent device which ought to be recognized as basic to decent film grammar: the shot introduced and given its own pure power, for a few seconds-it ought often to be minutes-without sound, music, explanation, or comment. Private Snafu, a cartooned cluck full of instinctive bad habits, would be fun to see, I imagine, on any front; but I wonder why there is no animated version of Yank's Private Sadsack, The Magazine seems a little short on fun, and lamentably short on pretty women. As teaching and as morale tonic I presume it would be very valuable even if it were much less good than it is; but on both counts it seems tame and unimaginative compared with what it might be. I have to speak, with the sense of a very limited right to, of my objection to hearing the Japanese referred to as "cockroaches," "rats," and so forth. With combat experience, I must realize, this might strike me differently; I only hope not. I also hope that I would under no circumstances accept the Magazine's muted sneer at a Japanese shrine. There are some tenderly crude and on the whole nice pieces of sentimentality about soldiers' parents who cannot write their sons in English, army dogs, and sailors' children at Christmas time. There are some fine, terrible shots of Tarawa. A few minutes of Kiska under quiet steady rain make about as beautiful an image of desolation as I have ever seen.

JAMES AGEE

ART

PIET MONDRIAN, the great Dutch painter, died in New York on February 1 at the age of seventy-one. He came to this country two years ago from London, where he had been living since 1939, after twenty years spent in France.

Mondrian was the only artist to carry to their ultimate and inevitable conclusions those basic tendencies of recent Western painting which cubism defined and isolated. His art has influenced design and architecture more immediately than painting but remains easel-painting nevertheless, with all the concentrated force and drama the form requires. At the same time it designates the farthest limit of easel-painting. Those whose point of departure is where Mondrian left off will no longer be easel-painters. Excluding everything but flat, unmodulated areas of primary color and rectilinear and rectangular forms, his art returns painting to the mural-the mural as a living, modern form, not the archaeological reconstruction of Puvis de Chavannes, Rivera, and the WPA projects. I am not sure whether Mondrian himself recognized it, but the final intention of his work is to expand painting into the décor of the man-made world-what of it we see, move in, and handle. This means imposing a style on industry, and thus adumbrates the most ambitious program a single art has ever ventured upon.

Mondrian's own explicit intentions were somewhat different. There is no need to take his metaphysics on its own terms, but it certainly helps us to understand the creation of his masterpieces. He said that his art was concerned with man's deliverance from "time and subjective vision which veil the true reality"—I quote from his essay "Toward the True Vision of Reality."

Plastic art affirms that equilibrium can only be established through the balance of unequal but equivalent oppositions. The clarification of equilibrium through plastic art is of great importance for humanity. It reveals that although human life in time is doomed to disequilibrium, notwithstanding this, it is based on equilibrium. If we cannot free ourselves, we can free out vition. Mondrian's pictures attempt to balance unequal forces: for example, one area, smaller than another, is made equivalent by shape and spatial relations. Fur-

At the moment, there is no need for art to create a reality of imagination based on appearances, events, or traditions. Art should not follow the intuitions relating to our life in time, but only those intuitions relating to true reality.

In other words, the vision of space granted by plastic art is a refuge from the tragic vicissitudes of time. Abstract painting and sculpture are set over against music, the abstract art of time in which we take refuge from the resistance of space.

Mondrian's painting, however, takes its place beside the greatest art through virtues not involved in his metaphysics. His pictures, with their white grounds, straight black lines, and opposed rectangles of pure color, are no longer windows in the wall but islands radiating clarity, harmony, and grandeur-passion mastered and cooled, a difficult struggle resolved, unity imposed on diversity. Space outside them is transformed by their presence. Perhaps Mondrian will be reproached for the anonymity with which he strove for the ruled precision of the geometer and the machine in executing his paintings: their conceptions can be communicated by a set of specifications and dimensions, sight unseen, and realized by a draftsman. But so could the conception of the Parthenon. The artist's signature is not everything.

Mondrian was of the type of artisthero who immolates himself for his work, sacrificing the customary amenities of life, or making his art carry desires frustrated in other directions. He never married-he expressed a desire to but complained that he could not afford it-and he seems to have had few friends. He gave the impression of being inarticulate in conversation, and said once that he preferred not to argue about the problems of art viva voce but to read and write about them. His appearance was as dry and ascetic as a superficial acquaintance with his work might lead one to expect. But there were in both the artist and the art an intensity and passion which it needed only a second glance to discover. His one great diversion, surprisingly or not, was dancing, and I am told that he liked it so much that he often danced by himself in his studio.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

Coming Soon in The Nation
"A Carriage from Sweden"—a Poem

By Marianne Moore
Leigh White's "The Long Balkan Night"
Reviewed by M. W. Fodor

MUSIC

EORGE BALANCHINE has Tgiven us in his ballets the concrete and rich manifestations of one of the great creative minds of our time; but what he has given the ballet companies have taken away. His choreography for Diaghilev's 1929 "The Prodigal Son" and "The Ball" was later replaced by De Basil who acquired the sets, costumes, and music; the rights to "Concurrence" and "Cotillon" are held by De Basil, now in South America; "The Fairy's Kiss" and "Serenade" are no longer given by the Monte Carlo company; the Ballet Theater, which produced "Apollo" last year, has dropped it this season. And of his most recent ballets, created for the South American tour of Lincoln Kirstein's American Ballet, the one to Mozart's A major Piano Concerto has not been given here at all, "Ballet Imperial" to Tchaikovsky's G major Piano Concerto has had only the few insufficiently rehearsed performances by dancers of the American Ballet during the New Opera Company's second season, and "Concerto Baroco" to Bach's D minor Concerto for two violins has had only the recent performances by some of these dancers under the name of American Concert Ballet-one of which, at the Y. M. H. A., I am glad to have been able to see. It was not a great performance, but sufficiently good to enable one to perceive the quality of the work, and in particular the extraordinary quality of the middle movement. The music here is a never-pausing flow of lovely melody, constantly building up and releasing phraseological and emotional tensions, and astounding in its inexhaustible invention; and similar astounding fertility of imagination is evident in the parallel-flow of movement, with its own built-up and released tensions, that is one of the most excitingly beautiful things I have ever seen done on a stage.

Later in the Y. M. H. A. series there was a performance by Argentinita and her associates; and I was amazed by the increased effectiveness and delightfulness of their dancing in the small auditorium. But there was another reason for the greater pleasure from the performance; and this was the fact that nobody was seated while dancing was in progress. Those who have had "Les Sylphides" or any other opening ballet at the Metropolitan—or, for that matter, the first act of an opera—wrecked by the series of disturbances created by latecom-ers, and who then have had the first five or ten minutes of the next ballet or act disturbed by the same people returning from the lobbies or the buffet, will appreciate the Y. M. H. A.'s good sense in ruling that latecomers shall not disturb the performing artist and the people in the audience who have arrived on time. In European opera houses and concert halls the doors to the auditorium are closed when a performance is about to begin-with the result that almost nobody is late; in New York concert halls too nobody is seated during a performance (only newspaper critics, for no good reason, are allowed to barge in and out); and the Metropolitan Opera Association should have the same arrangement. And Mr. Hurok should have it even if the Metropolitan doesn't, when he takes over the opera house for performances of ballet. What the Y. M. H. A. does, the man who-in the words of the Ballet Theater program last fall -has "emerged the sultan of ballet" certainly can do.

In addition he should live up to the responsibilities of his new position. Writing about Diaghilev, Beecham pays tribute to the "combination of abilities [that] had enabled him to form a troupe of dancers second to none anywhere and to enroll under his banner a group of the most gifted composers and scenic artists of the day," and that led him also to employ "a large and first-rate orchestra [which], replacing the old moderatesized and none too skillful body of players, raised and brought the instrumental side of the performance well into line with the rest of it." It is for Mr. Hurok to do the same things today.

Among the questionable pretensions and anecdotes which the New Friends of Music in some way has managed to get published not only in publicity stories that are ignored but in articles and even in multiple-researched-writtenand-checked Time stories, the most important has been that the organization has presented music, not performersthat anyone calling up to ask who was playing next Sunday would be answered "Beethoven is being played," and so on; when actually from the start the organization has announced imposing lists of performers, without which its announcement of concerts of the music of Beethoven would not have brought a single person to the hall. Recently the line has been changed: the claim now is that the New Friends first has chosen music and then has engaged the best performing artist or group for each work; when actually it has engaged performers for their box-office appeal without regard for their unfitness-Serkin, for example, to play Bach's "Goldberg" Variations last year. And this year its policy has backfired very badly. Instead of having Beethoven's quartets all played by the Budapest Quartet the New Friends decided to add another box-office name -that of the Busch Quartet-to its announcement; and having engaged Szigeti for Beethoven's sonatas for violin and piano it did not engage a first-rate ensemble pianist with temperament and style that would be well-matched to Szigeti's-Franz Rupp, for example, or Artur Balsam-but got a big-name solo pianist, Claudio Arrau. The series sold out; but the deficiencies of tone and ensemble in the Busch Quartet's playing this year were such that even normally uncritical people expressed indignation to me over having had such performances inflicted on them; and there was dissatisfaction also with performances of the sonatas that combined the warmth and vitality of Szigeti's playing, after his initial nervousness had worn off, with the chill and stolidity of Arrau's playing from first to last.

The New Friends did not consider it necessary to interrupt the Budapest Quartet's playing in Town Hall to announce the bombing of Truk; but WQXR considered it necessary to interrupt the broadcast of the performance for that purpose.

B. H. HAGGIN

CONTRIBUTORS

LEWIS GANNETT, book reviewer for the Herald Tribune, was on the editorial staff of The Nation some twenty years ago, and formed a friendship with William Allen White, at that time a frequent contributor.

EDWARD HUNTER is now on the "war desk" of the New York Post. He has edited newspapers and worked as a correspondent in China and Japan.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES is author of "Europa and Other Poems" and "Out of the Jewel," and editor of the Spanish Loyalist anthology "And Spain Sings." He has translated García Lorca's poems.

LEOPOLD SCHWARZSCHILD was a prominent Berlin editor before Hitler came to power.

BENJAMIN HARROW is professor of biochemistry at the College of the City of New York.

Letters to the Editors

At Least Peculiar

Dear Sirs: Your editorial of February 5 noting that the Dies committee has been given another $75,000 to investigate the C. I. O. and "Peace Now" makes reasonable assumptions as to how the taxpayers' money will be used. But may I point out the peculiar appropriateness of a Dies investigation of "Peace Now"? Dr. George W. Hartmann, chairman of that organization, was-like George W. Deatherage and Elizabeth Dilling-a star Dies witness against the "reds."

Volume XI of the Dies hearings devotes seventeen pages to the Hartmann testimony, taken November 27, 1939. Dr. Hartman spoke with some alarm of the red menace in our schools but assured the committee that the Nazi viewpoint was "practically unrepresented" in American colleges.

WILLSON WHITMAN

Woodside, L. I., February 15

Wages and the Little Steel Formula

Dear Sirs: In your editorial of January 8 entitled Wages and Living Costs the statement is made that since "the beginning of 1941 wage rates have been permitted to rise a maximum of 15 per cent, while the cost of living has gone up 231/2 per cent." From this you conclude that "simple justice" would indicate a need for revision of the Little Steel formula.

It is not correct that wage rates have only been permitted to rise 15 per cent since January, 1941. For voluntary increases by employers, no formal limits whatever were imposed on the amount of gains which could be secured up to October 2, 1942. Nor is it at all clear that a revision of the Little Steel formula would meet the requirements of simple justice for all wage and salary workers. In fact, the requirements of justice are not even simple in this particular instance.

The only available measure which even crudely approximates an index of pure wage rates involves correction of gross average hourly earnings of factory workers to remove the effects of overtime and of the increased relative importance of the high-wage war industries from the over-all averages. On the basis of the proportion of employeehours prevailing in January, 1941, this series shows an increase of 30.1 per cent for manufacturing as a whole between January, 1941, and October, 1943. It is true that this measure reflects other influences upon individual earnings besides changes in job rates, but it can certainly be concluded that the over-all increase exceeds 15 per cent.

When broken down for the twenty major industrial divisions of manufacturing, the increases in straight-time hourly earnings for the period are even more impressive: transportation equipment, 46.6 per cent; lumber and timber products, 43.6 per cent; furniture, 37.2 per cent; leather and leather products, 36.6 per cent; non-ferrous metals, 36.1 per cent; machinery, except electrical, 35.2 per cent; textile-mill products, 35.1 per cent; miscellaneous products, 33.6 per cent; and iron and steel products, 32.2 per cent.

The purpose of providing for adjustments in wage rates for the 15 per cent increase in the cost of living from January, 1941, to April, 1942, fundamentally was to preserve as far as possible the exchange value of a unit of labor effort, in particular for the protection of those workers who had lagged behind in the general increases of the period. Congress and the President thus made provision in the wage-stabilization program for general increases to correct maladjustments between wage rates and the cost of living as an adjunct of the stabilization of all wage rates at the level of September 15, 1942. Increases already gained in this period are offset in determining the residual allowances, and since most workers had received increases well over 15 per cent, they can get no further increase under the maladjustment provision. However, they still have the possibility for adjustment in wage rates under the gross inequities, substandards, and "rare and unusual" provisions of the stabilization program, which is further evidence that the alleged 15 per cent limitation is not true in fact. Moreover, in terms of weekly take-home pay, which is a better measure of ability to keep up with the cost of living, the gain for all manufacturing through September, 1943, actually comes to 66.7 per cent, while the percentage increases for particular industries are even greater.

However, since the distribution of war-time increases in income is by no means an even one, the over-all averages do not tell the whole story. There are many workers who have not shared in these gains because of lack of bargaining power and because their industries have not shared in war-time prosperity. Others who have been disadvantaged include many clerical and office workers; many federal, state, county, and municipal employees; aged persons on fixed incomes; and service men's dependents. Paradoxically, however, these groups would least be able to take advantage of any increase in the Little Steel formula for the same reasons that have been responsible for their lagging to date. Thus it is not at all certain that the requirements of simple justice would be met by revision of the Little Steel formula.

GEORGE H. HILDEBRAND, JR. Washington, D. C., January 13

Pamphlets for Sale

Dear Sirs: In The Nation of February 5 there is a paragraph in In the Wind about the sale of pamphlets in the Chicago Public Library in which it is said that discontinuance of such sales was "proposed by the chairman of the board, Joseph B. Fleming, attorney for the Tribune." The truth is that the library was notified by a local lawyer that litigation was under consideration to stop sales of pamphlets by the library as an extra-legal activity. The proposal to stop sales pending an examination of the legal aspects of the matter was made by me, not by President Fleming, although I naturally consulted him and he agreed. I submitted this proposal in a written recommendation which was approved in committee and unanimously adopted by the board, all members present voting for it. Mr. Leo A. Lerner was not present at that meeting and did not vote, although he expressed his contrary views at a subsequent meeting.

It seemed, and still seems, to me no more than common prudence, when threatened with a lawsuit, to suspend the questioned procedure until a competent opinion could be obtained-especially since the procedure in this case is a small and unimportant side-line to the library's free services, clearly outside its enumerated statutory functions, and certainly not worth getting into trouble about. The matter was referred to the city law department, which rendered a sweeping opinion sustaining the right of the Public Library to engage in sales. This ruling will be hailed with interest and satisfaction by public libraries in general, since it clears up a foggy issue. It will appear in full in the Library Journal of February 15. Meanwhile, steps have been taken to resume pamphlet sales without delay.

C. B. RODEN, Librarian Chicago, Ill., February 9

[The item was based on a clipping from the Chicago Daily News of January 19. Mr. Roden's version is undoubtedly correct; the clipping, however, implied clearly that discontinuance was Mr. Fleming's idea. ("Fleming attacked the pamphlets as 'propaganda,' saying some were issued by British government agencies. . .") Mr. Roden's name was not mentioned.

In any case, we are happy to learn that anti-Nazi "propaganda" is once more available at the Chicago Public Library.
—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Serbs, Croats, and Mr. Raditsa

Dear Sirs: The article on Yugoslavia in your issue of January 29 is as fine a piece of propaganda as I have ever seen anywhere, putting it politely. Bluntly speaking, it is a pack of half-truths which by careful omissions and innuendoes gives a story very different from the truth. The article is obviously designed to whitewash the Croats by identifying them with the Partisans and at the same time to blacken the Serbs and Mihailovich, and will cause more discord among Yugoslavs.

We are told that the "Serb trio" was responsible for the signing of the Axis pact in 1941. The account fails to mention that Croat leader V. Machek, whom the article subsequently praises, was at that time Vice-Premier of the country and that he publicly approved the collaboration in strong terms. There is considerable disagreement on the attitude toward the Axis of this leader of the Croats. Pro-Partisan Slobodna Rec (October, 1943) puts him in the same class as "traitor Mihailovich." Machek's "prison" by all accounts is his estate at Kupinec.

As to the breaking of the Axis pact in March, 1941, it was clearly established by a number of American correspondents on the spot that it was the Serb part of Yugoslavia that did it. In fact, all subsequent admirable acts of "Yugoslavs" were mainly of Serb origin.

The collapse of the Yugoslav army the article places on the doorstep of the Serbs because its generals were Serbs, specifically mentioning the collapse of the Kachanik front. There is no reference to the fact that the Croat troops were the main force there and that the Germans made their main attack on that spot. The fact that the Serb generals ordered cessation of fighting after April 9 is rubbed in, but the established fact that both Slovenia and Croatia accepted the Nazis with acclaim and declared their "independence" before that date is omitted.

The article makes much of "Serb chauvinism," but it does not explain the cause of it. For twenty years the Croats clamored for separation, and in 1941 they clearly showed their lack of love for Yugoslavia. When the Serbs, after the Croat atrocities and constant opposition, demanded the same thing, they became "pan-Serbs" and destroyers of the state. According to the article, the Croat massacres of Serbs "ran into the thousands." Louis Adamic says in his book that the figure ran to tens of thousands. A Fortune article of last June talked of 300,000, Pro-Partisan Slobodna Rec in October, 1943, said 450,000. Srbobran says 800,000. The London Economist (June 19, 1943) speaks of "wholesale massacres." A recent OWI release says that the Ustacha officer M. Bachich was executed by the Partisans for killing 1,500 Serbs around Bugojno. You choose whichever figure you like Much is made of the use to which the "Dönkelmann report" was put by the Serbs. Not much reference is made to the contents of the document itself, its detailed and circumstantial account, with names, localities, and dates, of Croat behavior toward their brother-Yugoslav Serbs. The article makes the distinction between Croats and Ustachi who committed the deed. Did the Croats make the distinction between the Serbs and the policeman who killed those five Croats in 1937? Did the Irish make any distinction between the English and their government which ordered the repression? Anyhow the report makes lurid reading, and no paper would publish it. No wonder it was sent to the only interested party. Does Mr. Raditsa deny the facts in the report in addition to attacking its publication?

A painful attempt is made in the article to make Pavelich's Croatia and Nedich's Serbia the same kind of Axis pupe et state. The fact is that at this moment all Serb soldiers taken prisoner are in German military prison camps, some 200,000 of them, with no record of a single one fighting against the United Nations armies. Croats were not taken prisoner by the Reich, and according to the OWI's recent release, they have lost 100,000 men on "Russian and other fronts." That indicates how the two peoples feel toward the Allied cause with, of course, a few exceptions.

I could go on indefinitely. The measure of the whole article can be taken by the vicious recourse to the bogy of anti-Semitism. When Srbobran spoke of "Jugocenter" as "Judocenter," it did not mean "Jewish Center" but "Judascenter" or "center of traitors." Srbobran made this meaning plain repeatedly-in the issue of June 22, 1943, for instance. The paper and the Serbs can be accused of many other things but to imply slyly that they are anti-Semitic is a plain misrepresentation. It is of interest that Adamic, who is of the same mind as Raditsa about the Serbs, derisively calls Ambassador Fotich a "part-Jew" and the former Minister Ninchich a 'christianized Hebrew.'

It is hard to understand why Raditsa, professed Yugoslav, does everything to irritate and antagonize the Serbs, who, after all, created the country in 1918 and who constitute half of its population. It is apparent that the country could not exist without their consent; so there seems no sense in attacking them. The only explanation is that the article was not written in behalf of Yugoslavs and their cause but to defend and propagandize the Croat cause.

MILAN D. POPOVIC Morristown, N. J., February 10

Mr. Raditsa Replies

Dear Sirs: Having already stated my position at length in The Nation, I shall not restate it here. I should merely like to say that it was never my intention to "irritate" and "antagonize" the Serbs, who with the Slovenes and Croats constitute Yugoslavia. I am fully conscious of the great meaning the heroic stand and sufferings of the Serbian people have for Yugoslavia. I know that there is no possibility of rebuilding Yugoslavia without the Serbs' consent, but at the same time we must accept the principle that Yugoslavia can exist only if it is freely accepted, equally and independently, by the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes.

That is what the "Partisans" have done after three years of war. They have cemented the Yugoslav idea with blood,

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 54

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- Cashel Byron's profession
- 8 It's against the law, but I'll help
- you to start it Small sharp weapon of the furious mob?

  10 The best answer to a wise man
- 12 Guide with four legs
- 18 This makes veneer smoother
- 14 We hear her love song in The Fortune Teller (Herbert) 15 Two kings of the Visigoths have
- borne this appellation 17 He is disappointed if he doesn't get
- what's coming to him 22 Berlin's current holiday
- 23 Though not a military man you can get him to ride and make him responsible for a column
- 24 In which a trio reveals a sense of
- proportion 26 A Marx Brother just failed to get
- in-hence the peeve 28 Surviving trace words, 4 and 4)

- 29 "A lovely apparition, sent
- To be a moment's ornament"

  30 Lost tile (anag.) (two words,
  2 and 6)
- 31 Sweaters or brows may be 32 Bold but insufficient reply to the question, "Who goes there?" (two

DOWN

- 1 Mariners and others have looked to it for guidance
- The stuff British V.C.s are made of 3 This Viennese composer might appear as a Shakespearean king if he dropped an aitch

- 4 Musical instrument formerly made
- mostly of pine Such clothes surely don't constitute climbing kit
- A daydream "He made him a hut, wherein he
- --- of Robinson Crusoe"
- 10 Necessitated a couple of chairmen being on their feet at once This folk tale looks as if it might
- e my foot!
- 16 Meaning? Why, meaning: and half of it's a devil 18 A strange exclamation to get from
- a Moslem princess!
- 19 Marat got the point of one while in his bath, but it didn't strike him as being funny
- 20 (Wagers about torture)
- The wag swallowed a bone, and got taken to the cleaners
- Privy seals Fancy finding a hornet in it!
- Trickled European river of a thousand legends

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 53

ACROSS:-1 SOUND ASLEEP; 9 PILE: 10 GLOBE: 11 HACK; 12 FLASHED; 13 STARERS; 15 UNLOOSED; 16 SOWERS; 18 SWATHE: 21 CREDENCE; 24 ALI BABA; 26 USHERED; 28 HERO; 29 ORATE; 30 OPAL; 31 SMALL-MINDED.

DOWN:-2 OVERSHOOT; 8 NUGGETS; AMOK; 5 LAERTES; 6 ETHER; 7 VILLON: 8 SCORER; 14 EDICT; 17 WHEREFORE; 19 WELLER; 20 EMBROIL; 22 EPSTEIN; 23 COEVAL; 25 BLOOM; 27 CALM.

while the government in exile plus Mihailovich has been destroying it. To label the Partisans "Croats" is nonsense when more than half of them are Serbs.

That there is no difference between Pavelich sending Croats into Russia and against the Partisans and Nedich sending Serbs against the Partisans is shown by the fact that according to an OWI release of February 2 the puppet Premier Nedich, upon German demand, has raised twenty new regiments and supplied them with "the necessary artillery equipment and technical troops."

BOGDAN RADITSA

New York, February 12

Why Not Organize?

Dear Sirs: Mr. Bernays's advertisement in your issue of February 12 suggested a thought which I have sometimes expressed to business men of my acquaintance: business men are judged, as a group, by the public utterances of the organizations which represent them before the public. The National Association of Manufacturers and the chambers of commerce have not usually expressed liberal views. There are certainly many business men who, even if members of these organizations, do not agree with many of the policies which they ptomote.

I wish it were possible for such business men to express themselves, so that they would be known to the public and particularly to those "liberals" and "intellectuals" to whom Mr. Bernays addresses himself. Maybe there ought to be a national committee of liberal business leaders, to promote and fortify the much-needed contributions which such men can make to social planning and public action.

Why doesn't Mr. Bernays act as a magnet to draw some liberals of both groups together, to talk things over? MICHAEL M. DAVIS

New York, February 18

Stories of Will Rogers

Dear Sir: I am editing the anecdotes of Will Rogers and will be glad to hear from all who may have anecdotes or stories. CYRIL CLEMENS

Webster Groves, Mo., February 18

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS
THE NATION, 56 Fifth Ave., New York 3, N. Y.
Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic.
One year S5: Two years $5: Three years $11.
Additional Postage per year: Foreign; $1;
Additional Postage per year: Foreign; $2;
Guide to Periodical Literature. Book Review
Digost, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs
Information Service, Dramatic Index, Two weeks notice and the old address as well as the new ser required for change of address.

THE Vation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 158

IN THIS ISSUE

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MARCH 11, 1944

NUMBER 11

11 11113 1330E
THE SHAPE OF THINGS	293
EDITORIALS
Same Old Fraud	295
France After Invasion	290
Dead Men Don't Blab	297
ARTICLES
Boss McCormick's Men by Willard Shelton	298
75 Years Ago in The Nation	299
Program of Action by Freda Kirchwey	300
Outflanking the Japanese by Donald W. Mitchell	305
In the Wind	307
POLITICAL WAR
French Democracy Gets to Work by Jules Moch	308
Ten Points for Peace	309
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus	310

BOOKS AND THE ARTS
A Carriage from Sweden by Marianne Moore
The DAE by George Genzmer
1311 Progressive Liberal Education by Sidney Hook
Land of the Louche by James Stern
134
Guides to India by Krishnalal Shridharani
Tilms by James Agee
Music by B. H. Haggin
137
LETTERS TO THE EDITORS
318

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 55 by Jack Barrett 3.

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Associate Editors

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave in the army]

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor
J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN Drama Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL LOUIS FISCHER JONATHAN DANIELS
REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U.S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 55 Fifth Ave., New York 3, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879, Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

IF WE COULD OFFER THE FINNS A TEXT FOR action, it would be: "Agree with your adversary while thou art in the way with him." The armistice terms proposed by the Soviet government make no demands for territorial concessions, for occupation by Russian troops, or for any change in government. They are far from harsh but they are hard because they put on Finland the responsibility of disarming and interning the Nazi troops whom they so ill-advisedly invited to enter the country. Russia could scarcely ask less and it would certainly be contrary to American and British interests to allow seven German divisions to escape for service in the west. Disregarding such facts, some of our professional Russophobes have been thrown completely off balance by the contrast between the Russian proposals and their own lurid forecasts of Carthaginian terms. Thus two days after the official Moscow communique was published, Hearst's New York Daily Mirror issued a fierce denunciation of Soviet plans based on "the minimum terms Russia has served on Finland, according to diplomatic sources in Washington." This unreliable authority included among the alleged Soviet demands unconditional surrender, occupation of Finland's chief cities, and the placing of all Finnish air and sea bases at Russia's disposal. Is it possible that the Hearst editors were ignorant of the actual Russian terms, or were they deliberately falsi-

THE SUSPENSION OF SHIPMENTS TO TURKEY of American and British war supplies can only be taken as indication of a serious setback for the United Nations. Turkey's recent coolness toward Britain and the United States is usually ascribed to our unwillingness to meet her rather exorbitant demand for arms as a price for entering the war. There would seem, however, to be little doubt that Turkey's demands have risen with the decline of American and British fortunes of war in the Mediterranean. Four months ago, when it looked as if the Allies would be in Rome before Christmas, the Turks were apparently prepared to be reasonable in their demands. But the unanticipated strength of German resistance in Italy and the failure of the Allies to establish additional fronts in Europe has caused the Turkish leaders to resume their originally cautious role. At the moment the chief hope for another reversal in the trend of Turkish policy lies in Bulgaria. Should the current crop of peace rumors involving the Bulgars bear fruit and the Germans be forced out of Bulgaria, it is quite possible that Turkey might suddenly see the advantages of entering the United Nations' camp as an active belligerent.

BURLINGAME

*

AMERICANS MAY TAKE JUSTIFIABLE PRIDE IN the tremendous contribution of lend-lease to the Russian war effort that is revealed in the current report. It is particularly encouraging to note that our shipments have kept pace with the increasing tempo of the Red Army offensives. More than 5,000 combat planes were sent to Russia in 1943, more than 800 of them in November and December. Perhaps even more significant in view of Russia's ever-lengthening lines of communication was the delivery of upward of 100,000 trucks, or double the number sent in 1942. More than half of the nearly 6,000,000 tons of food shipped under lend-lease was earmarked for the Soviets. While our assistance may not seem large compared with Russia's own war production, it may well have been enough to provide the margin between victory and defeat on the Russian front-and in the European war as a whole. For we have not only supplemented Soviet production but we have filled in the chinks in Russia's economic defenses by shipping machinery and critical war materials that could not possibly have been obtained elsewhere. Obviously, this aid must not stop now that the war is entering its most violent and critical stage. The continuation of lend-lease is so clearly indispensable to the winning of the war that, like victory itself, it is an objective on which there is no room for partisan differences.

 $\star$

THE SEIZURE OF THE ADMIRALTY ISLANDS represents another important leap in the revised form of island-hopping described in this issue by Donald W. Mitchell. The main Japanese bases at Rabaul and Kavieng have been by-passed. Undoubtedly they will be occupied in due time but not until they have been so weakened that they can be seized without great cost. Meanwhile, the navy continues to pursue its offensive in the Central Pacific with great vigor. Wake, the remaining Marshall atolls, and the Carolines are being subjected to almost daily attacks. But on the third prong of the Allied offensive, that directed by Lord Louis Mountbatten, progress has been extremely slow. Although Mountbatten's forces successfully repelled a Japanese counter-attack in the Arakan sector of the Burma front with heavy losses to the enemy, the main drive on Burma has not even started and presumably cannot be launched until after the rainy season. Only in the mountains of North Burma, where General Stilwell's Chinese forces have driven halfway across the narrow neck of the country, has any real progress been achieved. The delay in Mountbatten's offensive may possibly indicate that the United Nations are planning to open a supply route to China in some other way than through Burma. Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that the Japanese position would be much worse than it now is if major Allied forces were also closing in from this sector.

REPUBLICANS ARE HAILING THE NARROW margin by which the Democratic candidate, James H. Torrens, won in the normally "safe" Twenty-first New York Congressional District as another indication of a country-wide trend against the Administration, Actually, Mr. Torrens rolled up a fairly convincing majority except in the parts of Harlem that are included in the district. In Harlem, however, Mr. Torrens fared very badly, losing some precincts that were carried by President Roosevelt in 1940 by seven and eight to one. That a large number of Negroes have recently abandoned their support of the Administration and returned to the Republican fold is a fact on which there can be no dispute. This tendency appears to account, in part at least, for the recent Republican successes in Kentucky and for the election of a Republican in a special Congressional election in Philadelphia some weeks ago. To some it may seem ironic that Negroes should turn against the Administration in view of the President's establishment of the Fair Employment Practice Committee to war against discrimination. From the Negro's point of view, however, the FEPC has been a farce, and some Negroes openly blame Mr. Roosevelt for its ineffectiveness. And many others who still possess a high regard for Mr. Roosevelt personally have come to the conclusion that there can be no hope for justice from a party so largely dominated by the advocates of "white supremacy." The Democratic cause in New York, for example, can hardly have been aided by the action of the Democratic legislature of South Carolina on the day of the election denouncing those seeking the "co-mingling of the races on any basis of equality . . . as being hostile to . . . the preservation of the American Union."

X

THE PRESENT STATE OF MEDICAL ETHICS IS revealed in stark ugliness in a report submitted by the Moreland Act Commissioners of New York covering the operation of the Workmen's Compensation Law. It is disclosed that for years workers in New York City have been kept from obtaining either the medical care or the compensation to which they are entitled by rings of licensed representatives, lawyers, and doctors. The report charges that in order to swell the profits of these rings "workers have been subjected to inefficient treatment, over-treatment, and even to unnecessary and harmful operations which left them disabled, sometimes totally." These illegal profits are distributed among the physicians operating with the rings by means of an elaborate system of kickbacks. The commissioners list the names of some 3,000 doctors in New York City alone who are known to be involved in this fee-splitting. Although such kickbacks are in direct violation of both the laws of the state and the official code of the medical profession, the medical societies of New York City made no effort to curb the practice. Yet these same medical societies have shown great zeal and resourcefulness in campaigning against the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill for the creation of a national health insurance system which, it is alleged, would destroy the physician's "personal interest" in his patient, and thus result in a "forfeture of self-respect." We wonder.

March 11, 1944 295

THE STAFF OF THE NATION HAS LOST. temporarily, one of its most valuable members, Robert Bendiner, who has this week gone into the army. We do not begrudge him to the service, but we shall miss him and we shall miss his writing. Particularly during the coming months of political struggle, Mr. Bendiner's acute and vigorous comment would have been a valuable addition to the pages of this journal; he has a feeling for political realities that will be hard to duplicate. He takes with him the affection and high hopes of his colleagues, who will welcome his return as one of the intimate blessings of peace. . . . The position of managing editor, held by Mr. Bendiner from 1937 until last fall, has been filled by J. King Gordon, who comes to The Nation from the editorial staff of Farrar and Rinehart. We are fortunate to have Mr. Gordon on our board. In his former position he handled most of the books dealing with politics, labor, social problems, the war, and foreign policy, and his whole experience has been in the field of public affairs.

Same Old Fraud

THE measure that emerged last week-end from the Senate-House conference on soldier-vote legislation was euphemistically advertised as a compromise, but that happy label has rarely been so cynically misapplied. Despite the long and angry debate over "constitutional" issues, service men will judge any ballot bill enacted in Congress by a simple standard: does it give the overwhelming majority of soldiers and sailors a real chance to vote? This bill emphatically does not. Representative John E. Rankin of Mississippi, who is less subtle than some of his colleagues in indicating his fear of a large soldier vote, has conceded that this legislation has merit and that, with "minor revisions," it might even bear his name. The amazing thing is that any of the conferees should believe that anyone will be deceived by the new version of the original fraud.

In deference to public protests the new bill does provide for the printing of federal ballots; but the conditions it establishes for their use make it fairly certain that these ballots will be as rare as collectors' items. For one thing they are restricted to service men stationed outside the United States; Senator Hatch has pointed out that this provision appears to nullify existing federal laws which waive registration and poll-tax requirements for all service men, whether located here or abroad. But even a member of the armed forces abroad will have less than a fighting chance to use the ballot. He can apply for one only if the legislature of his native state has declared, by August 1, that it will recognize the federal ballot. A spokesman for the Council of State Governments has acknowledged that not more than one-third of the state legislatures will have met by that date, and not all of them are certain to take affirmative action. Thus service men from a majority of the states will not even be eligible to request a federal ballot. The soldier fortunate enough to come from a state that has validated the federal machinery may then proceed to try to use it, but he will need to be persistent. First he must submit his application for a state ballot no later than September 1. Then comes a thirty-day intermission. If the state ballot has not arrived by October 1, the soldier or sailor must declare under oath that he has tried and failed to get a state ballot. Then he may ask for a federal ballot.

The bill indicates that the Republicans, having precipitated a major struggle over the soldier-vote issue, are now determined to fight to the finish. Possibly the outcry that the debate has produced has convinced them that a large soldier vote would now be more dangerous than ever. For the nature of the debate has clearly identified foes of a simple federal ballot as foes of President Roosevelt; and if the service men were now to get a real opportunity to participate in the election, there is no doubt that their bitterness over this conspiracy would redound to the benefit of the President. It is questionable whether any alternative offers much hope to the G. O. P. If the proposed bill is enacted, millions of men will be robbed of their voting rights; but political commentators are increasingly agreed that the resentment of the troops will be mirrored in the voting attitude of many families at home. One observer has remarked that "for every soldier vote the President loses, he may get two instead-from a father or mother."

The President has said that he will turn thumbs down on any legislation that permits fewer men to vote than does the woefully inadequate 1942 law. Given the Barkley episode, another Presidential veto would obviously be more explosive than in normal circumstances; yet we wonder how many legislators would care to engage in a running debate with the President on this issue, or would be moved to tearful resignations by a veto. Throughout the soldier vote controversy there has been a mood of guilt and defensiveness among the men opposing a simple, uniform federal ballot. Now, with conservative newspapers joining in criticism of the new House-Senate bill, with the Herald Tribune and the Washington Post and many others exposing its inadequacies, the conferees have even less reason to believe they are getting away with it.

If Congress approves this legislation, we hope that the President will strongly challenge the master minds who have spent so much time devising ways of thwarting the soldier vote; if he signs it, he should do so only under vigorous protest and with a clear-cut analysis of its deficiencies. The guiding spirits behind this new fraud are men who are chiefly animated by the desire to "get" Roosevelt; they are also, in many cases, the same men who have berated the President for putting "politics" ahead of war. But this issue, perhaps better than any other in sight, gives Mr. Roosevelt a chance to lay before the people his case against the Congressional obstructionists. In fact they may have fashioned the issue on which the President can get a rejuvenated, progressive Congress in November.

France After Invasion

THE ADMINISTRATION has never been backward in enunciating fine principles. It has always been willing to talk broadly of the restoration of Europe's liberties and of the extension of international economic cooperation. But it has been slow in translating these generalizations into concrete terms, and in the meantime its day-to-day policies in regard to European affairs have been flavored with a reactionary opportunism that arouses the gravest suspicions of American postwar intentions.

There is clearly a great need of abandoning hand-tomouth diplomacy and negotiating definite agreements which can be judged on the basis of their correspondence with our democratic professions. We welcome, therefore, reports from Washington and London that Acting Secretary of State Stettinius will shortly proceed to England for a series of political and economic conversations with British and other Allied officials. If all the subjects mentioned are discussed the agenda will be a crowded one. Among economic questions, oil, communications, shipping, air transport, and the future of lendlease are of outstanding importance. But still more urgent are those political problems on which a basis of agreement, at least, is vital before the invasion of Europe gets under way. Of these none is more pressing than the way in which civil government is to be restored in the liberated countries.

It is understood that an agreement on this matter has been negotiated with the Norwegian government-in-exile and that similar conventions are under discussion with the Dutch and Belgians. One of the questions still to be answered, it is said, is who is to determine that conditions are such that civil government can be restored. Is this to be left solely to the discretion of the Allied military commander or are the refugee governments, who are supposed to take the view that the civil administration should take over as soon as fighting ceases, to be allowed a voice in the matter? And what about the officials who have continued at their posts during the German occupation? Who is to be the judge of their loyalty?

These questions are posed with especial sharpness in the case of France owing to the long-continued American liaison with Vichy and the many unfortunate and unsuccessful efforts to mold the French regime in North Africa in accordance with the State Department's prejudices. Yet it is essential that provision should be made without delay for the administration of France as soon as any appreciable portion of it is freed from the enemy. A recent dispatch from London in the New York Herald Tribune asserted that the draft of a plan for handing over the civil administration of France to the Committee of National Liberation has been approved by the British Foreign Office, the State Department, and General Eisenhower, but is now frozen on President Roosevelt's desk. This report has been denied by Mr. Stettinius. who says that the French Committee's future role is still under study.

However long that study continues we are certain that the State Department will not find any practical alternative to conceding General de Gaulle and the Committee of National Liberation the right to undertake the provisional administration of liberated France. What other substitute could we propose? We could not conceivably turn to the Vichy government, an acknowledged creature of the Nazis which is weekly slaughtering scores of French patriots. That would be to compound the errors of our Italian policy with lunacy, and, indeed, it has been reported without denial that we have given assurances to De Gaulle that there will be no dealings with Pétain and his crew.

Are we then going to attempt to govern France by means of AMG until the American and British governments judge the time ripe to permit the French people to have their promised say about their future? This proposition is equally invalid. It would put our armies in the position of conquerors rather than liberators; it would attract to our administrative headquarters the kind of intriguers who have swarmed in Vichy, around the German Command in France and, for a time, around the American Consul-General's office in Algiers; it would damn French-American friendship for a century.

Our wisest course in regard to France is to give the French Committee of National Liberation the recognition it has earned and let it proceed with the resuscitation of democratic France at the earliest possible moment. No doubt it will make some mistakes but they will be French mistakes and far less fatal than Anglo-American blunders. Of those the North African record shows more than enough. Even in terms of expediency we have failed miserably and De Gaulle, whom we tried so hard to pull down, is more firmly seated than ever. Nevertheless, despite accusations of dictatorial ambitions he shows no signs of becoming "a man on horseback." On the contrary, it is clear that the Provisional Consultative Assembly, as Jules Moch points out on a later page of this issue, is functioning actively as a representative body. It accepts De Gaulle's leadership but in no servile fashion, insisting on the right to criticize, to modify policy, and to demand information. French democracy is emerging from its ordeal in sound shape, and we had best leave it to work out its own destiny.

Dead Men Don't Blab

I WILL be too bad if the late Charles E. Bedaux is allowed to sink into limbo without causing more than a one-day ripple in the headlines. For the history of the industrial efficiency expert, who died on February 18 when he was due to face a grand-jury investigation into his relations with the Nazis, is an instructive one. Bedaux is best remembered by the workers of this country as the originator of the "stretch-out" system and for that his name is execrated by millions. But far more deadly for democracy was his work here and in Europe as a fascist agent and promoter.

Some of that story was published after Bedaux's death by the Department of Justice but the department either does not know all that is worth telling or it does not choose to make public all it knows. Its release gave a number of details about Bedaux's associations with prominent Nazis from 1937 on. We are told about his friendship with Abetz, Wiedemann, and Schacht and his visit to the home of von Ribbentrop in August, 1939. After the fall of France, we learn, he traveled constantly between Vichy and Paris as intermediary between Abetz and the Pétain government. We are not told, however, about his trip to Athens in 1941 when, on behalf of the German government, he negotiated the sell-out of two Greek generals.

When America entered the war, the department's dossier informs us, Bedaux was under nominal arrest for two months but his friendship with Nazi and Vichy officials continued. He gave the German military authorities information from his company files about the Persian Gulic Projects and was appointed as Expert in Economic Projects to the German military administration in France. The most grandiose of the projects he conceived was one for a pipe-line running from Senegal, the center of the African peanut industry, to the Mediterranean—the object being to make supplies of vegetable oils available to the Germans and thus help overcome the fat shortage. To further this scheme he went to North Africa armed with credentials from Laval and priorities from the German authorities for steel pipe and pumping machinery. He also carried, though the Department of Justice does not mention the fact, credentials from General Stuelpnagel, German governor of Paris.

Bedaux's African plans were upset by the Anglo-American invasion in November, 1942, and shortly afterward he was arrested, not by order of General Eisenhower as some reports have stated, but by the Military Security section of the French Deuxième Bureau, which was headed at that time by Colonel Crétien. a stalwart anti-collaborationist. Investigators of the bureau prepared an elaborate dossier on the prisoner in which the most damning item was his possession of a questionnaire issued by the German army seeking information on British and American military equipment, available ship tonnages, and Allied battle order.

Such a document, it need hardly be said, is fairly strong prima facie evidence of espionage, and it is not surprising that when officers of the FBI arrived in Algiers they should have taken a great interest in it. What is surprising is that, according to information we have received from very reliable French African sources, these FBI agents were apparently anxious to break down this evidence. They subjected the investigators of the Deuxième Bureau to a severe interrogation, attempted to get them to withdraw the charges against Bedaux, accused them of "planting" the questionnaire, and finally of being in the pay "of some agency of the American government controlled by Communists."

This is a very extraordinary way of hunting down traitors and one, we think, which would bear further investigation. But so would a number of other questions connected with the last months of Charles Bedaux. Why, for instance, was he removed from French custody? On what grounds was he given the benefit of American citizenship and saved from a French military court? Under a common sense interpretation of the law his naturalization would appear to have become ineffective owing to his long residence abroad. Finally why, when he was in detention, was he permitted an opportunity to accumulate sufficient luminal to enable him to choose his own time of exit?

Charles Bedaux had many influential friends but a vast host of enemies—all the democrats of the world. It is, however, his enemies who should mourn his death for if he had lived until he had told all they might have learned much to their advantage. Many of his friends, on the other hand, probably heard the news cheerfully. If they sighed at all, it was a sigh of relief.

Boss McCormick's Men

BY WILLARD SHELTON

Chicago, February 21 NCE upon a time the Chicago Tribune's indorsement was the kiss of death for a political candidate in Illinois. It was commonly said, and with reason, that people bought Colonel McCormick's newspaper to learn its views and vote the other way. But Mc-Cormick candidates were victorious in the 1940 and 1942 state elections, and the voting this year will show whether a Republican machine has been created in Illinois-an isolationist and reactionary machine—that is more powerful even than the Kelly-Nash Democratic organization in Chicago was in its dictatorial heyday.

McCormick's ticket for 1944 consists of Dwight Green for reelection as Governor, Stephen A. Day for reelection as Congressman-at-Large, and Richard J. Lyons for Senator against the Democratic incumbent, Scott W. Lucas, plus whatever Presidential aspirant comes closest ot the Colonel's taste. It won't be Willkie, of course, and perhaps not Dewey, for McCormick has read both these gentlemen out of the Republican Party. He obviously prefers General MacArthur or some nonentity like Bricker.

Dwight Green as Governor of Illinois has himself been a successful nonentity. His administration has been undistinguished and routine, and now he is apparently entirely willing to use his power as Governor to present a slate of exclusively tory-isolationist candidates in the primaries. One of his campaign slogans in 1940 was, "There will never be a Green machine," but the machine is functioning ruthlessly to crush any rebellion from Republicans with internationalist views. Governor Green himself popped up on the foreign-relations committee at the Republican Mackinac conference, and was reputedly responsible for the weasel words about "sovereignty" and "constitutionalism" with which isolationists hope to destroy a decent peace.

About Lyons, the Senatorial candidate on the Green slate, it is sufficient to say that he probably could be depended on to make "Curly" Brooks, the Tribune's present Senator in Washington, look like a mild liberal. Brooks has seldom had a thought not previously printed in a McCormick editorial; Lyons might furnish the Colonel himself with a few reactionary ideas. A veteran state politician who once served in Congress, Lyons is widely unpopular. Labor is against him, and business groups are not for him; yet he is on the slate. Though he was beaten for the Senate by Lucas in 1938, that does not mean he will be beaten in 1944. The atmosphere in Illinois has changed.

Curly Brooks

The atmosphere in Illinois, indeed, is something for the rest of the nation to observe with care. Roosevelt carried the state narrowly in 1940; in other contests the Republicans were almost universally successful, electing Green, Brooks, and the Honorable Mr. Day, who in 1933 cabled congratulations to Hitler on his rise to power and in 1941 published an anti-British book through Flanders Hall, a Nazi propaganda mill. There is no sign that Illinois is sick of this crowd.

The Chicago Daily News, Secretary Knox's newspaper, doesn't like Lyons, but for months it has neglected to campaign against him. Some Republicans resent the apparent capture of their party by its worst elements. Representative Dirksen of Peoria played with the idea of running against Lyons but preferred not to risk his seniority in the House without some organization support, and finally decided to seek the personal advertising of an alleged campaign for the Presidency. Deneen Watson, former leader of a Republican internationalist group, has filed for Senator against Lyons, but so far has obtained little organized support.

No strong candidate has dared file against Congressman Day, though Governor Green hesitated for weeks before coming out for him. Elmer J. Schnackenberg, speaker of the Illinois House of Representatives, was at one time mentioned as a rival, but "at a certain point," as some G. O. P. professionals put it, "ran up against a stone wall." Day's backing was too strong.

The chief opposition to the Green-Tribune machine is likely to come from a youngster named William G. Stratton, at present state Treasurer, who is bucking the organization to seek the nomination for Secretary of State. Stratton's father was a famous Illinois vote-getter, and the son has the same talent. But this "anti-machine" candidate has talked the isolationist line as smoothly as any other Illinois Republican who thinks he knows which side his bread is buttered on. The only issue in his challenge is whether the patronage-rich job of Secretary of State will go to a man who might use it to strengthen his personal machine or will continue to be controlled by the Green organization.

Under the circumstances it seems inevitable that the isolationist-reactionaries and their satellites will emerge from the primaries in April as masters of the Republican Party in Illinois. Governor Green could, if he wished, throw off their domination, but he does not choose to do so. Republican leaders are confident of winning the election, basing their claim on the admitted disaffection of farmers, plus the assumption that both American Federation of Labor unions and the United Mine Workers will vote against Mr. Roosevelt. If Colonel McCormick can get two Senators, a Governor, and a state organization committed to his brand of nationalism, he will have scored a notable victory. A large part of the Tribune's circulation, furthermore, is in Michigan, Wisconsin, and Indiana, where its impact is not to be ignored. Republicans in this area do not like to oppose the Tribune. One of the factors holding down Willkie in Illinois-in addition to the real bitterness of some persons against him-is the journalistic punishment visited upon those who boldly support his views. The power McCormick wields in the state Republican Party is not weakened even by the Tribune's refusal to campaign in earnest against the Kelly Democratic organization in Chicago municipal politics.

The rising Illinois Republican machine, in short, is more devious than the old-fashioned city or state organization with which America is familiar, and equally corrupt. It is as ruthless in handpicking candidates as Ed Crump of Memphis. It is cynically uninterested in rescuing the state and Chicago from the evils of local misgovernment. It adds, under isolationist overlordship, a spirit of malignant domestic and international toryism scarcely found in any other area.

The vote of the Illinois Republican delegation on the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation authorization is proof of what McCormick domination means. Illinois G.O.P. Representatives split eleven to five against American support of this plan to feed the hungry and rebuild the agricultural economy of war-ruined nations—though Midwestern Republicans generally supported the program. It was Vursell of Illinois who helped sponsor the House bill to deprive soldiers, in the name of "states' rights," of an effective voting plan. In the House vote on the Worley federal ballot bill the eighteen Republicans from Illinois were unanimously against it.

If there is to be any primary revolt which might defeat Lyons and Day, it can come only from the belated sense of decency of a few party leaders, balancing their fear of reprisals against their better instincts. Whether Tribune-dictated nominees can be beaten in the November elections depends on whether Illinois, a normally Republican state, revolts against a regime swayed by McCormick's hates and fears.

75 Years Ago in "The Nation"

TWICE DURING THE DEBATES of the present session of the Prussian Diet Count Bismarck has quite distinctly alluded to the late imminence of a French war against the North German Federation. . . . The danger to Prussia from the side of Rumania was also referred to by Bismarck as having been fortunately repressed by a peremptory word from the former.—March 4, 1869.

MESSRS. APPLETON & CO. announce . . . "The Principles of Psychology, Part I.—Data of Psychology," by Mr. Herbert Spencer.—March 11, 1869.

WE MAY PERHAPS have said a word too much when recently we charged Pennsylvania with being the most corrupt state in the Union. At all events, we are sure our Philadelphia friends will agree with us that the charge would penaps have come with a better grace from some journal not published in the city of New York and the state of which Albany is the capital. They will very likely be pleased with the history, which has just been ordered printed, of the bribery and corruption of our last legislature. . . . Still there is no doubt that when Albany is destroyed by fire from heaven, Harrisburg may as well begin to look about her.—

March 18, 1869.

OUR TWO BEST and oldest universities stand, at the present moment, as beggars openly before the public. At Harvard, the rise of prices, together with the increasing burden of insufficient endowments, has gradually eaten up the general fund at the disposal of the college, and compelled it to raise its board and tuition rates simply to keep the institution from falling to pieces. And this has been accompanied with starving the professors, and stopping the purchase of books and classroom apparatus. At Yale, the state of things is quite as bad.—March 18, 1869.

MESSRS. ROBERTS BROTHERS announce . . . the "Bab' Ballads," which first appeared in Fun; they are by Mr. William S. Gilbert.—March 18, 1869.

THE NEW YORK TIMES has published this week a resume of the operations actual and prospective of the leading railroad operators in this state, showing that they are already, by an ingenious and audacious system of combination, almost, and soon will be completely, in possession of the government of the state; that they control the legislature, have apparently cowed the Attorney General, and have at least some of the judges in their possession.— March 25, 1869.

THE AVERAGE AMERICAN . . . admires the dexterity with which the conductor deals out damp paper currency from one side of his mouth and slimy nickels from the opposite, but, though that functionary swears at him more hoarsely than usual, he does not suspect him of having small-pox pustules in his throat.—March 23, 1869.

Program of Action

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

The address which appears below was made at a dinner held on February 27 in New York on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of Freda Kirchwey's association with The Nation. Other, and notable, speeches were delivered by the chairman, Raymond Swing, and by Thurman W. Arnold, Archibald MacLeish, Dorothy Thompson, Reinhold Niebuhr, and William Rosenblatt, and messages were received from the President, Secretary Morgenthau, President Benes of Czechoslovakia, President de Gaulle of the French Committee of National Liberation, and other distinguished friends of The Nation. The whole collection of addresses and messages will soon be brought together in a booklet which will be sent, with The Nation's compliments, to all regular subscribers, as well as to members of the Dinner Committee, the Committee of Sponsors, and the guests of bonor.]

■WENTY-FIVE years ago the young people Mr. Villard took into the staff of The Nation were immersed in the tumultuous backwash of another war. I must tell you that all of us in the winter of 1918-1919 were hopeful. We thought that somehow out of the mistakes and deceptions of the leaders, out of the confused claims and fierce animosities—out of all the destruction and sorrow—the peoples of the world would somehow pull a decent peace. We believed in the forces of resistance. We saw little good in the bargains of the statesmen; but we knew the people were sick of bargains and sicker still of spilling their blood to make them last. We watched the early gallant, successful struggles of the Russian Revolution and we saw signs in every rebellious rising, in every little people's republic, in every local soviet-from Belfast to Budapest-that the people would have the last word.

The process of democratic defeat has been one which our journal has followed and tried to take note of, blow by blow and week by week, for twenty-five years. You can read it in full and accurate detail in the bound volumes of The Nation—not at all a bad way of reliving generation of political life. The only reason for recalling here the lost battles of 1919 and after is to throw light ahead, on the battles we face in 1944 and after.

It is said that President Roosevelt has studied with infinite care the last years of Woodrow Wilson's life in order to avoid if possible the errors of judgment and strategy that brought his great enterprise to defeat in the United States Senate and ended the hope of American participation in a system of collective security. Today we see our chief political leaders-not the President alonetiptoeing toward the brink of a new world order, accepting the necessity of American participation but hesitating to commit us fully and in advance to any detailed program of shared power in the post-war world. No fourteen points this time, no awkward promises from which we may later have to make an undignified and not very honorable escape. Nothing this time but the rather ectoplasmic principles of the Atlantic Charter, susceptible, obviously, to a wide variety of strategic interpretations. I don't blame the leaders of today for their caution, for trying to sidestep the mistakes of last time. For "last time" was one of the great times of reckoning for our civilization. Invisible at the peace table, and in the Senate of the United States (perhaps in the press gallery) and in the councils of the other leading nations, sat Saint Peter. He wrote down in his book -printed on the best rag paper with indelible ink and treated with wax to prevent decay-one of the major failures of mankind.

That undimmed record is staring at us today. Not only in the stupid unrealities of the Versailles Treaty, not only in the bristling nationalisms that sprang from the noble principle of self-determination (like thistles from figs), but in the fatal decision of the leaders of all the nations—ours included—to prevent the overthrow of the power of the established ruling groups. This is the one pact which—though unwritten and unsigned has been scrupulously observed by every government from 1919 till now. Even in the defeated countries, whose aggressive industrialist-militarist-imperialist rule had precipitated the war, even there, the victorious Allies showed themselves consistently partial to the heirs of the imperial power, consistently hostile to the emerging forces of popular revolt. The men who directed the remaking of the Western World after the last war remade it as nearly as possible in its pre-war political image. How quickly the fires of rebellion were smothered! How eagerly our leaders set the forces of reaction on their feet and fed them loans and made treaties and deals with them! They even encouraged our late enemy, Germany, to help wrest territory from our late ally, Russia-weakened by war and revolution. They launched attacks against Russia themselves, directly by expeditionary forces in the North and the Far East, and indirectly by giving (no nonsense about lend-lease) arms and funds to the Soviet Government's hostile neighbors and internal enemies

Undoubtedly our statesmen wanted to restore and keep order, and to them order meant only one thing-the Old Order. And so they ruled out those social and economic changes that might have saved Europe from the despair that bred fascist counter-revolution. And as fascism began to assume power—under various names—in Hungary and Italy and Germany and other countries, they calmly accepted this disease of frustration as a bulwark of the safe Old Order. They didn't know that it represented the breakdown of that order in a revolution of the right-or if they did know, they welcomed and encouraged it as a preferred form of social upheaval. Better everything-terror, race hatred, economic warfare waged according to new gangster rules, the wiping out of independent states-better all this than the faintest risk of encouraging popular risings and the spread of socialism in Europe.

Don't remind me that during the last seven years of this inter-war struggle for power, the United States had a vigorous New Deal government—a popular government itself, anti-fascist by profession and largely anti-fascist in feeling. I know that. And I haven't forgotten that when our government was forced to take a position for or against fascist aggression—in the matter of sanctions against Italy, for example, or, most crucially, in the embargo of arms to Republican Spain—the Administration, in spite of its liberal intentions, followed exactly the same basic policy adopted by the governments of Britain and France. I haven't forgotten. And I believe it proves certain things that American progressives may as well face: It proves, first, that the power of conservative industrial and financial interests in this country has never been seriously threatened -even when Wall Street was most fiercely attacking the New Deal which had saved it from collapse in 1933. (The ferocity of the business attack on the Roosevelt Administration in the election campaign of 1936 was one of the important though little recognized factors determining American policy toward the Spanish fascist rebellion of that summer.) It proves, second, that other conservative forces, such as the Roman Catholic hierarchy, acting politically, have largely dominated the policy of the Administration even in its most progressive periods. And throughout our government apparatus, from top to bottom, there have remained in key posts—particularly in those posts that control foreign affairs and domestic economic affairs—tories who, without any pressure from right-wing pressure groups, simply react like the reactionaries they are on every issue that arises.

And this brings me to the moment at which we find ourselves tonight. It is well, as I said a while back, that the President and his advisers are thinking about the experience of his great predecessor, Woodrow Wilson. But it is to be hoped that it is not only his political missteps they are thinking of, but the whole chain of events that followed: the fatal compromises in Paris, the deals he was made party to, the sort of Europe that grew out of those deals, the forces that controlled the League of Nations and prevented it from performing the functions he planned for it. For the lesson of "last time" runs straight down the years, from the mistakes of Woodrow Wilson through the mistakes of Franklin D. Roosevelt. And unless this is recognized, we shall have no better peace than we had after 1918-which means that we shall have no peace.

What reason are we given to hope that "this time" will not be like "last time"? Have the leaders of the Allied nations grasped the idea that we are engaged in putting down the power, not only of Germany and its allies and satellites, but of fascist counter-revolution? Do the men in control realize that we cannot win this war by fighting on one side with planes and tanks and on the other with political weapons? Do our leaders understand, after all these years, that it is not only the fascist gangsters themselves who need to be extirpated, but the sleek, respectable elements, here and abroad, who put and kept them in power? And do they know that this job calls for a profound shift in the balance of economic and political control, here in America and in Britain as well as in the fascist countries themselves?

These questions, unhappily, almost answer

By Art Young in The Nation, May 16, 1923

The little nations squander their pennies

at the airplane counter.

themselves. Put very crudely-but accurately-power in our own government, as in Britain, is still largely in the hands of men who hate fascism less than they fear social change. The war has increased, not reduced, the influence of those whom the President-in the days before the ukase abolishing the New Deal-used to describe as Economic Royalists. The same forces which conspired to hold this country in line with the Britain of Baldwin and Chamberlain before the war are again trying to build, stone by stone, another Old Order. Today, as between 1919 and 1939, the basic fear of disorder, which means fear of popular rule, dominates our relations with the political elements boiling up out of the cauldron of war. We want to win; but if possible we want to win in alliance with the men and institutions which were responsible for the policies that inevitably produced the war. This is a difficult formula to follow-it may be a dangerous formula even in terms of the military strategy it is presumably designed to serve—but we have consistently stuck to it until the explosive force of events or of popular feeling has blown us out of our familiar ways. In Spain, in France, in Italy, in Yugoslavia, in Greece, we have seen the formula in operation. Mr. Churchill urges us not to fool with "ideological preferences" while we have a war to fight. The Prime Minister should have reversed his advice: he should have appealed to the forces of political change kindly to delay their appearance on the scene until the rulers of Britain and the United States decide their proper time has arrived.

We all know that the war has to be won no matter what comes after. Nobody is arguing with Mr. Churchill about that. The aggression of the Axis powers left the rest of the world no choice but to fight, no alternative to complete victory. But those who see the war chiefly in terms of military action are also those who see the peace chiefly in terms of a restoration of the kind of worldminus a militarized Axis-that preceded the war. The main improvement such people propose is the creation of a new international organization which, through structural improvements or a fresh set of by-laws, will somehow or other succeed where the League of Nations failed. I have read many plans for achieving collective security, and I see the value of thinking in advance about the shape of the world order to come. But no international organization is any better than the leading nations that comprise it. A return to the power structure of pre-war Europe—with its economic relationships unchanged, its colonial system intact, its former ruling groups in control -would mean only a new cycle of economic disintegration, dictatorship, and war, no matter what convenants of peace the nations may sign.

It is this that I hope the President and his advisers see as they review the past in laying their plans for the future. I hope they see that the suppression of disorder is not the primary job of the victorious Allies. I hope they see that the economic structure of Europe, smashed to pieces by fascist methods applied to the business of war, cannot be patched together again. News from the underground in every country indicates an overwhelming conviction on the part of the people that the old system must be replaced with some form or degree of collectivist control, under democratic sanctions. To try to prevent this process by repressing the popular forces behind it (as we have done in Italy) or by lending our immense support to the groups that oppose it (as we have done in Spain) is to align ourselves politically with our enemies. It is to repeat all the mistakes that led us into this deadliest of revolutionary wars. Only a New Deal for the world, more far-reaching and consistent than our own faltering New Deal, can prevent the coming of World War III.

The Nation is going to work for that New Deal for the world. We may be fooled, as we were fooled twentyfive years ago; we may be staking our hopes on emotions and shifts of power which will prove transitory. But the years have made us more adept, too, at gauging our chances. And in spite of all the power arrayed against a decent new world, we know that the power on our side is great.

The democratic forces of Europe and Asia are fully awake to the needs and dangers of this time. The courage and unity and will to fight among the victims of fascist terror in every country are a blazing example to us in this relatively sheltered and isolated land. The people of the occupied countries, in particular, are fighting with a fury we have not learned, for values we do not yet recognize. They are already shaping their own future. Attempts to head them off have not been successful. Does anyone think the old gang will hold power in Spain or in Italy a day after our support is pulled out from under? Franco is our creature—ours and Hitler's; he is not Spain's. Badoglio and the King of Italy belong to us alone. As for France, no amount of Allied pressure was able to check the rise of De Gaulle. And it was not political maneuvering that placed him in his present position of pre-eminence; no one can accuse him of subtle or ingratiating methods! It was the inexorable and united demand of the French people-both in France and in the colonies—that thrust De Gaulle forward and then, quite as inexorably, through the Consultative Assembly, have been making him the instrument of the will of France. The popular revolution in Yugoslavia, so strong and successful that it has drawn Allied support away from the reactionary government-in-exile, will serve as a persuasive example throughout the Balkans.

And Russia. . . . With due regard to the firm and imperturbable self-interest that dominates the foreign policy of the Soviet Government, it must be said that the mighty weight of Russian influence has been thrown on the side of the democratic forces in Europe. Russia may be building its own sphere of influence, but it is not building it out of nations ruled by fascists and the underlings of fascists. Its own security demands neighbors who prefer peace to conquest. Today, unlike twenty-five years ago, the Soviet Union can if necessary establish its own cordon sanitaire against reactionary nations that threaten it. Perhaps it will do so in any case, just to be on the safe side. Perhaps it will do so only if its Allies continue to build up, and prop up, by diplomatic and military means and the support of the Catholic Church, the decrepit relicts of fascism. I, for one, shall feel that much has been lost if a new balance of power—East against West—is created in Europe. But it seems to me the most probable alternative to a decent system of collective security based firmly on a democratic Europe. Russia is not going to encourage the reestablishment of the Europe of 1939 and, with all the dangers inherent in any form of power politics, one must count this as gain.

The final source of strength we can draw upon in our fight for a New Deal for the world is here at home. Everywhere one finds a growing awareness of the imminent threat of reactionary control in America. The forces that resist social change have gained much territory and dug themselves in strongly during the war. But in a democracy such tendencies set in motion counter-currents. And today, with the Presidential campaign just opening, we see the lines being drawn more sharply than before. We are in for a fight. Men who have shilly-shallied will have to choose sides. Some will turn up in positions that will surprise us. Perhaps the President himself will surprise us.

The Nation is convinced that the campaign of the coming summer and fall will lay the lines of America's course for the rest of the war and for the whole reconstruction period. We believe that we, like every other organized progressive force in this country, must fight all the way from now until November to back the principles and support the candidates that offer the best hope of a democratic future for America and the world.

By Georges Schreiber, The Nation, May 17, 1933 The Burning of the Books

We must find our allies: we must overlook our smaller differences; and we must move. The discouraging fact we must face is that reaction is both well heeled and well organized, tough and unscrupulous. confident of victory. By comparison we are poorand divided. But in spite of the odds against us we cannot afford to mull along, waiting for the political consciousness of the masses to develop normally and gradually over a period of years. We must fight now. and build our militia while we fight. The most encouraging fact is that we have numbers on our side-if we can reach them.

It is encouraging, too, that the progressive labor groups are already getting organized for aggressive action. The C. I. O. Political Action Committee is a nation-wide move to overcome the traditional political inertia of American labor and provide that orientation and sense of political reality which the movement so greatly needs. Smaller organizations, such as the Union for Democratic Action, are as deep in the struggle as their means permit. And all over the country committees to carry out local actions have suddenly sprung into being.

The Nation intends both to fight and cover this campaign at the top of its ability. We want to keep track, through first-hand reporting all over the country, of the movement of progressive forces. We shall do what we can to make our pages a focus of information and direction. We shall print criticisms and analyses by the best available political writers. We shall tell the truth about candidates. We shall report as fully the campaign on the right and pay particular attention to the key states and districts. We shall proceed in the firm belief that no matter who is nominated or elected President, his capacity to act as the leader this country and the world most desperately require will depend upon the political elements that come to power with him. Neither a Roosevelt nor a Willkie will be able to steer this country toward a responsible foreign policy if he is opposed by the strongest elements in his own party; and at this critical hour, the strongest elements in both parties are their most reactionary elements.

To break the hold in each party of its Dieses, its Hoffmans, its Cotton Ed Smiths, its Ham Fishes, must be the first practical political aim of the progressives in this campaign. To rally around a concrete, clearly-put democratic program both in foreign and domestic affairs must be their second and more permanent aim.

Now a program can be as intricate as the usual political party platform or as brief as the President's Four Freedoms. But its value depends upon its ability to turn principles into specifications. The Nation's program of action is at least specific. It grows naturally out of the events we chronicle and the issues we discuss in each number. It is founded in a firm conviction that the very existence of our civilization depends upon the development-not yet achieved-of a close and confident political understanding among the great Allied powers both in fighting the war and in planning the peace; and upon the creation of a permanent international organization, in whatever shape, composed of nations whose governments have been stripped of fascist, pro-fascist, or collaborationist elements. In practice this means that the Allied governments should mutually carry out such immediate policies as these:

1. In Italy they should withdraw support from the King and General Badoglio and permit the free parties to establish a provisional republican government.

 They should recognize the French Committee of National Liberation as the provisional government of France, with full right to rid the army and the civil administration of fascists and other traitors, and to act in every way as an independent governing body.

3. They should forthwith break off relations with fascist Spain and do everything in their power to favor the reestablishment of the Republic, which alone can bring Spain into the Allied coalition.

4. They should support the free people's movements in every occupied country, abandoning the pretense of "non-intervention," which, in practice, has always meant effective intervention in behalf of reaction.

5. They should open their doors to every refugee able to escape from Europe and, by so doing, establish a moral right to insist that Britain permit the immigration into Palestine of all Jews who can still be saved from the extermination policy of the Nazi terrorists; they should use their united influence to bring about the abrogation of the White Paper and give their united support to the development of the Jewish national homeland in Palestine.

6. In Latin America they should give all possible aid to movements aiming at the establishment of democratic rule in those countries now subject to dictatorship. The United States, in particular, should do its best to strengthen and create a closer relationship between the nations possessing free governments, in order to reduce the danger of fascist control of the continent.

In domestic affairs, The Nation will continue to fight—and help unite other progressive groups in the fight—for the fullest possible use of our great productive machine (doubled in capacity during the war) after the war is won. The only hope of an orderly economic future for our country and the world lies in greater and greater production and a constant increase in the exchange of goods. With this in mind we shall oppose every policy that tends to limit production. In particular, we shall attack private monopolies of all sorts both in national and international trade.

We welcome the promises of American business to assume full responsibility for maintaining maximum production and employment. But we do not believe this aim can be achieved without the active intervention of the government. Only the government can plan and coordinate economic activities on a national and international scale. It is our belief that there will have to be more, not less, government intervention in business after the war. The government will have to act as umpire, policeman, promoter, social welfare agent, and wherever necessary as producer and distributor too. Against the background of this general position, we favor:

1. Immediate government pianning for expanded production and full employment after the war through improved fiscal policies and broad programs of public works; large-scale housing; regional developments such as the various public power projects; encouragement of small business and cooperative enterprises; encouragement of farm projects, collective and individual; government operation of such publicly-owned plant facilities as would otherwise be taken out of production.

2. Prompt passage of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill to extend the benefits of social security to many groups formerly excluded and guarantee adequate medical care for everyone.

3. Full representation, in all government departments and agencies, of labor and other progressive elements in the community.

4. The abolition of such obviously fascist devices as the Dies, Kerr, and Smith committees.

5. The wiping out of every form of legal discrimination, political or economic, against any racial or religious group, and the initiation of a deliberate program of education throughout the United States designed to overcome prejudice and the social discriminations that arise from prejudice.

These demands form only a working model of a plarform. But they offer an area on which progressives of various political groups can stand and fight together, If we agree on these few points, we can probably agree on the many that naturally grow out of them.

. . .

My friends, this analysis, these plans, this scattered collection of "points" can really be summed up in a simple plea. Ordinary people everywhere are sick to death of the scramble for power of privileged groups; they are sick of intrigue, of divisions among men; they are sick of the cruelty which has made the world a place of horror and ignominy. What they want—all they want—are the opposites of these products of fascism and war. They want a breath of human warmth in a world grown cold with hate; they want freedom to work and talk and enjoy the decencies of life; to educate their children. They are willing to die—they are dying, in millions—so that other men may have these things. But if they die only to keep alive a world in which the hope of freedom again withers and hatred and war come to flower, then the payment for that deception will be even heavier than the awful payment exacted today for the deceptions of last time. It is our task—our only important task on this earth—to help create a world fit, not for heroes, but for ordinary men and women.

Outflanking the Japanese

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THE speedy capture by the navy of Kwajalein and Eniwetok atolls in the Marshalls provides a complete vindication of those military critics who have contended that the Central Pacific rather than the Southwest Pacific route offers the most desirable highway to Tokyo. Actual experience has shown island hopping here to be easier, cheaper, and far faster than the kind of war in which General MacArthur, after two years of skilled fighting, has yet to clean up half of New Guinea.

The performance of Americans in the Marshalls invasion can only be termed excellent. Fine scouting and intelligence work gave a detailed knowledge of terrain and enemy strength. A thorough aerial softening of surrounding islands by both army and navy planes eliminated the chance of interference by air. As in the Gilberts, the very size of the invading fleet, precluded the enemy accepting a challenge to a fleet engagement. Landing tactics were better than at Tarawa and go far toward explaining the ridiculously low casualties. Finally, the tactics of by-passing, already practiced in the Aleutians and Solomons, left several Japanese bases to the east heavily fortified but largely helpless, to be dealt with at our leisure. Thus Japan, for the first time in her modern history has lost territory she had long controlled.

Not only the campaign in the Marshalls, but the recent raids are of the utmost importance. That portion of the United States Navy now in the Pacific is so strong that simultaneous offensives deep in enemy waters can be conducted practically without loss. They have shown that the land-based Japanese plane holds far fewer terrors than previously while our own air force is fully able to defeat any attempts the enemy may care to make toward relieving such important bases as Rabaul by convoys. We have a big job of mopping up ahead of us, but on the basis of recent events it seems unlikely that any of the Marshalls, Wake Island, Nauru, New Guinea, New Britain, or New Ireland can be held while the Carolines including Truk will also fall, probably sooner than expected and without a major test of naval strength. The Japanese navy now seems to be confined mainly to home waters.

The refusal of the Japanese navy to accept any of several recent invitations to battle is significant from several angles. The Pacific enemy has long been characterized by a kind of bulldog aggressiveness. Yet on all recent occasions when a collision might have occurred the American control of the air was such as to make acceptance of our challenge plainly suicidal. Nor is this the only factor involved. In the Pacific we have long been engaged in a process at sea analogous to the Russian "blitzgrinding" on land and have taken an immensely high toll of enemy vessels. Numbers of mistakes have been made in identifying the class of ships sunk, and the Army Air Corps has often been far too optimistic in its claims, as in the well known case of the Haruna. But the navy has leaned toward conservatism, and in several instances its reports of enemy ships destroyed have been too modest. The naval superiority with which the Japanese started the war has, therefore, disappeared without the slightest likelihood of returning. In fact, because of the phenomenal output of American yards our navy, even now markedly stronger than the Japanese, will shortly be overwhelming. Still later, the addition of our Atlantic fleet and the British navy will give the United Nations a margin of anywhere between three and five to one and will spell Japan's doom as surely as Germany's is now being sealed on land. From this time on the tactics of the United States in the Pacific can become bolder and more aggressive because we can now afford to take risks which would have been extremely foolish two years ago. The "play it safe close to the chest" methods of Admiral King should give way increasingly to the fighting offensive which is the heritage of the American navy.

With this bold leap forward to the Admiralty Islands General MacArthur has outflanked the remaining Japanese bases in the Southwest Pacific and trapped upwards of 50,000 enemy troops in New Guinea and the Bismarck Archipelago. This successful move is the:fruit both of the air and sea offensive which has almost paralyzed Rabaul and of the Central Pacific campaign. If the Japanese were still able to use Truk as a base, such a long stride to the north would hardly have been feasible. In both Pacific theaters there may now be a pause before further advances are undertaken for our newly won positions must be consolidated and the more important enemy strongholds, which have been by-passed, must be captured and converted to our use. In the Central Pacific, Ponape and Kusaie in the eastern Carolines are the most important positions still to be taken. Truk, no longer the bugaboo of a year ago, may be regarded as the first main objective of both our current drives.

From the Carolines we can branch out in either or both of two directions. The Marianas and Bonin Islands to the north lead directly to Japan itself, but the air bases available are not numerous and are hardly sufficient to support a real bombing offensive against the mainland. These islands are worth taking for their nuisance value to the enemy, but air raids from the Bonins will hardly bring Japan to terms.

Secondly, we can continue our island hopping directly to the west with the reconquest of the Philippines the main object. In anticipation of this the Japanese are now fortifying Halmahera, one of the essential stepping stones along the southern line of approach. Unless the enemy should decide to preserve his fleet for the defense of Japan itself this move would probably bring a test with the Japanese navy, for American sea and air power in the Philippine Islands would have the effect of cutting communications to the south with the Indies which could then be mopped up later.

Even the retaking of the Philippines is not likely to end the Pacific war. We may be obliged to gain Chinese bases by a sea offensive from the east rather than a long drawn out land offensive from the west. These will then have to be developed and used in prolonged aerial bombardment of Japan proper as a preliminary to invasion. There are, to be sure, alternatives. One is a direct invasion attempt under cover of our immensely strong carrier aviation. Another is converging attacks from the Kuriles and Formosa. It is difficult to see how the Japanese navy can hope to block our island hopping at any time in the near future—always provided we continue to secure absolute air superiority before each forward step. Without command of the air enemy naval intervention is very unlikely to be successful as the Japanese have discovered to their cost. It is far more likely that the Japanese, if they elect to fight a decisive naval battle, will do so in waters close to their mainland where the United Nations, operating from fewer and more distant air bases, will be at the greatest possible disadvantage.

Because of the effect on American life, it is also worth noting what portion of our war machine will remain after Hitler is defeated. Practically all of the vast merchant marine can be used to speed up conquest. This will not require the same number of destroyer escorts and other convoy protection types as have been needed in the Atlantic as the Japanese submarine threat is incomparably less. Otherwise, nearly all of our navy can be actively employed in the Pacific. The better part of the Army Air Force, especially the bombardment forces, can be used provided we can find sufficient bases from which to operate. The Marine Corps and army units specially trained in amphibious operations will also be needed. However, short of the actual invasion of Japan no particularly large forces of troops will be required in overcoming island garrisons. Nor does Japan itself have an army which would be called large by European standards. Keeping in mind forthcoming British aid it is very doubtful if we could profitably use as many as two million troops in the Pacific area. We could reasonably expect, then, a demobilization of 30 to 40 per cent of the men in our armed services after the defeat of Germany.

Developments in Russia have been fully as important to the outcome of the European war as the breaking of Japan's first real defense lines are in the Pacific. Three Russian offensives, under way at the moment, hold enormous possibilities.

Easily first of the area is southern Russia. Here the Germans are paying the penalty for attempting to hold territory when developments elsewhere had made such action strategically unsound. For fully five months while the battle lines west of Kiev surged further and further west and finally crossed the Polish border, the Germans held desperately to the southern Ukraine with their bridgehead on the lower Dnieper. As the Red Army drives lengthened, the southern German front became longer and more vulnerable to attack. Also German westward communications were increasingly threatened. The reasons for the Wehrmacht's attempts to hold this territory are not entirely clear but probably center around the fact that the metallurgical resources about Nikopol and Krivoi Rog had become of vital importance to Hitler's war machine.

It is still too early to estimate the full extent of Nazi defeat in southern Russia. The loss of nearly all of the Eighth Army comes at a time when Germany is critically short of troops. The mauling of other divisions about Nikopol will also affect the manpower balance in that area. However, the first spring rains have been cutting down the mobility of both armies, and the Red Army in the good fighting weather remaining may find it difficult to turn the defeat of the enemy into disaster.

The best opportunity of doing this lies farther north, where General Vatutin's armies have been making the most progress. Should the Russians be able to cut the Odessa-Zhmerinka-Lwow railway or better yet take Lwow itself, Mannstein's southern German armies, able to retreat only into Rumania and facing grave supply difficulties, will find themselves in a critical situation. Even if they escape encirclement their necessary retreat into the Balkans should place them outside the main arena of the war.

In the far north the twin drives west of Novgorod and southwest from Leningrad along the Gulf of Finland represent almost the only important activity in that area since 1942. While they are less threatening than offensives further south, the Germans cannot afford to take them lightly. To date they have (1) completely raised the two-year siege of Leningrad (2) compelled a retreat into Estonia of the northernmost German armies and flanked those immediately to the south (3) provided a little more mobility to the Russian Baltic Fleet with the clearing of part of the southern shores of the Gulf of Finland and (4) served the plainest kind of warning to Finland to get out of the war on the basis of harsh terms now or unbearable terms later. As the Russians extend their hold on the Gulf of Finland, they should shortly be in a position to interrupt the German iron-ore trade with Sweden from both sea and air, adding one more to the numerous harassments besetting the

From the strategic angle the German position in Russia is now chaotic. The front is irregular and unnecessarily long. The deep salients pushed by the Red Army have cut north-south rail communications and complicated the problem of supply. Only rarely do the present German lines rest on rivers, railroads, or any other natural supports. Yet, with the Russians in Poland only a little over 200 miles from East Prussia, the day has passed when the Germans dare conduct "strategic retreats" and attempt to find stable lines to the west. Inferior in numbers, desperately short of reserves, the Wehrmacht can only hold each bit of ground as long as possible before retreating.

While the Russian and Pacific fronts have shown the greatest activity for the month past, other developments have been significant. The strategically vital Battle of the Atlantic having been won, shipping becomes safer week by week as submarine sinkings rise and ship losses decline. January and February were extremely good months for the air war. The Italian campaign, on the other hand, gives less reason for satisfaction. The landing of six divisions south of Rome should have resulted in far greater gains, especially in view of the German unpreparedness to meet such a move. Either the capture of Rome or an attack on the rear of Kesselring's armies could normally have been expected. Instead the newly landed troops, after having secured their bridgehead, appear to have made no offensive moves. While more facts should be awaited before any final judgment is made, either bad leadership or extremely conservative and unimaginative tactics is suggested by our failure to exploit a strong position combined with the element of surprise. We must do far better if we are to win ir western Europe with both speed and low casualties.

In the Wind

ROM HONOLULU comes word that the Chinese of Hawaii, in a special "gratitude drive," have bought more than a million dollars' worth of war bonds "to give concrete evidence of their thanks to America" for the repeal of the Chinese exclusion laws.

LOUIS BROMFIELD was scheduled to present a plaque, on behalf of the National Victory Garden Institute, to Delano Lodge of the United Steelworkers of America, the much-publicized "model union" of the Empire Sheet and Tin Plate Company, Mansfield, Ohio. The union refused to accept the plaque from his hands because of his attacks on organized labor. Other arrangements were hastily made.

SCOOP: An anti-Semitic joke that has been in circulation since the first days of the war has just appeared in the Grants Pass, Oregon, Bulletin.

THE PROVOST-MARSHAL'S OFFICE has authorized commandants of army posts at which Italian prisoners of war are held to parole such prisoners at their own discretion. Thus far there is no record that any such parole has been granted, since the commandant issuing the parole would be held responsible if the prisoner should fail to return.

IN CASE Governor Dewey of New York should be nominated for the Presidency, the Union for Democratic Action has devised a campaign slogan for him: "Dewey or Don't He?" James Loeb, Jr., executive secretary of the U. D. A., admits the grammar is unorthodox but says it's good enough for the Republicans.

FESTUNG EUROPA: In Norway a nationwide campaign for enlistments in the German navy produced fifteen recruits. . . A concentration camp near Bergen is being enlarged. . . Incidentally, the new Nazi slogan for Norway is "Toward Better Times." The underground press generally has made the slogan its own.

[The $5 prize for the best item received during February goes to the American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born for its story of the omission of Czechoslovakia from an American map. It was published February 19.]

MEETING

SUN YAT-SEN DAY

Tribute to Dr. Sun Yat-sen Father of the Chinese Republic

Metropolitan Opera House sunday, March 12—2:30 P.M.

Outstanding Speakers
Pearl Buck's dramatization of Dr. Sun's life Songs by Paul Robeson Chorale Well-known stage and screen stars Special Radio Broadcast to Meeting from

Mme. Sun Yat-sen and Sun Fo ORDER YOUR TICKETS AT ONCE 55c - $1.10 - $1.65 - $2.20 - $2.75 - $3.30 - $5.50 SUN YAT-SEN DAY, 40 East 49th Street, New York 17, N. Y.

BURLINGA

PHRAIC LIE

French Democracy Gets to Work

BY JULES MOCH

Algiers, February 15

MY WORK in the French resistance movement has made it necessary for me to undertake several missions quite far from Algiers in recent weeks; for that reason I have been unable to send regular dispatches to The Nation.

During a short stay between trips in the provisional capital of France, I found a chance to go through the American newspapers and also to study at first-hand the activities of the young Consultative Assembly.

It seems to me that important sections of American opinion are finding it difficult to follow the evolution of French politics. That is not surprising: how many Frenchmen are familiar with current developments on the American political scene?

Whether the French are acquainted with the problems of the United States, however, can have little influence on the course of events: the France of 1944 will have no role to play in drawing up peace plans for the Western Hemisphere. America, on the other hand, because of its military and economic strength, its present guaranties and post-war promises, its provisional administration of territories occupied by its armies, and the prestige which naturally flows from these actions, will have a tremendous role to play in the demobilization of the Old World.

For this reason influential Americans, particularly government officials and newspapermen, should have a clear picture of the nations which the United States is helping to liberate. The accomplishments of the first two sessions of the Consultative Assembly are therefore of paramount importance to those who want to understand the position of France today.

In the field of governmental procedure great progress has been made. In accordance with the republican tradition of both France and America, the military authority has been placed under civilian direction. Two civilians, one a left parliamentarian, the other a moderate, now direct the War and Aviation Department and the Navy Department.

Moreover the government was reorganized last November in order to reflect more adequately the political composition of the Consultative Assembly and of France itself. It now includes seventeen members, of whom five are parliamentarians; two Socialists, Mm. Philip and Le Troquer; two Radicals, Mm. Queuille and Mendès-

France; and one moderate, M. Jacquinot. Of the remaining twelve members, four represent the principal resistance movements (Mm. d'Astier de la Vigerie, Fresnay, de Menthon, and Capitant); three supported General de Gaulle from the beginning (General Catroux, Mm. Diethelm and Tixier); two were designated by General Giraud (Mm. Monnet and Mayer); one, M. Bonnet, although a follower of General de Gaulle, was accepted by General Giraud as Commissioner of Information when unity was achieved; one is a diplomat who fled to London in 1943, M. Massigli; the final member is General de Gaulle, President of this provisional government of the Republic.

To recapitulate in other terms, its seventeen members include four Socialists, seven civilian republicans who have clearly defined their political position and who may be classified as Radicals, one Left Catholic, and one moderate republican of Reynaud tendency. Only four of the ministers, two of them generals, have no past record of active participation in French political life. How then can American journalists speak of authoritarian or personal or fascist tendencies in a council, two-thirds of whose members were active in the Popular Front, France's "New Deal" government?

One section of the French resistance movement is not represented in the government. But it is no fault of General de Gaulle's that the Communists rejected the offer made to them. If, as is probable, one or two of their representatives finally accept ministerial posts, the provisional government will then reflect exactly the whole resistance movement.

The Assembly has zealously considered the situation in France, ways of aiding the underground, French foreign policy, colonial policy, and the military and naval strategy of France. In lengthy debates, always a delicate matter in public session in time of war, the Assembly, despite its newness and the inexperience of many of its members, has acquitted itself with honor. Every debate has ended with a unanimous vote of confidence for the government. I myself can attest to the fact that the votes of confidence are no mere lip service; they show the real working unity of the parliamentarians, the delegates of the resistance, and those of the overseas territories behind the provisional government.

On two points—and only two—does the position of a part of the Assembly differ somewhat from that of the government. On the question of purging or punishing traitors, collaborators, and former Vichy ministers, the Assembly favors more drastic action, more summary procedure, and more exemplary punishment. Concerning the administration of France during the period between its liberation and the election of a Constituent Assembly, the delegates are still groping their way toward a solution. The problem is not simple. A ministerial proposal has been rejected by the commission studying the question, and the commission's proposal has been rejected by the Assembly. A new proposal will be submitted to the Assembly in March.

Skeptical readers may suggest that the Assembly is neither consultative nor representative. Let us examine this view.

In theory, the Assembly is only a consultative body. The decrees calling it into existence show that clearly. But that is only theory. From the start the Assembly, with the consent of the government, has gone beyond this narrow concept, acting in the belief that authority is not granted but must be taken.

The authority of the Assembly and the aid which it gives the government are such that it would be impossible for an important bill to become law without having first been examined and approved by the Assembly. The government itself established this precedent when it submitted to the Assembly its proposal for the organization of public power during the liberation period with the request that the Assembly study the post-war reconstruction of French economic life and possible structural reforms together with all the "suggested" modifications in the 1944 budget.

At present the Assembly is something completely different from a simple consultative body. It offers suggestions, but it legislates as well. In effect, a new parliamentary form has been born in Algiers.

One cannot argue, either, that the Assembly is not representative of occupied France. Forty-five of its hundred members left France in October and November 1943, delegated by the resistance organizations and political parties to represent them. They all describe France as 95 per cent, or more, behind the Allied cause. These millions of Frenchmen, hundreds of thousands of them active in the underground, organized and armed, rest their hope of liberation in the Allies and the government in Algiers. Even the Vichy propagandists no longer dispute the fact that the "Gaullists" or "terrorists," that is to say the patriots of France, are united in the struggle for liberty and the restoration of the Republic.

Make no mistake—the French resistance and the delegates who represent it in Algiers are ardent republicans. If studies made by the Committees of Resistance in France are not sufficient proof, we have only to look at the motion on nationalization, presented to the Assembly by the Socialist delegates, which immediately obtained signatures from forty members or more than half of those present,

France counts on the DeGaulle government to liberate its land, restore its honor, and allow it freely to decide its future. No question of personal power is involved. The commitments of De Gaulle in that regard are clear and explicit.

This is what America should know about France. France is ready for the heaviest sacrifices to regain its liberty. It is deeply hurt by the reticent and limited recognition accorded its government by the Allies. France will redouble its effort in the hope that the Allies will soon better understand its suffering, its aspirations, and its whole-hearted support of President de Gaulle.

Ten Points for Peace

MONG all the competing plans for a future world organization one of the simplest and most sensible is that recently put forward by Samuel S. Fels in the New York Times Sunday magazine. Mr. Fels proposes that the United Nations themselves should form the "nucleus for an international union of all governments in the interest of peace and good-will." The thirty-three states voluntarily linked for the prosecution of the war constitute a majority of the nations of the world in numbers, force, and influence. They have developed the machinery of cooperation; they have even initiated, in the field of relief and rehabilitation, common programs of action for the post-war period.

Mr. Fels recognizes clearly that the old idea of sovereignty must be fundamentally modified if the United Nations is to develop as an effective society of nations. But this would be true under any plan. The most complete and ingenious international governmental structure that could be devised would prove worthless unless each member nation were willing to contribute to it some share of its sovereignty.

We print below the ten points of Mr. Fels's proposal with the suggestion to readers that they send us their criticisms or other comments:

- 1. Charge the United Nations with the obligation to prevent wars and vest in them the power whenever and wherever necessary to use force to accomplish this end.
- 2. Require that weapons and materials of war remaining in the hands of the Axis powers shall be cut up and sold for scrap, and the proceeds used to supply much-needed food to the people of the countries concerned. (A preference for butter over cannon is thus indicated.)
- 3. Provide that instruments of war remaining in the hands of members of the United Nations after the war is over may be retained by them wholly or in part for requirements within their own borders; but that the primary purpose of those weapons, and their sole use outside the borders of their owners, shall be to carry out duties laid down for the United Nations in the peace.

- 4. Charge the United Nations with the duty and power to prohibit any further manufacture of weapons or munitions of war by any country or by private enterprise. Should, however, conditions arise later where limited amounts are required to carry out the purposes of the peace treaty, the manufacture of these shall be controlled by the United Nations only.
- 5. Charge the United Nations with establishing a central headquarters through which constant and diligent search shall be carried out in all parts of the world for dangerous evidence of preparations for war and situations that might lead to it. This would call for a corps of able, energetic, trained men to keep in touch with conditions by personal visits to countries where trouble is likely to occur. This corps of men to be given by the peace treaty all the rights needed by them to fulfill their instructions, including the right of search for hidden munitions factories.
- 6. Charge the United Nations with maintaining a similar corps to audit conditions in any mandated or colonial territories, with additional power to require reports, hold hearings, and hear native testimony.
- 7. Provide that the police powers of the various countries shall be put at the service of the United Nations when called upon. This will have the great advantage of connecting world efforts to prevent war with local efforts to prevent disorder.
- 8. Project the work of the United Nations on a basis of entire frankness with the people—their constituents—publishing to the world open, concise, and regular reports in every tongue.
- Provide, through some equable and compulsory system, adequate revenue to maintain these and other services of the United Nations.
- 10. Count on the advantages accruing to the countries participating in the United Nations to lead neutral and, after due probation, enemy countries to join them.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

HENRICH HIMMLER has issued a new decree creating what can be called a "total police force." On February 23 he announced that from now on "every male German irrespective of age, being capable and worthy of bearing arms, must serve in the auxiliary police." Obviously this is a ne plus ultra. No country can have more police than inhabitants.

The auxiliary police in Germany consists of two formations—the Rural Guard and the Town Guard. The first was founded two years ago; the second, somewhat later. Both serve as reservoirs of man-power on which the regular police can draw in an emergency. Members continue their regular occupations, but "during their leisure hours undergo training in the essentials of police theory and use of arms." As soon as they have received this rudimentary instruction they are assigned to police work for a few hours a few times a week, at night or in their free time. Previously the service was voluntary and on a limited scale. Now it is compulsory and universal.

The decree divides all men still in the country into three groups. In the first are those who are not employed full time in a war job; the police can call on them at any time. Then come those who have full-time war jobs, for example, in an armament factory; they can be called to police duty only in their free time. The third group consists of men who in addition to their full-time war job do work for the party or some war organization; they are to be used only in cases of "utmost necessity."

Each police station can commandeer as many men as it needs. Among the duties of this auxiliary force the Himmler decree mentions "the barring off of certain districts, searching houses, searching persons in the streets arresting suspects." "These tasks," it says, "demand a high degree of responsibility when Germans are involved and ruthless action when foreigners and prisoners of war are to be dealt with." The police auxiliaries "must feel that they share responsibility for the security of their district, which of course they know better than others." As a reward for service they receive decorations and commendations—and money. For bringing back an escaped war prisoner, for example, an auxiliary policeman is paid a hundred marks, "not subject to income tax."

"All German men must be available in case of utter need," says the Himmler decree. The question is, what sort of utter need is meant? The official text says only that it is necessary to fill out the ranks of the regular police because "its active members and reserves have been sent in increasing numbers to the front or into the occupied countries." That is undoubtedly a too ingenuous explanation: millions are not needed to replace a few ten thousands. On the other hand, to say that Himmler is preparing new police forces for the event of a revolution is too dramatic: no one thinking of forestalling a revolution would arm and train all men. The real reason seems to be the twelve to fifteen million war prisoners and foreign workers now scattered in hundreds of thousands of places of employment throughout the Reich, in towns and in the country. It is becoming more and more clear that these represent a gigantic enemy army which could be a great danger in a critical situation. Hence the necessity of forming an auxiliary police which can claim to be the largest police organization of all times and countries.

BOOKS and the ARTS

A Carriage from Sweden

They say there is a sweeter air where it was made, than we have here;
a Hamlet's castle atmosphere.
At all events there is in Brooklyn something that makes me feel at home.

No one may see this put-away museum-piece, this country cart that inner happiness made art; and yet, in this city of freckled integrity it is a vein of resined straightness from north-wind hardened Sweden's once-opposed-tocompromise archipelago of rocks. Washington and Gustavus Adolphus, forgive our decay.

Seats, dashboard and sides of smooth gourdrind texture, a flowered step, swandart brake, and swirling crustaceantailed equine amphibious creatures that garnish the axle-tree! What a fine thing! What unannoying romance! And how beautiful, she with the natural stoop of the snowy egret, gray-eyed and straight-haired, for whom it should come to the door,— of whom it reminds me. The split pine fair hair, steady gannet-clear eyes and the pine-needled-path deerswift step; that is Sweden—land of the free and the soil for a spruce-tree—vertical though a seedling—all needles: from a green trunk, green shelf on shelf fanning out by itself. The deft white-stockinged dance in thick-soled shoes! Denmark's sanctuaried Jews!

The puzzle-jugs and hand-spun rugs, the root-legged kracken shaped like dogs, the hanging buttons and the frogs that edge the Sunday jackets! Sweden, you have a runner called the Deer, who when he's won a race, likes to run more; you have the sun-bright gableends due east and west, the table spread as for a banquet; and the putin twin vest-pleats with a fish-fin effect when you need none. Sweden, what makes the people dress that way and those who see you wish to stay? The runner, not too tired to run more at the end of the race? And that cart, dolphin-graceful? A Dalgrén lighthouse, self-lit? responsive and responsible. I understand; it's not pine-needle-paths that give spring when they're run on, it's a Sweden of moated white castles,—the bed of flowers densely grown in an S meaning Sweden and stalwartness, skill, and a surface that says Made in Sweden; carts are my trade.

MARIANNE MOORE

The DAE

A DICTIONARY OF AMERICAN ENGLISH ON HIS-TORICAL PRINCIPLES. Edited by Sir William A. Craigie and James R. Hulbert. Four Volumes, University of Chicago Press. $100.

THE editors of the "Dictionary of American English," free at last to raise their eyes above endless quotation slips and proof sheets, must feel a decent, sober surprise at the acclaim given to the conclusion of their long, harmless, unpublicized drudgery. They and all who have collaborated with them in any way have reason to take pride in the completion of a great work of cooperative scholarship, and the University of Chicago Press has earned fully the Carey-Thomas award for creative publishing. I, for one, would like to add to the honor roll the unnamed book designer responsible for the format of the DAE-to give it the abbreviation by which it is already known-and the compositor or compositors who set the type on an intricate, exacting assignment. The DAE deserves the applause that it is now receiving; yet when work on it began at Chicago in 1925, almost the only aspect of the enterprise deemed newsworthy was the notion, intimated by the papers, that the senior editor was a foreign fuddy-duddy ill equipped to deal competently with the complexities of the American vocabulary.

Since echoes of that canard are still audible, it is worth recalling that Mr. Craigie was, as he happily still is, the most experienced of living English lexicographers, that he was the first person to urge the necessity and to formulate the plan of such a dictionary, and that he brought to the new task an incomparable knowledge of dictionary-making.

The first fascicle of the DAE I reviewed in The Nation in 1936 with the ebullient enthusiasm of a confirmed dictionary-reader. Almost a year later, on the publication of the second fascicle, I reiterated the praise but I also expressed some regret at certain features of the dictionary—the omission, except in special cases, of any indication of pronunciation and etymology, and the too rigorous exclusion of encyclopedic matter. I might have demurred, also, at the refusal to include any words that had not been "booked" by the year 1901. Surveying now the complete work, and recalling many hours of browsing in it as it was issued part by part, I can repeat the praise without reservation and have learned to tolerate comfortably its few sins of omission.

Yet it is not an easy work to use. The plan of the DAE is quite different from that of any other dictionary in the English language, and the reader who consults it uninformed of its special character may readily be baffled or disappointed. It is not, as its title seems to indicate, a dictionary of the English language in America. Such a dictionary would be bulky, expensive, and not especially useful, for it would to a great extent be a duplication of existing works, and what was novel in it would be pretty well lost under masses of familiar material. Nor is the DAE a glossary of Americanisms. It lacks, too, all those features that make the ordinary American dictionary a hybrid of lexicon and encyclopedia, amazingly versatile as a household reference book, but often considerably short of perfection as a guide to the ways in which words are actually used.

These, however, are not the only or the most radical departures from ordinary lexicographical method. All orthodox dictionaries comprehend, with greater or less attention to detail, the central vocabulary of the language and extend thence in various directions according to their scope. This inclusiveness gives a dictionary a certain familiar coherence; the word sought is almost sure to be there, and the particular usage indicated with more or less precision.

This familiar coherence is not to be found in the DAE. It is not so much an independent work as a gigantic supplement to other dictionaries, especially to its parent work, the "Oxford English Dictionary." Its choice of words and exhibition of significances are selective, the purpose being to register with great fulness the distinctive features of American English and to ignore so far as possible those other features that do not differentiate it from the English spoken elsewhere. Accordingly, the vocabulary of the DAE includes only "words and phrases which are clearly or apparently of American origin, or have greater currency here than elsewhere, but also every word denoting something which has a real connection with the development of the country and the history of the people." This rule, however, is construed to cover words that have acquired new applications in the United States. Some of these applications are so subtle that they hardly lend themselves to direct explanation or definition but have to be suggested by abundant quotations. Further restrictions were also imposed: slang and dialect terms are included only if they have found their way into the main currents of American writing, and no term has been included for which printed authority does not exist before 1901, although often the record of quotations is carried down almost to the present. The result of all this is that the reader is frequently at a loss to know whether he is likely to find what he wants in the DAE; the particular term or significance may be there or it may not, and not always is it possible to determine the status of an omission—it may be out of bounds, it may be an oversight, or it may have been excluded on insufficient grounds. The game of discovering omissions will go on for many years. The editors themselves are already playing it and will welcome the participation of others.

This difficulty is inherent in the DAE and could not have been avoided by either restriction or extension of scope. The user will always feel some uncertainty about what he will find. Usually he will find abundance.

Physically, the "Dictionary of American English" exists in 2,500 copies consisting each of four large quarto volumes and is not likely to be reprinted for years to come. Of these, 450 have been shipped to England, where they are certainly needed in the cause of international understanding. Some fifty others, let us say, will disappear in one way or another, some of them to reappear in mint condition for the use of a later generation. That leaves a scant 2,000 copies, most of them in university or research libraries, to exercise what influence they may on the linguistic consciousness of the American people. What may we expect?

Probably there can be no satisfactory answer to that question. Although we are a nation of dictionary owners, we are not a dictionary-reading people, and the DAE can affect only those who will read it systematically, not necessarily from A to Z, but with a certain persistence and continuity. It is not a book to be flipped open with the aid of a thumbindex, searched hastily for the proper head word, and then returned to the shelf when the tidbit of information for immediate use has been located. Of course, it can serve that purpose too, but it is made to be read with leisure and meditation, and the reader should have in his head both the map of his country and its history. Then the DAE comes to life and becomes one of the most memorable of American books. The great feature of the work is its host of dated quotations, many of them full, and an astonishing proportion of them quick with the life of an expanding and developing nation. According to my own rough calculation, there are between 170,000 and 175,000 of them in the 2,528 pages of dictionary matter. One might object, like Mark Twain's miner friend, that the dictionary, while interesting in the main, is much too various for comfortable reading. I have not found it so. A magnificent scholarly lexicon, it is also an inexhaustible anthology of American life; and although it does not represent that life with completeness-apparently the editors found little to quote from American philosophers, theologians, scholars, and pure scientists, omitting Jonathan Edwards, Abraham Lincoln, and William James altogether, and preferring Walt Whitman the journalist to Walt Whitman the poet-it mirrors that life as perhaps only one other work does. The reader, as I have said, may not find what he is looking for in the DAE, but like Columbus he will find America. GEORGE GENZMER

Progressive Liberal Education

VITALIZING LIBERAL EDUCATION: A STUDY OF THE LIBERAL ARTS PROGRAM. By Algo D. Henderson. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

If EVER there was a time when education was considered just right, history has left no record of it. From Plato's "Laches" to Dewey's "Democracy and Education" every important discussion of education has taken a critical attitude toward existing practices. This is as it should be; even reformers, when they are intelligent, become the critics of their own reforms. The history of education, wisely approached, should make us skeptical of any scheme that pretends to lay down the right education for all men at all times in all cultures, and of any tract on education described as the book to end all further books on the subject.

This book by Mr. Henderson, president of Antioch College, is emphatically free of all such pretensions. Taking American democratic society as its point of departure, it proposes to reorganize the liberal-arts program in order to turn out intelligent individuals, aware of the forces shaping the modern world and equipped with the knowledge and skills required to make existing society a better democracy. Mr. Henderson is convinced that this can be done without forcing the personalities of students into one mold or indoctrinating them with philosophical and social dogmas. He believes that it is a primary function of the liberal-arts college to awaken the critical sense in students and to nurture it to a point where, no matter what specific programs and loyalties they support, their basic allegiance will be to the authority of rational, scientific method. Properly conceived and administered, such a liberal-arts program will produce not thinking machines and social technicians but mature persons whose inner resources will give them both the strength and the means to refresh their minds in the thick of struggle.

What makes this book distinctive is its uncommon sense in a field marked by wild and strident claims. It is a modest but effective statement, against a broad background of educational experience, of one variant of the progressive educational philosophy. It is not a reply to the neo-Thomists but a positive formulation of the assumptions, objectives, and modes of operation of the experimental philosophy of liberal education. Its chief weaknesses are a failure to sink its philosophical foundations deep enough and a rather confusing organization of material which runs together discussion of first principles with the minutiae of administative detail. But it is eminently worth reading as a presentation of what may be called the modern point of view in education.

That point of view is reflected in the author's conception of the objectives of a liberal education today, the orientation of its curriculum, and the methods by which teaching and learning are to be carried on. These conceptions raise a whole cluster of problems. One of them is at present the subject of hot debate. I refer to Mr. Henderson's frank proposal that "the curriculum in liberal education should be focused around the study of vital problems of society." Such a position usually encounters the retort that this restricts education to a narrow absorption in the evanescent affairs of the moment and ignores the great classical tradition which is the support of the well-furnished mind. Mr. Henderson meets these and similar criticisms with admirable directness, albeit a little too briefly. Contemporary problems are the point of departure for study, but no important problem can be adequately grasped without exploring the causal and ideational lines that radiate from it into the past. Nothing is more contemporary than present-day totalitarianism. Can its nature be understood without a social and economic analysis of capitalist society? Can we come to grips with its rationalizations and achieve clarity in our own minds without detailed study of the ideas of men like Nietzsche, Hegel, Rousseau, Locke, Hobbes, Aquinas, Aristotle, and Plato, as well as the principles contained in the papal encyclicals of the last few centuries? What subject can bring home more forcibly the importance of sound ideas on biology and the logic of evidence? It is the great problems of the present, and they alone, which provide a focus of relevance to which to relate the study of the past. Otherwise how determine in an intelligent way at what point in the past to begin, what to include out of its inexhaustible materials, and what contributions to stress?

Those who would exclude concern with the major cultural problems of our time or subordinate them to the study of the past are, in effect, saying that the social and political problems of Graeco-Roman and medieval culture, out of which many of the great classics were born, are worth studying but not our own. It would be hard to justify this except on the assumption that the true answers to our problems can best be found by assaying the heritage of antiquity and the Middle Ages.

This assumption is made almost explicitly by the powerful neo-Thomist opposition to centering the liberal-arts curriculum around contemporary cultural problems. It believes that the classic tradition should be made focal in college studies because it is a great storehouse of truth which provides answers to the perennial problems of human life and destiny. Grant for a moment that there are perennial problems and even truths, why cannot they emerge from a consideration of the important issues of our age? What is eternally true must be true at any time. Even if the whole of this opposition's dubious metaphysics and still more dubious theology were sound, it could be shown that its educational program is pedagogically unsound. For whatever the alleged advantages of a curriculum organized around the materials of the past, they can be won also by intelligent study of modern culture. The enormous differential gain in this latter approach is that the knowledge and values which emerge from inquiries into the massive and dramatic problems of our time have a definite relevance to the perennial. task of making life better here and now.

On the other hand, if we assume that we already are in possession of eternal truths discovered by the past and that we need only apply them to the present, we are likely to overlook what is distinctive in our own times. The natural bias would be to discount evidence showing that the propositions believed eternally true are actually false or have only a limited historical validity. The creative sterility of modern adherents of great systems of past thought is in part due to their failure to dip into the fresh seas of contemporary experience to test and amplify their stock of "eternal" truths. Further, the whole notion that the past is to be ransacked only to discover the "truths" it can bequeath to the present is parochial. Its more fruitful use, as in literature and art, where the past is not relevant to programs of action. is the ever-present occasion it offers for the enlargement of meanings and the cultivation of the imagination. Mr. Henderson's liberal-arts program makes ample provision for

As a matter of fact, those who glorify the past usually do so from a standpoint which not only has a contemporary impact but grows out of a social position and interest of which they are not always aware. The signficance of the past is not a physical object like the shards recovered from an excavation site. It must be interpreted. And since it has many interpretations, there are as many "pasts" as there are significances that can be drawn from a never-ending series of "presents." Often the genuine issue between the protagonists of classical or modern emphasis in curricular studies is a radical difference in contemporary outlook and program. The past is used as a weapon in a present struggle over a present issue which should be frankly brought into the light. The real point of the attack on progressive education is an attack on secular education. And this attack is part of a much larger campaign against the ideals of a secular culture free of controls by dogmatic theology or political religions. Here, then, is one of the basic issues in modern education, one which will not be resolved in the schools but in the wider area of social and political life. SIDNEY HOOK

Land of the Louche

NOW I LAY ME DOWN TO SLEEP. By Ludwig Bemelmans. The Viking Press. $2.50.

OME years ago Ludwig Bemelmans published a short story in which he described how he crossed the Atlantic in one of the Normandie's glittering suites de grand luxe. "I think the tips on that voyage," he wrote, "amounted to more than the whole price of the voyage. I never enjoyed such service."

On the return trip, however, Bemelmans wanted "to experience how a man feels who has no money, or very little, and who has to live in the third class." There, to his surprise, he found that "a glass of vin ordinaire is good, the cuisine bourgeoise excellent." But he did not like "the vibration and the pitching," neither the child who ate himself sick on ice cream, nor the man at his table whose name was Ginsberg and had dirty fingernails.

Mr. Bemelmans's first novel suggests that he has taken good care to stay on the upper deck ever since. "Now I Lay Me Down to Sleep" is the funniest book I have read in recent years. It also contains many passages of superb writing. Bemelmans doesn't seem to know what a literary cliché is. Parts of his book have behind them the quality and the mentality of the late Ronald Firbank—but of a less precious, more prolific Firbank, whose day begins before lunch and whose evenings are spent in the demi-rather than the beaumonde. Most writers could profit from a study of Bemelmans's prose. Henry Miller, for example, with his passion for the unprintable, could take a lesson in subtlety from the following paragraph:

Mrs. Bosch whispered to the steward to go and see what the guest wanted, but the ardent steward, breathing heavily, pressed her against the wall again, and in two brief short words offered to do for the General what he had so successfully accomplished with Mrs. Bosch herself the night before.

General Leonidas Erosa—not a General at all, of course is a seventy-year-old, fabulously wealthy South American, whose chest looks "like a sofa ripped open," and who owns two fantastic homes—one an Art Nouveau Schlors in Ecuador, the other a vast villa in Biarritz, from which, when Europe begins to look unhealthy, he sets out-via Casablanca and New York-to South America, accompanied by his most peculiar retinue. For like most rich and lonely men, the General is surrounded not by friends, but servants, some of whom are crooks who rob him right and left-a practice of which the General approves-and one of whom, his Indian gardener, tries to suffocate his master after that man has lashed him across the face with a whip. This is the only occasion on which the General, who suffers from epileptic fits, resorts to violence. For the remainder of three hundred pages he is a funny, pathetic, wise, not ungenerous character, who spends his alcoholic, not so very unhappy days in the louche world of Ritz hotels, sumptuous suites of ships, superb food, his evenings in expensive boites, and his nights with other men's wives and Indian girls whom he discards -for that seems to be the custom in Ecuador-when they are pregnant. And he dies, not without dignity and courage, trapped by an earthquake in his own swimming pool.

This story is said to be an allegory. An allegory of what? Its publishers describe it as "a lamp hung out in the darkness of our time, to cheer us on our way." Where to?

True, we are cheered while we read it, but when we have laid it down, to sleep, we dream of our way lined with waiters holding out to us ice-cold magnums of Roederer Brut, and some of us, who have no money, or very little, cannot afford, are not at all sure that we even want, to enjoy such service.

JAMES STERN

Guides to India

INTRODUCTION TO INDIA. By F. R. Moraes and Robert Stimson. Oxford University Press. $2.

REPORT ON INDIA. By T. A. Raman. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

During this war Americans discovered Europe. During this war they are discovering Asia, and thousands of American and British troops in India, along with many more thousands of their relatives and friends at home, have overnight become concerned with that ancient land. The result has been to break down national and cultural insularities—which in turn creates problems of inter-group relationships. The success of any new world order will depend to a great extent upon our ability to ease now the meeting of peoples and cultures. Sympathetic guides are essential.

The first of the two volumes under review was written, by an Indian and an Englishman, with a specific end in mind, that of providing British and American troops now in India with a "quick and balanced" survey of the country; and they have produced an excellent book that can be read with pleasure and profit not only by foreign soldiers now stationed in India but by everyone interested in and unfamiliar with the Indian scene. This is the briefest and best introduction to India in the English language that I have seen.

The authors provide thumb-nail sketches of the land and the races that inhabit it, of life in rural India, of the birds, beasts, and plants that make India a poet's paradise. Their account of the nationalist movement is all too brief, but it is balanced and clear. And finally there is a most useful section, entitled "Classified Information," which covers, dictionary-wise, subjects ranging from Gandhi and the Maharajahs to the joint family system and prohibition.

Mr. Raman's "Report on India" is a competent and lucid piece of journalism. It too is designed to serve as an introduction to India. It includes generous information on such subjects as Indian history, Indo-British relations, nationalist aspirations, cows and caste, and India's rapid and astounding industrialization. It has useful maps, an appendix, a bibliography, and an index.

But the raison d'être of Mr. Raman's book appears when he comes to discuss India and the war, the Cripps mission and its aftermath, and political parties and personalities. Nationalists are not likely to agree with Mr. Raman's interpretations. And though some Indians might support his views, his book is bound to be regarded, among students of India, as a brilliant presentation of the British case. That the brief comes from an Indian makes it all the more effective as support for the current British argument.

The villain of Mr. Raman's piece is Mahatma Gandhi and its hero is L. S. Amery, Secretary of State for India. On page 183, for instance, Mr. Raman writes as follows: "The present writer believes that Gandhi . . . deliberately pitched the demand so high and maneuvered leaders like Nehru behind it in order to make a settlement during the war impossible, a settlement which, perforce, has to be on the basis of wholehearted support of the war." Mr. Raman is entitled to his opinions, but I am afraid that a vast majority of his countrymen will not share his views.

KRISHNALAL SHRIDHARANI

MOTION PICTURE

20th Century-Fox presents ALFRED HITCHCOCK'S

by JOHN STEINBECK

Tallulah Bankhead with WILLIAM BENDIX ntinuous Performances ASTOR B'WAY at 45th ST.

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD presents BOBBY CLARK in

SONGS BY COLE PORTER
WINTER GARDEN, B'way & 50th St. Mats. Wed. & Sat

"A definite hit . . . gay, glib, daffy — enormously funny."

---Morehouse. Sun

RUTH GORDON

IN THE NEW COMEDY HIT TWENTY-ONE

Limited Engagement NOW thru APRIL 8

"At $2.20 top price it's the season's Most happy bargain."-Nichols, Times.

CHERYL CRAWFORD presents BESS GERSHWIN'S

ALEXANDER SMALLENS, Conducto CITY CENTER, Mayor LaGuardia, Pres., 131 W. 55th St. Sun. 8:30: 85c-$2.20; Mats. Sat. & Sun. 2:30: 55c-$1.65. No morn. Perf 20th CENTURY FOX

Presents

Darryl F. Zanuck's

A Drama of the Bombing of Tokyo

Directed by Lewis Milestone

"Cinematically tense and disciplined, emotionally painful, enraging, inspiring." - Time.

Plus . Sensational In-Person Show

COUNT BASIE

CAROL BRUCE

ZERO MOSTEL

Now

7th Ave at 50th Street

"A rare, rich and rewarding picture."—Archer Winsten, N. Y. Post.

GINGER ROGERS, RAY MILLAND, WARNER BAXTER, JON HALL with MISCHA AUER

In Person-THE RHUMBA KING

XAVIER CUGAT and His Orchestra WALTER "DARE" WAHL - DEAN MURPHY PARAMOUNT . TIMES SQUARE

BURLINGAME

TILMS

THIS week I want briefly to mention several films which should have been reviewed sooner.

The Army Orientation film "The Negro Soldier" is straight and decent as far as it goes, and means a good deal, I gather, to most of the Negro soldiers who have seen it. It is also pitifully, painfully mild; but neither the film nor those who actually made it should be criticized for that. The mildness is, rather, a cruel measure of the utmost that the War Department dares or is willing to have said on the subject. The same mildness makes the film amenable to very broad public distribution, without wholly obviating its almost certain good effect upon a massive white audience which needs to be reached and influenced, however tamely. Whether tougher treatments ever get to the screen depends, in part, on how many people see this one. And that may largely depend on the efforts of the Negroes and whites whom this particular film is surest to disappoint. For I suspect that most exhibitors are going to need encouragement from the audience, in one form or another, to ask for the film at all-to say nothing of advertising it. And I believe that to many people the screen presentation of the Negro as something other than a clown, a burntcork Job, or a plain imbecile, will be more startling and more instructive than we are likely to imagine.

"The Purple Heart" is Darryl Zanuck beating his Hollywood rivals to the draw with a Japanese atrocity picture. It is a fictional account, much more controlled than it might have been, of the trial and torture of eight American fliers who were captured after the Doolittle raid. Under Lewis Milestone's direction, his best in years, it is unusually edged, well-organized, and solidly acted. But I feel extremely queasy watching fiction-especially persuasive fiction-which pretends to clarify facts that are not clear, and may never become so. Conditioned by such amphibious and ambiguous semi-information, we are still more likely than otherwise to do things to defeated enemies which, both morally and materially, will finally damage us more deeply even than

I feel an even sharper objection to the moment, in "Passage to Marseille," when Humphrey Bogart, on a ship representing France, slaughters the surviving helpless crew of a wrecked plane which represents conquered Germany-Victor Francen is shocked, to be sure; but Bogart is the star, from whom the majority will accordingly accept advice on what to do with Germany. Aside from this scene the picture is regulation Nordhoff and Hall, Warner Brothers, Michael Curtiz fustian about Devil's Island, French fascists, and French patriots—fair-to-dull melodramatic entertainment, needled with political consciousness.

In "The Fighting Seabees" American bulldozers engage in direct combat with Japanese tanks, but this opportunity for a few minutes of wonderful film is almost completely muffed. The Japanese are represented, both verbally and by mannerism, as subhuman. One is caught up screaming in the jaws of a steamshovel; he is shot and dropped. The dramatic intention is apparently one of grim humor but I wonder whom the laugh is on.

"The Sullivans" sketches the life story of the five brothers who were killed at once in the South Pacific. The streets, back-yards, porch-life, and interiors are quite good. The treatment of the human being is limpid, simple, and nearly always unimaginative. The emotional impact, for me, was almost nil, in part because nobody really came to life, in part because the effort to reenact and to exploit these real and vanished lives seemed to me somehow scarcely sane; I wish I knew why.

"No Greater Love," a Russian film about a woman guerrilla leader, has a kind of ferocity and ugliness which none of these American films approach; but I feel less uneasy about it than about them. I think the thing which gives this film a full existence and a full right to it is an earned immediacy and passion which the American films entirely lack. The acting is furious and hyperbolic yet proper to the overall key of frenzy. The photography would be discarded by any Hollywood studio: it is harsh, often crude, always sensitive to time, place, weather, substance, atmosphere, and the presence of life. I would have preferred superimposed printed dialogue to the dramatic-school and Theatre Union sorts of voices which were dubbed in; even if they had been excellent I suspect that their safe, hermetic, reenacted quality would have been inescapable, and would have created a strange and disturbing lesion of one's time sense in seeing and hearing the film. On the screen you see it happening; at the same moment the voices are saying, this happened, and this is roughly how. But dubbing is likely to lift this and future Russian films clear of their pitifully narrow American circuit of a few dozen little "art" theaters, and that is all to the good. People may now get a chance to learn what they, and Hollywood, are cheating each other out of. Ideally, "No Greater Love" should be double-billed, all over the country, with "The North Star."

"The Uninvited," through an adroit counterpointing, syncopating, and cumulation of the natural and the supernatural, turns a mediocre story and a lot of shabby clichés into an unusually good scare-picture. It seems to me harder to get a fright than a laugh, and I experienced thirty-five first-class jolts, not to mention a well-calculated texture of minor frissons.

"Standing Room Only" does pretty well with stale material too—Toryish tropes like the Washington room shortage, feminized husbands, female soldiers, imbecilic bureaucrats, pitiless servants. The lines are utterly insincere and slickly witty, the directing is fairly flip and observant, and some of the performances are fine, especially that of Roland Young, who is able to make anything he appears in seem much more intelligent, human, and amusing than it has any intrinsic right to.

"Lady in the Dark" is something I'm not sure I can talk about fairly, for the whole idea of mixing psychoanalysis and production numbers leaves me irrecoverably cold. Sketching my ideal MGM production of "The Brothers Karamazov" years ago, I cast Fred Astaire as Alyosha (against a more logical MGM choice of Hardie Albright) to make possible a great dancing sequence called Alyosha's Dream, in which Grushenka (Marlene Dietrich) would appear variously as herself, the Virgin, Mary Magdalene, and Father Zossima. Those who would like to see such a sequence done sincerely, the only proper way, may find a good deal to enjoy in "Lady in the Dark." But I like my dreams the hard way.

"Up In Arms," which puts Danny Kaye through a Sam Goldwyn war, ought logically to leave me just as cold, but I enjoyed it. The war is nothing like that fought on land, sea, or even in "The North Star." The Goldwyn Girls look like real live women instead of the customary radio-cap sculptures. There are some pleasant, silly gags by Don Martman of the Crosby-Hope-Lamour Roads-to-everywhere. All that aside, Danny Kaye is the whole show, and everything depends on whether or not you like him. I do.

JAMES AGEE

MUSIC

THE Metropolitan has not accepted the contention that all its performances should be given in English so that the audiences may understand the words that are sung and know what the operas are about; but it has done so for operatic comedies, or rather for some of them—for Puccini's "Gianni Schicchi," Mozart's "Magic Flute," and now Verdi's "Falstaff."

It is true that an audience needs to know what an opera is about. But I question whether this is more true of the comedies than of the tragedies, or of the comedies I have just mentioned than of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and "Don Giovanni" or Rossini's "Barber of Seville." And I doubt that the knowledge is achieved by having the opera sung in English. If the advocates of opera in English were to attend a performance in Berlin or Vienna, where all operas are sung in German, they would see as many people reading librettos as are to be seen in the Metropolitan, and for the same reason—the fact that the words are difficult, and for the most part impossible, to hear and understand: often they have been distended to unintelligibility in the process of being fitted to the music; often they are drowned by the orchestra; and most of the audience are too far from the stage. Having been taken to "Falstaff" by a friend I heard it from an excellent seat in row R of the Parquet; moreover I was listening to a delicately orchestrated work; yet only very few of the words reached my ears, and I would have had no understanding of what was going on if I had had to get it from the words that I could hear. Even when the opera is sung in English, then, one must read the words in advance to know what it is about, precisely as one must for a performance in Italian or German. And if that is so the advance reading should be done for a performance in Italian or German. That is, when the only reason for English turns out to be without force, the force of the reasons against English and for the original language should be deferred to.

For one thing there is the fact—which I was made freshly aware of by the "Falstaff" performance—that when one strains to hear all the words one doesn't hear the music; and the music is the point of the whole business. One doesn't go to the Metropolitan for the play of "Norma" or "Aida" or "Salome" or "Tristan" or even "Falstaff"; one doesn't go for the words that Verdi ordered from his librettist by the pound or the ones that Wagner himself perpetrated. One goes for the music about that play, the music that is hung on those words, the music that has much the same relation to the action and words as Cézanne's still-life has to the apples and pears which he painted. Since action and words are there one wants to know what they are about, and indeed one has to know for the music itself to have its full significance and effect; but the following of the drama should be such as not to distract one's attention from the music-which is to say that it should be a recognition of what one already knows, not a straining to discover what one doesn't know.

Then there is the fact that a performance in English sacrifices the effect of the sound of the original language; and the loss is greatest where the greatest gain is claimed for English-in comedy. Even in the long stretches where words cannot be heard clearly enough to be understood the loss of the mere sound of the Italian syllables is like the loss of an instrumental color in the orchestral part. But the argument for English is concerned with the places where the words come through clearly, and where, it is contended, the audience must understand them so that it may get the humorous points and laugh. But these are salient places which are planned for laughs; and because of the way they are contrived they are places which remain in the mind of anyone who reads the libretto, so that he recognizes and understands Dame Quickly's unctuous Revere-e-e-e-nza! as she curtsies, her repeated exclamation Po-o-overa donna!, her Siete un gran seduttore! as she pokes Falstaff in the ribs, and in addition he gets from these Italian statements something that is lost in Oh most bonored sir! or Unhappy lady! or You're a wicked seducer! He understands Falstaff's argument with Ford over precedence at the end of the act, and enjoys the additional effect, with the delightful music, of the words Prima voi . . . Prima voi and Passate . . . Prego.

And finally there is what the decision to use English cost this particular Metropolitan production of "Falstaff" in effectiveness, on top of the losses due to other things. Beecham, giving his own explanation why the work is not more of a box-office attraction, thinks that the six scenes are too many "for the thin shape and light weight of the piece; and the ensemble movements, until the very close when it is too late, have not the time to gather momentum and thrill the ear with that irresistible flood of tone that we have in the great finales of 'Aida' and 'Otello'''; and he observes that while "Falstaff" has exquisite and haunting fragments of melody it has "no tunes of a broad and impressive character . . . of the type of Ritorno vincitor or Ora per sempre addio [which] might have saved the situation." But whenever I have heard the work conducted by Toscanini every one of those six scenes has ended in a storm of applause; and the reason has been its mercurial swiftness and lightness and effortlessness even in the difficult double ensembles. Initially these qualities have represented Toscanini's feeling for the pace and character of the work; but after that they have come out of the hours and hours of rehearsal, the sheer hard work that is necessary to produce the appearance of ease. Beecham's performance also had lightness and exquisite contours and textures; but his pace was often a little deliberate; and the normal Metropolitan conditions of insufficient rehearsal resulted in raggedness and strain in some of the ensembles. But in addition the decision to use English-speaking singers in an English production compelled the use of young singers, most of them-Steber, Greer, Browning, Kullman-quite acceptable, but one of them, Margaret Harshaw, without the weight of voice (to say nothing of weight of body) for Dame Quickly. And above all it hung a dead weight on the performance in the Fal-B. H. HAGGIN staff of Tibbett.

CONTRIBUTORS

WILLARD SHELTON is an editorial writer for the Chicago Sun. He formerly conducted the editorial page of the St. Louis Star-Times.

DONALD W. MITCHELL, professor of political economy at Sam Houston State Teachers College, Texas, is writing a history of the United States Navy since 1883, to be published by Knopf.

JULES MOCH was a Socialist deputy and minister in pre-war France. After the capitulation he was active in the underground movement until forced to flee the country. He then became a commander in the Fighting French Navy, and is now a member of the Consultative Assembly.

MARIANNE MOORE, formerly an editor of the Dial, is the author of "What Are Years."

Letters to the Editors

In Defense of Vansittart

Dear Sirs: The time has come for somebody in this country to say a word or two in defense of Lord Vansittart. No other political figure on our side is being so constantly misquoted and misrepresented in so lighthearted and highhanded a manner.

In his article "Germany, Economic Heart of Europe" (The Nation, February 12) Fritz Sternberg speaks of "shelves of books and hundreds of articles" which, he says, have been produced in Britain and the United States during the past year, "recommending the dismemberment of Germany proper." To prove that this is the only possible course, goes on Mr. Sternberg, "it is explained that the Germans are by nature aggressive." Without at this time entering "upon a discussion of the German character," Mr. Sternberg would "merely remind the Vansittarts high and low that the Russians . . . do not demand that Germany be dismem-

It may be that, by referring to Lord Vansittart in the plural, Mr. Sternberg means to accomplish what others achieve by alluding to "Vansittartism," rather than to the individual in question. When told that none of the "recommendations" attributed to "Vansittartism" have been made by Vansittart, they are apt to point out that any similarity between the noun and the name is almost purely accidental. Be that as it may, I should like to call Mr. Sternberg's attention to two facts: (1) Lord Vansittart-high or low-has never recommended the dismemberment of Germany proper; (2) nor has he ever accused the Germans of being "aggressive by nature.

All Vansittart has recommended, and keeps recommending, is that the early emergence after Hitler's fall of a peaceable, democratic, and trustworthy Germany be not taken for granted. To quote from an interview he gave me in the fall of 1941: "The peaceful and civilized elements which undoubtedly exist and always existed in Germany... are not, and never have been, capable of exercising any moderating influence. To rely on them, and again stake the fate of humanity on their ability suddenly to acquire such influence, would be suicidal."

That is about as far as his "recommendations" go, even today. Germany, he maintains, must be rendered harmless. "Unilateral disarmament," as postulated in the Atlantic Charter, must be carried out to the letter. This necessitates Allied supervision for some time to come of Germany's industrial output, its foreign trade, its educational system. The Prussian spirit must disappear from the German schools and universities. "We must do everything in our power to bring about in Germany that change of heart without which no peace could ever last."

As to the political future of the Reich, Vansittart has not advanced any specific plan. He has, however, taken pains to show that the Germans are aggressive, not "by nature" (he is no racist, Mr. Sternberg!), but by tradition and education. And although both "Black Record" and "Lessons of My Life" contain a number of passages which I find contestable-to put it mildly-his knowledge of at least certain aspects of the German character-a knowledge born of suffering-is undeniable. So is the sincerity of his endeavor to prove by facts the validity of his theories.

No such effort can be detected in the concluding paragraphs of Mr. Sternberg's article, which thus remains inconclusive.

Ninety percent of the German people, he asserts, would be opposed to dismemberment. Why of course they would. They would be equally opposed to the cession of East Prussia to Poland, to unilateral disarmament, in short to each and every measure the United Nations may deem necessary. They are strictly opposed to losing Hitler's war.

'So it is to be hoped," winds up Mr. Sternberg, "that Germany will be allowed to remain undivided in its 1919 boundaries. Only on that condition will the progressive left forces which are capable of setting up a Socialist democracy (italics mine) be able gradually to win the upper hand. Nothing would so injure their growth or so limit their accomplishment as the rise of a new German nationalism, a development which would be greatly accelerated by any dismemberment of Germany." No proof whatever is offered for the contention that any "left progressive forces"whose very survival in strength would have to be proved in the first place—are indeed capable. Despite strong evidence to the contrary, their capability is boldly taken for granted.

I do not know whether dismemberment would be advisable in the interest of a less imperfect peace. Nor could I say whether Mr. Sternberg is right in assuming that Britain and the United States may be toying with the idea, whereas the U.S.S.R. is dead set against it. But I venture to doubt that the German nationalism which, according to Mr. Sternberg, would be so stimulated by dismemberment, is much in need of any such stimulus. It seems alive and kicking-playing havoc with the minds of German Nazis and anti-Nazis, leftists, rightists, and centrists alike. It is not "new," though. It is old.

ERIKA MANN

New York, February 11

Mr. Sternberg Replies

Dear Sirs: In defense of Lord Vansittart Miss Erika Mann writes:

"(1) Lord Vansittart—high or low has never recommended the dismemberment of Germany proper."

I did not accuse him of recommending it. What I said was this: it is on the premise that the Germans are by nature aggressive that the dismemberment of Germany is so often demanded. This fact cannot be denied.

Miss Mann again:

"(2) Nor has he [Lord Vansittart] ever accused the Germans of being 'aggressive by nature' "; on the contrary, 'he has . . . taken pains to show that the Germans are aggressive, not 'by nature' (he is no racist, Mr. Sternberg!), but by tradition and education."

What, actually, does Sir Robert Vansittart say? In the preface to "The Black Record," published by Hamish Hamilton, London, we find on page 4 these words:

Germans have made five wars in the last searchy-five years, besides four 'near misses.' If Germans had had their way, there would have been a war every eight years for the last three-quarters of a century. This sequence is due to their character and system.

Thus Sir Robert Vansittart's view is not, as Miss Mann writes, that Germany's aggressiveness is due to tradition and education, but that it is due to the German character. And as if to make it impossible to misunderstand his position, Sir Robert says on page 6:

March 11, 1944

The atrocities committed under this German regime, and in this German war, and the open return to literal slavery in Europe, are no accidental and ephemeral outcrop. They are a reversion to something much farther back than the Kaiser, or Bismarck, or Frederick, to the doings of a thousand, and two thousand, years ago. . . . I am simply saving that mankind has suffered atrociously from a series of gratuitous wars. These wars have been inflicted on mankind by one race, and mainly for one reason.

I believe that is clear enough.

There is a certain piquancy in the fact that one of the supporters of Vansittart today is Emil Ludwig, who supported German nationalism and imperialism with all his strength during World War I and now demands the dismemberment of Germany

Proofs of the strength of the progressive left forces in Germany, which Miss Mann finds lacking in my article, naturally cannot be exhibited under the rule of the Gestapo. Their strength will show itself in the bloody revolutionary conflicts which will some day break out in Germany and all over Europe. It would be disastrous for the future of the whole European continent if the issues in these world-shaking civil wars should be confused by nationalist and separatist questions—as they undoubtedly will be if Germany is dismembered. On this point Miss Mann characteristically takes no position ("I do not know whether dismemberment would be advisable").

FRITZ STERNBERG

New York, February 21

A Letter of Resignation

Dear Sirs: As my name has been publicly associated with the work of the Emergency Committee to Save the Jewish People of Europe, and I am now resigning from that body, I ask you to publish a copy of my letter of resignation so that my reasons for doing so may be quite clear. I wrote to the national secretary as follows:

"I am writing to tender my resignation from the Emergency Committee to Save the Jewish People of Europe, and to ask you to withdraw my name from the list of members of its executive committee. As you know from our previous correspondence, I have postponed my resignation until I was assured that the Emergency Committee had done the work for which it was created and that further work along those lines was in the hands of those best fitted to carry it out.

THE NEW YORK TIMES BOOK REVIEW, in a Front-Page Review, features

RUSSIA AND THE UNITED STATES

"Gascinating Character-Remarkable Book"

"Prof. Sorokin of Harvard is a fascinating character. Now Sorokin, "bourgeois" enemy of Lenin's proletarian revolution, emerges as a most stalwart defender of Stalin's Russia, which he hopes to see allied with the United States in creating the great peace system of the future."

RUSSIA and the INITED STATES

by PITIRIM A. SOROKIN

Professor of Sociology at Harvard University Author of THE CRISIS OF OUR AGE, etc.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN GOES ON TO SAY:

"Sorokin's latest observations on the crisis of our age are to be found in a remarkable book called 'Russia and the United States,' which for an olympian breadth of view challenges Mortimer Adler's recent 'How to Think About War and Peace."

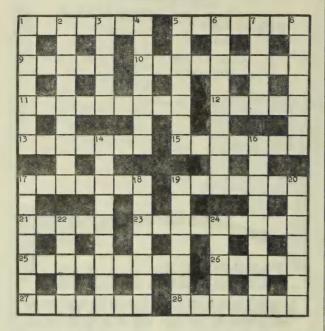

- John Chamberlain, New York Times.

"Sorokin's thesis in heavily documented and it deserves its hearing"

DUTTON & COMPANY 300 FOURTH AVE

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 55

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 What would you take to let a man give you a blow on the head? (two words, 1 and 6)
- 5 Another victory over the Romans would have finished him
- 9 In an elephant or in a wall plant 10 Patients get the needle when doc-tors do this
- 11 Touched in a childish game (two words, 6 and 3)
- 12 One who doesn't mind taking his medicine
- 13 Everybody makes them, but it's mostly chemists who use them
- 15 He of "The Lord is a shoving leopard" fame
- 17 Intends to be different
- 19 "Never ----- her with word too large" (Much Ado About Nothing)
- 21 New England accent
- 23 Loquacious
- 25 I get at one (anag.) 26 Rows in the upper circles, perhaps
- 27 You have probably read his Faerie
- 28 Ted Ray's wandered from the fold

DOWN

- 1 The airman got out of Australia via Torres Strait
- 2 Long drawn out
- 3 Sharper than a mayfly, perhaps

- I They have their work cut out for
- 5 That's the way of it
- 6 Why should it turn? It's the same on every side (hyphen, 5 and 4)
- 7 Human hat-pegs
- Film actress who should be useful in the cutting room
  - 14 A stage urn (anag.)
- 16 Eliza Doolittle's famous retort in Shaw's Pygmalion (suitably edited, of course) (two words, 3 and 6)
- 17 Purposes-of living under canvas? 18 The barometer reading most of us
- prefer (two words, 3 and 4)
- 19 Good ones are said to be found only in Paris
- 20 In evening clothes
- 22 Fish
- 24 A Croat turned Thespian

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 54

ACROSS:-1 PUGILISM; 8 ILLEGAL; 9 LINCHPIN; 10 SILENCE; 12 STEER; 13 EVENER; 14 GIPSY; 15 ALARIC; 17 PAYEE; 22 SPREE; 23 EDITOR; 24 RATIO; 26 GROUCH; 28 RELIC; 29 PHANTOM; 30 SO LITTLE; 31 KNITTED; 32 HERE GOES.

DOWN:-1 POLESTAR: 2 GUNMETAL: 8 LEHAR; SPINET; PLAIN; 6 REVERIE; 7 CARCASS; 10 SEDAN; 11 LEGEND; 16 IMPORT; 18 BEGUM; 19 STILETTO; 20 BRACKETS; 21 WASHING; 22 SIGNETS; M THRONE; 27 OOZED; 28 RHINE.

"When I joined the Emergency Committee it was with the single thought of helping as far as I could to save the European Jews from persecution and death. With the appointment of the War Refugee Board, the work of the Committee seems to have been accomplished. The task of rescuing the Jewish people is now in the competent hands of that board and of Mr. Pehle. The gathering of funds to assist the work of the board can best be accomplished by the United Jewish Appeal, a long-established fund-raising organization which supports three agencies working for the rescue and rehabilitation of the Jews: the Joint Distribution Committee, the United Palestine Committee, and the National Refugee Service. I can therefore see no season for the continuation of the Emergency Committee.

"There is, moreover, a further reason for my feeling that the Emergency Committee can no longer serve the ends for which it was instituted. Its prime movers and most active members are also associated with the League for a Free Palestine, a political organization which I believe to be inimical to the best interests of the Jews established in Palestine and their friends everywhere. I cannot be convinced that the proponents of the league, however good their intentions, will continue to subordinate their concern for the league, which is their long-term and primary objective, to other ends. And I must therefore dissociate myself from this group."

BABETTE DEUTSCH

New York, February 26.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

War and Postwar Adjustment Policies: Text of Official Report and Related Documents. By Bernard M. Baruch and John M. Hancock. American Council on Public Affairs. $2, cloth; $1, paper.

Europe's Children. By Thérèse Bonney. Duell, Sloan and Pearce. $3.

Czechoslovak Sources and Documents: President Benes on War and Peace. Czechoslovak Information Service.

Silly Girl: A Portrait of Personal Remembrance. By Angna Enters. Houghton Mifflin $3.50. Letters from Exile. By Egon Hostovsky. Czechoslovak Information Service.

The Power Industry and the Public Interest: Summary of the Results of a Survey of the Relations Between the Government and the Electric Power Industry. The Factual Findings Edited by Edward Eyre Hunt; The Program of The Power Committee. Twentieth Century Fund. $2.

First Fleet: The Story of the U. S. Coast Guard at War. By Reg Ingraham. Bobbs-

Merrill. $3.

THE Vation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 158

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MARCH 18, 1944

NUMBER 12

IN THIS ISSU	E
--------------	---	--

THE SHAPE OF THINGS	32
EDITORIALS
A Revolting Necessity	32
Postwar Education	32
A Crisis of Confidence by Freda Kirchwey	32
ARTICLES
Palestine Run-Around by I. F. Stone	32
50 Years Ago in The Nation	32
Hymn to Free Enterprise by J. D. K.	32
China in Distress by Maxwell S. Stewart	33
In the Wind	33
POLITICAL WAR
Does Europe Need Germany? by Louis Fischer	33
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus	33
BOOKS AND THE ARTS
Lonigan, Lonergan, and New York's Finest
by James T. Farrell	33
The Balkans by M. W. Fodor	33
What Is Faith? by Jacques Barzun	33
The War: GHQ and GI by Marcus Duffield	34
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling	34
In Brief	34
Films by James Agee	34
Music by B. H. Haggin	34
LETTERS TO THE EDITORS .	34
CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 56 by Jack Barrett	34

Editor and Publisher FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor Literary Editor
I. F. STONE MARGARET MARSHALL

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Associate Editors

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor
J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic
B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL LOUIS FISCHER JONATHAN DANIELS
REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U.S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 55 Fifth Ave., New York 3, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

A SPECIAL MILITARY COURT AT ALGIERS HAS convicted Pierre Pucheu, former Minister of Industrial Production in the Vichy cabinet, of treasonable collusion with the enemy, and sentenced him to die. His defense was that the Vichy government was generally recognized as the legal government of France at the time he joined it. He also tried to prove that, while outwardly collaborating with the Nazis, he had secretly worked against them. A prudent man, Pucheu probably did try to hedge his bets; an intelligent man, he realized before some of his colleagues that Hitler was going to lose and attempted to transfer his investment to the winning side. The judges, however, were unimpressed by his belated conversion, and it is believed unlikely that the higher court to which he has appealed will set aside their verdict. We intend at an early date to publish an extended comment on this historic trial, and if possible a first-hand report of it.

MR. DE VALERA HAS INVESTED SO MUCH OF his political capital in uncompromising independence and unbending neutrality that his blank refusal of the United States' request to close the German and Japanese consulates in Dublin was only to be expected. But that is not likely to end the matter. With Anglo-American preparations for invasion of the Continent moving toward their climax, with Northern Ireland a major American base, the threat to security of Axis spies operating in Eire is too great to be ignored. It is all very well for Mr. De Valera to argue that his government has taken every precaution. The ten enemy agents he has jailed are probably only a small proportion of those at large and not a few unreconstructed Irish rebels are ready to lend them a hand. It is not surprising that, unable to obtain cooperation from Dublin, the Anglo-American High Command in Britain should have insisted on closing the border between Eire and Ulster and on the strictest supervision of traffic across the Irish Sea. Such measures will have detrimental effects on Irish economy and may be protested as unfair pressure tactics but with so many lives at stake we imagine public opinion in this country will not be critical. Our government, however, would be in a stronger position if it addressed Franco with equal firmness, asking him to clear all Germans out of Spain. Nazis in La Linea, only five minutes from Gibraltar, Nazis in Tangier and Spanish Morocco are no less dangerous to our cause than those in Ireland.

X

CHRONIC DISCONTENT IN BRITAIN'S COAL industry, boiling over in one of the worst strikes of the war, has caused a serious loss of production at a time when supplies are already dangerously low. The men are returning to work, but the settlement of this dispute will not end tension in the coal fields. The immediate cause of the trouble was a recent wage award setting a national weekly minimum for underground workers of $20 and for surface men of $18. These rates represented an advance, although some $2 a week less than the miners' union had demanded. The grievance of the men, however, was not so much with the minimums set as with the fact that there was no commensurate increase in piece rates. Other complaints were of the discontinuation of former bonuses for especially bad working-places and increased deduction for miners' house coal. But beyond such specific issues there was the long-standing belief of the colliers that they are the stepchildren of industry and government. Because of this emotional reaction most of the rank-and-file miners appear to be have overlooked the fact that the new wage award conceded them a national minimum-something for which they had been struggling for years. This will free the union from district negotiations and enable it to raise those problems of national planning which must be faced if the sickness of the British coal industry is to be cured.

*

THE A. F. OF L. HAS DECLARED THAT IT WILL reject the President's proposal to share with the C. I. O. representation at the forthcoming conference of the International Labor Organization at Philadelphia in April. If the C. I. O. is represented, the A. F. of L. threatens to withdraw from the work of the organization altogether and to try to prevent further Congressional appropriation for its support. This amazing stand, coming on the heels of the A. F. of L.'s refusal to attend the world conference of trade unions in June because of the presence of representatives from the Soviet unions, has created a situation in the ranks of labor not dissimilar to that which existed in the political sphere at the end of World War I. Since the conferences are called to consider post-war issues, representation by both American labor groups is important if labor is to exert any real influence on the peace. If the A. F. of L. does not participate, there is grave danger that it will drift into isolationism, opposing all international collaboration. This makes the President's task a delicate one. He must do all that he can to keep the A. F. of L. from making the threatened break; yet he dare not carry his appeasement to the extent of denying the C. I. O. its full rights. Fortunately, there are possibilities for compromise which have not yet been fully explored.

THE LAST HOPE FOR A SOLDIER-VOTE PLAN that would permit any substantial number of service men to cast their ballots in this fall's elections collapsed when two representatives, Rankin of Mississippi and LeCompte of Iowa, blocked a last-minute plan supported by the other conferees to permit all service men not receiving a state ballot by October 1 to cast a federal ballot. Under the scheme finally adopted by conference only men overseas will be eligible for the federal ballot, and because of distance it may be assumed that many of these will be unable to cast their votes. Thus the great controversy has ended, as far as Congress is concerned, in a complete victory for the unholy coalition of Republicans-who fear that the service men will vote Democratic-and Southern Democrats-who fear that Negroes might be permitted to vote. In an obvious effort to muddy the political waters still further, Governor Dewey has come forth with a "model" plan which he claims will make "voting simpler on Kwajalein than for the citizens at home." Under this plan each soldier is asked to send his name, home address, and service address to the Secretary of State of New York, and the state will undertake to provide a ballot. Simple though the plan may appear on paper, experts doubt whether it will lead to any large number of votes. Any plan that depends on the initiative of the individual soldier is dubious since few soldiers are likely to learn of the procedure required by their particular state. Moreover, as Mr. Dewey must be fully aware, the addresses of service men change from week to week, and a large proportion of the ballots are certain to go astray. Mr. Dewey revealed the political inspiration of his plan-and incidentally his own political ambitionswhen he denounced the federal ballot on the ground that it made no provision for state and local offices. Yet the omission of these offices from the ballot proposed by the Green-Lucas bill was in deference to the states' rights interests for which Governor Dewey has become the chief spokesman.

THE COMMUNISTS ARE GETTING CLEVERER than ever in what George Creel in Collier's calls their "War on Cordell Hull." Earl Browder's latest move to ruin the old gentleman is to send a letter to Collier's denying that he ever "participated in any kind of a campaign against Mr. Cordell Hull" and declaring that the Secretary of State—lucky fellow—has Mr. Browder's "support, as well as [his] deep respect and admiration." According to Creel, the war on Hull has hitherto proved unsuccessful, but this subtle move by our gaily inconsistent Communist leader should finish him off. The FBI is notoriously suspicious of federal employees suspected of having visited the Soviet Union, and the Dies committee has waylaid many who were the recipients of less fervent missives from Earl Browder. We fear that Mr. Hull's days in office are numbered. Creel's superficial foray into State Department press agentry rarely rises above the level of attributing the attacks on Hull to a Red plot, embracing not only such notoriously weakminded liberals as the editors of The Nation but even such stalwarts as those of the New York Herald Tribune. In some secret center, according to Mr. Creel, sits Fu Manchu Browder, devising diabolic stratagems, but none more daring or dastardly than this latest honeyed attempt at downright character assassination.

*

REPRESENTATIVE MAY DOUBTLESS FELT THAT he was upholding the honor of the white race when he prevailed upon the War Department not to use the Public Affairs Pamphlet "The Races of Mankind" in its orientation courses. Mr. May's specific objection to the pamphlet appears to have been a reference to the intelligence tests given by the American army in 1917 in which Northern Negroes from certain states made higher median scores than Southern whites from Mississippi, Kentucky, and Arkansas. The pamphlet goes on to explain that these differences "did not arise because people were from the North or the South, or because they were white or black, but because of difference in income, education, cultural advantages, and other opportunities." Since Mr. May does not challenge the accuracy of the test, and can hardly be expected to contend that the poor showing of the Southern whites was due to any innate inferiority in comparison to either Northern whites or Negroes, his position is simply one of trying to keep the truth from our soldiers. In thus forbidding the presentation of scientific facts which utterly refute Nazi and Japanese theories of race superiority, Mr. May, as chairman of the House Military Affairs Committee, is holding off from our soldiers the weapons by which they can defend themselves in the war for men's minds—a war that is even more important in Nazi strategy than the struggle for islands and beachheads.

A Revolting Necessity

BERLIN, subjected to an increasingly heavy battering over a period of months by the R. A. F. night bombers, has now experienced a rapid succession of massive daylight attacks by the American Eighth Air Force. There are signs that the enemy defenses are being smothered and that the Germans are preparing to abandon the city and evacuate the remaining population. If this happens, the Anglo-American air forces will have won a victory the significance of which can hardly be exaggerated. Berlin is of major importance to the German war effort as a center of production, as the hub of the whole transportation system, and as the seat of a highly centralized bureaucracy. The loss in administrative efficiency alone caused by the scattering of government offices is not a factor to be dismissed lightly.

Yet at the moment when Anglo-American air power appears to be approaching its apex of effectiveness, the whole policy of mass strategic bombing is being sharply challenged both here and in Britain. Its military results, it is claimed, cannot justify the appalling suffering that our terrific assult from the skies is inflicting on German noncombatants. This is the gist of the case made in a pamphlet "Massacre by Bombing" written by the well-known English author, Vera Brittain, and published in this country by the Fellowship of Reconciliation with the indorsement of a group of religious leaders and Oswald Garrison Villard.

The pamphlet, which gives a detailed but hardly objective or reliably documented account of the effects of raids on German cities, makes ugly reading. No one with imagination can contemplate the results of a rain of fire and high explosives on crowded streets with any complacency. And in so far as Miss Brittain's protest is directed against the indecent gloating with which the bombings are too often reported, it has our deep sympathy. We can agree, too, in dismissing the argument that the raids are justified as a means of paying back the Germans in their own coin for their murderous attacks on Warsaw, Rotterdam, London, and a host of other cities. As Miss Brittain says: "Retaliation in kind and worse means the reduction of ourselves to the level of our opponents."

Even if we could accept the theory that the total guilt of Germany deserves total punishment, we still have to remember the ten million foreign slaves in the country. They probably furnish an unduly large share of the casualties since they are forced to stay near their work and are often housed on factory premises. Nor can we forget that the bombing of military objectives often brings death to our friends in occupied countries. In this connection, political results sometimes seemed to have been weighed too lightly against military considerations. The heavy bombing of northern Italy last year, at a time when the Italian workers were rising against fascism, is difficult to defend on strategic grounds.

Nevertheless, when all is said, we still cannot accept Miss Brittain's proposition that "nothing less than absolute certainty" that mass bombing will shorten the war justifies its employment as a weapon. To order the kind of warfare we are waging is, indeed, a dreadful responsibility. But who is ready to take the responsibility of ordering its abandonment? "The whole of this air offensive," Mr. Churchill said in his last speech, "constitutes the foundation on which our plans for overseas invasion stand." The outline of our present strategy is not hard to trace. Prior to assaulting Fortress Europe we are endeavoring to knock the Luftwaffe out of the skies and to prevent its reinforcement. Concentrated attacks on German fuel supplies and communications will probably follow. For by these means we can hope to offset the advantages the enemy derives from his defensive preparations. Under any circumstances, the invasion of Europe must be a costly undertaking. Making their way to the shore through acres of minefields, our men will have to storm bitterly contested beaches and a network of concrete fortifications bristling with every deadly weapon. Having established beachheads they must anticipate savage counter-attacks made by a highly mobile enemy, commanding large strategic reserves. Before they tackle these tasks, can we, dare we, neglect any means of reducing the German ability to resist? Quite apart from the lives that would be sacrificed by such a policy, we have to take into consideration what failure will mean in terms of prolonging the war and the agony of millions under the Nazi heel.

Deprived of the weapon of mass bombing our armies might easily be so handicapped that the war would be stalemated. That, perhaps, is what the protesters have in view, for what they are really attacking is not a weapon of war but war as a weapon. But, hating war, the peoples of the United Nations hate the alternative—Nazi domination—still more. And because they do so they will not shrink from "the revolting necessity"— to use the words of Bishop C. Bromley Oxnam—of obliteration bombing of German cities.

Post-War Education

PERSONS who are interested in the probable direction of American educational development after the war would do well to study the report which the New York Board of Regents submitted to the 1944 state legislature some weeks ago. In general, it is an interesting and heartening program. The Board of Regents envisions a very considerable expansion in the state's educational facilities from the kindergarten through college.

Unique from an educational viewpoint is the plan to establish twenty-two new two-year colleges, to be called institutes, to provide technical training for students who, for one reason or another, would not normally attend college. Present plans call for the setting up of such institutes specializing in technical fields like agriculture, aviation, the graphic arts, industrial arts, automotives, science, food occupations, machines and metals, and communications. Plans have also been drawn up for the creation of an Institute of Public Service Training at Albany for the training of state and local government employees, and an Institute of Labor and Industrial Relations at a site yet undetermined.

These institutes will fill an important gap in American public education. Although similar to junior colleges in many respects, they will offer a much more concrete and practical curriculum and thus should attract many students who otherwise would discontinue their education after finishing high school. In addition to providing needed technical courses, these institutes will stress citizenship training and offer a wide range of cultural subjects. It is hoped that through night courses and other special arrangements they can be made available not only to high-school graduates desiring specialized training but to persons of any educational background.

The Regents' plan also calls for a very large expansion in the system of free scholarships for college students. Instead of 750 scholarships worth $100 a year, as at present, 12,000 scholarships will be offered worth $350 a year. The seeming generosity of this proposal is offset, however, by the fact that New York is one of the few states that does not maintain a state university with free tuition for residents. Even if the Regents' proposal is adopted, only one-tenth of the 120,000 boys and girls graduated from the state's high schools each year will be able to obtain free tuition in a regular college at the state's expense. New York's backwardness in this respect is recognized by the Regents, who point out that at present the state's per capita expense for higher education is among the lowest in the country-43 cents as against a national average of $1.15.

The Regents' post-war program is not limited to higher education. A further consolidation of school districts is urged for country areas, and additional state aid is proposed to provide more kindergartens and to develop counseling services and adult education. All these steps are significant because they appear to chart the main channels of post-war educational development. The need for retraining millions of service men and war workers for peace-time occupations will unquestionably lead to a new emphasis on technical and vocational training and adult education throughout the country. The New York program anticipates this need and provides a practical way of meeting it.

The most glaring omission in the Regents' proposals is their failure to provide for the development of a workstudy program that would enable young people of limited financial ability to continue their studies in secondary school and above. Even with the increased scholarships, thousands of superior students will be barred from the benefits of higher education unless special arrangements are made to help them earn their own way. Such program should probably be financed by the federal government rather than the states, as, indeed, the National Resources Planning Board recommended. But in the absence of federal action, the responsibility for this basic step toward providing real equality in educational opportunity obviously rests with the states.

A Crisis of Confidence

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

FOREIGN policy is the chief instrument of political war. This elementary fact has been recognized by our enemies from the day they first tackled the job of expanding fascism from a local racket to a world cartel. The present crisis in foreign policy is, therefore, a war crisis, a crisis in the political war we have been waging so ineptly and so reluctantly ever since we gave up the hope of winning peace through appeasement.

That the crisis is a major one we can guess from the way it is being handled in the Allied press and on the radio. The deep disturbance over our failure to agree with our Allies on a series of crucial issues has spread far out beyond the usual limits. We find staunch defenders of State Department policy joining—though they don't openly admit the union-with critics on the left in demanding a showdown on Italy, on Spain, on the recognition of De Gaulle. They point out that we are losing by default to Russia; that we can make our influence felt on the Continent only if we manage to arrive at a policy which makes sense in the light of actual developments. In Yugoslavia we have been jockeyed into a position where we can neither abandon the government-inexile nor support it. We seem unable to make up our minds on De Gaulle, although the British are supposedly urging a quick decision. By our continued support of Badoglio we are not moderating the feeling of the Italian people toward their unwanted ex-post-fascist government; we are only hardening it against their liberators. Our latest negotiations with Franco are blurred by censorship, though we have been permitted to learn that they are progressing nicely. But even if Franco agrees to withhold every ounce of wolfram from Germany, we shall not have changed an enemy into a friend; we shall merely have convinced the Spanish people all over again that we are either dupes or reactionaries.

These are only a few of the raw materials—very raw, indeed—out of which the crisis has been made. Others lie on the borders of Poland, in Finland, in Germany. Whatever may be the rights of Russia's case in Poland, the conviction has grown fast in this country that we have had nothing whatever to say about it. Mr. Hull offered our good offices to settle the dispute, and Moscow refused them. Apart from this we have acted as troubled onlookers, occasionally mumbling a few words about the desirability of postponing difficult problems till after the war.

The collapse of confidence is of course not the result of any list of failures but rather of the fact, now glaringly apparent, that no genuine understanding was reached in the series of conferences among the Allied leaders. A bridge was built across a wide chasm of suspicion and division of interest. Personal contact, never more important, curiously enough, than in this war of masses and machines, was established after two years of near isolation. But the agreements which alone could have held the bridge in place were not made. Basic issues were either avoided altogether or an agreement was made to disagree —perhaps within certain prescribed geographical and political limits. And meanwhile, as the war gains in intensity, ad hoc solutions are found for the problems the diplomats dodged. Sheer force moves boundaries, sets up or overthrows governments. And the hope of a united policy, of political cooperation between the major allies, seems to fade day by day.

This, then, is the essence of the crisis. People fear, quite reasonably, that if the efforts of Russia, Britain, and the United States cannot be coordinated for the purposes of political warfare, the chance of effective collective action after the war is a slim one.

Now another conference has been called to deal with the problems which have multiplied and developed so much explosive power since the last toast was drunk at Teheran. No one ever dreams that Under Secretary Stettinius will be able to solve them. Alibis are being prepared in advance; several dispatches have already described the coming talks as primarily "exploratory" in character.

I think it should be clear by this time that any single conference, particularly one called in a period of tension, is certain to provide stop-gap remedies, sedatives rather than cures. It may be essential as a preliminary to thoroughgoing treatment but it is not a substitute for such treatment. Mr. Churchill said not long ago, "There would be very few differences between the three great powers if their chief representatives could meet once a month." The Prime Minister should have gone a step further. What is needed is continuous rather than periodic consultation.

For more than two years The Nation has urged the necessity of setting up a permanent United Nations political council, a body which would be charged with the handling of inter-Allied political problems and with the formulation of political strategy. Its members should be policy-making officials of top rank. Its powers in the field of political warfare should be as great as those exercised by the joint military high command, and the work of the two should, of course, be closely coordinated. Not once in a while, or once a month, but every day in the year this body should sit; it should deal with political issues as they arise—not after they reach the point of explosion.

Mr. Stettinius, in the course of his discussions in London, should press the necessity of setting up such a council. No other single job he could do would yield as great benefits, or go as far toward ending the dangerous confusions and conflicts responsible for today's crisis.

Palestine Run-Around

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 10 R. ROOSEVELT'S statement to the National Conference on Palestine won the gratitude of all friends of a Jewish national home. When the President authorized Dr. Stephen S. Wise and Dr. Abba H. Silver "to say that the American government has never given its approval to the White Paper of 1939," he was making more than a platonic gesture. It is too often forgotten, notably in Downing Street, (1) that Palestine is not a British colony but a mandate, (2) that France gave up its claim to Palestine and the League granted the mandate on condition that Britain establish a Jewish national home there, and (3) that this condition is also the basis on which the United States, in a separate treaty with Britain in 1925, accorded American recognition to the Palestine mandate. Article 6 of that treaty, like Article 6 of the League mandate, requires the Administration of Palestine to "facilitate Jewish immigration under suitable conditions" and "encourage . . . close settlement by Jews on the land." The Anglo-American treaty of 1925 provides that there may be no change in its terms "unless such modification shall have been assented to by the United States." The White Paper of 1939, Chamberlain's Middle East Munich pact, provided that Jewish immigration should be shut off entirely after five years "unless the Arabs of Palestine are prepared to acquiesce in it." This was "plainly a breach and repudiation" of Britain's obligations under the mandate and therefore invalid without American approval. The President can summon an august witness on the point, for the man who called the White Paper "plainly a breach and repudiation" was Winston Churchill.

In Washington the effect of the President's statement will be further to confuse those who were prepared to accept in good faith General Marshall's request that Congress shelve the Wagner-Taft-Wright-Compton resolution. The position taken by the Chief of Staff before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee was that passage of the resolution would lead to trouble with the Arabs. The opinion of the Chief of Staff in time of war necessarily carries great weight, and the National Conference on Palestine deferred to it. But if appeasement of the Arabs was necessary for military reasons, how explain the President's statement? It is true that the Wagner-Taft-Wright-Compton resolution would put Congress on record as favoring immigration into Palestine "so that the Jewish people may ultimately reconstitute Palestine as a free and democratic Jewish commonwealth," while the President only promises "full justice . . . to those who seek a Jewish national home." But I doubt whether the difference will be regarded as appeasement by the Arab rulers, especially when they consider that the President's reference to the White Paper opens the door to American diplomatic intervention, whereas the Congressional resolution is little more than a reaffirmation of a similar expression of opinion by Congress in 1922.

The Chief of Staff tells Congress that we dare not express an opinion on Palestine lest we offend the Arabs. The Commander-in-Chief then proceeds to express just such an opinion. Dr. Silver, after seeing the President, is encouraged to hope that military authorities "will soon find it possible, consistent with the realities of the situation, to withdraw their objections." Under the circumstances, it is not hard to understand why so cautious and conservative a man as Senator Taft publicly questions these alleged military reasons and calls for passage of his resolution in spite of them. This whole affair and its background leave one with the distinct impression that the Marshall statement was another example of a makeshift foreign policy cloaked as military expediency, the fruit of subterranean pressures and petty intrigue. I do not question General Marshall's sincerity or good-will. He has his hands full and can hardly be expected independently to investigate advice which comes to him on political matters from State and War Department Near East experts. But I am inclined to think that the Chief of Staff in this Palestinian matter, like Eisenhower on several occasions in French North African affairs, has been the innocent dupe of wilier men.

If the State Department had wanted to take responsibility for opposing the Wagner-Taft-Wright-Compton resolution, it could easily and quietly have prevented the bill's introduction. If military reasons made the measure unwise, a hint to the sponsors would have been enough to stop them. The origin of the resolution goes back to conversations last year between Zionist leaders and the highest officials of the State Department, including Mr. Hull and Mr. Welles. These officials were friendly, and the Zionists were given to understand that it would be helpful to the State Department if Congress reasserted American policy in favor of a Jewish national home in Palestine. In the middle of January, two weeks before the bill was introduced, Rabbi Silver went to see Secretary Hull. Had the Secretary advised him that the resolution was ill-timed, introduction would have been postponed. Mr. Hull said the State Department could take no position on pending legislation but indicated no opposition. This, in the light of the preceding conversations and Mr. Hull's known caginess, was regarded as a hint that the Zionists might go ahead.

There were other ways in which the bill might have been stopped. Senator Wagner, its co-sponsor in the Upper House, is a ranking member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, a devoted and responsible Administration supporter. A hint to him of any military risk would have been enough. Senator Taft, who joined with Wagner in offering the bill, had first written to Secretary Hull to ask whether the State Department had any objections. When Senator Taft received no reply, he took the matter up with his brother, Charles P. Taft, an official of the department. Taft, after discussing the question within the department, reported that there were no objections. The bill was introduced in the House on January 27 and in the Senate on February 1 and warmly supported in both houses by both the majority and the minority leaders. Either Senator Barkley or Representative McCormack could have been warned if military considerations made the bill unwise at this time.

In the House, Representative Sol Bloom, chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, is notoriously subservient to the State Department. Before ordering hearings on the Wagner-Taft-Wright-Compton resolution, he also got into touch with Secretary Hull. While Hull was noncommittal, he was not hostile. Bloom took this as a hint to go ahead. The hearings in the House lasted from February 8 to February 16, and ended with no expression of opposition from State or War Department. The Senate committee held an executive session on February 17 and heard witnesses for and against the bill, again with no opposition from Administration sources. It was not until six days later, on February 23, that a special session was hurriedly summoned by the committee to hear General Marshall and to consider letters from Secretaries Hull and Stimson asking that no action be taken on the resolution at this time. Oddly enough, neither Senator Wagner nor Senator Taft was present at the executive session which heard Marshall, although they were co-sponsors of the bill. Wagner and Taft say they were not informed of the meeting.

There is no reason to believe that the military situation changed in the few weeks between the introduction of the resolution and Marshall's appearance before the committee. Was a change in attitude brought about by protests from Arab countries against passage of the resolution? These did not begin to arrive until March 1, several days after Marshall testified. They give the appearance of a concerted attempt to ride in on the coat-tails of an arranged victory, and one wonders whether they were made before assurances had been obtained through diplomatic channels that they would be welcome. The sequence of events was such as to hand proponents of a Jewish national home a humiliating defeat after they and their Congressional supporters had been given no reason to believe that their efforts were ill-timed or contrary to national interest. The incident was not made less disturbing by the excuses offered in private to Zionist leaders by high State and War Department officials. The State Department blamed the War Department for the change of front. In the War Department it was said that the State Department was responsible and that the War Department wasn't particularly concerned about the measure.

Were the Zionists led into a trap? Or were they the victim of last-minute pressure from the British government? Though Mr. Churchill remains a friend of the Zionist cause, the Colonial Office and the Palestine Administration are generally anti-Zionist and pro-Arab, and intend to enforce the White Paper. Another influence hostile to a Jewish national home is that of Brigadier General Patrick J. Hurley, who returned from the Near East bursting with suspicion of British imperialism and anxious to outbid it for Arab favor in order to further American exploitation of Near East oil. Hurley is an "oil" general, like Gulf's General Walter Pyron, the chief War Department adviser on oil. Still Harry Sinclair's lawyer and Washington Man Friday, Hurley operates in full military panoply out of his corporation law office in Washington, with his press agent commissioned a major. He is one of those who think Arabian oil too important to be left "at the mercy of local conflict," the implication being that the conflict must be ended by liquidating the effort to build a Jewish home in Palestine.

The Near Eastern Division of the State Department is another important factor behind the scenes. It shares the prejudices and antipathies of the Colonial Office. There is the same natural and instinctive orientation to the Arab potentate and large landowner, the same dislike of the Jew. Its leading Arab expert seems to be a Colonel Harold B. Hoskins, who is closely associated with Adolf Berle, another great friend of the Arabs. In his civilian capacity Colonel Hoskins is a New York cotton-goods merchant. He was born in Beirut, the son of American missionaries, and perhaps might best be described politically as a Syrian nationalist. He spent the winter of 1942-43 in the Near East on a special mission of inquiry, whence he returned with the same preconceptions with which he left. I have the alarmist report on "The Present Situation in the Near East" which he circulated confidentially last year among Congressmen he thought might be won to his views. It is anti-French and anti-Jewish, and its section on "People Seen" indicates that though he spoke with many Arabs, Frenchmen, and British colonial officials, he spoke with no Jewish leaders on his trip. The report is almost entirely taken up with arguments against Jewish aspirations in Palestine, seasoned with unfriendly remarks about the Jews of North Africa. It is on men like Hurley and Hoskins that Marshall must necessarily have relied, at least in part, when he advised Congress that it would be unwise to pass the Wagner-Taft-Wright-Compton resolution.

This undercover campaign against a Jewish national home in Palestine is much like the campaign last year to deprive the Jews of French North Africa of their citizenship. All sorts of dire predictions were made of Arab revolt and military difficulties if the Crémieux decree were reinstated. But there was no trouble when the French National Committee put the decree back into effect, restoring French citizenship to the Jews. I wonder to what extent the campaign against the Palestine resolution is due to the same kind of wishful thinking. I note that the March 4 issue of the New York Times, which is strongly anti-Zionist, carried a dispatch from Jerusalem saying that "Palestinian Arab politics at this time present a somewhat confused appearance." The "confusion" seems to be in the eye of the beholder. The correspondent reports that Arab political parties seem to be having trouble trying to "drum up a popular following." He credits this to "a public inertia that may be attributed to the general absorption with the prosperity brought to the Arab peasantry as a result of the huge Allied military expenditures." Palestinian Arabs seem much less aroused than the Near Eastern Division of the State Department.

The fact is, as attested over and over again by official investigations, that the Arabs of Palestine have benefited by Jewish immigration, however that may pain Hitler's friend and would-be Quisling, the Grand Mufti, now in Berlin. In 1920, as Colonel Hoskins shows in his private report, there were 600,000 Arabs in Palestine. In 1942, their number had risen to 1,000,000. That doesn't sound as though the Arabs have suffered from the influx of Jews.

"In our history we have colonized all over the world," Josiah Wedgwood told the House of Commons during the debate over the White Paper in 1939, "but this is the first case in which we have colonized without injuring the native population. One has only to go today to the neighboring countries of Syria or Egypt to see the condition of the fellahin, of the Arab workers of those two countries, and compare it with their position in Palestine, to see how enormously the natives of Palestine have benefited by the immigration of the Jews." That this should arouse the fear and enmity of the Arab politicos and landowners is natural, but their protests ought not to be taken for the voice of the Arab masses. Apparently the President does not intend to do so.

50 Years Ago in "The Nation"

FEARLESS UTTERANCE of the truth has become a lost art with the truckling and time-serving breed of politicians, who are most offensive precisely because they dare not run the risk of offending anybody. If abandoning all political hope is the secret of courage . . , a society ought at once to be formed on that principle for the unlocking of honest men's mouths.—March 1, 1894.

THE COLUMBIA BICYCLE Catalogue for 1894. Describes fully the new line of Columbia Wheels, and is by far the handsomest and most comprehensive ever issued by a bicycle establishment. . . . Its pages are alive with interesting matter pertaining to cycling, and should be read by every intending purchaser of a bicycle. (ADVY.)—March 1, 1894.

THE PASSAGE of the "Greater New York" bill, in accordance with which the voters of the district which it is proposed to convert into the larger city will be given an opportunity to express their opinion on the subject, furnishes an issue of much interest for the approaching campaign. While there is probably considerable sentimental opinion in favor of the proposition, there is also a strong undercurrent of opposition, based upon the fear that the tax rate of New York will be greatly increased if Brooklyn and other outlying communities are added to ours. Brooklyn is at present taxed almost beyond the point of endurance, while our tax rate, owing to the city's enormous wealth, is very low.—March 8, 1894.

"A STANDARD DICTIONARY of the English Language." Prepared under the supervision of Isaac K. Funk, D.D., etc. In two volumes. Vol. I. New York: Funk & Wagnalls Co.... Great prominence is given in the advertisements to claims for this dictionary of an enormous number of words..., although the strenuous effort of the good lexicographer is to keep down his vocabulary. In an ordinary dictionary of reference, 25,000 words comprise all that anybody ever looks out. The rest is obstructive rubbish.—March 8, 1894.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK: . . . Tolstoi, Count Leo. "The Kingdom of God Is Within You." . . . Zola, Emile. "The Experimental Novel, and Other Essays."—March 15, 1894.

THE ABOLITION of Fast Day in Massachusetts . . . is personally a triumph for Ex-Governor Russell, who first, though unsuccessfully, urged it upon the legislature. The day had come to be only a pious mockery, in reality nothing but a general holiday masquerading as a time of fasting and prayer. . . Its abolition will doubtless seem to many timid souls as little less than a plunge into atheism, but it is really in the interest of religion as well of common sense and sound ideas of government.—March 22, 1894.

THE APRIL NUMBER of the North American Review contains: . . . Private History of the "Jumping Frog" Story. By Mark Twain. (ADVT.)—March 29, 1894.

Hymn to Free Enterprise

The Voice of Business

1. Of freedom this and freedom that the drooling leftist

But freedom for Free Enterprise is all that really matters; This freedom was ordained by God, upon it rest all

For man's divinest impulse is to overreach his brothers; And so to this celestial urge we make our offering votive, Behind all human greatness lies the noble Profit Motive.

Chorus of Bankers, Stockbrokers, Executives, and Advertising Men

> Then hail we now Free Enterprise, Extol and give it praise! In it the world's salvation lies. Without it every freedom dies; O glorious Free Enterprise-The Enterprise that PAYS!

Solo: The President of the Manufacturers' Association

2. For victory we're giving all—at scarcely more than cost; But how will victory help us if Free Enterprise be lost? The war's demands for well-laid plans most loyally

But peace is quite a different thing-no planning then is needed;

So, while today the state's controls have stretched us on the

The moment victory comes in sight we want our freedom back!

Chorus

Then hail we now Free Enterprise, Extol and give it praise! In armed revolt we'll all arise If any post-war party tries . To undermine Free Enterprise-The Enterprise that PAYS!

Solo: The President of the Chamber of Commerce

3. At periods when Free Enterprise may not provide employment

We dread the thought of hungry men-it lessens our enjoyment;

The government must then step in, with this considera-

That any public works proposed do not increase taxa-

Depressions, after all, good friends, much as we may deplore them,

Are acts of God. Who ever heard of blaming business for them?

Chorus

Then hail we now Free Enterprise, Extol and give it praise! Of course, when profits shrink in size To lay men off is only wise; We dearly love Free Enterprise, But only when it PAYS.

Solo: The President of the Bankers' Association

4. We face today a dreadful threat from fools who would destroy us,

Of "Socialized Security" they prate in accents joyous; Security? Its cost alone would drive us to perdition, Besides, it kills initiative and dries up all ambition; Security breaks down the will, the urge that keeps men

It stifles effort, starves the soul-except in men like me.

Then hail we now Free Enterprise, Extol and give it praise! While Wagner, Beveridge theorize, Their deadly, bolshevistic lies Are poisoning Free Enterprise-The Enterprise that PAYS.

Solo: The President of the Advertisers' Association

5. Conspirators on every side Free Enterprise have slandered, Forgetting that it's given us the world's best living stand-

We eat and drink supremely well at Mayflower, Ritz,

And no one drives more Cadillacs or bigger ones then

How blind the Socialist who plots this way of life to Free Enterprise brings wealth to all-at least to all who matter.

Chorus

Then hail we now Free Enterprise, Extol and give it praise! In grateful pride we publicize The soldier in this war who dies: "He died to save Free Enterprise-The Enterprise that PAYS!"

The Voice of Business

6. Free Enterprise does not, of course, mean silly competition, And cutting prices is a sin for which there's no remission; A "Gentlemen's Agreement" is the best of all devices

To stabilize our dividends, our markets, and our prices; For taking risks we've little love, we set our whole affection On something like monopoly, with adequate protection.

Chorus

Then hail we now Free Enterprise, Extol and give it praise! In it the world's salvation lies, Without it every freedom dies; O glorious Free Enterprise, O wonderful Free Enterprise, O MARVELOUS Free Enterprise-The Enterprise that PAYS!

J. D. K.

China in Distress

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

ACCORDING to Admiral Nimitz, Allied strategy calls for the ultimate seizure of bases on the coast of China. General Stilwell has promised that Chinese forces will drive eastward from the interior to effect a strategic junction with Allied forces advancing across the Pacific. The important military and political obstacles to be surmounted in the carrying through of such a plan were discussed recently in these columns.* What is not sufficiently appreciated is that the economic obstacles to a successful land offensive are equally great.

Americans traveling in China see the country's economic difficulties chiefly in terms of inflation. By the beginning of 1944 prices had mounted to such fantastic levels as to stagger the imagination. In Chungking, where the situation is worst, prices are now more than 200 times as high as in 1937 and are continuing to rise at the rate of 10 per cent or more a month. Because of the shortage of goods the price of some manufactured articles has risen more than 500-fold. Americans, who must exchange their dollars for Chinese currency at an artificially pegged rate, pay $10 or more for a meal, $60 for a pair of shoes, and $2 for a package of cigarettes.

Individuals are not the only ones affected. The American government faces an equally appalling situation in the development of its military facilities in China. Some of the difficulties are unavoidable. There is a scarcity of all kinds of supplies, and it has been made worse by hoarding. The chief hardship, however, is the result of arbitrary Chinese exchange restrictions. For despite the rapid decline in the purchasing power of Chinese currency, the official exchange rate, applicable to government as well as private transactions, has been maintained at 20 to 1. The true rate on the basis of changes in the purchasing power of the two currencies since 1937 is probably between 450 and 500 Chinese yuan for $1. Since the beginning of February State Department employees, American correspondents, missionaries, business men, and other foreigners have been granted a special 40-to-1 rate which has eased their position slightly. American relief funds have also been given the advantage of this special rate. But the American army's expenditures for airfields, barracks, and other military installations have, until the past week, remained pegged at the 20-to-1 ratio, a rate which practically precludes extensive undertakings. While the Chinese government offsets this handicap in part by building and paying for the operational parts of the airfields, the artificially pegged exchange rate has unquestionably delayed our military preparations. Discussions are now under way between the Chinese and American governments for some adjustment in the official exchange rate for military expenditures. But even if the army is given the benefit of the 40-to-1 rate, the cost of new facilities will still be so high as to prevent any but the most urgent kind of construction.

Why the United States government has permitted China to hamper the war effort, to exploit individual Americans, and minimize the effect of our relief activities by so greatly undervaluing the dollar is a matter of which no satisfactory explanation has ever been given. True, the right to fix the exchange rate is always regarded as one of the basic privileges of a sovereign nation. But in war time especially, it is a right which should be exercised in close cooperation with other countries. And it is difficult to see why the United States should feel obligated to provide China with the funds to support an exchange ratio that would otherwise collapse of its own weight. Yet that is precisely what we have done and are continuing to do. At the present moment half of the American $500,000,000 loan to China is still on deposit in this country in American currency, and it is estimated that China has an additional $200,000,000 in private assets invested in the United States. The present exchange rate unquestionably has aided China and individual Chinese citizens in maintaining these foreign assets abroad, but at the expense of the war effort.

China itself was not particularly harmed by the inflation in its early stages. About the only persons who suffered seriously during the early years of the war were teachers, government officials, and army officers, all of whom were dependent on fixed salaries. Hardest hit were the college professors. Early in 1943 it was estimated that the salaries of full professors in the Chinese universities, despite some increase, had a purchasing power only about one-twentieth as great as their pre-war salaries. It is still lower today. Although the government has sought to alleviate their plight by rice subsidies, many professors and officials find acute difficulty in obtaining the basic necessities of life. In contrast, coolies, skilled workers, and farmers suffered little, if at all, during the first three or four years of the inflation. Wages increased to keep pace with the cost of living, and farmers benefited from the higher prices obtainable for their crops.

During the past year, however, even these latter groups have begun to suffer from the general deterioration in production resulting from the inflation. Except for a few kinds of skilled labor, wages have fallen behind the rise in living costs. The strenuous efforts which the government has made to hold down the price of rice and other food has seriously affected small farmers. Such farmers now find that the prices of the things they must buy, few as they are, have risen more than the prices they receive for their crops. It is estimated that the real income of this group, scarcely above a bare subsistence level in normal times, has declined at least 10 per cent.

&quot;Victory Lies in China, by Maxwell S. Stewart, February 26, 1944.

Despite its catastrophic effect on large groups in the population, an inflationary rise in prices usually has a stimulating effect on production. This seems to have been true in China until about the time of Pearl Harbor, or a little later. Recently, however, essential war production has been increasingly curtailed by the universal shortage of goods and the efforts of the government to control prices. Factories making war materials have closed down or shifted to civilian production. Manufacturers who had made contracts with the government for munitions have frequently been compelled to cancel them because they found that the price offered by the government did not begin to cover the rising costs of raw materials and labor. Industrial and financial interests have found it more profitable to hoard and speculate in raw materials than to turn them into finished goods. Because of hoarding and high transportation costs, even governmentowned munitions plants have encountered difficulty in obtaining sufficient raw materials to operate at capacity. The production of other raw materials required by the United Nations has also been curtailed. For example, the output of wolfram, badly needed in the United States, was cut 50 per cent in 1943; in Yunnan the output of the great Kechiu tin mine has been reduced from 10,700 tons in 1938 to slightly more than 2,000 tons last year. Production of tungsten is also declining, and part of the output is alleged to have been smuggled into Japanese hands. The New York Times recently reported that 68 of the 364 factories in the Chungking area had closed their doors and that more were expected to do so before spring. Most construction, including the building of new strategic railways, has come to a standstill.

The government has done little to develop an adequate program of war production. Total steel output in 1942, for example, was only about 10,000 tons. This output could be increased several-fold by making greater use of the facilities of small village industries. But without an over-all plan for war production such an increase would be futile. Actually, according to the Ta Kung Pao, China's leading independent newspaper, "the iron-and-steel industry is producing more than consumers can buy." Commenting further on the inadequacy of industrial planning in war-time China, the Ta Kung Pao says: "A sound plan for industrial development has been lacking so far. Although government enterprises have achieved considerable results, it is open to discussion whether there is sufficient planning for the future. Private industries are being developed without rational planning in relation to existing communications and rawmaterial supplies."

For an explanation of this lack of planning and the general laxity on the economic front it is necessary to probe rather deeply into the economic and social structure of war-time China. The China of today is not the China of 1937. All its seaports and industrial cities have been lost. In losing them China also lost a large proportion of the men who had risen to financial and industrial leadership. When the great cities of Nanking, Shanghai, Canton, Hankow, and Hongkong fell into the hands of the enemy, the bankers, merchants, and industrialists who had founded modern business establishments in these cities stayed behind and were captured by the Japanese, were killed, or saw their property taken by the enemy. With the wiping out of this class of modern business men, financial leadership in China passed into the hands of those whose wealth lay in the interior, chiefly large landowners and merchants. This group has none of the progressive traditions of the port cities. It has its roots in China's archaic system of land tenure and is chiefly interested in perpetuating that system.

The tenancy problem varies considerably in different parts of China. In some sections, chiefly North China, most of the land is owned by those who farm it. But in other areas, including a large part of what is now Free China, most of the land is controlled by absentee landlords. The rents charged in these areas are extremely high, amounting to half or more of the total crops. Moreover, the landlords, the moneylenders, and the merchants often work together to maintain this highly exploitative share-cropping system, together with arrangements for small loans at extremely high rates of interest. Naturally, this combination has considerable political as well as economic power in the areas where it is dominant.

The inflation and the accompanying wave of speculation have probably increased its power, since this group alone has had idle money to use for hoarding and speculation. And to complete the vicious circle, this increased power has been used, according to the Ta Kung Pao, to prevent the Chinese government from instituting the bold policies necessary to stimulate production and bring the inflation under control, thus obstructing the effective prosecution of the war. Some critics go even farther and insist that the government's policy of subsidizing the landowners by agricultural credit loans—a policy entered into on the theory that this would increase farm production—has merely given the landlord more money for speculation and for lending out at exorbitant interest.

The situation appears to have been aggravated by the government's imposition of a tax in kind on the peasants and small craftsmen. This tax is of course a natural outgrowth of the inflation. In a period when prices are rising rapidly, taxes payable in currency are unsatisfactory, particularly for a country at war. Vast quantities of grain, meat, and other farm products are needed to feed the army, and the government can only be sure of getting these supplies if it collects them directly from the producer. At best, such a tax was bound to be unpopular with the farmers. But resentment has been made much greater in China by the presence of widespread favoritism and graft. It is generally believed that the large landowners, having both influence and money, get off rather lightly in the forced grain collections, while the poorer farmers are forced to contribute up to half of their total crop in "taxes." Furthermore, much of the grain that is collected never reaches the National Government authorities but serves merely to enrich the local militarists. And in some areas the collections have been so severe as to create famine conditions.

Equally unpopular with the Chinese peasant has been the enforcement of the universal-military-service law, which in theory is supposed to mobilize Chinese manpower for an all-out war effort. In some areas half to two-thirds of the men of military age have been conscripted for the army. In addition, a proportion of the men, horses, and carts in every village are drafted for transport and other noncombatant service. The national-service regulations are also subject to gross abuse. The peasants complain that they are often forced to work on projects wholly unconnected with the war for the benefit and enrichment of local military leaders.

In several parts of the country the resentment against forced grain collections and national labor service has led to open revolts against the government. The most serious of these revolts occurred in the widely separated provinces of Kweichow—where the most serious famine occurred—and Kansu. Several smaller peasant uprisings are known to have taken place in other sections of Free China. The Kansu revolt involved an area with a population of one to two million and was still not fully suppressed at last report. Kweichow's uprising was put down after a considerable loss of life.

Even from this brief survey it should be evident that China's economic problems are deepseated. While some critics insist that the government, by adopting all-out economic measures, could provide the basic war materials necessary for its own armies, few observers see any chance of this being accomplished without aid. If the Chinese economy is to be rehabilitated during the war so as to meet the on-the-spot needs of the United Nations armies, a considerable portion of the responsibility for planning and directing that effort will have to come from the United States. This obviously means more than mere financial assistance—although such assistance is essential.

A means of effective economic as well as military cooperation will have to be worked out before China can be made the base for offensive military operations against Japan. This cooperation will undoubtedly have political as well as economic and military implications. For it is evident that the revitalization of the Chinese war effort is at bottom a political problem, Because China is rightly sensitive regarding foreign interference in its internal affairs, this problem may be hard to solve. Experience with a century of Western imperialism has made the Chinese suspicious of foreign influence of any kind. Because of the depth of this feeling, the American, British, and Soviet governments have hitherto adopted a strictly "hands-off" attitude regarding China's economic and political problems. But there is at least reason to question whether this policy has been altogether wise in view of the immense stake which all four nations have in an early victory.

In the Wind

INTEREST in foreign languages runs with the tides of war and politics. The Berlitz School of Languages reports that the demand for Russian has more than doubled since the Red Army began to hit back in 1942, though it declines whenever Stalin makes a move or statement that is unpopular in this country. The Linguaphone Institute, which is also having a boom in Russian, says the demand for French slumped badly after the defeat of France but is now increasing rapidly.

THE NEUTRAL CONSCIENCE: Irish Travel, official organ of the Irish Tourist Association, recently published on one page photographs of "Fujiyama, the Sacred Mountain of Japan," and "Mount Erigal, Donegal." The caption, in large type at the top of the page, was "See Japan—in Ireland."

ALL IS NOT DARK in Dixie. Georgia has become the first state in the Union to sponsor a statewide Sew-for-Russia campaign among its high-school students. The Homemaking Division of the Department of Education expects 15,000 garments to be made by girl students this month.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY reports that the Virgin Mary has been made an honorary general in the Argentine army. She receives no salary, but is allowed a "vivaticum" of ten dollars a day—which is collected by the church.

FESTUNG EUROPA: A Danish underground newspaper comments thus on the 8 p.m. curfew imposed by the Nazis: "Does a Dane like anything better than to sit at home on a quiet night when the noise of the town has ceased and hear the stillness broken only by a violent explosion? That is the saboteurs' good-night kiss to Adolf."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Does Europe Need Germany?

BY LOUIS FISCHER

OLOTOV, Hull, and Eden resolved last autumn, at the Moscow conference, that "those German officers and men and members of the Nazi Party who have been responsible for or have taken a consenting part" in atrocities, massacres, and executions be sent back to the place of their crimes for punishment, and that others too, "whose offenses have no particular geographical localization" be judged by the Allies. Most persons in non-fascist countries will agree. But most persons will also agree that such retribution is only the first short step toward a solution of the German problem.

The main purpose of the peace is to prevent another war. Will the terms imposed by the victors on Germany—and Japan—create conditions that conduce to peace? That is the question. The primary criterion of the peace should not be its good or bad effect on Germany but its effect on the world.

Considering its murders and sins, Germany undoubtedly deserves a cruel, crushing peace. The real test of the future peace settlement, however, is not whether Germany deserves it but whether we can afford it.

There is little to choose between Germany's barbarities and aggressions and those of Japan. Chiang Kai-shek is the last man to forget Japan's misdeeds. In a January 1, 1944, broadcast Chiang revealed that, at the Cairo conference, President Roosevelt asked him his views on the fate of Japan. Chiang replied, "It is my opinion that the Japanese militarists must be wiped out and the Japanese political system must be purged of every vestige of aggressive elements. . . If the Japanese people should rise in a revolution to punish their warmongers and to overthrow their militarist government, we should respect their spontaneous will and allow them to choose their own form of government."

"President Roosevelt fully approved of my idea," Chiang added. Chiang explained that he was disclosing this historic conversation in order to proclaim China's readiness "to give a helping hand to the innocent and harmless people in Japan." Chiang Kai-shek, Roosevelt concurring, believes in another Japan.

Hitler and Himmler also believe in a second Germany; else they would not execute Germans for listening to the foreign radio and fill prisons and concentration camps with enemies of their regime. It is paying the Nazi dictatorship too high a compliment to assume that all Germans are pro-Nazi. A dictatorship is by definition a government which acts without consulting the people. Terror and the din of clever, repetitious propaganda often achieve subsequent popular acceptance of the acts of the dictatorship.

Numerous Germans became pro-Hitler when he won bloodless victories (Rhineland remilitarization in 1936, Austria and Czechoslovakia in 1938) which, in the Nazi-induced fog of nationalistic frenzy, seemed to confer benefits on Germany at no cost. Suppose Germany's bloody military defeats turn the pro-Nazis back into anti-Nazis, and suppose section of the German people sets up a government which is obviously and convincingly democratic. Suppose. Would we follow the Chiang Kai-shek prescription and change our treatment of Germany, or would we, like Nazis, insist that blood and race make all Germans incorrigibly bad?

Not all good Germans left Germany in 1848; some couldn't get out. Even Lord Vansittart says, "I have taken the percentage of good Germans at 25." Maybe it is 20, maybe 30. Whatever the percentage, the conclusion is clear: the "good Germans" must be helped to gain and keep power. The bad Germans must be denied access to power.

"We British ourselves derive in large measure from the same Teutonic stock" as the Germans, writes the celebrated British historian, G. P. Gooch, in an attack on Vansittartism. If all Germans are incurable savages and villains, what about the great numbers of civilized liberal Americans of German descent? American environment changed them? Then perhaps the task of the peacemakers is to create a new German environment.

WHY GERMAN DEMOCRACY FAILED

Germany recently conducted a full-scale experiment in democracy. Between 1919 and 1932, but particularly until 1929, Germany was a democracy with broad public support, real freedom of speech, assembly, and worship, vibrant parliamentary government (except for short lapses toward the end), vigorous trade unions, a great flowering of art and culture, free elections, and—between 1924 and 1929—considerable prosperity based on foreign borrowing. The Weimar Republic did not disrupt the peace of Europe.

In the end, the democratic forces of Germany proved too weak. The reasons? The feudal, militaristic, monopolistic elements in Germany were never deprived of their power for evil. The democrats were timid, Fabian, and usually non-violent. Despite adequate justification (the 1920 Kapp putsch, for instance) the republic did not stamp out the Junker estate owners, the Prussian army caste, the industrial trusts, or the unregenerate Kaiser-loving bureaucracy. These groups had made the First World War, using Wilhelm II as their instrument. Later they made the Second World War as Hitler's eager partners.

Those who would point a finger of scorn at vacillating, inadequate German democrats might do well to take a look at other democracies; they would observe a similar phenomenon. The Spanish Republicans were true democrats if there ever were any—and Teutonic blood in Spain is negligible. Did they, between 1931 and 1936, smash the militaristic, land-owning, pro-fascist monarchists who were all the time preparing the overthrow of the republic? In France democracy was a treasured right. Yet France succumbed in 1940 through the sins of its appeasing, anti-Popular-Front pro-

